(2) Of Cluain-aird-mobecog—May 26. He was son of Eoghan, son of Murchadh, descended from Oilill Olum. He was brother of St. Corbmac (Mar. 26), in whose Life his monastery is called Killbreacain or Cluainaird-Mobecóc, in Munster. (Colgan's Acta SS. 728, 751, c. 1, 2.) O'Clery (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 139) puts the site of this church in Muscraighe Breoghain (a district now comprised in the territory of Clanwilliam, in the south-west of the county of Tipperary), and attaches him also to Tigh Chonaill in Uí-Briuin Cualann (in barony of Rathdown, cos. Dublin and Wicklow), adding from the Life of St. Abban, that he himself built a church at Cluainaird-Mobecóc, and left Becan in it with the office of the holy church as in every church he blessed: this is said to have been when St. Abban had commenced to build churches in Ireland after his pilgrimage to Rome. In this church with its large and most regular monastery, at the foot of Mount Crotte in Muskerry, St. Becan continued till death, in prayers and tears and holy observances. (Colgan, Acta SS. 615, c. 20. 728, 751.) He died A.D. 689 or 690, and in the Annals of Ireland is known by the diminutives Dabec and Dabecoc (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 21, 129; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 294-95).

(3) Surnamed Ruim or Ruminn—March 17. He was son of Ernán, the son of Fiachna, of the race of Conall Gulban, chiefs of Tyrconnel. He was nearly related to St. Columba and to the early abbots of Hy. Leaving Ireland, he went first to Iona, and then into a solitary place, possibly near to the monastery, where he could devote himself to meditation and prayer, without breaking the fraternal bond. There he lived for several years while his uncle Segenius was abbot of the island, and about A.D. 633 his brother Cumineus addressed the well-known Paschal letter to Segenius, "Becanoque solitario, caro carne et spiritu fratri." On March 17th, A.D. 677, this monk, "candidus et benignus," died "in loco solitario." (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 277-8; Colgan, Acta SS. 408, c. 4, 630; Tr. Thaum. 482; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, 284-5; Reeves' St. Adamnan, 366.) [A. P. F.]

BECC or BEG, son of De—Oct. 12. His father was De, Deaghaidh, or Dagaicus, but his race is disputed. He seems to have been attached to the court of the monarch Diarmait of Tara about A.D. 550, when his prophecies appear to have had a wide reference and acceptance. (O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. iii. 173.) In the Fifth Life of St. Columba (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 403, c. 87) St. Becc is represented as one day meeting with St. Columba, when he went twice astray in prophesying with regard to his own life, so that instead of seven years, as he said, or seven months, he really had only seven hours to live. At once, confessed and contrite, he was absolved by St. Columba, and refreshed "sacro viatico Christi corpore:" thus he died, and by the prayers of St. Columba passed into the heavenly joys. The Four Masters (by O'Donovan, i. p. 197) place at A.D. 557 the death of this "celebrated prophet." Colgan (Acta SS. 713, c. 4, § 3) gives his genealogy from Colla-da-chrioch; but the ancient pedigree represents him as eighth in descent from Niall of the Nine Hostages (Mont. Dong. by Todd and Reeves, 272). [A. P. F.]

BECGA or BEGGA, d. of Gabhrán, V.—Feb. 10. It is said (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 121) that when St. Patrick was in East Meath, he left at the church of Techlaisran, in that county, two of his disciples, Bega a virgin and Lugaídh a priest (April 17), probably brother and sister, the children of Gaurán. Near the church-door were a well and a tomb, the latter having the name of Feart-Bige, or Bega's tomb.

BEDA, more correctly BAEDA. (1) THE VENERABLE. Bede was born on the estate given by Egfrith, king of Northumbria, to Benedict Biscop for the foundation of his sister monasteries of Wearmouth and Jarrow, probably however before the lands were so bestowed; for the Wearmouth estate was given in 674 and the Jarrow one in 682, whilst the birth of Bede seems satisfactorily fixed to 673. The place of his birth is uncertain, for whilst tradition and local history fix it at Jarrow, there is no positive evidence. Nor are the names of his parents preserved. He himself, writing, as it may be reasonably concluded, immediately on the completion of his History in 731, describes himself then as in the 59th year of his age; this would fix his birth in 673; but as he lived until 735, and the passage in question may have been added at any time between 731 and 735, the year has been sometimes fixed as late as 677. Mabillon, however, whose arguments are sound and whose conclusion has been generally received, accepts the earlier date. At the age of seven he was handed over by his relations to the care of Benedict Biscop, who had not then, in 680, begun the buildings at Jarrow, but had just returned from Rome bringing with him the arch-chanter John. Under Benedict's care Bede was educated in one or both of the sister monasteries, and after the death of Benedict he passed under the rule of Ceolfrith. At the age of 19 he was ordained deacon by John of Beverley, at that time bishop of Hexham, and in his thirtieth year he received the priesthood from the same prelate; as John ceased to be bishop of Hexham in 705, and the later date for Bede's birth would place his ordination as priest in 706 at the earliest, this may be regarded as conclusively in favour of the earlier date; in which case he was ordained deacon in 691 and priest in 702. From the date of his admission to the joint monastery to his death he remained there employed in study and devotional exercises, and there is no evidence that he ever wandered from the banks of the Wear further than to York, which he visited shortly before his death. In the valuable MS. Cotton, Tiberius A. xv. fo. 50; which is not later than the 10th century, is preserved a letter of Pope Sergius to Ceolfrith, desiring him to send to Rome, "religiosum famulum Dei N. venerabilis monasterii tui," to assist in the examination of some points of ecclesiastical discipline. This letter was very early believed to refer to Bede; and by the time of William of Malmesbury had begun to be read, "religiosum Dei famulum Bedam, venerabilis monasterii tui presbyterum;" the name of Bede resting on the authority of William of Malmesbury only, and the word presbyterum on an interlineation in the Cotton MS. as well. If the word presbyterum be authentic it is a strong argument against the identification of Bede, for he was not ordained priest until 702, and Sergius died in 701; on the other hand, it is not essential to the sense, rests apparently on an interpolation, and even if genuine may be accounted for as a mistake on the part of the pope. Intercourse between Wearmouth and Rome was nearly continuous at this period, and there would not seem to have been any monk under Ceolfrith's rule, to whom the reference would be more likely than to Bede. Some monks of the monastery went to Rome in 701 (Bede, de Temporum Ratione, c. 47), and brought a privilege from Sergius on their return (Hist. Abbat. c. 12), but Bede was not among them. On the whole, probability is in favour of the supposition that the invitation was meant for Bede, and the acceptance of it was perhaps prevented by the death of Sergius. Whether Bede's studies were mainly carried on at Wearmouth or at Jarrow is not an important question; as he died and was buried at the latter place, it is probable that he also lived there chiefly, but the two houses were in the strictest union, and he was as much at home in one as in the other. Under the liberal and enlightened administration of Benedict Biscop and Ceolfrith, Bede enjoyed advantages which could not perhaps have been found anywhere else in Europe at the time; perfect access to all the existing sources of learning in the West. Nowhere else could he acquire at once the Irish, the Roman, the Gallican, and the Canterbury learning; the accumulated stores of books which Benedict had bought at Rome and at Vienne; or the disciplinary instruction drawn from the monasteries of the continent as well as from the Irish missionaries. Amongst his friends and instructors were Trumbert, the disciple of St. Chad, and Sigfrid, the fellow pupil of St. Cuthbert under Boisil and Eata; from these he drew the Irish knowledge of Scripture and discipline. Acca, the bishop of Hexham and pupil of St. Wilfrid, furnished him with the special lore of the Roman school, martyrological and other; his monastic learning, strictly Benedictine, came through Benedict Biscop from Lerins and the many continental monasteries his master had visited; and from Canterbury, with which he was in friendly correspondence, he probably obtained instruction in Greek, in the study of the Scriptures, and other more refined learning. His own monastery was a place of rest and welcome for all learned strangers such as was abbot Adaman (Bede, H. E. v. 21). And Bede seems to have lost no opportunity of increasing his stores.

He himself describes the nature of his studies, the meditation on Scripture, the observance of regular discipline, the care of the daily singing in church, "semper aut discere, aut docere, aut scribere dulce habui." These were the occupations of his youth. From the time of his ordination he devoted himself to selecting from the works of the Fathers passages suitable for illustration and edification, and, as he adds modestly, he even busied himself with adding contributions of his own after the pattern of their explanations and interpretations.

The list of his works given at the conclusion of his History, Bede seems to have arranged in the order of their relative importance, not of their composition; and most of them afford only very slight indications of the dates at which they were written. It is probable that the earliest of his writings are the more elementary ones, on Orthography, the Ars Metrica and the De Natura rerum. The Ars Metrica is dedicated at the conclusion to Cuthbert, a "conlevita" which seems to fix the date of writing earlier than 702 (Opp. ed. Giles, vi. 78). The De Temporibus, the latest date of which is 702, may have followed almost immediately, and the De Natura Rerum has been referred to the same date. The De Sex aetatibus Saeculi was written five years later to be read to Wilfrid. The whole of the Commentaries are of later date; they are all dedicated to bishop Acca, who succeeded his master Wilfrid in 709. The Commentary on the Apocalypse, that on the Catholic epistles, and that on the Acts, came first. Then the Commentary on St. Luke; that on Samuel followed, three books of it being written before the death of Ceolfrith in 716: that on St. Mark many years after. The treatise De Temporum Ratione is assignable on internal evidence to 726. Before the composition of the History comes that of the life of Cuthbert and of the abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow which are referred to in the greater work. The History itself was completed in 731, after which only the Epistola ad Egbertum seems to have been written. If these indications are trustworthy, it will follow that the author gives the list of his works, with some important exceptions however, in the reverse order of their composition. The last work on which he was employed at the time of his death was the translation into English of the Gospel according to St. John.

The attainments of Bede were very great. He certainly knew Greek (H. E. v. 24) and had some knowledge of Hebrew. Among the classical writers of antiquity he knew Virgil, Ovid, Lucan, Lucretius, Terence, and a host of smaller poets. Homer he quotes once, and may have taken his authority at second-hand. He knew nearly all the second-rate poets, using them for the illustration of the Ars Metrica. The earlier fathers were of course in familiar use. The diversity as well as the extent of his reading is remarkable; grammar, rhetoric, poetry, hagiography, arithmetic, chronology, the holy places, the Paschal controversy, epigrams, hymns, sermons, pastoral admonition and the conduct of penitents: even speculations on natural science, on which he specially quotes Pliny, furnished work for his pen, besides his great works on history and the interpretation of Scripture. On all these points his knowledge was thoroughly up to the learning of the day; his judgment independent and his conclusions sound. He must have had good teachers as well as a good library and an insatiable desire of learning.

These qualifications fitted him for the remarkable place he holds in literature. Having centred in himself and in his writings nearly all the knowledge of the day, he was enabled before his death, by promoting the foundation of the school of York, to kindle the flame of learning in the West at the moment that it seemed both in Ireland and in France to be expiring. The school of York transmitted to Alcuin the learning of Bede, and opened the way for culture on the continent, when England under the terrors of the Danes was relapsing into barbarism. It is impossible to read the more popular writings of Bede, especially the Ecclesiastical History, without seeing that the great knowledge of the scholar was coupled with the humility and simplicity of the purest type of monasticism. Employed on a theme which, in the prevailing belief of miraculous stories, could scarcely be treated of without incurring the charge of superstition, he is eminently truthful. The wonders that he relates on his own account are easily referred to very conceivable natural causes; and scarcely in any case is a reputed miracle recounted without an authority. Gentleness is hardly less universally found than truthfulness. He is a monk and politician of the school of Benedict Biscop, not of that of Wilfrid. The soundness and farsightedness of his ecclesiastical views would be remarkable in any age, and are especially remarkable in a monk. His letter to Egbert contains lessons of wisdom, clear perception of abuses, and distinct recommendation of remedies, which in the neglect or observance of them might serve as a key for the whole later history of the Anglo-Saxon church. And the same letter breathes the purest patriotism and the most sincere love of the souls of men. There is scarcely one of the fathers of whose personal history so little is known, and whose personal character comes out in his writings so clearly as that of Bede in this letter, and in his wonderful History.

Loved and honoured by all alike, Bede spent his life in his monastery in a period which, at least for Northumbria, was one of very varied character. The wise Aldfrid reigned during his youth and early manhood, but many years of disquiet followed his death, and even the accession of his friend Ceolwulf in 731 did not assure him as to the end of the evils, the growth of which since king Aldfrid's death he had watched with misgivings. His bishops, first John of Beverley, and after the few years of Wilfrid's final restoration, Acca his friend and correspondent, and his abbots, first Ceolfrith and then Huaetbert, were men to whom he could look up and who valued him. His fame, if we may judge from the demand for his works immediately after his death, extended wherever the English missionaries or negotiators found their way; and both in England and on the continent it must have been widely spread during his life. Nearly every kingdom of England furnished him with materials for his History: it was a London priest who searched the records at Rome for the monk of Jarrow; abbot Albanus transmitted to him the details of the history of the Kentish church; bishop Daniel, the patron of Boniface, supplied the West Saxon; the monks of Lastingham, the depositories of the traditions of Cedd and Chad, reported how Mercia was converted; Esi wrote from East Anglia, and Cynibert from Lindsey.

Soon after his visit to Egbert at York in 734 his health began to fail; and by Easter, 735, he had become asthmatic. But he laboured to the last, and, like Benedict Biscop, spent the time of unavoidable prostration in listening to the reading and singing of his companions. When he could, he continued the work of translation, and had reached the 9th verse of the 6th chapter of St. John on the day he died. As the end approached, he distributed the few little treasures that he had been allowed to keep in his chest, a little pepper, incense, and a few articles of linen; then, having completed the sentence which he was dictating, he desired to be propped up with his face towards his church. He died repeating the Gloria Patri. The day is fixed by the letter of Cuthbert, who details the events of his death-bed in a letter to his friend Cuthwin, May 26, 735. He was buried at Jarrow where he died; his relics were in the 11th century removed to Durham, and in 1104 were found in the same coffin with those of St. Cuthbert. The story of his epitaph and the tradition of the bestowal of the title of Venerable is too well known and too apocryphal to be repeated here. For the subsequent fate of his remains see CUTHBERT.

His death was in perfect harmony with his devout and studious life. Alcuin has preserved one of his sayings relative to the singing of the hours in church, "I know that the angels visit the canonical hours and gatherings of the brethren: what if they find not me there among the brethren? Will they not say, Where is Bede: why does he not come with the brethren to the prescribed prayers?" (Alc. Epist. 16, ed. Migne.)

Of the legendary or fictitious statements about Bede, the following are the most important; his personal acquaintance with Alcuin, which is impossible, see ALCUIN; his education and sojourn at Cambridge, on which see Giles, Bed. Opp., i. lxx., sq.; his visits to Italy and burial at Genoa or at Rome, which seem to belong to another person of the same name (ib. i. cvi.), and the legendary statements about his title of Venerable (ib. i. ci.). For a detailed investigation of these, and the alleged authorities on which they have been supposed to rest, see Gehle (Disp. Hist. Theol. de Bed. Ven. Leyden, 1838, pp. 2-4, 17-21); and the same learned monograph may be referred to for the fallacies as to the date of Bede's death, pp. 31, sq.

Bede's list of his own works may be arranged as follows:—

I. Commentaries on the Old Testament; viz. Genesis, 4 books, derived chiefly from Basil, Ambrose, and Augustine; the Tabernacle, 3 books; Samuel, 3 books; the Building of the Temple, 2 books; on Kings, 30 questions dedicated to Nothelm; Proverbs, 3 books; Canticles, 7 books; on Isaiah, Daniel, the twelve minor prophets and part of Jeremiah, extracts from Jerome; on Ezra and Nehemiah, 3 books; on the song of Habakkuk, 1 book; on Tobit, 1; chapters of lessons on the Pentateuch, Joshua, and Judges; Kings, Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Canticles, Isaiah, Ezra, and Nehemiah.

II. Commentaries on the New Testament: St. Mark, 4 books; St. Luke, 6 books; 2 books of homilies on the Gospel; on the Acts, 2 books; a book on each of the Catholic Epistles; 3 books on the Apocalypse, chapters of Lessons on the whole New Testament except the Gospels.

III. Letters: de sex Aetatibus; de Mansionibus filiorum Israel; de eo quod ait Esaias "et claudetur, &c.;" de ratione Bisserti; de Aequinoctio.

IV. Hagiographies: on St. Felix, rendered from the poem of Paulinus; on Anastasius, a revised translation from the Greek; on St. Cuthbert, in verse and prose; the abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow; the History of the English Church; and the Martyrology.

V. Hymns and epigrams.

VI. Scientific books: de Natura rerum, de Temporibus, de Temporum Ratione.

VII. Elementary books: on Orthography, Ars Metrica, Schemata, and Tropes.

Besides these we know that he wrote translations into his own language, none of which are extant, from the Scriptures; Retractationes on the Acts; the Letter to Egbert; and a book on penance on which more will be found below.

In the default of a critical edition of the works of Bede, which can hardly be looked for at the present day, a general reference may be given to Gehle's disputation on the subject, which furnishes materials for most of the following notes.

Bede's collected works, including many that are not his, have been published at Paris, 1544; at Basel, 1563; at Cologne, 1612, 1688; and by Dr. Giles, at London and Oxford, in 1843; and in Migne's Patrologia, xc.-xcv.

The several editions of the separate extant works, whether singly or conjointly, are as follows:—

I. The Commentaries on the Old Testament: (1.) Genesis, partly in the Basel and Cologne editions, completed by Henry Wharton from a Lambeth MS. in Opera quaedam Historica, London, 1693; and by Martene and Durand, Thesaurus Anecdot. v. 115. (2.) The Tabernacle. (3.) Samuel. (4.) On the Temple. (5.) Questions on Kings; these are in all the editions. (6.) Proverbs; published among the works of St. Jerome, and in all the collective editions. (7.) On Canticles, against Julian, bishop of Celano. (8.) Ezra and Nehemiah, founded on St. Jerome. (9.) On the Song of Habakkuk, first published by Wharton in the Opera Historica, 1693; by Martene and Durand, Thesaurus, v. 295. (10.) Tobit, in the collective editions. (11.) The Pentateuch; the Questiones, published in the Basel edition, vol. viii., are not Bede's; and the Expositiones in vol. iv. of the same edition are questioned, and are not contained in Giles's edition. (12.) Kings and the Verba Dierum, rest on the same evidence as the Expositiones (No. 11), and are in all the editions except Giles's. (13.) The book on Job, published as Bede's in the collective editions of Basel and Cologne, belongs to an earlier writer, Philip, a pupil of St. Jerome. The works called by Bede Distinctiones Capitulum, on the Prophets, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Canticles, Ezra and Nehemiah, are not known to exist; but it is probable that they were merely an arrangement of these books for reading, rather than commentaries; a theory which, if true, will account for the appearance of the works of other writers under the name of Bede.

II. Commentaries on the New Testament: (1.) St. Mark, and (2.) St. Luke are all in the editions. (3.) The Homilies; 140 are printed in the Basel and Cologne editions, and also separately at Paris and Louvain; and 11 more by Martene and Durand, Thesaurus, v. 317. But of these a large number are either spurious or mere fragments; and Dr. Giles, having obtained an early and sound MS., prints only 59 of the best authenticated.

(4.) The Apostolus (Epistles), drawn chiefly from Augustine, published by Bousard in 1499, and in the collected editions, except Giles's; this, however, is rejected as not being Bede's by Mabillon, who knew another MS. containing the authentic work (Analecta, p. 18).

(5.) The Acts, (6.) the Catholic Epistles, (7.) the Apocalypse, are in all the editions. (8.) The Capitula Lectionum are not known to exist, but they were probably the mere Distinctiones Capitulum, on which remark has been made above. (9.) The Retractationes on the Acts, not mentioned by Bede in the list of his works, are in all the editions.

III. The Epistles: (1.) De sex Aetatibus saeculi, to Plegwin; ed. Ware, Dublin, 1664; Wharton, London, 1698; and in Giles. (2.) De Pascha Celebratione, to Wichred; in all the collective editions.

(3.) Ad Albinum; sent with a copy of the History; ed. Mabillon, Analecta (ed. nov.), p. 398. (4.) Ad Egbertum; ed. Ware 1664, Wharton, 1693; edd. Smith, Hussey, Moberly, &c. (5.) Ad Accam, de Mansionibus florum Israel; first printed by Giles. (6.) Ad Accam de eo quod ait Esaias; also first printed by Giles. Of the other letters printed in his edition, No. 7, addressed to Nothelm, is the preface to the Questions on Kings, and No. 12 to Eusebius, is the dedication of the Commentary on the Apocalypse; the rest, Nos. 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 13, are the introductory letters to Acca prefixed to the several books of the Commentaries. In another collection of Anecdota, Dr. Giles has printed for the first time the Epistola de Bisexto ad Helmwaldum, mentioned by Bede in the list of his works (Anecdota Bedae, &c., London, 1851).

IV. The Lives of the Saints: (1.) St. Felix; AA. SS. Bollund. Jan. i. 943; Smith, Appendix to the Echl. Hist. (2.) St. Cuthbert; Canisius, Lectt. Antiqq. v. 492 (ed. Basnage, ii. 1-24). Mabillon, AA. SS. O.S.B. saec. ii. 877-937; Smith, Stevenson; (3.) Vitae Abbatum; Ware, 1664, Wharton, 1693; Smith and Stevenson.

4. Historia Ecclesiastica, ed. Esslingen, 1471; Strasburg, 1473; Esslingen, 1475; Strasburg, 1500; Hagenau, 1506; Strasburg, 1506; Paris, 1514; Cologne, 1537; Antwerp, 1550; Paris, 1554; Basel, 1563; Louvain, 1566; Cologne, 1601, 1612; Heidelberg, 1587; Cambridge, ed. Wheloc, 1643, 1644; Paris, ed. Chifflet, 1681; Cologne, 1688; Cambridge, ed. Smith, 1722; London, by Stevenson (English Hist. Soc.) 1838; in the Monumenta Historica Britannica, ed. Petrie and Hardy, 1848; Oxford, ed. Hussey, 1846; Oxford, ed. Moberly, 1869; and in the collected editions. It has been translated into English by Stapleton, 1565; Stevens, 1723; Hurst, 1814; Giles, 1840; and Gidley, 1871.

5. Martyrologium; first published by Henschenius, in AA. SS. Bollund. Jan. i. 40; Mar. ii. § 5; the works given under the name in the earlier editions being discarded as not authentic; also in Smith and Giles.

6. Liber Hymnorum; ed. Cassander, Paris, 1556, 1616. Wernsdorf, Poetae Lat. Min. ii. 239-244.

7. Libellus de Situ urbis Jerusalem; in the collective editions and in Smith.

V. The Scientific works: (1) de Natura Rerum; Basel, 1529; and edd.; (2) de Temporibus, by Colomiés, Paralipomena de Script. Eccl. and edd.; (3) de Temporum Ratione; edd. The portion known as the Chronicon was published separately, and appears by itself in Smith, and in the Mon. Hist. Britt.

VI. The elementary works: (1) Orthographia, ed. Putsch, Hanau, 1605. (2) De Arte Metrica; ed. Putsch. 1605; Cassander, 1616, and edd. (3) Schemata, &c., ed. Pithou, Rhetores, pp. 342-355; ed. Venice, 1522; Basel, 1536; Paris, 1599.

VII. The Penitential of Bede, in its genuine form, is printed by Martene and Durand, Amplissima Collectio, vii. 37; Wasserscheleben, Dussordnungen, pp. 220-230; Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 326, sq. The Liber de Remedii Peccatorum, ascribed to Bede, is not genuine, but a compilation from his work and that of Egbert.

A list of all the works ascribed to Bede will be found in Wright's Biographia Britannica Literaria. (See Gehle's Disputatio Hist. Theolog. de Ven. Beda, Leyden, 1838; Wright, Biogr. Brit. Lit. ii. 263-283. The preface of Dr. Giles to the collected works, Potthast, Bibl. Med. Aev. Hist., 159, 160. Mabillon, AA. SS. O.S.B. saec. iii. pt. i. 500-524. AA. SS. Boll. May, vi. pp. 718-723.)

(2) A name occurring in the pedigree of the kings of the Lindisfari, as father to Biscop. [See BENEDICTUS BISCOP.]

(3) Beda Major; a priest mentioned by Bede himself, as present with S. Cuthbert at his death (V. S. Cuthb. c. 37). His epitaph, written by his pupil Luting is given by Mabillon in the Analecta (ed. nov.) p. 381; he fixes the date by the notes of time in the Epitaph to A.D. 681, Feb. 9: but as Cuthbert died after this in 687, the epitaph must belong to some other Bede.

(4) A monk contemporary with Charles the Great, sometimes confounded with the Venerable Bede. Mabillon (Iter Italicum, p. 144) gives an epitaph recorded by Romanus, as existing formerly in the church of St. Peter at Rome; and Ware refers to Raphael of Volaterra for the story that his tomb was at Genoa. A life of Beda junior, who died at Genoa about 883, is given in the AA. SS. Boll. April, i. 867-873. It is probable that the name was not very uncommon, and that traces of the Venerable Bede were eagerly sought for and even fabricated. [S.]

BEDWINI, a Celtic bishop, whose name occurs in the stories about Arthur, is said to have lived at Cellwig. He is conjecturally connected with Bodmin (Rees, Welsh Saints, 238; Whitaker, Cathedral of Cornwall, i. 45, ii. 234). [C. W. B.]

BEGA; BEZA, BEYA, BEGGA, BEE, S. A Cumbrian saint of whom nothing is clearly known, and whom the endeavours of the hagiographers have only succeeded in investing with a history which belongs to several other saints. According to Alban Butler (Sept. 6), she was an Irish virgin who lived as an anchoress in the 7th century, and founded a nunnery in Copeland. He also mentions a place in Scotland called Kilbees after her. This is the most reasonable account. According to the life of her seen by Leland (Coll. iii. 36), after founding her monastery in Cumberland she removed into Northumberland and founded another north of the Wear; then to Hert, where she becomes identical with St. Heiu [HEIU], and then to Tadcaster; winding up her career at Hackness, as identical with St. Begu [BEGU]. (Mon. Angl. iii. 576). Begu and Heiu are well known from Bede, and were two different persons, neither of them possibly identical with the Cumbrian saint; yet Suysken in his commentary on St. Bega (AA. SS. Boll. Sept. ii. 694-700) accepts this version as true. In default of an English career for the saint, she is next sought in Ireland and Scotland, and the Aberdeen Breviary contains lessons for two saints, with either of whom she might be identified. (1.) St. Bega, venerated at Dunbar, who lived in an island called Cumbria in the Ocean Sea, as an anchoress, visited occasionally by St. Maura; and dying, Sept. 3rd, was buried in her island, whence the rector of Dunbar, attempting to fetch her remains, was driven back by a storm. (2.) St. Egga, an Irish princess, given in marriage by her parents against her will, hears of the Gospel as preached in England; flies to England to Oswald and Aidan, and becomes the first abbess of nuns in England. She has her home in a desert island, and in her old age resigns her abbacy to St. Hilda, under whose rule she ends her days, Oct. 31. After 460 years her remains are removed to Whitby (Brev. Aberd. pars aestiv. fo. 145 and 136). Here are probably some reminiscences of St. Heiu. She was probably a local saint of the 8th century. The monastery bearing her name was founded as a cell to St. Mary's at York, in the reign of Henry I. [S.]

BEG-BILE, son of Tigernach - Oct. 12. Being descended from Conall Gulban, this Irish saint was related to St. Columba, and lived at the close of the sixth century. He was brother of St. Conan-dil (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 563; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 275).

BEGHA V.—Oct. 31, circ. A.D. 660—also called St. Bez and St. Begagh. She left her home in Ireland on hearing of the flourishing state of Christianity in Britain, and, in order to avoid a marriage intended for her, fled into Scotland in a ship that was in waiting. She received the veil at the hand of Bishop Aidan, in the reign of King Oswald in Britannia, and ruled a community in a cell constructed by him in a certain desert island. When St. Hilda returned from Gaul (Bede, Ecl. Hist. iv. c. 23), St. Begha prayed that she might be freed from the burden of government, and that St. Hilda might be consecrated abbess in her stead, and this was accordingly done. After many years she died in the odour of sanctity, attested by many miracles at her tomb, especially by the miraculous cure of the two sons of a Frenchman from Chartres. (Brev. Aberd. pars aestiv. f. cxxvi.) Bede mentions a nun called Begu, in the monastery of Haeconos, thirteen miles from Whitby, to whom the death of St. Hilda was revealed in a vision (Ecl. Hist. iv. c. 23). St. Begha is honoured at Kilbagie and Kilbucho in Scotland; but her greatest foundation was within the kingdom of Strathclyde, at St. Bees, which takes its designation from her. It was founded in A.D. 656. Afterwards a priory was endowed on its foundation by William de Meschines, Lord of Copeland, temp.

Henry I. There was a cell of this house at Nendrum or Mahee Island, in Down county. (See Description of Nendrum, by Rev. William Reeves, D.D., 1845, and his Eccl. Antiq. 163, 190, sqq. for the grant of the island of Neddrum or Nendrum, by Sir John de Courcy, in 1178, to the priory of St. Bega de Coupland. Bishop Forbes, Kal. of Scott. Saints, p. 278.) In treating of the Anglo-Saxon nuns, Montalembert (Monks of the West, Edinb. iv. 58-9 and v. 248-52) deals with the difficulties connected with S. Bega, giving a concise account of the traditions and historical speculations regarding her, but without deciding whether she is the Begu of Bede, or whether the traditions do not really belong to two or more individuals. (See also Orig. Par. Scot. i. 177; Bolland, Acta SS. Sept. tom. ii. 694; Faber, Life of S. Bega, 1844; Tomlinson, Vit. S. Begaie in Carlisle Hist. Tracts.; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 257-58.) [BEGA.] [A. P. F.]

BEGU, a nun of Hackness, in Yorkshire, for more than thirty years, who is said to have had a supernatural intimation of the death of S. Hilda in 674 (Bed. H. E. iv. 23). She has been sometimes supposed to be identical with S. Bega. [BEGA.] [S.]

BELLATOR, fl. c. 550, a presbyter, friend of Cassiodorus, at whose request he wrote commentaries on Ruth, appended by Cassiodorus to Origen's exposition to complete a comment on the Octateuch. He also wrote commentaries on Tobit, Esther, Judith, Maccabees, and Wisdom, the whole of which have perished. He translated two books of Origen's Homilies on Esdras, and Huet regards him as the author of the extant Latin version of some of the works of that father. (Cassiod. de Inst. Div. c. i. 540, c. v. 542, c. vi. 543; Siebert, de Ill. Eccl. Script. c. 89; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 525.) [E. V.]

BEMA. [MANES.]

BENEDICTUS OF ANIANE. This "second founder" of monasticism in Europe, or "second Benedict," as he has been called [see BENEDICTUS OF NURSIA, p. 309], was born in Languedoc (Occitania, Septimania) about the middle of the 8th century. His father Agulfus, count of Maguelone (Magalona, Magdalona), a cathedral city till the 16th century (Bailet, Vie des Saints), was cup-bearer in the court of Pepin and his son, and is described as of Gothic extraction (Ardo, Vit. Bened. Anian. c. 4); the Goths, according to Mabillon (ad loc. cit.), having settled about Toulouse (Tolosa) early in the 5th century. Benedict was brought up to arms and courtly exercises, as a young nobleman of the time; but even then he cherished an idea of strict self-discipline (Vit. c. 5), which before long ripened into his taking the monastic vow. An accident which befell him was the immediate occasion. While serving in the army of the great Karl in Italy, about A.D. 774, he had a narrow escape from drowning, in saving his brother's life, in the river Ticino (Ticinus), near Pavia (Vit. c. 6; cf. Mabill. ad loc.). He resolved, without his father's knowledge apparently, to become a monk, and by the advice of a blind old hermit whom he consulted, betook himself to the monastery of St. Seine (Sequanus), in a forest of Burgundy, and there, after probation, was duly admitted (Vit. c. 6). It was then probably that he assumed the name of Benedict. Here he remained for the space of two years and a half; or, according to another reading, five years and a half (Vit. cc. 10, 58; cf. Mabill. ad loc.), voluntarily taking upon himself the most menial offices (Vit. c. 7). But though the abbat showed his appreciation of the new brother, by appointing him "cellarer," or house-steward, an office almost next to his own, Benedict's austerities made him unpopular with the monks generally, who derided his emaciation and dirty habits (c. 9), and resented his strictures (c. 10). Indeed, Benedict at this period of his life, seems, in the fervour of a convert, to have aimed too high; even disparaging the wisely tolerant rule of his great namesake, as fit only for "novices and weak brethren," and preferring the sterner rule of the ascetics of the East (c. 8). However, his intense earnestness prevailed, and on the death of the abbat, the monks unanimously (c. 10) invited Benedict to be their head. But he declined, being conscious of an incompatibility in spirit; and returning to his own native district, built a "cell" in the gorge of the stream Aniane (Anianus), for himself and one or two monks who accompanied him thither (cc. 10, 14).

From this insignificant beginning arose the monastery which Ardo, the biographer of Benedict early in the 9th century (cf. Vit. c. 40), calls "the head not only of the monasteries in Gothia, but of many others" (c. 27). Before long many persons flocked to the spot, attracted by the fame of Benedict's sanctity; of these some went away disgusted by the scantiness of the fare doled out (c. 11), others attached themselves to him. With their aid Benedict raised the walls of a small monastery, himself working with the rest. Everything was on a very simple scale, the only possession, at first, of the little brotherhood being an ass and some utensils for grinding their corn; their food chiefly bread and water, with milk supplied by the peasant women of the neighbourhood (cc. 12, 13). Even for divine service Benedict at this time declined the gift of anything costly, preferring to use vessels of wood, or of glass, such as were subsequently forbidden by a council near Maintz (Conc. Triburiense), in A.D. 893 (c. 14; cf. Mabill. ad loc.). Slaves he refused to accept, or at once set them free (c. 14). As was inevitable, the property of the monastery gradually increased; and the depredations of his lawless neighbours put Benedict's patience often to the test (cc. 13, 19). Still the work of the monastery went on and prospered. In the famine which visited those parts about A.D. 779 (c. 16; cf. Mabill. ad loc.) the monks gave relief freely, and the example of their self-abnegation was contagious; other monastic communities sprung into existence all around (c. 15).

A larger and stately building was erected about A.D. 782 (Vit. c. 26; cf. Mabill. ad loc.), to accommodate 1000 monks (c. 34), with all its appurtenances of proportionate grandeur. To this were affiliated, as usual, numerous "cellae" or priories as dependencies in the district (c. 34). Benedict meantime was diligently acquiring books for the library of the monastery, and forming that collection of "Rules" which he subsequently turned to good account in his reformation of the monastic system (c. 27). He welcomed to his monastery the visit of any monk eminent for piety, specially from Monte Cassino, the head-quarters of Western monachism, in order to make himself thoroughly acquainted with the various usages. His influence as a Reformer began to make itself felt perceptibly. He formed classes in his monastery, under competent teachers, for training monks and clergy in his rules (c. 36); and these, his pupils, went forth, as colonists, to found new monasteries or to resuscitate those in which the monastic spirit was dying away. He was frequently consulted from all quarters. The archbishop of Lyons and the bishop of Orleans sent to ask for some of his monks to aid in rebuilding monasteries in their dioceses (c. 36). Alcuin, then presiding over the great monastery of St. Martin at Tours, was his intimate correspondent (c. 36). He was fortunate, too, in royal favour. Louis, at that time king of Aquitaine, a devoted patron of monachism, and his queen, were his constant friends (c. 43 et pass.). Benedict had placed his monastery under the royal jurisdiction, that it might be in no danger from the claims of his own relatives (c. 27). Louis proved himself worthy of this confidence. He enriched the monastery largely (Mab. Obs. Praev. in Vit.; cf. c. 45), and gave Benedict authority as Visitor to regulate all the monasteries in his kingdom (c. 43). Benedict's munificence seems to have made him acceptable in this capacity (c. 43).

Towards the close of the 8th century the heresy of the "Adoptionists" or "Adoptians," who maintained that Christ, according to His human nature, is the Son of God by adoption only, made its way across the Pyrenees from Spain northwards. At the head of this party were Elipandus, archbishop of Toletum (Toledo), and Felix, bishop of Urgella (Urgel). Their teaching was condemned, as tending to Nestorianism, at the councils of Ratisbon (Conc. Ratispon. A.D. 792), Frankfort (Conc. Francofurt. A.D. 794), and Aachen (Conc. Aquisgran. A.D. 799). Benedict's friend Alcuin wrote strenuously against the Adoptionists, and Benedict himself, by his reputation for sanctity and learning, was drawn into the controversy (Alcuin, Ep. Praev. Lib. IV. contr. Elipand.). He was sent more than once into Spain on this business, and was present at the synod of Urgel (Conc. Urgell. A.D. 799) (Baluz. Not. ad Agobard. cited by Mab. on Bened. Anian. Vit. c. 17). But controversy was not his forte (Herzog, Real-Encyclop. s. v.), and the controversial writings attributed to him, and which, if his, owe their existence, perhaps, to this controversy, are the least important of his works (cf. Baluz. Misc. ii. 85).

The accession of Louis, on the death of his father, to the imperial throne increased the influence of Benedict, and gave a yet wider scope to his energies as a reformer. The new emperor at once invited his favourite counsellor to follow him to his new dominions, assigning for his residence a monastery near Saverne (Tabernae), in Elsass (Alsatia), Maurum-Monasterium by name (Vit. cc. 47, 48). But this was inconveniently far from the court (c. 48), and leaving an abbat in his place at Maurum-Monasterium, he was soon induced to fix his residence in close proximity to Aachen, on the banks of the river Inde (Inde), where his imperial patron built for him the famous monastery, known subsequently as Cornelius-Münster, from the relics of Pope Cornelius deposited there (Vit. cc. 48, 58; cf. Herzog, l. c.). Here Benedict continued on a larger scale the work commenced on the banks of the Aniane, collecting from every quarter materials for a thorough re-organization of the monastic system, prosecuting his inquiries in every direction, especially in regard to the observances of Monte Cassino, the head-quarters of Western monachism, and labouring to make his own monastery a model to all others (cc. 50, 53). He took an active part in the council held at Arles in A.D. 813 (Conc. Arlat.), at which various questions of ecclesiastical discipline were settled (c. 31), and presided over the more important council at Aachen (Conc. Aquisgran.) four years later (Mab. AA. SS. O.S.B. Saec. iv.). Amid all these public duties Benedict found time to plead the cause of the poor and oppressed at court (c. 49), even at the cost of provoking against himself the hostility of the nobles. But his imperial patron stood by him to the last (c. 43). Benedict closed his laborious and self-denying life in peace, "full of years and full of honours," within the walls of his abbey, surrounded by his faithful monks, not a few of whom had followed him from the Aniane to the Inde, A.D. 821, having completed the three score and ten years assigned to man by the psalmist (c. 57). He was buried at Inda, and is commemorated on Feb. 11 (Mab. ad loc.).

Benedict's character strongly resembles that of the founder of Wesleyanism. In both there was the same methodical austerity, the same sombre earnestness, the same determination to regulate even the most trivial minutiae (cf. c. 28 et pass.). In all these features Benedict of Aniane is much nearer to John Wesley, than to his great namesake, Benedict of Nursia. It is no wonder that at first Benedict was no favourite at court generally. The monks as a class resented his interference with their ease and laxity, the nobles his uncompromising resistance to their encroachments on monastic property (c. 41). But the single-mindedness of his aim bore down all opposition, and more than one of the Frankish nobility, attracted by Benedict's teaching and example, renounced the world for a monk's cell, and became a munificent benefactor to the order (cc. 42, 46). In later life Benedict grew more lenient to the infirmities of others, but he never spared himself. While his bodily strength permitted, he took his share with the brethren in mowing, reaping, &c. (c. 31), and he persisted to the last in his habits of rigid asceticism, denying himself all but the very poorest fare, and being continually in tears for his own sins and those of others (c. 56). It was a character that could not fail to impress itself vividly, by the very force of contrast, on a lawless and licentious age.

But, after all, Benedict's influence as a reformer of abuses was only transient. There was a want of elasticity, a stiffness and an angularity about his reforms, which unfitted them for general acceptance. Their success depended exclusively on himself, and he attempted to define precisely points which would have been more wisely left undefined, prescribing even, for example, whether or not the hood should hang down to the knees (c. 52). His task, indeed, as he proposed it to himself, was an impossibility. It was the first and last attempt ever made at a thorough and sweeping reformation of the whole monastic system, even in its minutest details, throughout the Carolingian empire. Benedict of Aniane attempted for the Franks what the greater Benedict had done in Italy three centuries before; he failed comparatively, because he wanted the wise forbearance of his predecessors. "De minimis non curat lex."

A reformation was urgently needed, but not on his plan. The Rules of Benedict and Columban had long contended for mastery in the monasteries of the Franks, sometimes existing side by side in the same monastery, until, usually, the milder code ousted its rival (Holsten. Praef.; Bened. Anian. Cod. Regul.). Sometimes various rules were professed in the same monastery (Mab. Praef. Ann. O. S. B.; tom. i. §18), and this diversity of usages was made more glaring in the latter part of the 8th century by the intrusion of the canonical rule into some regular monasteries (Ardo. Vit. Ben. An. c. 40; cf. Mab. ad loc.). Practically each monastic community was a law to itself, and in many cases great laxity of morals was the natural consequence of this vagueness and uncertainty of rule. The facility of migrating from one monastery to another gave rise to frequent scandals (cf. Reg. Bened. c. 61; Mab. Ann. O. S. B. l. viii. 18, &c.).

Benedict's great aim was to tighten the reins of discipline, to obliterate these inconsistencies of usage, to make the Nursian rule sole and supreme everywhere, and to draw the line sharply between monks on the one hand and canons and secular clergy on the other. In these his efforts, he had to face the strong and active opposition of the party at the head of whom stood the brothers Adalard and Wala.

Beside the danger from the want of coherence and organisation among themselves, danger threatened the monks from without. Not a few of the great nobles seized the opportunity with avidity for enriching themselves from the monastic revenues. Benedict's influence with the Crown was a great safeguard for the monasteries against the rapacity of their neighbours. Louis excused the monasteries generally from the imposition of oppressive services (Vit. c. 54), and relieved the smaller and less wealthy from all duty except that of praying for their sovereign.

The culminating point in this work of reformation was the great council at Aachen (Conc. Aquisgran.), A.D. 817. This was convoked by Louis at Benedict's suggestion; Benedict presided, with Arnulf, an abbat from Anjou, appointed by the emperor as vice-president ("adjutor;" Mab. AA. SS. O.S.B. Saec. iv.); and Benedict's was the guiding spirit which directed the deliberations of the abbats there assembled. So early as in the 6th century the old Benedictine rule had been formally sanctioned in the Gallic monasteries (Conc. Matiscon. A.D. 525); but profession in this instance was by no means tantamount to practice (cf. Conc. Turon. iii. A.D. 813). Benedict and his colleagues set to work vigorously. More than 70 canons were enacted. The pre-eminence of the old Benedictine rule was declared; and, in order to ensure complete uniformity, whatever had been left ambiguous by the founder was determined precisely, on the minutiae of dress, diet, divine service, &c. These regulations were enforced throughout his dominions by the emperor's fist, who also appointed visitors ("inspectores") to see them carried out fully (Vit. c. 50). They were observed even in Italy, and incorporated at Monte Cassino with the original ordinances (Bulteau, Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Benoît, v. 4). But the effects of this "peaceful revolution" (Dantier, Les Monast. Benedict. ii. 18) were only transient. Not many years elapsed after the death of Benedict, before his opponents regained the ascendancy; and Odo of Clugny, Bernard of Cîteaux, and the other monastic reformers of the mediæval period had to do the work over again in their several spheres. In one respect, however, the advantages resulting to the monastic life and to Europe generally from the labours of Benedict were more lasting. Even through the dark and turbulent ages which ensued, the monasteries, as a rule, were schools for the young and oases of peaceful study.

Benedict's most important writings are (1) his Codex Regularum; a collection of various rules (α) Eastern, (β) Western, for monks, nuns, and canons, with an appendix of treatises on the monastic life. Codex Regularum Monast. et Canonic. &c., juxta edit. Luc. Holsten (Paris, 1663) recusam August. Vindeliceor. 1759, et a R. P. Mariano Brockie obs. crit. hist. illustratam. (2) Concordia Regularum; a digest, or harmonised catena of these rules under their respective headings. Concordia Regularum, ed. Hugo Menard, Paris, 1638.

The following minor treatises are ascribed to Benedict by Mabillon (c. s.):—Testimoniorum Nubecula Benedicti Levitæ de Incarnat. Dom. &c. (Baluz. Misc. Sacr. ii. 85). (2) Disputat. Benedicti Levitæ adv. Felician. Impietatem (ib.). (3) Epistol. Guarnario (ib.). (4) Confessio Fidei Benedicti Levitæ (ib.). (5) Excerptus divers. Mod. Poenitent. (Baluz. ii. 1385). (6) Benedicti Abbatis Forma Fidei (a "Summa Theologica"); and (7), Benedicti Libellus ex divers. Patr. Sentent. al. Collectio ex Homiliis Patrum.

The Nubecula, Disputatio, and Confessio, are attributed to Benedict on the hypothesis of his being only a deacon when they were written.

Mabillon is inclined to identify Benedict of Aniane with an abbat Euticius, mentioned by Joannes Monachus in his life of Odo, the famous Cluniac reformer, as "Founder of the Customs of Clugny," and explains, that it was by no means unusual at that time for ecclesiastics to have an "ascititious" name as well as the name by which they were known ordinarily. (Mab. AA. SS. O.S.B. Saec. iv.)

The principal source of our information about the life of Benedict is the biography of him by Ardo or Smaragdus, one of his pupils. It is written sensibly and in an agreeable style, and with every indication of being trustworthy. The greater part is the testimony of eye-witnesses (e.g. cc. 31, 35, 36, 37, &c.), and the miraculous element is less obtrusive than in most biographies of the kind. (S. Benedicti Anianensis Vita, auct. Ardone seu Smaragdo discip. ap. Mabill. AA. O.S.B. Saec. iv. i. Venet. 1733; cf. Mabill. AA. SS. O.S.B. Praef. Saec. iv.; see also *AA. SS. Bolland. BENEDICTUS BISCOP, called by Eddius (V. Wilfridi, c. 3) Biscop Baducing, was, by birth, a noble Englishman, descended—if he be identical with Biscop, the son of Beda, who is mentioned in the Genealogies appended to Florence of Worcester—from the royal house of the Lindisfari, or people of Lincolnshire (M. H. B. 631). He appears, however, first as a minister or thegn of Oswy, king of Northumbria. Born about 628, he determined, at the age of twenty-five, to renounce the world. He visited Rome in 653, being accompanied as far as Lyons by Wilfrid whom he left there (Bede, H. E. v. 19; Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 3). Having informed himself of the minutiae of ecclesiastical discipline, he returned to Northumbria, and there remained for several years endeavouring to promote religion and learning. His second visit to Rome is placed by Florence of Worcester in 665; Alchfrith, the son of Oswy and friend of Wilfrid, was to have accompanied him, but was prevented by his father. Bede (Vit. Abb. c. 2) says that this visit took place during the pontificate of Vitalian (657–672). It was broken by a visit to Lerins, then the seat of monastic discipline in its purest form. There Benedict became a monk, received the tonsure, and studied the monastic institute for several months, returning to Rome just at the moment at which Wighard, who had been chosen archbishop of Canterbury, arrived, in 667. After the death of Wighard, Vitalian commended Theodore, whom he had consecrated in March, 668, to the guidance of Benedict, who conducted him through France, where they remained for several months [see THEODORUS], to Kent, arriving at the end of May, 669. After spending two years in monastic work at Canterbury, he made a third journey to Rome, this time, apparently, to buy books, of which he procured a large number in that city and at Vienne. He returned to England in 672, intending, it would seem, to visit Wessex, where the king, Coinwalch, was his friend. But hearing of Coinwalch's death, he proceeded to Northumbria, where Egfrith, in 670, had succeeded his father Oswy, and Alchfrith was in disgrace or dead. He now set himself to the work of planting reformed monachism in Northumbria; Egfrith gave him seventy hides of land of royal demesne, on the north of the river Wear, near the mouth. There he built, by Egfrith's wish, the monastery of St. Peter's, Wearmouth, in 674. In building the church and other parts of the monastery he employed French masons, whom he himself fetched from France; the architecture was an imitation of what he had seen at Rome, and the windows, we are expressly told, were filled with glass and lattice-work, the makers of which were brought from abroad. In order to make the furniture of his church complete he made his fourth journey to Rome, during the pontificate of Agatho, and, therefore, not earlier than 678. On this occasion he purchased a large collection of books, procured a quantity of relics, obtained the services of John the archchanter and abbot of St. Martin's at Rome, who returned with him to instruct his monks in music and ritual; and, with the consent of Egfrith, received from Agatho a formal privilege, exempting his monastery from all external interference. He obtained, also, a large supply of images and pictures. Whether he is the Benedictus mentioned in the acts of the council at Rome, in 679 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 131), is uncertain, but he was, most probably, present at the council, John the archchanter being commissioned by it to bring the Lateran Canons of 649 to England. In 679 he returned and obtained from a Northumbrian synod a recognition of pope Agatho's privilege. Egfrith was so much pleased with the monastery of Wearmouth that he determined to promote the foundation of a sister monastery, to be dedicated to St. Paul. For this purpose he gave forty hides of land; and the indefatigable Benedict planted his new foundation at Jarrow, sending seventeen monks, with Ceolfrid as their abbot, thither in 682. The abbacy of Wearmouth he himself shared with Easterwin his cousin, who undertook the coadjutorship about the same year. Having so far freed himself from the necessity of staying at home he started a fifth time for Rome, to procure pictures and books for Jarrow. His stay this time was somewhat prolonged. On his return he found that Egfrith had been killed in 685, and that his monasteries had been thinned by pestilence, which had carried off abbot Easterwin in 686. He ratified the election of Sigfrid as successor of Easterwin, and purchased of king Aldfrid, the successor of Egfrith, three hides of land south of the Wear, with two magnificent pallia which he had brought from Rome. The rigour of his life and his great labours now began to tell upon him; he became paralysed in the lower limbs, and remained so for three years before his death. Sigfrid, too, fell into consumption, of which he died in 689; and Benedict made over both his monasteries to Ceolfrid. Benedict spent his last months in urging on his disciples the importance of maintaining the monastic rule in the pure Benedictine form, to which he had brought it after visiting seventeen of the continental monasteries; the preservation of his precious libraries, and, especially, the duty of disregarding the claims of nobility or consanguinity in the choice of spiritual rulers. His sleepless nights he spent in listening to the reading of the bible and repetition of the psalms, in which his weakness only now and then permitted him to join. He died on the 12th of January, 690, whilst his attendants were repeating the 83rd Psalm (Deus quis similis). He was buried in the church of St. Peter at Wearmouth. The interesting and circumstantial account of his life is furnished by Bede, who was born on the monastic estate, and committed to Benedict's care at the age of seven years. He would be about eighteen at the time of Benedict's death, and may have received from him some account of his five pilgrimages. The character of Benedict is one of great sanctity, energy, and foresight. As a promoter of learning and cultivation he stands far higher than Wilfrid, although his work lay in a much smaller sphere. The line which he took in the ecclesiastical politics of the time is not signified by the historian; Eddius, however, remarks on his austerity as connected with his early separation from Wilfrid; and it would seem certain that although strongly attached to Rome, as his ideal of the church and the resting-place of the apostles, he stood aloof from Wilfrid's later policy, and accepted the position of Egfrith and Theodore, with both of whom he stood, as we have seen, in the most friendly relations. He was, probably, opposed to a certain extent to Wilfrid, at all events to the ambitious projects of the latter; and his spirit of self-sacrifice is in strong contrast with Wilfrid's habit of self-assertion. However this may have been, the debt which England owes to Benedict Biscop is a very great one, and has scarcely ever been fairly recognized; for it may be said that the civilisation and learning of the 8th century rested on the monastery which he founded, which produced Bede, and through him the school of York, Alcuin and the Carolingian school, on which the culture of the middle ages was based.

(Mabillon, AA. SS. O.S.B. Saec. ii. 1000-1012; AA. SS. Boll. Januar. i. 745, 746.) [S.]

BENEDICTUS FOSSATENSIS (Benedict of St. Maur), abbot of the monastery of St. Maur des Fosse (Monasterium Fossatense), was one of the monastic reformers in the latter part of the 8th, and commencement of the 9th century, and is sometimes confounded with his more famous namesake of Aniane. But Benedict of Aniane is never styled "Fossatensis," and died A.D. 821, whereas Benedict of St. Maur was alive A.D. 829 at the dedication of the church of the monastery of St. Vandrille (Monasterium Fontanellense) (Mabill. AA. SS. O.S.B. Saec. iv.). The monastery over which he presided, called "des Fosse," or "de Saint Maur des Fosse," near Paris, was the final resting-place of the relics of St. Maur, after frequent translations to escape the ravages of Norman marauders (Bulteau, Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Benoist, v. 12). It must not be confounded with the monastery "de Fosse" (Monasterium Fossense), in the diocese of Maestricht, between the Meuse and the Sambre. Benedict took an active part in the reformation of the monastery of St. Vandrille, near Rouen, founded about 648 A.D. by one of the great nobles of the Court of Dagobert (Bult. iii. 23, v. 24).

[I. G. S.]

BENEDICTUS MEDIOLANENSIS (Benedict of Milan) was a contemporary of Benedict of Aniane, and, like him on a smaller scale, was instrumental in the restoration of the old Nursian rule. He was made abbat in A.D. 784 of the monastery of St. Ambrose at Milan by Peter, archbishop of Milan, and founder of the monastery; and his appointment was confirmed by Karl the emperor (Mabill. AA. SS. O.S.B. Saec. iv.). The monastery stood by one of the six gates of the city; at each of which was a monastery with hospital attached to it. (Bulteau, Hist. de l'Ordre de S. Benoist, v. 76.) [I. G. S.]

BENEDICTUS OF NURSIA. St. Benedict, abbat of Monte Cassino ("Abbas Casinensis"), called "Patriarch of the monks of the West," lived during the troubled and tumultuous period after the deposition of Augustulus, when most of the countries of Europe were either overrun by Arians or still heathen. There were many monks in southern Europe, but without much organization till Benedict reformed and remodelled the monastic life of Europe. (Mab. Ann. I. i.) The principal, almost sole, authority for the life of St. Benedict are the Dialogues of Gregory the Great. Their genuineness has been questioned; chiefly on the ground of the Latin being inelegant and the narrative so largely interspersed with miracles. On this theory the Dialogues have been attributed to Pope Gregory II., more than a century later (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. voce). But there is nothing in style or matter really inconsistent with the reputed authorship. Gregory the Great had planned to write something of the kind "de miraculis patrum in Italia" (Ep. ad Marimin. Stractus, iii. 51): and he is said to have sent the Dialogues to Teudelinda the Lombard queen (Sigeo. Gemblac. c. 42 ap. Fabric. Biblioth. Eccles.). Cave thinks them interpolated (cf. Mab. AA. SS. O.S.B. Praef.) The writer professes to quote from four of Benedict's disciples, three subcontemporary, the other his successor at Monte Cassino. (Greg. M., Praef. Dial.)

Benedict was born about A.D. 480 at Nursia (Noceria), anciently belonging to the Sabines (frigida Nursia, Virg.), an episcopal city in the duchy of Spoleto in Umbria. His parents were of the higher class ("liberiori genere," Praef. Dial.). A later writer gives their names, Euproprius and Abundantia (Petr. Diac. de Vir. Ill. i.). The ruins of the ancestral palace are shown at Noceria, with a crypt, the reputed birthplace of Benedict (Mab. Ann. i. 4). He was sent as a boy to be educated at Rome; but soon, shocked by the immorality of his companions, fled, followed by his nurse (Cyrilla; Petr. D., de Vir. Ill. i.) to Afile (Efile), on the Anio (Teverone), about forty miles from Rome (Dial. ii. 1). Thence he retired to a cave at Sublaqueum (Subiaco), where he lived as a hermit in almost utter isolation for some years, visited only from time to time by a priest of the neighbourhood, Romanus (Dial. ii. 1). The cave, the well-known "il Sagro Speco," is shown about three miles of very steep ascent above the town of Subiaco, and the traditionary spot marked by a monastery, once famous for its library and for the first printing press in Italy, where the youthful anchorite rolled naked in the thorn-bushes to overcome sensual temptations (Mab. Ann. i. 8). The fame of his sanctity spreading abroad, Benedict was invited, his youth notwithstanding, by the monks of a neighbouring monastery (at Vicovarro), to preside over them, and very reluctantly consented. Soon however their laxity rebelled against his attempts at reformation (he seems thus early to have shown the organizing faculty for which he became afterwards so remarkable), and he abdicated, after miraculously escaping being poisoned by them (Dial. ii. 3). He retired to his cave; and undertook the superintendence of youths, among whom were two who became foremost among his followers, Maurus and Placidus, sons of Roman patricians (Dial. ii. 4). Here he founded, it is said, twelve monasteries, each of twelve monks with a "father" at the head of them (Dial. ii. 3). Of these only two remain, "Il Sagro Speco" and "Sta. Scholastica"; the rest being in ruins, or merely oratories (Mab. Ann. ii. 1). That of "Sta. Scholastica," so named after Benedict's sister, enjoys especial privileges, and takes precedence among the Benedictine foundations even of Monte Cassino, as of older date (Alb. Butler, Lives of the Saints). Several of the miracles ascribed to Benedict are connected with Subiaco. But, after some time, finding his work continually hindered by the machinations of a dissolute priest, Florentius, he removed with some of his disciples to Monte Cassino (Dial. ii. 8), destined to become illustrious as the headquarters of the great Benedictine order, and as a stronghold of learning and liberal arts even in the darkest ages.

It was probably about A.D. 530 that Benedict transferred himself to Monte Cassino (Mab. Ann. iii. 5). The mountain with a town and stream at its base, all of the same name, stands on the borders of what were formerly Latium and Campania, nearer to Naples than Rome: a few miles from the birthplace of the great Dominican, Thomas Aquinas. Some ruins of an old Roman amphitheatre mark the site of the town, near the modern S. Germano; the little stream flows into the Rapido, a tributary of the Garigliano (Liris). The summit of the mountain three miles above the town, and, even at the present time inaccessible to carriages, was crowned, before the arrival of Benedict by a temple of Apollo; frequented even then by the rustics (Dial. i. 8), although the existence of a bishop of Casino is indicated by the list of bishops present at the Roman Council A.D. 484 (Mab. Ann. iii. 5). On this precipitous eminence, looking down on the plains washed by the peaceful Liris ("taciturnus amnis" Hor.), and backed by the wild crags of the Abruzzi, Benedict set himself with new vigour to carry out his plans of a revival of monasticism. The miraculous intervention of which Gregory hands down the story (Dial. ii. 9, 10) is not necessary to explain, how the missionary spirit of Benedict and his monks overthrew the image and altar of Apollo, and reared shrines of St. John Evang. and St. Martin, the founder of monasticism in France, within the very walls of the Sun-god's temple—it was customary to reconsecrate, not to destroy, Pagan edifices (Greg. M. Ep. xi. 76)—where now stands one of the most sumptuous of Italian churches. Here Benedict commenced the monastery destined to a world-wide reputation. Here for some twelve years or more Benedict presided over the followers who remained with him—here he is believed to have composed the Benedictine Rule, in the same year, it is said, in which the schools of Athens were suppressed, and his famous Code was promulgated by Justinian—and from this sequestered spot he sent forth his emissaries not only to Anxur (Terracina, Dial. ii. 22), but beyond the borders of Italy, to the neighbouring isle of Sicily (Mab. Ann. iii. 25). Mabillon considers the narrative in Greek by Gordianus of the Mission of Placidus into Sicily spurious, but the mission itself beyond doubt. As an instance of the rapid growth of this monastery, the Benedictine editor notes that there was even then land attached to it; but the passage only speaks of land immediately adjacent (Dial. ii. 33). Not many years however elapsed before this and other similar foundations were richly endowed with lands and other offerings (Greg. M. Ep. iii. 3).

It was in the vicinity of Monte Cassino, that Benedict confronted and rebuked the ferocious Totila (A.D. 542) at the head of his victorious Ostrogoths (Dial. ii. 14, 15); and that he was wont to cheer his solitude by brief interviews at very rare intervals with his beloved sister, Scholastica, herself a recluse at no great distance (Dial. ii. 33). He is said to have been summoned to a Synod at Rome (A.D. 531) by Boniface II. (Cave, Hist. Litt. on the authority of a codex in Bibl. Vat. by Ant. Scip. Mon. Cas., Eleg. Abb. Cas. p. 25). His death is variously computed from 539 (Schol. Bened. in Honor. August. iii. 30, ap. Fabr. Bibl. Eccl.) to A.D. 543 (Trithem. de Vir. Ill. c. 300, ap. Fabr.; cf. Clint. Fast. Rom. and Mabill. AA. SS. O.S.B. Praef.). Some few writers assign a yet later date. His sister (his twin-sister according to Trithemius, but cf. Mab. Ann. iii. 14) shortly preceded him. She is called Abbess by Bertharius, Abb. Cas. in the 8th century (Mab. Ann. iii. 14); but probably lived alone (cf. Greg. M. Dial. iii. 7, 14), or as one of a sisterhood. The words "ad cellam propriam recessisset" are ambiguous (Dial. ii. 34; cf. Act. Sanct. Feb. 10).

The character of St. Benedict may be best estimated from his Regula Monastica, if, as indeed is reasonable to suppose, it was his composition. In contrast to monastic rules already in existence, chiefly of Eastern origin, it breathes a spirit of mildness and consideration, while by the sanction for the first time given to study, it opened the way for those literary pursuits which afterwards developed themselves so largely within convent walls. Unlike many ardent Reformers, Benedict appears to have led a consistent life from the first, without any violent and convulsive disruption of existing ties. He is more like the "judicious" Richard Hooker or the George Herbert of the English church, than the S. Francesco di Assisi, or the S. Domenico of his own communion. The traditional account, too, of the great Reformer's tender affection for his sister, as well as of his withdrawal before the opposition which he had to encounter at Subiaco, seem to give verisimilitude to the traditional portraits of him, as of gentle though dignified aspect. At the same time his demeanour before Totila, the strict rule under which he kept others as well as himself (Dial. ii. 23, &c.), and his severity in repressing the slightest disobedience (Dial. ii. 24, 28, &c.) testify to his practical insight into character, (Dial. ii. 20), as well as to his zeal and courage. In another book of the Dialogues (iii. 161) he is said (like Antony) to have reproved a hermit who had chained himself to a rock, in these words, "Brother, be bound only by the chain of Christ!" The character of the Benedictine Order, by the specialities which have always distinguished it from other religious orders, attests the sagacious and liberal character of its founder.

"Through mists of years behold him yet!

The garb severe, the aspect meek,

Serene yet firmly set,

And lips that seem to speak.

With power to draw heaven's lightning down,

And stay or raise the tempest's rain.

So kings doff robe or crown, Won o'er to swell his train."

It is doubtful whether Benedict was ordained. Fleury thinks not, although he preached (Ecc. Hist. xxxii. 15). The idea of his being a priest is modern (Mab. Ann. O. S. B. v. 122; Murat. Scr. Ital. iv. 27).

The miracles, with which the life of St. Benedict abounds, are such as are very common in the mediaeval biographies of famous ascetics. In many cases the alleged fact plainly requires no such explanation, e.g.—the broken cord by which the Saint's basket was drawn up, and the exceedingly heavy stone which resisted the efforts of his disciples to move it, may obviously be accounted for without any supernatural intervention (Dial. i. 9). Similarly the apparition so frequently occurring, of the devil in bodily form, may be but an embodiment to the senses of the assaults of temptation (Dial. 2, &c.). Sometimes the supposed miracle seems to be only a metaphorical expression, as the snake in the stolen flask, or the dragon which encumbered the recreant monk (Dial. 18, 24); sometimes it seems only to represent Benedict's keenness of insight into character, and extraordinary power of influencing those with whom he came in contact, as in his interviews with Totila (Dial. 14) and with an Arian Goth (26); in his detection of acts of disobedience, though done out of his sight (12, 13, 19); and in his prediction about a demoniac who wished to be ordained (16). The money unexpectedly provided for the poor debtor, and the flour in the famine, were not of necessity miraculous (Dial. 21, 27); while the highly wrought imagination of the recluse may suffice to account for his vision of his sister's soul ascending to heaven, and of his own speedy dissolution (Dial. 35, 37). Some of St. Benedict's miracles seem taken almost literally from the narrative of the prophets Elijah and Elisha in the Old Testament, e.g. the floating iron, the cruse of oil, and the raven (Dial. 6, 8, 29). It is important also to observe the legendary character of the evidence for these wonders. Marcus Poeta, a Benedictine monk, in the beginning of the 7th century, adds to those recorded in the Dialogues a story of angels guiding St. Benedict to Monte Cassino (Petr. D. de Vir. Ill. ap. Fabr. Biblioth. Eccles.) and the story is repeated as authentic by Paulus Diaconus (Mab. Ann. iii. 5); in this manner the love and reverence of admiring disciples were continually embellishing the fame of their founder with new prodigies. Mabillon thinks that the story of a girl sent by Benedict to be healed by Remigius, bishop of Rheims, arose from a misunderstanding of the word "benedictus," as if it were a proper name (Mab. Ann. iii. 16).

Some, probably not all, of the remains of St. Benedict, were transferred from his shrine at M. Cassino to the Benedictine Abbey at Floriacum (Fleury), on the Loire, in the 7th century or at a later date (Mab. Acta. ii. 339). The question is discussed at length in AA. SS. Boll. 21 Mar. iii. 299-301, and in Mab. AA. SS. O.S.B. Saec. ii. 337-352.

Besides the famous Regula Monachorum, the following shorter and less important writings are generally attributed to Benedict: Sermo in Decessu St. Mauri et sociorum, and Epistola ad S. Maurum. The Epistola ad S. Remigium, the Sermo in Passione S. Placidi et sociorum, and the De Ordine Monastico are probably spurious (Migne, Bibl. Patr. s. voce; Cave, Hist. Litt.; Gueranger, Enchirid. Benedict.). Some Sententiae are ascribed to him in the Sententiae Patrum, Col. 1531, 8vo (Cave, Hist. Litt. s. voce).

BENEDICTUS I., POPE, called by the Greeks BONOSUS (Evagr. Sc. H. E. v. 16), son of Boniface a Roman, was elected successor to John III. on the 3rd of June 574 (Jaffé, Regesta Pont.; the dates given by Baronius are erroneous; cf. Clinton, F. R. ii. 543, on the causes of discrepancy in the pontifical chronology). During his pontificate Italy was harassed by the invasion of the Lombards. Though they never actually penetrated into the city of Rome, they ravaged the suburbs, violated the cemeteries, and persecuted the Christians. Misery and famine ensued, and Rome was only relieved eventually by a corn fleet from Egypt, despatched at the pope's request by the emperor Justin. Benedict died in July 578, and was buried on the last day of that month in St. Peter's. He was succeeded by Pelagius II. (Anastas. Liber Pontif.; cf. Paul. Diac. De gestis Long. ii. 10, ap. Muratori, i.). According to Ciacconius (Vitae Pont. Rom.) his memory was eulogized by Gregory the Great. His restoration of certain lands to the abbot of San Marco at Spoleto rests on the same authority (Greg. Op. ii. 950, ed. Bened.). The story given by the author of the 'Vita S. Gregorii,' that Benedict ordained Gregory deacon and sent him on a mission to convert the English is without foundation (Baronius, sub anno 581, §§ 2 and 5). No writings of Benedict are extant. The two letters given by Migne (Patrologia, vol. 72, pp. 683, sq.) are spurious (cf. Hirschius, Decret. Pseudo-Isidorianae, pp. 718, 719; see generally Baronius, sub annis 573-577; Labbe, Concilia, vol. v.). [T. R. B.]

BENEDICTUS II., POPE, son of John, a Roman, descended from an illustrious Sabine family (Ciacconius, Vit. Pont.), described by Anastasius (Lib. Pont.) as a "lover of poverty, humble, gentle, long-suffering, and generous," was elected successor to Leo III. during the latter part of the year 683. It was not however till the 26th of June 684 that he was consecrated, the confirmation of the election by the emperor not arriving till that time. Thus, in the letter to Peter the papal commissary in Spain, written in 683, Benedict only styles himself "presbyter et in Dei nomine electus Sanctae Sedis apostolicae" (Mansi, xi. 1085). So it is as "elect" that he orders the restoration of Wilfrid to the see of York (Jaffé, Regesta). To obviate the inconvenience of such delay Benedict obtained permission from the emperor Constantine Pogonatus, that in future the bishop elect should forthwith proceed to ordination. By so doing the emperor by no means renounced his right of imperial confirmation,* as has often been alleged; still less did he

* Gieseler, Ecl. Hist. i. § 129 and notes, p. 374 Eng. Tr. The same emperor had, a few years previously, in the case of Agatho, remitted the customary tribute; cf. Gesch. der Stadtverfassung in Italien, by Carl Hegel, t. 239.

"restore" to the Roman see a privilege which had been unjustly taken from it, as Baronius supposes. The exact words in Anastasius are—"Concedit ut qui electus fuerit in sede apostolica e vestigio absque tarditate pontifex ordinetur." Constantine endeavoured further to bind over the ever doubtful allegiance of the pope by sending locks of hair of his two sons, Justinian and Heraklius, to Rome, thereby making them the adopted children of St. Peter and his successor. Little else is known of Benedict. He restored and adorned several of the churches at Rome. (Anastasius.) At the beginning of May 685 he died, and was buried on the 8th in St. Peter's. An epitaph is given in Ciacconius. He was afterwards canonized (Jaffé does not give him the title of Saint, Reg Pont.). His successor was John V. (Baronius sub annis: Labbe, Conc. vi. 1276-79.) [T. R. B.]

BENIGNUS. This name appears in both Scotch and Irish hagiography.

(1) Dempster, at August 9, A.D. 436, gives a Benignus, presbyter at Lesmahago, on the authority of the long-lost Collectanea of Gilbert Brown, abbot of Sweetheart. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 278.)

(2) Colgan gives an account of another who was brother of S. Cethechus; he was also disciple of St. Patrick, and put by him as abbat over the monastery of Drumlias (now Drumlease, in the barony of Drumahaire, co. Leitrim), where he ruled for 20 years. His father is said to have been from Connaught, and descended from the race of Kien, son of Oilill Olum; but Colgan doubts whether this Benignus may not be the Benignus, Dabona, or Beon, who is venerated at Glastonbury, in England, according to William of Malmesbury (Colgan, Acta SS. 788; Tr. Thaum. 130, c. 9; 176, n. 84; 177, n. 109). Some at the same time imagine that it was Benignus of Armagh who went to Glastonbury. (Ussher, de Brit. Eccl. Prim. Dubl. 1639, p. 876; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 318.)

(3) But the most famous is St. Benignus or Benen, son of Sescnen, and Primate of Armagh—Nov. 9. It is said, that when St. Patrick landed at the mouth of the Boyne, at Colp, he came first to the house of Sescnen or Sescnen, and, in baptizing him and his house, gave the name of Benignus to one of his sons, whom he also took along with him. (Ussher, de Brit. Eccl. Prim., Dubl. 1639, p. 848; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 220.) St. Benen succeeded to Armagh A.D. 455, and in the lists of the Coarbs of St. Patrick is usually placed third after St. Patrick; he is sometimes designated "Benen, son of Sescnen, Patrick's Psalm-singer." The Leubhar Breac says he was of the Cianachta Glinne Gaimein, of the race of Taidg, son of Cian of Cashel. Most Irish authorities date the arrival of St. Patrick, and baptism of St. Benen, at A.D. 432, the year of Pope Celestine's death; but Dr. Todd prefers A.D. 441. (Life of St. Patrick, 130, 174 sq., 391 sq., 412 n. An account of St. Benignus's family and miracles is given in Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 301; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 203-5.) He died A.D. 468, and thus was bishop at Armagh during the lifetime of St. Patrick, who died in 493; in fact, St. Patrick seems to have had charge of the whole church there, and to have left bishops at Armagh and other centres, while he was engaged in his missionary labours. (Colgan, Acta SS. 307, cc. 5, 6, and notes; Todd, St. Patrick, pass.; Lanigan, Ib. i. 257, 323 sq., 374.) He was counted the special Apostle and Patron of Connaught, and is said to have had among his disciples St. Jarlath, bishop of Tuam, though there is no little difficulty in the chronology. (Colgan, Ib. 308, c. 2-3, and notes; Lanigan, Ib. ii. 42.) If he wrote any account of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 6, n. 3), it is now lost; but he is said to have been the original compiler of the Psalter of Cashel, and of the Leabhar na-gCeart or Book of Rights (published by the Celtic Society in 1847, under the editorship of Dr. O'Donovan), though his traditional connection with the Seanchus Mor or Cain-Phadruig is embarrassed by the chronology. (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 134; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 25, 46, 66; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 109, 114.) [A. P. F.]

BENJAMIN, a monk of Scetis, in the 4th century, of great repute for effecting miraculous cures. (Pall. Hist. Laus. 13; Soz. Hist. vi. 29; Niceph. Hist. xi. 35.) [I. G. S.]

BENJAMIN, succeeded Tobias as sixth bishop of Jerusalem; one of the fifteen enumerated by Eusebius, H. E. iv. 5, before Hadrian's days "all of the circumcision." [E. V.]

BENUS, an abbat among the monks of Ta-beuna, in the 4th century. He was famed for his gentleness. (Pall. Hist. Laus. 49; Ruff. de Mon. 2; Soz. Hist. vi. 28; Niceph. Hist. xi. 34.) [I. G. S.]

BEOAEDH (BEDA, BEATUS), bishop of Ard-carna, in Roscommon. March 8, A.D. 524. He was the son of Olean, son of Conan, of the race of Lugaidh, son of Ith and noted for his active kindness and hospitality (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 71). He lived in the end of the 5th century, and was a disciple of St. Patrick, being possibly the St. Beatus, bishop of Duncruithen, of whom St. Evinus writes in his Tripartite Life of St. Patrick (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 146, c. 125, and notes): yet though imagining this, Colgan will not certainly affirm it, and Lanigan also has doubts as to the identity (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 265-267). He died A.D. 524, on the 7th or 8th of March; and his bell "Ceolan-Beoaidh," covered with gems, and kept in a silver case, is said to have been preserved with great veneration, as a relic in the church of Bailena-gCleireach, in Breifay (now Ballynaglearagh), on the confines of the counties of Leitrim and Cavan. (Colgan, Acta SS. 562-3, and Tr. Thaum. 156, c. 32; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. ii. 130; Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. 170-1; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 89.) [A. P. F.]

BEOAN. In his Life of St. Furse, Colgan (Acta SS. p. 90) refers to several saints of this name, but only two can be treated with any detail.

(1) Son of Nesson, and bishop of Fidh-chuillim (now Feighcullen, county Kildare). August 8th. He was one of the seven sons of Nesson, son of Erc, &c. of the race of Cathaoir Mór, of Leinster (Mart. Doneg.). He was Abbot of Ard-cuillim, and of Feighcuillim (if they were not identical), and at the latter his feast was celebrated. (See Colgan, Acta SS. 609, n. 2)

(2) Bishop of Tamlacht-Menainn—Oct. 26th. Mart. Doneg., at this date, associates him with "Meallan," and locates them at "Loch Bricrenn in Ui-eath-Uladh" (Iveagh, Down county). The other martyrologies call him a Briton, but the writer of St. Fursey's life says that the "two venerable men (Beoan and Meldan) were of that province in which Fursey, that man of God, was born," i. e. South Munster (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 455, 457; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 112-14). Girald. Cambrensis (Topogr. Hib. Dist. ii. c. 40) gives an account of the great reverence shewn to St. Beoan's name after his death around the church which he built in the more distant parts of Ulster, where the birds and wild beasts found a safe and quiet home in memory of the love and kindness of St. Beoan to animals. He is frequently mentioned in the Irish Life of St. Patrick, and Meldan, his companion, was "synedrus seu pater spiritualis" of St. Fursey (Colgan, Acta SS. 79, c. 21; 90, n. 19). St. Fursey took their relics with him when he left Ireland and deposited them in the chapel dedicated to SS. Peter and Paul on the top of the hill of Cignes, at Peronne, in France (Colgan, Ib. 290, 295, and 300, n. 23). SS. Meldan and Beoan, bps., flourished in A.D. 580, but they must have died before 626, as they appear in St. Fursey's vision. [FURSEY.] He may be S. Bean of Strathearn. [BEAN.] [A. P. F.]

BEOG or BEOCC—Oct. 25. This is probably the St. Dabeoc (Latinized Beoanus) who, when living in a "penal cave" on the island in Lough Derg, afterwards made famous as the scene of St. Patrick's Purgatory, saw a bright light in the north and told the disciples who were watching with him, that this represented the glory of St. Columba, who was afterwards to be born in that region. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 157, 285; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 390, c. 10, 449, n. 19.) His life is given by O'Hanlon (Lives Ir. SS. i. 11-16). [DABEOG.] [A. P. F.]

BEOGHN, abbat of Bangor, in the county of Down, Ireland—Aug. 22. He succeeded St. Comgall A.D. 600, and died A.D. 605, when St. Silvanus was appointed. (Colgan, Acta SS. 423-4.) In the Four Masters (by O'Donov. i. p. 201, n. 2) is given a wild legend from the Leabhar-na-hUidri, where SS. Comgall and Beoan are engaged in the capture of a salmon, which proves to be Liban, the daughter of Eochaidh, who had been drowned in Lough Neagh with her father and brothers. (Colgan, Acta SS. 1-3; Reeves, Ecol. Antiq. 55, 265, 376; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 149.) [FAINCHE.] [A. P. F.]

BEONNA (BINNA, BYNNA) (1), a Mercian witness to charters about 730 (Kemble, C. D. i. 101). (2) A Mercian abbat, who attests charters from 767 onwards (K. C. D. i. 143, 147, 187, 190, 203, 204, 211). He appears to have been abbat of Peterborough (K. C. D. i. 201), and attended the great Council of Clovesho of 803, in attendance on the bishop of Lichfield, and continues to sign charters until 805; it is just possible that he is the Beonna who became bishop of Hereford in 823, and died in 830. His relics were, according to Hugh Candidus (ed. Sparke, 39) preserved at Bredon. [S.]

BEORCHTYTH, BERTHGYTH, an abbess who addresses two letters to a man named Balthard, probably her brother, desiring to see him. If the Balthard in question be the Kentish nobleman of that name, Berthgyth would seem to have been in a German monastery. (S. Bonif. Epist. ed. Würdtwein, no. 150, 151.) She was a daughter of the missionary abbess Chunihilt, aunt of Lullus, and sent by Boniface into Thuringia. (Othlon. V. Bonif. ed. Jaffé, p. 490.) [S.]

BEORHTRIC, BRIHTRIC, BRITHRIC, BYRHTRIC, king of Wessex (786-802, or, according to the Chronicles, 784-800, which requires to be corrected by two years). He succeeded, on the death of Cynewulf, as a descendant of Cerdic, but his pedigree is not preserved. In the fourth year of his reign (789) he married Eadburh, the daughter of Offa (H. Hunt. M. H. B. 731), a connexion which strengthened his position for the time, and enabled him to drive into exile Egbert, son of Eahmund, king of Kent, who had hereditary claims on the kingdom of Wessex. His reign is chiefly marked by the first invasion of Wessex by the Northmen, who landed in Dorsetshire and slew the reeve Beadoheard in 789, or, according to Ethelwerd (M. H. B. 509), in 787. What little is known of Beorhtic's character is unfavourable; for, although Ethelwerd speaks of him as most pious, his pride is mentioned especially in the contemporary chronicle preserved by Simeon of Durham. He was poisoned in 802 by his wife, in mistake for the ealdorman Wor, of whose influence with her husband she was jealous. Two grants of Beorhtic to Abingdon (Kemble, C. D. i. 191, 217; Chron. Abingd. i. 16, 28) are preserved, one of which may be genuine. [S.]

BEORWALD, abbat of Glastonbury, early in the 8th century. He has been confounded with Beorhtwald or Brihtwald, archbishop of Canterbury, very erroneously. All that is certainly known of him is in connexion with St. Boniface. He is mentioned by Willibald, in his life of Boniface (ed. Jaffé, p. 439), as taking part in a West Saxon synod, in which Boniface was sent to the archbishop of Canterbury to make certain inquiries, between 710 and 716. And there is a letter of archbishop Brihtwald to Forthere, bishop of Sherborne, begging him to order Beorwald to release a captive girl, which he had refused to do at the archbishop's personal request (S. Bonif. Epist. ed. Würdtwein, No. 155). In the list of the abbats of Glastonbury, given by William of Malmesbury (ed. Gale, p. 528), he appears twice, first as Beorhtwald the sixth, and, again, as Beorwald the seventh abbat; and his abbacy is dated 705 to 712. But in the more ancient list (MS. Cotton, Tiberius, B. V.) he is placed fourth, between Coengils and Cealdhun. His name is attached only to very questionable charters (Kemble, C. D. i. 47, 56, 58), one of which, however, if genuine, dates him as early as 702 (ib. 56); and if Aldberht, as William of Malmesbury says, succeeded him, he must have died before 712 (ib. 73). [S.]

BERACH. This name is interpreted by Colgan (Acta SS. 346, n. 2) as "directe et punctualiter ad scopam collinans, vel quasi alicujus mucrone punctum attingens." The Latin equivalent is Verutus. (1) April 21.

The abbat of Bangor, co. Down, succeeded Segan, son of O'Conn, in the year 663, and died of the great plague in 664. (Four Mast.; Ann. Tigernach; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 204 n., iv. 56 n.)

(2) A better known Berach, Breagh, or Barry (Latinized Barrachius) was abbat of Cluain-cairpthe, now Kilbarry, near Termonbarry, county of Roscommon, Connaught. Feb. 15 is the day observed in his memory, but the dates of his Acts are uncertain. He was of the race of Dobhtha, of the posterity of Brian, son of Eochaidh Muighmhedhoin (A.D. 358-365). (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 13.) His father was Nernald or Nendalus, and his mother, Finmaith, sister of St. Fregius or Cruimther Fraech, of Cloon, in Leitrim. He was born at Gortaluachra, near Cloon, and his name is said in the Irish Life to have been Fintan at first, and then changed to Berach, on account of the greatness and unerring aim of his power, though in this the Bollandist writer naïvely remarks that his wonders have been exaggerated. His birth is put on Feb. 15, A.D. 521, by Herman Greven, on the authority of Ussher; he was baptized by his uncle St. Fregius, who flourished about A.D. 570, and was educated by him, though the Bollandist declines to accept Colgan's tradition of his drawing nourishment from the lobe of St. Fregius's ear as from his mother's breast. He was successively under St. Daigh and St. Kevin; the place of his monastery was pointed out by a stag which carried his baggage; and a dispute in which he was engaged with a Druid, and which was referred to Aidan, son of Gauran, king of the Albanian Scots (A.D. 571-605), gives us something like an historical standpoint. In this last Colgan (Acta SS. 347, n.³⁰) allows that, as regards the particulars of the contest, there must be no little exaggeration, yet he tries to show that from a consideration of the dates, and of the names of persons and places, there must be a large substratum of truth, fixing it about the year 560 or 570. The date of Berach's death is uncertain, but it probably took place before the close of the 6th century. Baring-Gould (Lives of the Saints, ii. 307-9) gives A.D. 615. St. Aengus counts him among the bishop-saints of Ireland. (See Colgan's Life of St. Berach, Abb., by an anonymous writer, "ex MS. Monasterii Insulae omnium SS.," with the "Supplementum ex Codice MS. Hib. Eccl. ejusdem sancti," given in Acta SS. 340-348; and the Two Lives given by the Bollandists in Acta SS. Feb. tom. ii. 833 sq.; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 323-5.) He was ordained by Bp. Etchen, and is the Berach who was attacked by the whale between Iona and Tiree, when he neglected St. Columba's prophetic directions to avoid it. (Colgan, Ib. 342, c. 19, 488; Reeves, St. Adamn. p. 48 and note.) In the Supplement to his Life in Colgan he is said to have received a staff (Bacullh-gear) and a bell (Clogberaigh) from St. Daigh on leaving his monastery: staff and bell are still preserved. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Sc. SS. 278-79; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 330, 444.) [A. P. F.]

BERCHAN (Latinized Berchanus and Barachianus). In Irish hagiology we find several of this name, attached to different days; some have little more than the place of dedication given, and possibly their genealogy, while others are better known. Of the former class are such as Berchan of Cluain-Aedha-Aithmet, in Luighnè (Lune, in Meath), June 5 (Mart. Doneg. and Toll.); Berchan of Cluain-caoi, May 24 (Mart. Doneg. and Tall.; Colgan, Acta SS. 73, c. 2); Berchan of Inis-rochla, in Loch Erue, and of the race of Colla-da-Chrioch, Nov. 24 (Mart. Doneg.; Colgan, Acta SS. 713, c. 4); Berchan, son of Neman, and brother of St. Sedna of Killaine in Mount Brech, great-grandson of Loarne: he thus lived in the 6th or beginning of the 7th century (Colgan, Acta SS. 565).

Of the second class are, (1) BERCHAN, of Cluain-sosta—Dec. 4. Mart. Doneg. calls him "bishop and apostle of God, of Cluain-sosta, in Ui-Failghe (Clonsast or Cloonsost in Offaly or Ophaly, King's county). He was the son of Muiredhach, of the race of Cairbre Righfoda, son of Conaire, of the seed of Heremon. Fer-da-leithe (the man of two portions) was another name for him, as he spent half his life in Alba, and the other half in Erin. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 327; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 279; Reeves, Adamn. 314 n., 462.) Ussher (in De Brit. Eccl. Prin. Ind. Chron. at A.D. 570) notices a Berchan as belonging to the second order of Irish saints, "quem sensu oculorum privatum sed spiritu propheticum praeditum fuisse aiunt:" it may perhaps belong to Berach of Cluain-cairpthe, but the name Byrchinus or Berchanus suggests Berchan. At Clonsast, in King's county, Ireland, there is St. Braghan's Well. (Ord. Survey, s. 27, as referred to in Reeves, Adamn. p. 314, n.) The Scotch Kalendars place this saint's day at April 6, and make him bishop in the Orkneys. Camerarius (p. 127) says that he was celebrated in the province of Stirling, and passed his youth in the celebrated monastery of St. Columba, not far from thence. He has several places in Scotland named after him, and in Inishmore, in Galway Bay, his grave was said to be. (Colgan, Acta SS. 715, n.¹⁰; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir., iii. 66; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. SS. 279. For forgeries in Berchan's name, see Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. xxxii.; Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, xxxix. sq. 79 sq.; O'Curry, Lect. MS. Mat. Ir. Hist. 412, sq.)

(2) Of Echdruim—May 7. This Echdruim is apparently not Auhgrim, co. Galway, but a place now unknown on the confines of Dal-Riada and Dal-Araidhe (Colgan, Acta SS. 783; Reeves, Eccl. Ant. 335). From the dates and other circumstances, this Berchan seems to be the Becanus, Bercanus, or Brecanus, son of Saran, of the race of Colla Dachrioch, whom Colgan (Acta SS. 782-3 and notes) gives as brother of St. Cairnech (28th March) and St. Ronan (27th May). His mother was Pompa or Bedona, daughter of Loarne, king of the Dalriads in Argyleshire (Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 52, 316); his father Saran is said to have lost his proper position in Dalriada for his opposition to St. Patrick (Colgan, Ib. 376, c. 7 and notes).

(3) Of Eago or Egg—April 10. The Irish Kalendars give Berchan as one of the saints specially venerated in Egg or Eig in the Hebrides of Scotland (Reeves, Adamn. 308); and this may be the Berchan "cujus cognamentum Mesloen," whose inquisitive disposition was so troublesome to St. Columba, and who was saved from its consequences in time and eternity by the special intercession and merit of that saint. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 328, c. 27, 368, c. 21, 429, c. 110, 488, n. 11.)

(4) Abbot of Glas Naoidhen in Fine-Gall, on the brink of the river Liffey, on the north side—Oct. 12. He is more generally known as Mobhi Clairenech, i.e. of the flat face, and the place of his dedication is now Glasnevin, to the north of the Liffey and near Dublin. (On the position of Glasnevin, see Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. 183, n. 1; Reeves, Adamn. lxxii-iii.) The Drummond Kalendar at Oct. 12 has the festival of "beatissimi et venerabilis viri Mobi, qui absque naso et oculis planâ facie natus de mortua, ut fertur, femina et conceptus!" (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 25, 400). He was of the race of Finn Fuathairt, of whom St. Brigida is descended; and Uanfinn, daughter of Finnbar, was his mother. He is said to have been at Derry (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 275). His monastery at Glasnevin, consisting "of a group of huts or cells, and an oratory, situate on either bank of the Finglass," is said to have received at the same time, among the fifty students of theology then at this great school, SS. Columba, Congall, Ciaran, and Cainnech (O'Curry's Lect. Anc. Irish, ii. 81, 91). But the "extraordinary universal plague through the world, which swept away the noblest third part of the human race," broke up this community, and carried Mobhi with it to the eternal mansions. This took place in A.D. 544 or 545. (Four Masters, by O'Donov. i. 183 and notes; Reeves, Adamn. lxxii-iii. 160; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 613, c. 3; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. 76, 78, 223, 226.) Mageoghegan states, in his translation of The Annals of Clonmacnoise, that he is supposed "to be (the same as the prophet) called in English Merlin." In Archdall's Monast. Hibern. 119, there is mentioned among the Canons Regular of St. Augustine, "Glasena-Oidhean, St. Mobyns, alias Boetius, or Mobyteus. This house was called also the Abbey of St. Boetius." Archdall evidently looking to another Mobhi. [See BITEUS.] [A. P. F.]

BERCHTHUN. (1) (BRIHTHUNUS.) The deacon of John of Beverley, bishop of York. He was abbot of John's monastery of "Inderauda," or Beverley, when Bede wrote; and it was from him that the historian received the miraculous stories which he tells about John. According to the fragments of the history of Beverley preserved by Leland (Collectanea iii. 155) he died on the 15th of May, 733; and Smith, in a note on Bede, mentions his name as occurring in Martyrologies on that day. He was buried at Beverley near his master (Mon. Angl. ii. 127, 128). His death is placed by Capgrave in 740.

(2) A bishop of Lichfield, the 13th in the ancient lists (M. H. B. 623). He succeeded Cuthfrith, whose death is placed in some MSS. of Florence in 767; and his name appears in charters from 774 to 777; his successor Higbert being elected in 779. The text of Florence erroneously calls him bishop of Dorchester (M. H. B. 546). The Lichfield writer, Chesterfield, gives him an episcopate of four years, from 755 to 759; but this is clearly an error. Little or nothing can be said to be known of his history; but his name is known from the mention of it by Matthew Paris in his Lives of the Offas. He is there made archbishop of Lichfield and confounded with bishop Humbert, who lived half a century later. See Wharton (Ang. Sac. i. 429), who is himself mistaken in his treatment of the archiepiscopate of Lichfield. [HIGBERT.] [S.]

BERCTGILS, also named Bonifacius, a Kentish man, appointed by archbishop Honorius, of Canterbury, the third bishop of the East Angles, with his see at Dunwich. The year of his consecration was probably 652 (Bed. H. E. iii. 20; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 530; Wharton, Ang. Sac. i. 403). He ruled for seventeen years (Bed. H. E. iv. 5; W. Malmesb. G. P. p. 147). [S.]

BERECTUS (BERETCHERT, BERIKTUS).

(1) A saint of the name of Berectus—Feb. 24, A.D. 720—in the reign of Mordac, the fifty-ninth king of the Scots, is mentioned by Wion. He is said to have died in 720 (Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 107). Wion (Lignum Vitæ, pars 2, lib. iii. p. 57, 1598) says, "In Scotia Sancti Berecti Monachi et Confessoris, qui profuit et vitæ sanctissimæ exemplo et predicatione," and adds in a note, "De eodem Galesinus hac die, ex MS. Kalendaris: de cuius rebus gestis nihil reperit." (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 279.)

(2) On Dec. 6, the Irish hagiologists place Beretchert or Berectus of Tulachleis, now Tullylease, county Cork. He is given as brother of SS. Gerald (March 13), Balanus (Sept. 3), and Hubrit (April 24), and thus son of an unknown Cusperius, king of England. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Feb. tom. ii. 833 sq.) in their life of St. Berach (Feb. 15) would identify Berectus with Berach; otherwise, they say, there is nothing known of him. Four Masters give the obit of "Berichtir of Tulachleis" on Dec. 6, A.D. 839, and, supposing that to be correct, Dr. Reeves (St. Adannan, p. lv.) says St. Gerald must come down to about A.D. 800; but the Four Masters put St. Gerald's death at A.D. 726, March 13, and Ussher in Chronol. Index at 697. (See the date of St. Gerald's death discussed in Colgan, Acta SS. 604; Ussher, de Brit. Ecl. Prim., Dubl. 1639, pp. 964, 1169.) [A. P. F.]

BERTWALD, BEORTHTWALD (BRIHTWALD, BEORHTWALD, BEORHTWALDUS), the 8th archbishop of Canterbury. According to Bede he was abbot of Reculver, and although not to be compared with his predecessor Theodore, a man well instructed in ecclesiastical and monastic discipline. A charter of Hlothari, king of Kent, is preserved, dated at Reculver in May, 679, in which lands in Thanet are bestowed upon him and his monastery (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i. 20); and he is likewise mentioned in a spurious charter of 689, as an abbot in Kent (ibid. 34). The Glastonbury writers claim him as abbot of that monastery (Will. Malmesb. de Antiq. Glast. ap. Gale, p. 308, &c.), but they have confounded him with Beorwald. [BEORWALD.] He was chosen archbishop of Canterbury, July 1, 692, and went to Lyons for consecration, which he obtained from Godwin, the archbishop of Lyons, June 29, 693 (Bede, H. E. v. 8). Two letters of pope Sergius are given in William of Malmesbury (G. P. ed. Hamilton, pp. 52-55) respecting him; one adressed to the kings Ethelred, Aldfrith, and Ealdulf, exhorting them to receive Berhtwald as primate; the other to all the bishops of Britain, urging them to obedience to him. Both are of somewhat questionable authenticity. In 693 Berhtwald attests an act of Oshere, king of the Hwiccas, done in a Mercian Witenagemot (Kemble, C. D. i. 41); in 696 he took part in the legislation of Whithred, king of Kent, at the council of Berghamstede or Bersted (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 233); between that year and 716 obtained, in a council at Baccanceld or Bapchild, the famous privilege of Whithred, which secured the liberties of the Kentish monasteries. In 702 he joined the Northumbrian king Aldfrith in the condemnation of Wilfrid, and in his excommunication (Heddius, V. Wilfr. cc. 45-47); and in 705, at the command of the pope, attended the council at Nidd, in which Wilfrid was reconciled (ib. c. 58). The same year he held a synod at Brentford (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 274) for the pacification of Essex and Wessex, having, the year before, taken measures for the division of the West Saxon diocese. A letter of Waldhere, bishop of London, to him, on these subjects, is extant (ibid.). The division of Wessex being accomplished, he consecrated Aldhelm as bishop of the new see of Sherborne (Will. Malmesb. G. P. p. 385). In 706 he attests a charter founding the monastery of Evesham, in relation to which two forged letters of pope Constantine, addressed to him, are extant; and, according to the life of St. Egwin, he attended a council at Alcester, on the same business, in 709. Shortly after, between 709 and 712, we find him writing to Forthere, bishop of Sherborne, to obtain the release of a captive girl from Beorwald, abbat of Glastonbury (Bonif. Epist. ep. 155). About this time we find him receiving Winfrith [BONIFACIUS], in Kent, on a mission from the West Saxon clergy, possibly connected with the institution of the new see of Selsey, which was instituted about 711. In 716, in a council at Clovesho, he obtained a confirmation of Whithred's privilege (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 300, 301). With the exception of his connexion with the affairs of Wilfrid, and his consecration of successive bishops of Rochester, Bede does not say much about Berhtwald; he records his death as happening Jan. 13, 731, and mentions that he was buried near his predecessor, within the church of St. Peter at Canterbury (H. E. ii. 3, v. 23). Having presided over the Anglo-Saxon church at a critical period of its growth for so many years and with so steady a hand, Berhtwald may safely be credited with considerable ability and moderation. That he was not regarded as a saint is, probably, owing to the line that he took with respect to Wilfrid, which, although approved by the best men of the time, was not likely to commend itself to the hagiographers. The life of St. Egwin, ascribed to him, belongs, unquestionably, to a later Berchtwald. [S.]

BERNACIUS, ST. (Brynach), of Wales, in the 5th century, said to have been the instructor of Brychan, king of Brecknock. His life is given in the Cotton MS. Vesp. A. 14 of the 12th century, and is printed in W. T. Rees' Lives of the Cambro-Briton Saints (1853); an abridgment of it occurs in Capgrave's Legenda Angliæ, 36. The details are fabulous, but we find the usual connection between South Wales, Cornwall, and Brittany. The saint comes from Brittany to South Wales, and his disciple St. Clether (the father of twenty children) retires to Cornwall, to lead the life of a devotee there. The parish of St. Clether, in Cornwall, is just east of Davidstow and north of Alternun—so named from the celebrated Welsh Saint David and his mother Nonna. The life says that St. Bernachus died April 7. (Sir H. Nicolas adds "July 7," and Ritson "March 9," as his feast-days.) Giraldus Cambrensis (Itin. Cambriæ, ii. 2) refers to his famous spring situated just north of the Presseleu mountains in Pembroke. There is probably some confusion between Clether's twenty sons, and the twenty-four assigned to king Brychan, perhaps owing to the names Brynach and Brychan being confused (see under Brychan). R. Rees (Welsh Saints, 156) enumerates several churches named after Brynach, in or near Pembroke and Brecknock. Another account makes Brynach contemporary with Maelgwn, and, if so, he must be placed in the first half of the 6th century. (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 158; Hardy, Catalogue of Materials, i. 91-92.) [C. W. B.]

BERNUINI, BERWIN. (1) A nephew of Wilfrid and a clerk to whom he commended the Isle of Wight, giving him the priest Hiddila to preach to and baptize the people: cir. 686. (Bede, H. E. iv. 16; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 537.)

(2) An English priest to whom Alcuin writes, professing his attachment to Offa and the English. The letter was probably written during a coolness between Charles and Offa, the cause of which is obscure, and the date of the letter, although fixed by Froben to 793, is very uncertain (Alc. Opp. ed. Froben, i. 11). [S.]

BERON. [HIPPLYTUS.]

BERONICIANUS, bishop of Tyre, appointed on the deposition of Cyrus by the dominant party at the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. At his request Cyril wrote to the Oriental bishops, urging on them the necessity of their anathematizing Nestorius. (Cyril, Ep. ad Aristolaum; Baluz. Nov. Coll. 889; Tragoed. Iren. c. 194.) [E. V.]

BERTHA, BERCTA, wife of Ethelbert, king of Kent. She was daughter of Caribert, king of Paris, by his wife Inoberga (Greg. Turon. iv. 26; ix. 26), and lost her father in 575, her mother in 589. The date of her marriage is unknown, but it was probably after the death of her mother, although Bede speaks of the king receiving her "a parentibus." Ethelbert was still a heathen, and on his marriage it was made a condition that his wife should be allowed to enjoy the exercise of her own religion, and should be attended by a bishop. Luidhard, or Letard, who is called by the Canterbury historians bishop of Senlis (Thorn, ed. Twysden, 1767), was chosen to accompany her, and the remains of the church of St. Martin, at Canterbury, were allotted for Christian worship (Bede, H. E. i. 26). It was partly, no doubt, by her influence that Ethelbert was induced to receive the Roman mission and to be baptized. Pope Gregory, in 601, when sending Mellitus to reinforce Augustine's company, addressed a letter to Bertha, in which he compliments her highly on her faith and knowledge of letters, and urges her to make still greater efforts for the spread of Christianity. He also ascribes the conversion of the English mainly to her, and compares her to the empress Helena (S. Greg. Epist. xii. 29; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 17, 18). The date of her death is unknown. She was buried in the porch of St. Martin, in the church of SS. Peter and Paul (Bede, H. E. ii. 5). Ethelbert seems to have married again after her death. She was the mother of Eadbald, who succeeded to the throne on Ethelbert's death, and of Ethelburga, who, in 625, was married to Edwin, king of Northumbria. As her son was unbaptized in 616, it is probable that she found considerable difficulty in promoting Christianity in her own family, or else that she died whilst her children were very young. Elmbam (ed. Hardwick, p. 110) says that she took part in the foundation of the monastery of St. Augustine, at Christmas, 604, but this is merely traditional; and the latest trustworthy trace of her is St. Gregory's letter of 601. [S.]

BERTHWYN, an early bishop of Llandaff. (Liber Landavensis, 166, 431, 626; but see Stubbs's Registrum Sacrum, 156 on these lists.) [C. W. B.]

BERWYN, ST. (OR GERWYN), a son of Brychan, who is said to have settled in Cornwall, but the name is difficult to identify, unless he is the same as St. Guronus, a hermit who preceded St. Petrock at Bodmin. Another account (Rees, Welsh Saints, 142) makes Gerwyn a son of Brynach by Brychan's daughter, and gives him three sisters, Mwynau, Gwennan, and Gwenlliw, and two of the saints who have given names to Cornish parishes are St. Mawnan and St. Wenn, who may possibly be identified with two of the sisters. [C. W. B.]

BERYLLUS, bishop of Bostra,* in Arabia, in the middle of the 3rd century, known in his day as one of the most learned teachers of the church. Beryllus conceived heretical views with respect to the person of our blessed Lord, to consider which a synod was assembled at Bostra, A.D. 244. The assembled bishops were unanimous in condemning his teaching, and declared that Christ at His incarnation was endowed with a human soul (Soc. H. E. iii. 7), but they were unable to convince Beryllus of his error. Origen however, who, having been recently degraded from Holy Orders and excommunicated at Alexandria, was then residing at Caesarea, had been invited to the synod, and by his intellectual superiority, dialectical skill and friendly moderation succeeded in proving to Beryllus the unsoundness of his tenets, and in leading him back to the orthodox faith. For this, according to Jerome, he received the thanks of Beryllus in a letter extant in his time, together with many others relating to this synod. Our only authority as to the tenets of Beryllus is a somewhat obscure passage of Eusebius, H. E. vi. 33, and a fragment of Origen's commentary on the Epistle to Titus, found in the apology of Pamphilus, Orig. Opp. tom. iv. p. 22, edit. Bened., which have led to very opposite conclusions. These may be seen in Dörner, where the whole question is discussed at length. His views were Monarchian, and are identified by Schleiermacher with those of the Patripassians, and by Baur with those of Artemon and the Neo-Ebionites. According to Dörner, Beryllus occupies a middle place, forming a connecting link between the Patripassians and Sabellius. The leading ideas of his teaching as developed by Dörner from Eusebius were as follows: (1) there existed a πατρική θεότης in Christ, but not an ἰδία θεότης: (2) Christ had no independent existence in a circumscribed form of being of His own (καρ' ἰδίαν οὐσίας περιγραφὴν), before His Incarnation (ἐπιδημία). (3) Subsequently to His Incarnation, He who had been identified with the πατρική θεότης became a circumscribed Being possessed of an independent existence; the being of God in Christ being a circumscription of the θεότης of the Father, i.e. of God Himself. According to Eusebius H. E. vi. 20, Beryllus was the author of epistles and treatises displaying considerable elegance. (Hieron. de Script. Eccl. No. lx.; Niceph. H. E. v. 22.; Neander, ii. p. 350, ff.; Gieseler, v. p. 219; Dörner, Person of Christ, First Period, Second Epoch, sect. i. c. 2, Div. i. vol. ii. pp. 35-45, Clark's Translations; Schröckh, iv. 38; Mosheim, *de reb. BESNA, priest, and chaplain to St. Patrick. "The priest Besna, sweet his verses, the chaplain of the son of Alprann," is given in the list of St. Patrick's household in the Four Masters, A.D. 448. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 188, n. 123) says, he was called in Irish Cruimther (priest) Besna, and would wish to identify him with the "Cruimther, of Domhnach-mor," given in Mart. Doneg. at Nov. 11. [A. P. F.]

BESSARION (BISARION), an Egyptian monk in the 4th century. Very many sayings and wonders are recorded of him. (Pall. Hist. Laus. 116; Ruff. de Verb. Sen. 122, et alibi pass. Rosw. V. P.) [I. G. S.]

BETTI, an Englishman, one of the four priests sent by Finan to the Middle Angles as missionaries, after the baptism of Peda in 653 (Bede, H. E. iii. 21). [S.]

BEUNO, ST., son of Hywgi, or Bugi, and a contemporary of St. Kentigern, to whom he was nearly related. He founded a religious society at Clynng Fawr, in Carnarvonshire, before or about A.D. 616 (but see Haddan and Stubbs, i. 160, on the date), on land granted by Cadfan, prince of North Wales, to whom Beuno gave a small golden sceptre in acknowledgment, which was worth sixty cows—the Welsh (like the Irish up to the English invasion) then reckoning value by cattle. In his old age Beuno was the instructor of St. Gwenfrewi or Wenefred. Eleven churches are dedicated to him, and his festival is on April 21 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 268). In his life (printed in Cambro-Briton Saints, 299), it is said that he quitted Berriew, near Welshpool, in Montgomeryshire, because he heard a Saxon saying to his dogs "Cergia." Beuno at once said to his disciples, "let us leave this place, for the nation of this man has a strange language, . . . they have invaded this place and it will be theirs, and they will keep it in their possession." Just before his death Beuno saw a vision of the Trinity, and Peter and Paul and the Druids ("Dindevirion") and Deiniol—a statement which strongly contrasts with the denunciations of the Druids (or Magi) in other lives of Celtic saints. [C. W. B.]

BIGSECH, V. of Cill-bigsiche (Kilbixy), in West Meath—June 28 (Mart. Doneg.)—but Mart. Tall. calls her "Bigesgi Virg." She was of the race of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muighmheadhoín. In Colgan (Acta SS. 248, c. 2), among the saints of the family of St. Colman, and house of Hi-Fiachra, is mentioned "S. Bicsecha filia Bressalii, colitur 28 Junii." [A. P. F.]

BILLFRITH, an anchorite and goldsmith, who bound the copy of the Gospels written by bishop Eadfrith (Sim. Dun. Hist. Dun. ii. 12; AA. SS. Boll. March, i. 448–452). He is made a contemporary of St. Balthere; and although nothing else is known of him, must have lived about 740. [S.]

BIRINUS, ST., the first bishop of the West Saxons. He is said by Bede (H. E. iii. 7) to have undertaken, by the advice of pope Honorius, to attempt the conversion of the interior of England, which had, as yet, been unvisited by missionaries; and for this work he was consecrated by Asterius, bishop of Genoa. On landing in Wessex in 634 he found the people still heathen, and determined that it was better to stay among them and preach to them than to go further into the country. One of his first proselytes was the king, Cynegils, whose conversion was aided by the persuasions of Oswald of Northumbria, and was followed by that of his whole people. Under the protection of the two kings he fixed his see at Dorchester in Oxfordshire, on the border of Wessex and Mercia; the latter kingdom, then under Penda, affording a field for his missionary labours. The death of Cynegils, and the indecision and defeat of Coenwalch his successor, do not seem to have affected the position of Birinus, who, however, lived to see Coenwalch restored in 648, and a church founded at Winchester, which was consecrated to St. Peter. He died in or before 650 (Chr. S. M. H. B. 311), and his obit was kept on the 3rd of December. He was buried at Dorchester, and his remains were translated by bishop Haedde to Winchester about 686. (See Rudborne, Ang. Sac. i. 193.) This much is known from Bede; the Winchester historians add that he was a Benedictine monk of the monastery of St. Andrew at Rome, that he dedicated the church of the Holy Trinity at Winchester in the twelfth year of his pontificate, and died in the fourteenth (Rudborne, Ang. S. i. 190, 191). The honour of possessing the relics of Birinus was claimed, however, in the 13th century, by the canons of Dorchester, who maintained, in contradiction to Bede and the Winchester tradition, that Birinus had never been translated, but Bertinus or Birnstan, who, according to their account, was the tenth of his successors. This of course is untrue; Byrstan living long after the death of Bede. Honorius III. inquired into the matter, but came to no conclusion, miracles being alleged on both sides. Surius (Dec. 3) has preserved the particulars in a life of Birinus (vi. 219–221, ed. 1581). [S.]

The parish of Kilbirnie in Scotland is named from St. Birinus, but no fair marks his day (N. S. A. "Ayrshire," p. 689). There is a Kilbirnie Loch, at the west end of the parish of Beith (O. S. A. viii. 326); and probably the parish of Dumbarney, in the most beautiful part of Strath-earn, takes its name from this saint. (O. S. A. viii. 404; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 279–280.) [A. P. F.]

BISI, the fourth bishop of the East Angles at Dunwich; consecrated by Theodore, as successor to Boniface, in 669 or 670. He was present at the council of Hertford in 673; and was soon after obliged by bad health to retire from the government of his diocese, which was immediately divided between the sees of Dunwich and Elmham (Bed. H. E. iv. 5). [S.]

BITEUS, i.e. Mobiu, abbat of Inis-cumsraigh (Inishcourcey, Ines, and now Inch, co. Down; Reeves, Eocl. Antiq., pp. 44, 92)—July 22. He was of the race of Eochaidh, son of Muireadhach, who was of the race of Heremon (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 199); and O'Gorman calls him Bute or Byte. He was one of the 350 disciples of St. Patrick mentioned by Tirechan, as given by Ussher (De Eocl. Brit. Prim. Dublin. 1639, 950-1; Colgan, Acta SS. 378, n. 22). It is said, that, when St. Patrick built a church at Elphin, he left there Assicus, Biteus the son or Assicus, and Cipia the mother of Bishop Biteus, St. Assicus being St. Patrick's worker in brass (Petrie's Round Towers of Ireland, p. 202). Biteus is counted one of the "tres fabri aerarii vasorumque sacrorum fabricatores;" but Colgan (in T. Thaum. 176, n.) says that he was son of Assicus only by spiritual birth or education, being by natural descent his brother's son. Working with his uncle Assicus, he made altars, and square covers for the service-books, and square patens. One of these little shields (scutellae) was kept (says Colgan, Ib. 134, c. 39) at Armagh, another at Elphin, and a third at St. Felart's church, at Domnachmor, to the west of Elphin; and Petrie says it is not improbable that specimens of the work of Biteus and his fellow-artificers may still remain. He is often classed among the bishops assisting St. Patrick, and is said to have been buried at Rath-cunga, where his uncle's remains were deposited (Ib. c. iii. 144), but Lanigan (Eocl. Hist. Ir. i. 341, 343) is doubtful as to his having been a bishop during the lifetime of the Apostle of Ireland. [A. P. F.]

BLADUS, ST., said to have been a bishop in the Isle of Man. His day was July 3. (Acta Sanctorum Oct., viii. 890; see Stubbs, Registrum Sacrum, 154.) [C. W. B.]

BLAECCA, the "praefectus" or reeve of Lincoln, converted, with all his family, by Paulinus in 627 or 628 (Bed. H. E. ii. 16). Smith, in his note on the passage, mentions an apocryphal statement that Blaecca was descended from Woden and was lord of Thong Castle. [S.]

BLAISE. [BLASIUS.]

BLANDINA, martyr, a female slave, reckoned as the chief among the martyrs of Lyons, in that, although weakest in body, she suffered longest and most bravely the most various and prolonged torture. Among other things she was stretched upon a cross and thrown to wild beasts, which however refused to touch her; and, finally, she was tied up in a net and gored to death by a bull. (Euseb. H. E. v. 1; Eucher. Lugdun. Hom. inter Hom. Euscb. Emsen. xi.; Greg. Tur. de Glor. Martt. xlix.; Baron. June 2.)

BLANE—Aug. 10, A.D. 590. The Irish Kalendars record Blaan, bishop of Ceann-garadh, in Galghaoidheln (i.e. Kingarth in Bute, which was included in ancient Galloway, Scotland). Camerarius calls him "episcopus Sidorensis." His Life was compiled by George Newton, archdeacon of Dunblane, and from it Colgan cites freely, in his Life of St. Cathan (Acta SS. pp. 233-34, and notes). When St. Cathan forsook his native country of Ireland, and sought for the eremitic life in the island of Bute, his sister Erca, or Ertha, accompanied or followed him thither from Ulster. In the cell he built at Kilcathan, in Bute, he educated his sister's son, Blane, who was the fruit of violence done to Erca by an unknown man; the mother and infant are said to have been put into an oarless boat at sea, and to have been carried by the tide to the shore where SS. Comgall and Cainnech found them, and gave St. Blane his education for seven years. St. Blane was next under his uncle in Bute, (who is always known as Cathanus "Sti. Blaani educator sive magister,") and then was sent back to St. Comgall and St. Cainnech, to receive priest's orders. He was raised to the episcopate, went to Rome, and after receiving the Pope's blessing, returned on foot through Anglia, in a northern city of which he performed the extraordinary miracle of restoring a blind wicked boy to sight (Orig. Par. Scot. i. p. xxiv.; C. Innes, Sket. Ear. Scot. Hist. 7; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 280-1). From his connection with St. Cainnech (Kenneth), and St. Comgall, St. Blane could scarcely have been born before A.D. 550; and King Aidan, his father, or grandfather, the son of Gauran, died in A.D. 605. Dempster says, he flourished in A.D. 446, and in this date Alban Butler follows him (viii. 176); but the true time is at the end of the 6th or beginning of the 7th century. He was buried at Dunblane, and had several dedications in Bute and Argyshire. (Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 210-2; Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 145, 164, 167; Fordun, Scotich. xi. c. 21; Bolland, Acta SS. Aug. tom. ii. d. 10; Reeves, Culdees, 46.)

[A. P. F.]

BLASIUS, martyr, bishop of Sebaste in Armenia, whose flesh was scored with iron combs, and who was finally beheaded, with two boys, under Agricolaus the praefect, A.D. 316 (Baed. & C. Acta, in Surius, Baron. Feb. 3). He is the patron saint of the city of Ragusa; and also (probably from the combs above mentioned) of the guild of woolcombers.

[A. W. H.]

There is little doubt it is the same person, who in the Scotch Kalendars is called St. Blaise, patron of the island of Pladay, on the south coast of Arran, and having altars in the cathedral church, Glasgow, and St. Giles, Edinburgh. (Regist. Glasg. 414; Maitland, Hist. Edin. 271; Fordun, Scot. i. c. 6, ii. c. 10; Orig. Par. Scot. i. 3, 138, ii. 254.)

[J. G.]

BLASTUS, a Quartodeciman Montanist at Rome about the reign of Commodus (180-192).

Eusebius (H. E. v. 15) names him at this time as having drawn away many from the church at Rome by his novelties. Irenaeus wrote to him a letter on Schism (Eus. v. 20. 1). The Appendix to Tertullian de Praescriptione, written not long after by a Roman author, as Lipsius has shewn, adds to his article on the Montanists a statement (22) that Blastus "wished secretly to introduce Judaism, saying that the Pasch must be kept only on the 14th of the month according to the law of Moses." Pacianus in the 4th century (Ep. i. ad Symp. in Gall. B. P. vii. 257) speaks of him as a Greek, whom he believed to be one of the many authorities to whom the Cataphrygians (secundum Phrygas), i.e. Montanists, appealed: some indications, however, such as the inclusion of Theodotus and Praxeas among the authorities, suggest that he may possibly have had all Phrygian heretics in view indiscriminately. See Massuet, Diss. de Iren. ii. 59; Schwegler, Montanismus, 243, 252; Gieseler, K. G. i. i. 292 f. [H.]

BLASTUS, named by Theodoret (H. F. i. 25) in a list of Marcionites. Volkmar, with much probability, suggests that the name is a careless transcript of BASILICUS from Eusebius: it must however be remembered that Theodoret wrote a treatise against Marcion, now lost (Epp. 116, 145) and may conceivably have had access to Marcionitic literature now lost. In an earlier chapter (i. 23) he has set down the Quarto-deciman Blastus as a Valentinian by a careless misunderstanding of another passage of Eusebius, where he is named in the same sentence with Florinus, but pointedly distinguished from him. [H.]

BLATH, the Irish for a flower, a beautiful thing, or grace, favour. Martyrologies give several virgins of this name. Thus on Jan. 18 is "Scoth, Feamnor, Blath, and Ana, four virgins of Cluain-greenach" (Mart. Doneg.; Mart. Tall.; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 323). And on Jan. 29, another Blath appears in Mart. Doneg., while Colgan (Tr. Thaum. App. v. c. 13, p. 623, "De discipulis S. Brigidae") has "S. Blathnata seu Blatha, Latine Flora, coqua Sanctae Brigidae, de qua vita Hibern. S. Brig. c. 33, et Mar. Gorm. ad 29 Jan." She flourished about A.D. 523 (Colgan, Ib. p. 629; O'Hanlon, Ib. i. 495-6).

[A. P. F.]

BLATHMAC (BLAITHMAIC). In the 8th and 9th centuries this appears to have been a common name in Ireland. (See the Annals of the Four Masters, Ulster, and Tighernach; Colgan, Acta SS. p. 129, n. 3.) The festival of Blathmac, son of Flann, is given in the Martt. of Doneg. and Tull. on July 24; but Colgan puts the "depositio" of St. Blathmac and his companions, in Iona, on Jan. 19 (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 332). Colgan (Acta SS. 127-9) gives Hugo Menard's Life of St. Blathmac the Martyr in the Benedictine Martyrology, and also Walafrid Strabo's Poetical Life of the same. (See Grub's Eccl. Hist. of Scotland, i. 125, sq.) Blathmac was the son of an Irish prince, probably of the O'Neils of Meath, among whom Blathmac and Flann seem to have been names of common occurrence. In the Table of the Mart. Doneg. he is called also Florigenius, or Florus, as the synonym of Blathmac. He became in early life a monk, though his relatives tried to prevent it, and after being made abbat in an Irish monastery, he fled to Scotland, in his desire for martyrdom, and came to Iona, where his desire was soon gratified. He was distinguished by the gift of prophecy, and when thus made aware of his coming martyrdom, he set himself to strengthen those who were prepared to suffer with him, and warned the weaker brethren to flee in time. When the Danes attacked Iona in search of the treasures believed to be deposited there, and especially of the shrine of St. Columba, "Ad sanctum venere patrem, pretiosa metalla reddere cogentes, queis sancta Columbae ossa jacent." As he was celebrating the Mass, and "ante sacram vitulus stetit integer aram," the heathen hordes rushed in, and slew his companions; and when he refused to accede to their demands for the shrine, which was hidden in the earth, they barbarously killed him, and his remains were afterwards buried in the place where he died. Menardus conjectures that his death was about A.D. 793, and on Jan. 19; and D. Camerarius (Bolland, Acta SS. Jan. tom. ii. p. 601), on Dec. 4. But the more correct date seems to be A.D. 825, as fixed upon by Dr. Grub and Dr. Reeves (Adarnan, pp. xxii. 315, 388-9). For the place of his burial, and the subsequent preservation of his relics, see the learned and interesting Additional Note M, in Reeves, Adarnan, 312 sq.; Ecol. Antiq. 226. His life is celebrated in verse by Walafrid Strabo, abbat of Augia Dives or Reichenau, A.D. 823. It is given by Colgan as above, by Pinkerton in his Vitae Antiquae SS. 459; by Messingham in Flor. Sanct. Hib. 399-402; and in D'Achery, and Mabillon's Acta SS. Ord. S. Benedicti, pars iii. 98. See Bp. Forbes, Kol. Scott. Saints. 280; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. 253, 255; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 326-30. [A. P. F.]

BLESILLA, eldest daughter of Paula and sister of Eustochium, a Roman lady in the latter part of the 4th century, who lost her husband very soon after marriage, and ere long was induced by Jerome to become an ascetic. She was an accomplished linguist, speaking Greek fluently, and knowing something of Hebrew. She died in early youth, and her funeral caused a tumult against the monks, her death being attributed to her austerities. It was at her request that Jerome began his translation of Ecclesiastes, which had been instrumental in persuading her to become a recluse (Hier. Epp. 23, 25, et al.).

BOBOLENUS, a German monk, c. 690. He wrote the life of St. German the abbat of Grandval in the diocese of Basle, who suffered martyrdom at the hands of duke Boniface, A.D. 666. This biography is given by Bollandus under Feb. 21, iii. 263, and by Mabillon, Sacc. Benedict. ii. 511. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 600.)

BODFAN, ST., to whom a church in Carnarvonshire is dedicated. His festival is on June 2 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302). [C. W. B.]

BOETHIUS, Ep. Monasteriensis (BOETIUS, BUIE, BEODE, BOICH)—Dec. 7. He was the son of Bronach, of Mainister-Buite (now Monasterboice, county Louth), of the race of Comla, and descended from Oilill Olum: he is said to have been like to Beda the Wise, in habits and life. (For the etymology of his name, which means "Fire," or "Living to God," "God-living," see Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 329.) He died upon the day on which St. Columba was born, whose birth he foretold, and who afterwards came to the monastery, disinterred his remains, and gave the whole place and its members his blessing. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. c. 14, p. 391; c. 65, p. 400; App. II. i. c. 8, p. 457; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 158 n., 329; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 170 n.; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 461.) The Four Masters give the obit of Buite Mac-Bronaigh, bishop of Mainister, at A.D. 521, and this is generally accepted as the true date. (See Reeves, Adarnan, pp. lxxviii-ix, and most valuable notes, fixing the date of St. Columba's birth, and St. Buite's death.) A poor copy of St. Buite's Life, in Latin, is preserved in one of the Ware MSS. in the British Museum, Cod. Clar. xxxix. (Add. No. 4788), and a good one in the Bodleian (MS. Bodl. Rawl. B. 505). This states, that after thirty years' peregrination in Italy, he returned with St. Codrus, and some devout persons who joined him in Germany; that he restored to life the daughter of the king of Dalriada, and Nectan, king of the Picts, from whom he received a grant of the Castrum in which he had performed the miracle, and where he afterwards founded a church. This is, according to Mr. Skene, probably Carbuddo, in Angus, quasi Castrum Boethii. There are still the remains of a Castrum there, not far from Dunnichen. He went to the Kyanaetei, but was repelled as a foreigner (Skene, Chron. of Picts and Scots, pp. lxxiv. 410). [A. P. F.]

BOËTHIUS (Boërios, Procop.), ANICUS MANLIUS SEVERINUS.* This honourable name, invested by the church for so many centuries with a halo of sanctity, can hardly be excluded from a Dictionary of Christian Biography, though the criticism of modern times has tended more and more to distinguish the Roman senator, the author of the Consolatio Philosophiae, from the writer of certain theological treatises which bear his name, and upon the genuineness of which depends his claim to be enrolled among the martyrs of Christendom. These works, (i.) De sancta Trinitate, (ii.) Utrum Pater et Filius substantiãditer prædicentur, (iii.) De duabus naturis et una persona Christi, contra Eutychem et Nestorium, (iv.) Fidei confessio seu brevis institutio religionis Christianae, based upon the Aristotelian Categories, and compiled in great measure from the writings of St. Augustine, being concerned entirely with abstract questions of dogma, offer but little to compare with the Consolatio, into which the mind and heart of its author were manifestly thrown: nevertheless Hand (Encyclopædie, r. Ersch u. Gruber, in voce) has endeavoured to shew that they are alien in point of philosophy as well as in the method of thought and expression from the undoubted writings of Boëthius. For instance, although philosopher and theologian alike demonstrate the substantia as opposed to the accidental nature of God, Boëthius (ad Arist. Categ. c. 4) maintains Aristotle's distinction of substances, whereas the author of the first theological treatise insists upon the substantial indifference of the three persons in the Trinity. Again, while Boëthius translates the οὐσία of Aristotle by substantia, the author of the third treatise adopts the later rendering essentia, while he also follows ecclesiastical writers in his use of the words substantia (ὕποστασις), and persona (πρόσωπον). The arguments of Hand have been controverted by Gustave Baur (de Boëth. Christianae fidei assertore, c. 1), but the theory of a second Boëthius, whom Hand supposes to have been confounded at an early age with the philosopher, so far from being refuted, has suggested the still more plausible conjecture of Obbarius (Proleg. ad Consol. Phil. p. xxxvii. Jenae, 1843) that another Severinus was the author of the works in question, and that to this person, and not to the author of the Consolatio, belong the honours of martyrdom in defence of the Catholic faith. In support of this conjecture there are the facts, (i.) That no author is known to mention the theological works of Boëthius before Alcuin (de Proc. Spir. Sancti, p. 752), who flourished nearly three centuries after his death. (ii.) That although the tradition was current in the middle ages, from Paulus Diaconus (8th cent.) downwards, that Boëthius laid down his life in his zeal for the Catholic faith against the Arian invaders of Italy, this is not his own account of his fall from court favour, nor is it supported by any contemporary writer. (iii.) That in the epitaph of Gerbertus, bishop of Ravenna, afterwards pope Sylvester II., inscribed upon the monument raised in his honour by Otho III., A.D. 996, no mention is made of martyrdom or of canonization (Migne, Patrol. vol. 139, p. 287). (iv.) That while the Church of Rome knows nothing of St. Boëthius, the festival of St. Severinus has been held on the 23rd Oct., ever since the 8th cent., in the neighbourhood of Ticinum, where Boëthius is popularly believed to have been executed. It is singular, in our opinion, that criticism has been so slow to perceive the double clue which runs throughout the history of Boëthius, as derived from various sources. It is not merely a single instance of confusion that is noticeable; the same twofold character, half secular, half ecclesiastical, pervades the whole; and hence the unusual number of so-called fables that are mixed up with or set alongside of the best authenticated facts: for instance—

(1.) The wife of Boëthius was unquestionably Rusticiana, the daughter of the senator Symmachus (Cons. Phil. ii. 3, 4; Procop. Goth. iii. 20), by whom he had two sons, Aurelius Anicius Symmachus and Anicius Manlius Severinus, who were consuls A.D. 522 (Cons. Phil. ii. 3, 4); but tradition makes him to have been also the husband of Elpis, a Sicilian lady and the authoress of two hymns in the breviary [ELPIS], and by her to have had two sons, Patricius and Hypatius, Greek consuls A.D. 500.

(2.) According to his own statement Boëthius was imprisoned (Cons. Phil. i. ii. metr. 24) at a distance of 500 miles from Rome (ib. i. 4): according to other accounts he was simply exiled, a confusion which no doubt arose from the epitaph of the said Elpis, in which she is said (Burnm. Anth. Lat. tom. ii. epigr. 138) to have followed her husband into banishment.

(3.) His fall and death is mixed up by Paulus

Diaconus and other writers, who are followed among modern writers by Bähr (Rom. Lit. p. 162) and Heyne (Censar. ingenii, etc. Boëth.), with the constrained embassy of pope John to Constantinople on behalf of the Arians of the East, which is said to have resulted in the suspicion of his treachery and finally in his death; whereas Boëthius was put to death, according to others (Anonym. Vales. &c.), before the embassy, or at least before the return of the pope, A.D. 525, and as he himself implies (Cons. Phil. i. 4), on suspicion of conspiracy, not against Arianism, but for the restoration of the liberty and power of the senate.

(4.) Two distinct accounts exist of his execution, one stating that he was beheaded at Ticinum (Anast. Vit. Pontif. in Johanne I.; Aimoin, Hist. Franc. ii. 1), where he was imprisoned, according to popular tradition, in a tower still standing at Pavia in 1584 (Tiraboschi, iii. l. 1, c. 4). Another relating (Anonym. Vales. p. 36, in Gronov. ed. Amm. Marcell.) that he was confined along with Albinus in the baptistry of a church, and soon afterwards executed "in agro Calventiano," being first tortured by a cord tightly twisted round his forehead, and then beaten to death with a club.

(5.) He is claimed by the church as a saint and martyr under the name of Severinus, the friend of St. Benedict (Tritenheim, ap. Fabric. Bibl. Lat. iii. 15), and the worker of a miracle at his death (Martianus Rota, vid. Boëth. in usum Delphin.), but of all this his contemporaries knew nothing, and no hint of it appears until three centuries after his death, when he also becomes the author of four dogmatic treatises on the mysteries of the Trinity.

Whether or not this double tradition has grown out of the history of two distinct individuals, there can be little doubt that to obtain a true estimate of the character and writings of Boëthius, the author of the Consolatio must be distinguished from Severinus, saint and martyr, or whoever else was the writer of the above-mentioned theological works; and, the accretions of later times being thus removed, it remains for us briefly to notice the most authentic facts of the philosopher's life, and to inquire how far his thoughts were coloured by the contemporaneous influence of Christianity, or exercised an influence in their turn upon the religious thought of the middle ages.

Boëthius was born between the years A.D. 470–475, as is inferred from his contemporary Ennodius (Eucharisma de vitâ suâ), who says that he himself was sixteen when Theodoric invaded Italy, A.D. 490. As a wealthy orphan (Cons. Phil. ii. 3) he inherited the patrimony and honours of the Anician family, was brought up under the care of the chief men at Rome (ib. ii. 3) and became versed not merely in the erudition of his own country but in that of Greece likewise. In the words of his friend Cassiodorus, "The geometry of Euclid, the music of Pythagoras, the arithmetic of Nicomachus, the mechanics of Archimedes, the astronomy of Ptolemy, the theology of Plato, and the logic of Aristotle," were translated and illustrated for the benefit of the Romans by his indefatigable pen (Var. i. Ep. 45). Nor was he less distinguished for his virtue. His purse was ever open to the poor of Rome (Procop. Goth. i. i.). He exerted his authority and eloquence on behalf of the oppressed provincials (Cons. Phil. i. 4). Such conspicuous merit was at first appreciated by Theodoric. He received the title of patrician while still a youth (Ib. i. 3), became consul A.D. 510, and princeps senatus (Procop. Goth. i. i.), was employed in the important station of master of the offices (Anonym. Vales. p. 26), in which post his scientific knowledge and mechanical skill were turned to ample account (Cassiod. Ep. i. 10, 45, ii. 40), and reached the summit of his fortune on the day when supported by his two sons, who had just been inaugurated in the consulship, he pronounced a panegyric upon Theodoric and gratified the populace with a largess (Cons. Phil. ii. 3). But a reverse was at hand. The philosopher had exerted himself to rescue the state from the usurpation of ignorance; the senator had opposed his integrity to the tyranny and avarice of the barbarians who did not in general share the moderation of their leader. His expression, "palatini canes" (Cons. Phil. i. 4), shews the uncompromising spirit in which he must have set his face against their iniquities; and it is not surprising that the courage and sympathy he shewed in pleading the cause of Albinus, a senator who was accused of "hoping the liberty of Rome" (Ib. i. 4), joined to other similar conduct, and misrepresented by his foes, at length poisoned the mind of Theodoric, who seems to have appointed one Decoratus, a man of worthless character, to share and control the power of his favourite (Cons. Phil. iii. 4). As to the existence of any wide-spread conspiracy to overthrow the Ostrogothic rule there is but very faint evidence, and against this accusation must be set his own indignant self-justification (Cons. Phil. i. 4). A sentence of confiscation and death was passed upon him by the senate without a trial; he was imprisoned in the Milanese territory, and ultimately executed in one or other of the ways described above, probably about the 50th year of his age, A.D. 520-524. His father-in-law, Symmachus, was involved in his ruin (Procop. Goth. i. i.), and his wife, Rusticiana, reduced to beggary (Ib. iii. 20). The remorse of Theodoric, which came too late to save "the last of the Romans," is the natural and tragic finish to a story that cannot fail to suggest many parallels in history.

It was during his imprisonment that Boëthius composed his "Consolation of Philosophy," a work described by Gibbon as "a golden volume, not unworthy of the leisure of Plato or Tully." It is a dialogue in prose and verse (a species of composition suggested probably by the medleys of Petronius and Capella) between the author and his visitant, Philosophy, whom he represents as a woman of reverend mien and varying stature, upon the borders of whose vesture were woven the letters Π and Θ, symbolizing no doubt the Platonic division of philosophy into πρακτικὴ and θεωρητικὴ. Those who regard the "Consolation" as the work of a Christian, have not unnaturally been surprised and perplexed by its total silence as regards the distinctive faith of Christianity, and have been forced to take refuge either in the supposed incompleteness (Bertius, Lips. 1753), or in the allegorical interpretation of the dialogue (Gervais, vid. Schröckh, Hist. Eccles. xvi. 118). It breathes a spirit of resignation and hope, but so does the Phædo. It is based upon a firm belief in Providence, but it is only in his poetic flights that the author's language seems to savour of a belief in a personal God (Cons. Phil. iii. metr. 9), his faith never elsewhere rising higher than Theism, and occasionally passing into Pantheism (Ib. iii. 12, et pass.). He asserts the efficacy of prayer, but the injunction thereto is drawn from the Timæus and not from the New Test. (Ib. iii. ix.), while the object of his aspiration is not the στέφανος ζῶης or δικαιοσύνης of the Apostles, but the summum bonum of the Greek philosopher. He has been thought to betray an acquaintance with the Christian idea of heaven (Ib. i. 5, iii. 12, iv. 1, v. 1), but his patria is the peace of the philosophic mind, not the πολίτευμα ἐν οὐρανῷ ἕπαρχον. In short, the whole work, with the exception of words and phrases (e. g. adunatio, angelicâ virtute, coæternus, purgatoriâ clementiâ), which imply nothing more than an acquaintance with Christian writers, might have been written, so far as theology is concerned, by Cicero himself. And it is only as the work of a pagan that it can be said to have merited the high respect so long paid to it by the church or the devotion of its many translators (vid. Dict. of Greek and Rom. Biograph., in voc.). Even this respect was due rather to the position of Boëthius as standing at the close of classical and before the rise of scholastic philosophy, than to any originality he possessed either as a thinker or a poet. His works not only prove that he had an intimate knowledge of Greek literature, but were for centuries the only vehicle by which Greek philosophy penetrated to the West; but at this distance of time, while the greater part of his writings are forgotten, the chief of them is of value only as a stately prose-poem serving, along with the poetry of Claudian and Ausonius, to mark the point of contact between the thought of Heathendom and the faith of Christianity. That from the 6th to the 14th century its author was invested with a monopoly of philosophic greatness was natural in the utter decay of learning, but at most he can only be said to have shone by virtue of the light he reflected from his masters, and it was the excess of darkness which made that light of brightness sufficient to shine across the ages till it paled in the rising splendour of the revival of letters.

The works of Boëthius are as follows:—De Consolatione Philosophiæ libri v.; In Porphyrii Isagogen a Victorino translata dialogi ii.; In eandem a se ipso Latine translata libri v.; In Categoriis Aristotelis libri ii.; In ejusdem librum περί ἔρμηνελας lib. i.; Editionis secundæ libri vi.; Analyticorum Aristotelis priorum et posteriorum libri iv.; Topicorum Aristotelis libri viii.; In Aristotelis Topica libri viii. (not extant); Introductio in Syllogismos Categoriicos; De syllogismis hypotheticis libri ii.; De Divisione; De Definitione; De Differentiis Topicis libri iv.; In Topica Cicronis libri vi.; Elenchorum Sophisticorum libri ii.; De Arithmetica libri ii.; De Musica libri v.; De Geometria libri ii.; also two short treatises entitled respectively "De rhetorice cognatione," and "Locorum rhetoricorum distinctio," discovered by Cardinal Mai in a MS. of the 11th century. Doubtful works:—De unitate et uno; De Bono; De Hebdomadibus; all of which are dedicated to pope John.

The first edition of his collected works was published at Venice, 1497, fol. The most complete is that contained in Migne's "Patrologia," which is a collation of the best editions, the principal being those of Glareanus, Basil. fol. 1570, and Vallinus, Lugdun. 1656. It includes the commentaries of Glareanus on the "Consolatio Philosophiae," those of Gilbert de la Porée on the above-mentioned theological works, condemned by the Council of Rheims 1148, and the Vie de Boèce by Gervais. The best edition of the Consolatio is that of Theod. Obbarius, Jenae, 1843. The most important translation, that into Anglo-Saxon by Alfred the Great (vid. preface to Cardale's edition, 1829).

The chief ancient authorities for the life of Boëthius are the epistles of his contemporaries Cassiodorus and Ennodius, and the History of Procopius. The best modern authorities are Hand, in Ersch and Gruber's Encyclopädie; and for an opposite view of his religious faith, Gustave Baur, de Boëth. Christianae fidei assertore, Darmst. 1841; Heyne, Censura Boëth. de Cons. Phil., Gotting. 1805, in Opusc. Academ. vi. 142; and the "Prolegomena de Boëthii vitâ et scriptis," to the edition of the Consolatio Philosophiae by Obbarius. [E. M. Y.]

BOETIUS, disciple of St. Fursey, and probably one of the three companions of St. Foillan, the brother of St. Fursey, who were killed along with St. Foillan, and buried with him in the church of the canons of St. Gertrude, on the bank of the Sambre, in South Brabant, i.e. at Fossae, in Belgium. BOGHA (BOGA), V. of Leitir in Dalaradia—Jan. 22. In Murt. Doneg. and Tallaght are given the three daughters, i.e. foster-children or pupils in religion, of Comhgall, son of Fianghalach, &c. abbat of Bangor, in Down. (See COMGALL.) In Dr. Todd's note to Murt. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 24, he says that Aengus in the Felirc mentions "The decease of the daughters of Comhgall." Among the saints descended from the family of Maccarthennus and the race of Eochaidh, are given SS. Boga, Colma or Columba, and Lassara, virgins, with their genealogy, and "coluntur in ecclesia Litterensi in Dalriedia [recte Dalaradia], Jan. 22." (Colgan, Acta SS. App. c. 3, 741; Reeves, Ecl. Antiq. 237.)

BOISIL, praepositus or prior of the monastery of Mailros, under abbat Eata. He is described by Bede as a man of great virtues and of a prophetic spirit (Bede. H. E. iv. 27); and of his power of predicting events several instances are given, which Bede seems to have learned from Herefrith, abbat of Lindisfarne, and from Sigfrid, a monk of Jarrow, who had been educated at Mailros (V. S. Cuthberti, c. 6). Most of these are connected with the history of St. Cuthbert, whose future sanctity he recognized at their first interview (V. S. Cuthb. c. 6), who he foretold would be a bishop (Bede, H. E. iv. 28), and to whom, during the last week of his life, he revealed much of the future (V. S. Cuthb. c. 8). Whatever may be the truth of these stories, it seems certain that it was through Boisil that Cuthbert obtained admission at Mailros and the tonsure (V. S. Cuthb. c. 6), that he was his favourite pupil, and the companion of his last hours. Cuthbert succeeded him as praepositus. Another of his pupils was the famous Egbert, to whom, according to Bede, he appeared after his death, twice, in dreams; in one of which he dissuaded him from a missionary journey to Friesland, whilst in the second he urged him to go to Iona to attempt the conversion of the Scottish monks to the English or Catholic customs (Bede. H. E. v. 9). The exact date of Boisil's death is uncertain; it was after the expulsion of the Scottish monks from Ripon (cir. 662), and some years before Cuthbert's promotion to Lindisfarne, possibly in the great sickness of 664, which he is said to have foretold. Boisil was not only a scholar, but an indefatigable preacher in the villages of the north (Bede, V. S. Cuthb. c. 9). Relics of him were preserved at Durham (Smith's Bede, pp. 741, 742, 744). See also Act. SS. Boll. Martii 20, and Jan. 23. His memory was observed on Sept. 9; Mabillon, Act. SS. O.S.B. Saec. ii. p. 850. [S.]

BOLCAN or OLCAN.

(1) Bishop of Derkan or Airthir-muge—Feb. 20 (Murt. Doneg. and Tallaght). About A.D. 440, according to Joceline, in the north of Ulster, where it was formerly Dalriada, and now Reota or the Route, there lived a man, "Deo et hominibus dilectus," named Bolcan or Olcan. In infancy he had been found beside his dead mother by Darius, a regulus or chief, of Carsedna, which is near Airthir-muge, and a few miles from Dunluce. He was called "misellus," or in Irish, "Olcán," or Boleán. St. Patrick baptized him, and, on seeing him advance in learning and piety, put him over the church of Rath-mugia, or Airthir-mugia, the chief town of Dalriada, where he had baptized him, but the legend is probably erroneous which makes him nephew of St. Patrick. After educating him, and probably before giving him the church of Airthirmuge, St. Patrick sent him to Gaul, and Ussher (De Brit. Ecl. Prim. Dublin. 1639, p. 951, and Ind. Chron.) gives A.D. 450 as the date of his return, which Colgan and Lanigan think much too early, if he was born about A.D. 443; but he was in all probability a bishop in A.D. 480, when he had one of the most distinguished schools in the north of Ireland. Ussher makes him be consecrated bishop of Derkan, or Clonderkan, in Dalriada, in A.D. 474, and the place for his church given him by Fergus, the younger son of Ere, whose posterity were promised by St. Patrick to have great power among his brethren, and who afterwards extended their sway into Scotland. A story is told of his having been induced by menaces against himself and others to baptize Saran, a chief in Dalriada, and father of St. Berchan (or Becan) of Echdruim [see BERCHAN (2)], and of St. Patrick, hearing of his weak compliance, and being filled with anger, foretelling that for his indiscretion his church would be thrice destroyed in after ages. Whatever foundation there may be for the legend, Reeves notes a curious circumstance, that the church of Armoy (Airthirmuge) has had its property gradually merged in the episcopal property of Connor, so that three-fourths of the parish have been from time immemorial the property of that see. (See Colgan, Acta SS. 375-8; Tr. Thaum. 85, 95, 146, Y 2

147, 231, col. 2; Reeves, Ecol. Antiq. 80, 90, 238, 243-5, 321, 376; Ussher, Ecol. Br. Antiq. Dubl. 1639, pp. 610, 951, A.D. 450, 474; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 256, 265, 341, sq. 403.)

(2) July 4. In speaking of St. Bolcan of Airthirmuge, Colgan (Acta SS. 377, n. 5) says, there is another saint in Ireland called Bolcan, who is venerated in the parish church of Kill-chule (Kilcooley, co. Roscommon), in the diocese of Elphin, in Connaught; and again (Ib. p. 377, c. 10), that he is always enumerated by Tirechan and Aengus among the presbyters and abbats who were disciples of St. Patrick, being in fact a presbyter and worshipped on July 4 in the church of Kill-chuile, in Connaught, possibly the Olcan mentioned by Ussher, from Tirechan (De Brit. Ecol. Prim. Dubl. 1639, pp. 950-1; Reeves, Ecol. Antiq. p. 244). Alb. Butler (vii. 61) says his relics remain at Kilmore, where his monastery stood, and Lanigan (Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 256, 344) calls him Olcan of Kilmoyale. [A. P. F.]

BONIFACIUS MOGUNTINENSIS. St. Boniface of Mainz, called "the Apostle of Germany," was the greatest, though not the first in time, of the missionaries who christianized Germany. He was born of noble parents in Wessex,^a at Crediton (Crediodunum), in the last quarter of the 7th century, and was educated as a child within the walls of a monastery, apparently in or near the neighbouring city of Exeter (Adestanacstrum) (Willibaldi Vit. Bonif. c. 1; Bonif. Epist. 10). His name then was Winfried. He soon evinced a longing for the life of a monk; his father reluctantly consenting he was received into the monastery of Nutsall (Nhts-scillense), near Winchester (Netley?); was ordained priest at the age of thirty, and, being eminent among the brethren for his learning and ability, had the prospect of future greatness before him, learned men being scarce at that time in England. On the recommendation of the assembled abbats of Wessex, he was deputed by Ina, king of Wessex, to attend a council convoked by Bretwald (Brietwaldus), archbishop of Canterbury (Vit. cc. 2, 3, 4; Ep. 3).

But Winfried longed to exchange the peace and security of the cloister for the toils and perils of a missionary. The conversion of his own country was accomplished; even Wessex, "the most pagan of the Saxon kingdoms" (Milman, Hist. of Latin Christianity, ii. p. 67), had embraced the Christian faith; his longings naturally turned to the old country, the fatherland of the English. Willibrod, like himself, an English monk, had recently preached the gospel to the Frisii (parts of Holland and Hanover), and two other English monks, the brothers Ewald, among the Saxons (North Germany, S. of the Elbe).

Early^b in the 8th century Winfried embarked with only two or three of his brother monks with him, crossed from London to Dorst, near Utrecht, and commenced operations. But his attempt was singularly inopportune. Ratbod (Ratbodus), king of the Frisii, at war with Karl Martel, was devastating the churches and monasteries in Friesland which had been founded by the Franks, was restoring the worship of idols, and was altogether in no mood to receive overtures of Christianity. After an unsuccessful interview with Ratbod, Boniface returned home, nothing done (Vit. c. 4).

After a short stay, whether of one winter or more is uncertain, in his old quarters at Nutsall; and, after declining, according to his biographer Willibald, the honour of succeeding Winbert as abbat,^c Winfried renewed his attempt, with the same intrepidity as before, but with more preparation (Vit. c. 6). It was his farewell for ever to the shores of England. Fortified with a commendatory letter from his friend and patron Daniel (Ep. 33), bishop of Winchester, he made his way, no easy journey in those days, to the city which was then emphatically the centre of the organization of Christendom. At Rome he was welcomed cordially by the Pope, Gregory II. (Vit. c. 6; Ep. 10). There, too, he formed a friendship for life with Eadburga, an English princess (Ep. 14), who, like many others in England of royal blood, had retired to the cloister (Montalemb. Les Moines de l'Occid. v. 5). Then and there, according to some writers, but more probably on being made bishop during his next visit to Rome, he assumed the name Bonifacius (Mab. ad Vit. c. 7).

The winter past and the snow melting, he recrossed the Alps, after a friendly reception at the court of the Lombards, bearing a general authorisation from the pope to evangelize central Europe (Vit. c. 6; Epp. 119-124). He found the duchy of Bavaria, extending from the Alps to the old Roman frontier, in a state of great disorganization. It had received Christianity as a Roman province, and more recently Rupert, Corbinian and others had laboured there; but the clergy as well as the people were demoralised. Winfried appears to have made only a brief stay among them, passing on into Thuringia (Saxony), which had been in part christianized by the disciples of Columban; but some of the tribes had relapsed into heathenism, and the Christianity of the others was not in conformity with the Christianity of the Roman see. His missionary efforts, however, in this district were interrupted by tidings of the death of Ratbod (A.D. 719, Mab.). Perhaps Winfried was disappointed of the success which he had anticipated in Thuringia, or seized with a craving to revisit the scene of his earliest enterprise; perhaps he felt that he had yet much to learn under one older and more experienced than himself; anyhow he turned his steps at once to Friesland, and there assisted Willibrod, archbishop of Utrecht (Trajectum), for three years. At the end of that time, declining to become coadjutor first and afterwards successor of Willibrod, he returned to Thuringia in the wake of Karl Martel's victorious troops, and then prosecuted his mission northwards in the territory of the Hessi, a heathen tribe between the middle-Rhine and the Elbe. Here he made many converts (Vit. cc. 6, 7).

So far in Winfried's career it has been only the skirmishing before the battle, or the athlete's training for the race. From this date his work becomes more systematic, and the link closer which binds him to Rome.

^a Trithemius calls him "Scotus natu," evidently mistaking him for a Kelt from Ireland (Fabric. Biblioth. Eccles. s. v.).

^b 704 A.D. Cave and others; not before A.D. 716, Mabillon (on Willib. Vit. Bonif. c. 4).

^c But it is argued from Ep. 33 that Winbert died later (Wright, Biog. Brit. Liter. p. 310).

In A.D. 723 he made his second visit to Rome, to receive Pope Gregory's directions on various complications arising from the unsettled relations of Christianity and heathenism in Germany. On St. Andrew's day in that year he was consecrated bishop, without a see ("regionarius"), and probably on that occasion assumed the name by which he is known in history. Boniface had learned by experience how essential was the support which Rome alone could give to the success of his labours, and bound himself, apparently without any reluctance, by a stringent oath of fealty to the pope, similar to that which was imposed on the Italian (suburbicarii) bishop. (Othlo. Vit. Bonif. c. 14). As early as was possible in the spring he started again from Rome northwards, armed with the pope's commendatory letters to Karl Martel (Othlo. Vit. c. 15) and others, clergy and lay people, with whom he was likely to be brought into contact (Willib. Vit. c. 7).

Evidently the conversion of the Saxons, to whom Boniface felt himself drawn by the ties of blood and race, had been from the first very near his heart (Ep. 36). But experience had taught him to work his way gradually to his end. Before returning to his mission among the Hessi, he attached himself for a time to the court of Karl Martel, and gained the sanction of that prince, then vigorously pushing forward his schemes of conquest in that direction (Vit. c. 8). The position of the Hessi was important, ecclesiastically as well as politically, on the frontier between Christendom and paganism, between the Frankish kingdom and the Saxons. It was necessary to strike a telling blow; and Boniface had both the courage and the tact for the emergency. With his own hands, in the presence of an assembled crowd, he felled to the ground the sacred and inviolable oak of Thor at Geismar (Gaesmara); and, subsequently, his monks assisting, built an oratory with the planks (Vit. c. 8). Conversions followed rapidly: and he appears, notwithstanding much opposition from the clergy as well as the laity, to have been successful now in controlling the disorder in Thuringia. In the midst of his labours he kept up a constant correspondence with old friends in England, who sent him from time to time a plentiful supply of monks and nuns, willing recruits for his missionary campaign, as well as books and other things which he needed. Here and there, as occasion offered, he planted his monastic colonists, to hold the territory which had been reclaimed from heathenism. It was about this time, or rather later, that he founded monasteries, inconsiderable of course, at first, in size, but invaluable as mission stations, at Ordorp (Ordorf), near Erfurt, Fritzlars (Fridislar), near the scene of his exploit with the oak, and at a place called "Hamanaburg," in all probability Homburg in Hesse (Vit. c. 8).

The death of Gregory II., and the accession of Gregory III. to the papal throne (A.D. 731) brought only fresh honours to Boniface. The new pope lost no time in raising the devoted emissary of Rome to the dignity of archbishop (as before, without a see) and legate, thus enabling him to coerce the refractory bishops who thwarted his efforts (Vit. c. 8). In the same year (A.D. 732), Karl Martel's decisive victory at Tours, which rolled back the Saracenic tide that threatened to submerge Christendom, gave a new impetus to Christian missions. In A.D. 738 Boniface made his third and last pilgrimage to Rome, not now as an obscure priest, but with a great retinue of monks and converts, and received the pope's authority to call a synod of bishops in Bavaria and Alemannia (Württemberg); circumstances however appear to have deferred this synod for some years. Returning through Bavaria, Boniface, acting in concert with Duke Odilo, founded four bishoprics in the eastern part of the duchy, Salzburg (Sala Franconica), Freisingen (Frisingum), Passau (Patauivium), and Ratisbon or Regensburg (Reginae civitas), with a view to remedy the ecclesiastical lawlessness which still prevailed (Vit. c. 9; cf. Miraeus, ap. Fabric. Biblioth. Eccles. s. v.).

After a quarter-century of all but incessant missionary activity, the influence of Boniface was now at its zenith. The accession of a new pope, Zacharias (A.D. 741) made no change in the consideration with which he was regarded at Rome. On the contrary, his letters to Zacharias shew, that after being the trusted friend and counsellor of the two previous popes, Boniface could address their successor, if he thought it necessary, in a tone, if not of reproof, at least of earnest expostulation (Ep. 143). The death of Karl Martel also in the same year was rather a gain than a loss to Boniface, for the comparatively pacific policy of the sons was a more congenial atmosphere for his missionary plans than the restless pugnacity of their father, which often compromised the preaching of the gospel even by co-operation. Karloman, as the close of his career shewed, was predisposed to submit to the direction of a monk; and Pepin welcomed so potent an ally as Boniface in his efforts to reduce the Gallic clergy to obedience, and to correct the licentiousness which prevailed under the degenerate Merovingians, by eliminating the Celtic element from among the clergy and by consolidating the fabric of church and state with Rome, as the keystone of the arch. The influence of Boniface as legate extended southwards and westwards in Austrasia and Neustria. In the previous pontificate, probably A.D. 739, Boniface had held a council, vaguely designated "on the bank of the Danube" ("ad Danubium"), perhaps at Ratisbon (Miraeus, s. v. ap. Fabr. Bibl. Eccles.; cf. Ep. 122), at which he created the four Bavarian bishoprics (Willib. Vit. c. 9, Ep. 4). In A.D. 742 he presided at what is called still more vaguely a "Germanic council," perhaps as being the earliest provincial council in Germany (cf. Mab. ad Willib. Vit. c. 9). The decrees then enacted were confirmed by a council held, A.D. 743, in a palace or villa of Carloman (Miraeus, v. s.) at Estines (Conc. Lepitins. or Liftins.), in the diocese of Cambrai, on the southern frontier of Austrasia (Ep. 124). At this synod Gewilieb (Gervilius) was deposed, with Karloman's consent, from the see of Maintz (Moguntum) for the indulgence of his sporting propensities, and for the graver offence of homicide in battle. Boniface was installed in his stead, the bishopric being elevated into an archbishopric, with jurisdiction over a district from Köln to Strasburg, and from Coire to Worms (Othl. Vit. Bonif. cc. 33, 36, 39; cf. Willib. Vit. c. 9, where Boniface is styled "Archiep. Mogunt." at this date). Apparently, Boniface would have preferred Köln (Colon. Agripp.) for the seat of his archbishopric. But the repugnance of the clergy of Köln, who dreaded his strictness in enforcing discipline, coinciding with the opportune vacancy of Mainz, determined it otherwise (Epp. 138, 140). Two other synods, of which the traces are lost, seem to have taken place about this time (Willib. Vit. c. 10). In A.D. 744 a more important council was held at Soissons (Suessiones), on the confines of Neustria and Austrasia, apparently by the joint authorisation of Pepin and Carloman (Vit. c. 9), under the mock sovereignty of Childeric, at which, among other things, Adalbert (or Elbercht) and Clemens, two of Boniface's most energetic opponents, Adalbert, apparently, a fanatic with a strong following among the lower classes, Clemens an adherent of the old British church, were formally condemned (Vit. cc. 9, 10). Their condemnation was subsequently ratified by a synod at Rome (Epp. 134, 135, 148). Meantime, Boniface was not neglectful of his missionary work in central Germany. In A.D. 742 (probably, but A.D. 746 Annales Fuldenses) he founded the sees of Würzburg (in Franconia), Buraburg (in Hesse), Erfurt (in Thuringia); and a few years later the see of Eichstädt, where he placed his nephew and faithful companion Willibald, who is not to be identified with his biographer (Vit. c. 10; Bulteau, Hist. de l'Ordre de St. Benoist, iv. xii.).

In A.D. 744 Boniface founded the great monastery with which his name is especially connected, of Fulda, in the wild forest of Buchenau (Buchonia), between Hesse and Bavaria, destined to become among the Benedictine monasteries of Germany what Monte Casino was already in Italy (Ann. Fuld.; cf. Trithem. ap. Fabric. Bibl. Eccles. s. v. Bonif.). Finding it impossible himself to exercise a constant superintendence over it, he appointed Sturm (or Sturmio), a Bavarian, who had long worked under him in Thuringia, to be abbat, but from time to time he resorted thither for rest and retirement (Gloria Fuldæ, pp. 3, 8, 66, 67).

In 751 the shadowy sovereignty of the Merovingians faded utterly away. That Boniface was present at Soissons and consecrated Pepin to be king in name, as he and his fathers had long been in deed, is affirmed by Bulteau and Matter, following the mediæval annalists. (Bult. Hist. de l'Ord. de S. Ben. iv. xii.; Matter, Hist. de l'Egl. ii. p. 33; Trithem. s. v. ap. Fabric. Bibl. Eccles.: Marian. Scot. Chronicon, A.D. 750; Ann. Fuld. A.D. 752.) Rettberg, however, and the able writer of the biography of Boniface in Herzog (Real Encykl. s. v.), argue satisfactorily from Boniface's letters that he took no part in Pepin's coronation, dreading a relapse into the aggressive policy of Karl Martel. It may be argued, that one whose influence had made itself felt so constantly on the politics of Christendom, would hardly be content to stand by, a passive spectator of the extinction of the old dynasty. But probably Boniface estimated the importance of what was being done at its true value, thinking with pope Zacharias, that he, who was already king for all practical purposes, might as well wear the crown (Marian. Scot. Chron. A.D. 750).

In the following year Karloman abdicated his throne and retired to Monte Casino, leaving his brother sole king. It has been supposed that Boniface prompted this step; on the other hand it is to be noted that after Karloman's abdication, Boniface began to withdraw from public life, requesting the pope to depute some one else as papal commissary at the synods.

Boniface's indefatigable labours were drawing to their close. The increasing infirmities of age (Willib. Vit. c. 12) admonished him to hand over to younger men the completion of the work so well inaugurated by himself. In A.D. 753, or in the following year, he named Lull or Lullus, with consent of Pepin, his successor in the see of Mainz, intimating his presentiment that the end was near (Willib. Vit. c. 10; A.D. 753 Riddle, Eccles. Chronol.; A.D. 754 Cave, Hist. Liter.; A.D. 755 Mar. Scot. Chron., who makes Lull succeed after the death of Boniface; A.D. 781 Ann. Fuld.). But the veteran missionary was as unwilling as any of his warrior forefathers to die peacefully and ingloriously. He would die as he had lived, in harness. After hastily revisiting the scene of his labours in Thuringia, he started on his last journey, to make one more effort for the conversion of the heathen among whom he had first tried his powers as a preacher of the gospel. Infirm and decrepit in body (Willib. Vit. c. 12), but dauntless as ever in spirit, he embarked on the Rhine, with Eoban (or Doban), a coadjutor bishop, and a handful of devoted followers, clergy, acolytes, and others, threading his way through the villages scattered here and there among the marshes of Frisia ("pagi divisi," Willib. Vit. c. 12).

On a summer's day (June 4, Ann. Fuld.; June 5, Bult. Hist. de l'Ord. S. Benoist, iv. xii.), the messengers of peace, a little company of some fifty in all, planted their tents on the banks of a river near Dockum or Dorkum, there awaiting the arrival on the morrow of a large number of converts to be confirmed by the missionary bishop. But the early morning witnessed a strangely different sight. Boniface and his companions found themselves beset by a concourse of armed pagans, eager to stop the progress of these destroyers of their idols, and to seize the vessels of gold and silver supposed to be in their keeping. Some attempt at self-defence was made by the younger Christians, but in vain. Boniface, with characteristic fortitude, checked this ineffectual resistance, and met the fate, which doubtless he had long anticipated if not longed for, with the calmness of one of the early Christians in a Roman amphitheatre. Scarcely any of his followers escaped. His assailants fought among themselves over the scanty booty which disappointed their expectations; and Pepin availed himself of the excuse for invading Frisia by way of avenging their massacre of the bishop and his companions. The bones of the martyr, after the usual contention between Utrecht, Mainz, and Fulda, were finally deposited in the monastery of Fulda, according to the wish expressed by Boniface before setting off on his last journey. (Willib. Vit. c. 12; Ann. Fuld. A.D. 781.)

It is improbable that Boniface ever occupied the see of Utrecht. Willibald is silent about it. A canon of Utrecht, writing in the 14th century, claims this honour for his cathedral, alleging that Boniface succeeded Willibrod or Clemens (A.D. 744). But the same writer represents Boniface as the founder at Utrecht of a church of "canonici;" an apparent anachronism which discredits his testimony, even apart from this not intrinsically trustworthy (Joann. de Beka, Hist. Vet. Episc. Ultraject. pp. 8, 9, 10). Bulteau thinks that Boniface was made archbishop of Utrecht after resigning Mainz (Bult. Hist. de l'Ord. de S. Benoist, iv. xiii.). It is more likely that Boniface superintended the see of Utrecht as papal legate for a short time when it became vacant in A.D. 753, appointing as his coadjutor or subordinate ("co-episcopus," al. "chorepiscopus." Willib. Vit. c. 12), Eoban or Doban, one of his missionary fellow-labourers; an arrangement all the more likely, if Utrecht was still a see "in partibus infidelium." The long-standing rivalry between Utrecht and Cologne probably helped to foster the idea that Boniface was ever formally appointed archbishop of Utrecht.

Boniface was statesman and scholar as well as missionary, an able administrator as well as an earnest preacher; and his aim was to civilise as well as to christianize the heathen of his fatherland. The sanction of the papal see was almost indispensable for the success of his efforts; for the helpless feebleness of the Merovingians and the strong self-assertion of the Carolingians were alike unfavourable to the growth and development of the church. Boniface was wise in seeing this. But he never allowed himself to be made a mere puppet in the hands of the popes; he appealed for guidance and direction in his perplexities to England as often as to Rome; he was not afraid even, if necessary, to expostulate reprovingly with the pope himself.

The extent and multifariousness of his labours is amazing. Besides the more directly missionary work of journeyings and preachings beyond the right bank of the Rhine, there were monasteries of his own founding to be visited and superintended, councils, latterly one or more in a year, to be presided over, questions without end to be settled on points ranging from abstruse doctrine to small trivialities of ceremonial or of social propriety. His work was, also, embarrassed by many complications, by the controversies between the Roman church and the Christians not in communion with it, between the Frankish monarchy and the Gallican bishops, and by that which is the standing difficulty of missionaries, the difficulty of deciding when to allow and when uncompromisingly to prohibit old heathen customs not altogether in accordance with Christianity, yet very deeply rooted in the hearts of the people. Among all these conflicting interests a firm hand and a discriminating eye were needed to hold the balance steadily. Boniface was a man who could say "No," and a strict disciplinarian; but his letters shew the kindness and geniality of his nature, and the number of his devoted personal followers proves that he could win and retain men's hearts. And thus, which is indeed the surest test of true greatness, his work survived him. In every department of it he left disciples willing and able to carry it on to completion. It is no exaggeration to say, that since the days of the great Apostle of the Gentiles no missionary of the gospel has been more eminent in labours, in perils, in self-devotion, and in that tenacity yet elasticity of purpose, which never loses sight of its aim, even while compelled to approach it by some other route than that which it proposed to itself originally—than Winfried, known in the annals of Christendom as Boniface, "the Apostle of Germany."

Boniface's letters are important in their bearing on the history of his age, as well as on his own life. Epistolae S. Bonifacii Mart. Prim. Mogunt. Archiep. German. Apost. etc.; per Nic. Serarium, Soc. Jes. Presb. Mogunt. 1605. These were re-edited by Würdtwein, Mogunt. 1790. Dowling (Notitia, s. v.) and Cave (Hist. Liter. s. v.) attribute to him Statuta Quaedam S. Bonif. Archiep. Mogunt. et Mart. (Dacherii Spicilegium). There are also sermons bearing his name (Martene et Durandus, Ampfiss. Collectio, ix.; Pezii Thesaur. Anecdot. ii.). The Vita S. Livini is assigned to him by Serarius, but this is disputed; Mabillon assigns it to an older Boniface (Ann. O.S.B. xiv. vii.).

The earliest life of Boniface is the memoir of him by Willihald (not the nephew of Boniface, the bishop of Eichstädt), apparently a constant companion of Boniface, and an eyewitness of much which he relates. This was rewritten, with slight additions, by Othlo, a German monk, in the 11th century. See also in Freher, German. Rer. Scriptores, Francof. 1600, the Annales Fuldenses (scanty and incorrect); Letzner, Hist. Bonif. Erfandt, 1603; Beka, *Hist. Episcop. BONIFACIUS, bishop of the East Angles. [See BERCTGILS.] [S.]

BONIFACIUS I., POPE and saint, successor of Zosimus, a Roman, son of a priest, Jocundus, has been identified with Boniface the priest, the papal representative at Constantinople during the time of Innocent I. (Baronius s. a. 405, § 15; cf. Bianchi-Giovini, Storia dei Papi, i. 353). Zosimus died on the 26th of December 418. On the 28th Boniface was elected bishop in the church of St. Theodora by a majority of the clergy and people, and consecrated next day in the church of St. Marcellus. Previously, however, a small body of the clergy, contrary to the command of the prefect Symmachus, had shut themselves up in the Lateran, and as soon as the burial of Zosimus took place, proclaimed Eulalius the archdeacon pope. Three bishops (including the bishop of Ostia) assisted at the consecration of Eulalius, nine at that of Boniface. Symmachus reported to the emperor Honorius in favour of Eulalius. Honorius decided accordingly, and ordered Boniface to quit the city. Boniface went no farther than the church of St. Paul without the walls. He made an attempt to return by force, but was repulsed. The people, however, espoused his cause, and maltreated the officers of Symmachus. A petition was addressed to the emperor by the clergy of Boniface's party to annul the previous decree, and to cite both candidates to the imperial presence. Honorius agreed, and at the same time summoned a council of bishops to Ravenna to decide upon the question. The synod met, but came to no decision. Meantime Easter was approaching, and Achilleus bishop of Spoleto was commissioned by the emperor to conduct the services of the feast at Rome. Eulalius, perhaps enraged at the approach of Achilleus, rashly returned to the city in defiance of the prefect. Symmachus complained, and Honorius decided that Eulalius had by his conduct condemned himself, and that Boniface, as a reward of his moderation, should be received into the city and accepted as bishop. This was the third disputed election. (See full account, with all the documents, in Baronius s. a. 419; Jaffé, Regesta.) Personally Boniface is described as an old man at the time of his appointment, which he was unwilling to accept, of mild character, given to good works (Anastasius, Lib. Pont.). Prostrated by sickness shortly after his accession, the fear of another contest in case of his death prompted him on recovery to obtain from Honorius a rescript by which it was decreed that, in case of a double election neither rival should be bishop, but that the clergy and people should proceed to a new choice (Baronius). In the contest against Pelagius, Boniface was an unswerving supporter of orthodoxy and Augustine. [PELAGIUS.] Two letters of the Pelagians had fallen into the pope's hands, in both of which Augustine was calumniated. Boniface sent them promptly by the hands of Alypius to Augustine himself, that he might reply to them. His reply, contained in the "Quatuor libri contra duas Epp. Pelagianorum" (Opp. x. 411, Ben. ed.; cf. Repr. ii. 61 in vol. i.) is addressed to Boniface, and bears testimony to the kindness and condescension of his character. Boniface was strenuous in enforcing the discipline of the church. Thus he insisted that Maximus bishop of Valence should be brought to trial for his misdemeanours before the bishops of Gaul (see letter in Labbe, Conc. ii. 1584). So also in the case of the vacancy of the see of Lodève he insisted on a rigid adherence to the decrees of the council of Niceæ, that each metropolitan, and in this case the metropolitan of Narbonne, should be supreme within his own province, and that the jurisdiction conferred by his predecessor Zosimus on the bishop of Arles should be of none effect (Labbe, ib. 1585). On the significance of this transaction as regards the history of the relation of the pope to the metropolitans, see Gieseler, Ecc. Hist. i. § 92 (p. 265, Eng. trans.). Nor was he less strenuous in his assertion of the rights of the Roman see. Following the policy of his predecessors Siricius and Innocent, he vindicated the supremacy of his patriarchate over the province of Eastern Illyria. The people of Corinth had elected a certain Perigenes bishop, and sent to Rome to ask the pope to ratify the election. Boniface refused to entertain their request unless sent through the hands and with the consent of the papal legate, Rufus archbishop of Thessalonica. Rufus wrote a letter recommendatory of Perigenes, and Boniface confirmed the appointment. Meantime, however, the party in Corinth opposed to Perigenes had appealed to the Eastern emperor. Theodosius decreed that canonical disputes should be settled by a council of the province with appeal to the bishop of Constantinople. Boniface immediately complained to Honorius, that this law infringed the privileges of his see, and Theodosius on the request of his uncle annulled it. Proposals however had actually been made for the convocation of a provincial council to consider the Corinthian election. To check this tendency to independence, and to defeat the rival claims of Constantinople, Boniface forthwith addressed letters to Rufus, to the bishops of Thessaly, and to the bishops of the entire province. Rufus was exhorted to exercise the authority of the Roman see with all his might; and the bishops were commanded to obey him, though allowed the privilege of addressing complaints concerning him to Rome. "No assembly was to be held without the consent of the papal vicar. Never had it been lawful to reconsider what had once been decided by the Apostolic see." (See documents in Labbe, iv. 1702 sqq.) Among the lesser ordinances attributed to him by Anastasius the most important is that whereby he forbade slaves to be ordained without the consent of their masters. Boniface died on the 4th of September 422, and was buried, according to the Martyr. Hieronym. (ap. Jaffé, Reg.), in the cemetery of St. Maximus, according to Anastasius in that of St. Felicitas (cf. Ciacconius, Vit. Pont. who gives several epitaphs). He was succeeded by Celestine I. His letters are given by Labbe, vol. iv.; Migne, Patr. vol. xx.; Baronius. (Compare Jaffé, Regesta and App. pp. 932, 933, where spurious letters and decrees attributed to Boniface are given.) [T. R. B.]

BONIFACIUS II., POPE, successor to Felix IV., of Roman birth but Gothic parentage, son of Sigisbald or Sigismund, was elected bishop of Rome on the 17th day of September 530, and consecrated five days afterwards in the basilica of Julius (Jaffé, Regesta Pont.) At the same time a rival party in the basilica of Constantine elected and consecrated Dioscorus. The Roman church was saved from schism by the death of Dioscorus a few weeks afterwards; but Boniface carried his enmity beyond the grave, and anathematized his dead rival for simony (cf. Cassiodorus, Var. 9, Ep. 5). This anathema was subsequently removed by Agapetus I. It has been conjectured (by Baronius, Labbe, Cave, &c.) that the double election was brought about by Athalaric the Gothic king, that he might have an opportunity to intervene after the example of Theodoric, and place a partisan of his own upon the papal throne. [THEODORIC, FELIX III. (cf. Gieseler, Ecc. Hist. i. § 115, p. 340, E. Tr. and reff.)] The pontificate of Boniface is chiefly remarkable for the bold measure proposed and carried by him at a council at St. Peter's, by which he was empowered to nominate his own successor. Accordingly he nominated the deacon Vigilius (subsequently pope, 537), and obtained the consent of the clergy thereto. Shortly afterwards, however, another council met and annulled the previous decree as contrary to the canons. Boniface acknowledged his error and publicly burned the document with his own hands. Some (e. g.

Bianchi-Giovini, Storia dei Papi, ii. 165) have conjectured that Boniface acted throughout as the tool of the unprincipled Vigilius; others (e.g. Baronius, Milman, &c.) that the object of Boniface was to prevent for the future the interference of the Gothic king, and that it was the Gothic king that compelled him to rescind the decree. It would have been equally difficult, however, to have brought the clergy and people of Rome to tolerate such a scheme. Of the pontificate of Boniface there is little else to record. A petition was presented to him (in which he is styled "universal bishop") by Stephen archbishop of Larissa, metropolitan of Thessaly, complaining of the encroachments of the patriarch of Constantinople who had suspended Stephen from his office. The result of the council held is unknown, but there can be little doubt that Boniface followed the policy of his predecessors in this matter and asserted the authority of the Roman see over the whole of the province of Illyria (see documents in Labbe, Conc. iv. 1690 sq. also BONIFACIUS I.). According to Ado (quoted by Baronius and Labbe) Boniface dedicated the church of St. Michael the archangel "in summitate Circei." He died in October 532, and was buried on the 17th in St. Peter's. An epitaph is given by Ciacconius (Vit. Pont.). He was succeeded by John II. Two epistles are attributed to Boniface, one spurious addressed to Eulalius of Alexandria (cf. Hinschius, Decr. Ps.-Isid. p. 703), the other genuine addressed to Cæsarius of Arles, confirming the decrees of the second council of Orange. (See generally Anastasius, Lib. Pont.; Labbe, Conc. iv. 1682 sqq.; Baronius, sub annis; Migne, Patr. lxxv.) [T. R. B.]

BONIFACIUS III., POPE, son of John a Roman, was elected whilst deacon, after an interregnum of nearly a year, to succeed Sabinius. He was consecrated on the 19th of February 607. (So Jaffé, Reg. Pont.; there is considerable difficulty in the chronology of this and the next three popes.) He had filled the office of apocriarius or legate at Constantinople during the pontificate of Gregory the Great, by whom he had been highly recommended to the emperor Phocas (Greg. Epp. xiii. 38). With that tyrant he is said to have been on terms of intimate friendship, of which friendship, and of the grudge of Phocas against Cyriacus, bishop of Constantinople, he took advantage, when pope, to obtain an edict by which it was decreed that the bishop of Rome alone had the right to assume the title of "Universal Bishop." Several modern authorities have called in question the authenticity of the edict, but apparently on insufficient grounds. (Hallam, Middle Ages, ii. 159, note; Lorenz and Schröckh ap. Gieseler, Eccl. Hist. i. § 115, p. 344, note, E. Tr.) Its importance, however, has been much exaggerated. The papal supremacy has been supposed to date therefrom, and such was the orthodox view in mediæval times, as is expressed by Godfrey of Viterbo (ap. Gieseler, l. c.)

"Tertius est Papa Bonifacius ille benignus
Qui petit a Phoca munus per secula dignum
Ut sedes Petri prima sit; ille dedit.
Prima prius fuerat Constantinopolitana;
Est modo Romana, meliori dogmate clara."

By the title of "Universal Bishop" the predecessors of Boniface had at times suffered themselves to be addressed (Labbe, iv. 1690, where Stephen of Larissa so calls Boniface II.), and the bishops of Constantinople had openly assumed it and have arrogated it ever since. The edict therefore merely affected to ratify the assumption in the case of the former bishop as against the latter, and was only binding in so far as the edicts of such an emperor had any validity. The earliest actual assumption as opposed to tacit acceptance of the title by the bishop of Rome is in the Liber Diurnus, the date of which is supposed to be about 682-5 (Gieseler, ib. p. 375, note). During his short pontificate Boniface held a council at Rome which forbade and anathematized the evil custom of intriguing for the appointment of successors to bishoprics during the lifetime of the occupants. Three days were to elapse between the burial of the deceased and the next election. Boniface died within the year, and was buried on the 12th of November 607 in St. Peter's. He was succeeded by Boniface IV. No writings of his are extant, but certain letters written by him to Gregory from Constantinople are said by Ciacconius (Vit. Pont. i.) to be deposited in the Vatican. (See Anastasius, Lib. Pont.; Baronius; Labbe, Conc. v. 1615, 16.) [T. R. B.]

BONIFACIUS IV., POPE and saint, successor to Boniface III., son of John the Doctor, a Marsian of the city of Valeria, was elected and consecrated on the 15th of September 608 (Jaffé's dates are most to be depended on; but the chronology of Boniface III. and IV. is specially obscure; Jaffé does not style Boniface saint). A priest at the time of his election, immediately afterwards he turned his house into a monastery. From the emperor Phocas he obtained leave to convert the Pantheon into a Christian church, which he dedicated to the Virgin and Martyrs (Gregorovius, Gesch. d. Stadt Rom, bk. iii. c. 4). Twenty-eight cart-loads of relics, it is said, were conveyed thither for its sanctification, and from the magnificent dedication services dates the origin of the festival of All Saints (Wetzer, Kirchen-Lexicon). During his pontificate Mellitus, bishop of London, came to Rome on the affairs of the newly-founded English church. Boniface gave him a seat at a council then being held concerning certain monastic questions, and on his departure intrusted him with the decrees of the council to take to England, together with letters to Laurentius archbishop of Canterbury, to the English clergy, to Ethelbert, and to the English people (Beda, ii. 4). The decrees of the council (in Labbe, v. 1618) are spurious. The letter to Ethelbert which alone is extant (Labbe, ib.; Will. Malm. G. P. i. § 30) is considered by Haddan and Stubbs as of very questionable genuineness (Councils, &c. iii. 65, 66); two letters to Florian of Arles and to Theodorik king of the Franks are referred to by Jaffé in Rass und Weis (Leben der Väter und Martyrer, iii. 381, 382). His gift of privileges to the monastery at Canterbury is spurious (Jaffé, Reg. P.). The letter from Columban to Boniface on the condemnation of the "Three Chapters" (cf. Gieseler, Eccl. H. i. 363, Eng. Tr., and Milman, Lat. Chr. i. 435 sq.) is looked on as unauthentic by Clinton (F. R. ii. App. 485). Famine, pestilence, and inundation are said (Anast. Lib. Pont.) to have rendered miserable the pontificate of Boniface. He died and was buried in St. Peter's on the 25th of May 615, and was succeeded by Deusdedit. Two epitaphs are given by Baronius and Ciacconius (Vit. Pont.). The latter further says that his tomb was opened and the remains removed to the new St. Peter's on the 21st of October 1603, where they now lie (cf. Gregorovius, Grabmäler d. Römischen Papste, 209). See generally Labbe, v. 1616 sq.; Baronius, s. a. 607-14; Migne, Patr. lxxx. [T. R. B.]

BONIFACIUS V., POPE, a native of the city of Naples, was elected successor to Deusdedit, and consecrated on the 23rd of December 619 (Jaffé, Regesta). There is little recorded of him. According to Anastasius he was a man of mild character, and the same authority mentions certain ordinances chiefly ceremonial enacted by him. He is said to have completed and consecrated the cemetery of St. Nicomedes. During his pontificate Italy was disturbed by the rebellion of Eleutherius the eunuch, exarch of Ravenna. Fortunately for Rome the pretender was assassinated by his own soldiers before he reached the city. Boniface died and was buried in St. Peter's on the 25th of December 625. He was succeeded by Honorius I. Three genuine letters of his are extant. One is directed to Justus of Canterbury sending him the pallium, and conferring on him the right of ordaining bishops. The other two relate to the conversion of Northumbria. One, directed to king Edwin, urges him to become a Christian; the other, to Ethelberga, his affianced bride, exhorts her to the conversion of her husband (see letters in Bede, E. H. ii. 8, 10, and 11; also in Labbe, Baronius, and Councils, &c. by Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 72, 75-79). It appears from Bede (Ib. ii. 7) that Boniface had sent a previous hortatory letter to Mellitus and Justus which has not been preserved. The letter to Justus given by William of Malmesbury (Gest. Pont. i. 31) assigning the primacy to Canterbury, is of questionable authenticity. (Councils, &c. iii. 73; Jaffé, Reg. Pont. treats it as genuine. See generally Labbe, Concilii, v.; Baronius, s. a.; Migne, lxxx. 429 sq.) [T. R. B.]

BONIFACIUS QUERETINUS—March 16, circa A.D. 630. St. Bonifacius, surnamed Queritinus, by others called Albanus Kiritinus surnamed Bonifacius, as he is termed in the Utrecht MSS. used by the Bollandists, has his real history so mixed up with fable, that it seems impossible to disentangle the truth from the falsehood. According to the legend he was the Pope of that name, of a Jewish stock descended from a sister of St. Peter and St. Andrew, and born at Bethsaida; he was ordained priest by John, the Patriarch of Jerusalem, in his 36th year; four years after he came to Rome, where he reigned more than seven years; with seven bishops, two abbesses, and a retinue of seven priests, seven deacons, and of all the minor orders by sevens, he came to Pictland, and founded churches at Invergowrie, and Restinoth, Forfarshire. He baptized King Nectan and all his court. After evangelizing and building churches among the South Picts, he went to Ross-shire, founded a church at Rosemarkie and dedicated it to St. Peter: and at the age of eighty and upwards, he died at Rosemarkie, and was buried in the church of St. Peter. This legend has doubtless a certain amount of truth, and points to the entrance into Scotland of a strong Italian influence, which was displacing the Irish or Columban: the names of St. Boniface's companions are familiar in Scotch hagiology, and there may be also an engraving of certain Irish elements. But a closer determination appears to be beyond our reach, than to say that he was an Italian, who, in the beginning of the seventh century, came to Scotland to induce the Scotish church to conform to the Roman customs, and probably closed his labours at Rosemarkie, as the legend says. (Brev. Aberd. Prop. SS. pro temp. hyem. ff. lxx. lxx.; Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, pp. clviii. sq. 421-3; Reeves, Culd. 48; Bolland, Acta SS. tom. ii. 444; Proc. Soc. Ant. Scot. i. 281-82; Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. ii. 567; Edinb. Mag. July 1794, p. 39; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 281-83.) [J. G.]

BONOC, B. In the Register of the Great Seal, book 36, No. 72 (MS. General Register House, Edinburgh), there is a confirmation by King James VI. of Scotland of a charter granted "per dominum Thomam Wemis capellani capellanie Sancti Bonach situate et fundate intra villam de Lucheris." In the original charter, which is engrossed, the saint is called Bonoc, "capellanus capelle Sancti Bonoci," and is probably St. Bonifandus B. who accompanied St. Boniface to Pictland [BONIFACIUS]. His relics were at Leuchars, Fifeshire. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 282, 283.) [A. P. F.]

BONOSUS, the founder of the sect of the BONOSIANI, was bishop of Sardica in Illyria at the end of the 4th century. Some authorities make him bishop of Naissus in Upper Moesia, but there is little doubt that that was another bishop of the same name (Tillemont, x. 754). Bonosus is only known to us as holding the same views with Helvidius with regard to the perpetual virginity of the mother of our Lord, and as to His brethren, whom he affirmed to have been the natural offspring of Joseph and Mary. At the synod of Capua convened by Valentinian, A.D. 391, to settle the rival claims of Flavian and Evagrius to the see of Antioch, opportunity was taken to lay an accusation against Bonosus. The synod was unwilling to consider the question, and transferred it to Anysius the bishop of Thessalonica and metropolitan, and his suffragans, who, as a neighbour of Bonosus, might be supposed to be more fully acquainted with the merits of the case. From a letter of pope Siricius, erroneously attributed to Ambrose, and printed among his epistles (Ep. 79), it is evident that Anysius and his brethren were reluctant to undertake the decision, and that the pope's authority was required to induce them to do so (Labbe, ii. 1033). Bonosus was on this condemned of heretical teaching, deposed, and his church closed against him. Bonosus consulted Ambrose whether he should employ force to obtain admission. Ambrose recommended patience and submission. This prudent counsel was not followed, and the difference was exaggerated into a schism, which lasted into the 7th century. The Illyrian bishops, while they deposed Bonosus, recognised the orders of those who had been ordained by him, in the hope of avoiding the greater evil of schism. This proceeding was displeasing to pope Innocent, who addressed a letter to them, c. 414, stating that even if such a course had been necessary at first, that necessity had passed, and the evil had arisen of men who would have been likely to be rejected by the orthodox bishops getting ordained by Bonosus, and then presenting themselves for recognition by the church without formal recantation of their errors. (Innocent. Epist. xxii. c. 5; Labbe, ii. 1273.) At this time Bonosus seems to have been dead. Bonosus and his followers were widely accredited with heretical views respecting the conception and person of Christ. Mercator calls him an Ebionite, and a precursor of Nestorius (Dissert. i. de haeres. Nestor. § 6, ii. 315). But the Bonosians were more usually charged with Photinianism. (Gennadius de Eccl. dogm. c. 52. "Photiniani qui nunc vocantur Bonosiaci.") Whether these charges were well grounded, or were based on the general unpopularity of the sect, it is impossible to determine. Their baptism was pronounced valid by the 17th canon of the second synod of Arles, A.D. 445, on the ground that, like the Arians, they baptized in the name of the Trinity. (Labbe, iv. 1013.) But Gregory the Great in a letter to the Irish bishops (Ep. lib. ix. 61), includes them in those whose baptism the church rejected because the name of the Trinity was not invoked (cf. Gennadius de Eccl. dogm. u. s.). The truth probably is that the Bonosians were an obscure and unpopular sect, of whom little was really known, and of whom it was safe to believe all that was bad. They on their part rebaptized those who joined them. The 3rd council of Orleans, A.D. 538, ordained that they who did so should be arrested by the royal officers and punished. The Bonosians, with other heretics, are anathematized by pope Vigilius. (Ep. xv.: Labbe, v. 333.)

[E. V.]

BORBORIANI, one of the names given to certain Ophitic Gnostics, derived by Epiphanius (i. 85 A) from βόρβορος, "mire," as expressing their unclean living; so also Philaster (c. 73). It is probably an accidental coincidence that Clement (Strom. ii. p. 491), as Lipsius points out, describes certain unworthy Nicolaitans as "sunk in a mire of vice" (ἐν βόρβορῶν κακίας). In another place (i. 77 A in Dindorf's text, omitted by Petau) Epiphanius calls them Borboritae, and in reality the name is probably only BARBELITAE with a different vocalisation. Epiphanius once (92 A) has Βαρβηρώ; and conversely one text of Nicetas (Theo. Orth. Fid. iv. 2) ap. Oehler in Addenda to Epiph. t. iii. p. 605), who follows Epiphanius, has Βορβολῆται. A law of 428 (Cod. Theod. xvi. 5. 65) forbids the Borboriani (among other heretics) to meet for prayer. [H.]

BOSA, bishop of York. He was a pupil of St. Hilda at Streoneshall (Bed. H. E. iv. 23), and on Wilfrid's exile in 678, when his great diocese was divided, was appointed by king Egfrith and archbishop Theodore to the bishopric of Deira (Bed. H. E. iv. 12), with his see at York. In 686, on Wilfrid's restoration, Bosa was expelled from York (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 43), but returned on the second exile of Wilfrid in 691, and retained his see until his death. He is mentioned by Eddius as alive in 704 when pope John VI. directs that he shall be summoned to a synod on Wilfrid's business (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 52). He died, probably, in that year or the following, leaving York open to John of Beverley, whose translation left Hexham open to Wilfrid on his return. His death is frequently placed by mistake in 686, the year of Wilfrid's first return, instead of that of his second. (See Raine, Fasti Eboracenses, i. 84.) He is highly praised by Alcuin (Gale, 718), who says that he was a monk, and organized the worship in his church on the principles of the monastic, or, at least, the "common" life. Acca, afterwards bishop of Hexham, was brought up in his household (Bed. H. E. v. 19). He was honoured as a confessor on the 13th of March (Raine, l. c.). He probably represented the mediating school of discipline, promoted by Theodore, in opposition to the vagaries of the Irish scholars on one side, and to those of Wilfrid, with the Gallican and Roman influences, on the other. [S.]

BOSEL, the first bishop of Worcester. That see having been created by the division of the great Mercian diocese in 679 or 680, Tatfrith was nominated bishop but died before consecration. Bosel was then appointed, and governed until the year 691, when, his health having given way, Oftfor was appointed to succeed him (Bed. H. E. iv. 23; Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 536, 538). His name is attached to a Malmesbury charter of 681 (Kemble, C. D. i. 26), and to one of 685 (W. Malmesb. G. P. v. 352), both of questionable authenticity. [S.]

BOSPHORIUS, bishop of Colonia in Cappadocia Secunda, a confidential friend and correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen and Basil the Great. His episcopate was prolonged through at least 48 years (Pallad. c. 20, p. 203), and must have commenced in 360. From the letters of Gregory we learn that he and Bosphorius had lived together in youth, laboured together, and grown old together (Greg. Epist. 141, 227). He had great influence over the gentler nature of Gregory, whom he did not scruple to address in very strong, almost vituperative language, when he appeared to be shrinking through timidity from public duty. Gregory, however, speaks of Bosphorius in terms of the highest respect, both for the purity of his faith and the sanctity of his life, as well as for his successful exertions in bringing back wanderers to the truth, acknowledging the benefit he had derived both as a hearer and a teacher from his instructions (Epist. 164, 225). His influence was powerful with Gregory at the chief crises of his life. He persuaded him to remain at Nazianzus after his father's death, and to accept the unwelcome charge of the see of Constantinople. Gregory bitterly complained of his unscrupulous importunity, but yielded (Epist. 14, 15). In 383 Bosphorius was accused of unsoundness in the faith; a charge which greatly distressed Gregory, who wrote urgently in his behalf to Theodore of Tyana, Nectarius, and Eutropius (Ep. 225, 227, 164). Basil addressed to him a letter denying the charge of having excommunicated his bishop Dianius (Ep. li.). He attended the Second Oecumenical Council at Constantinople in 381 (Labbe, ii. 956). Palladius speaks with gratitude of the sympathy shewn by him towards the bishops banished in 406 for adhesion to Chrysostom's cause (Pallad. c. 20, p. 203). [E. V.]

BOTOLPHUS (BOTULF), a holy man, who, according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, founded a monastery at Ikanho in 654 (M. II. B. 312). The place is identified, very probably, with Boston, or Botulfstowen, in Lincolnshire. He is not mentioned by Bede; but Mabillon found in a MS. at Onche a life of him written, not as he thinks by a contemporary, but by Folcard, abbot of Thorney, soon after the Conquest (Acti SS. O.S.B. iii. pt. 1, 1-7). From this we learn that Botulf and his brother Adulf were Englishmen, who went into Germany to learn the Gospel more fully, and there became monks. Adulf became a bishop, according to the biographer, at Utrecht, in which case he must have preceded St. Willibord, who is generally regarded as the first bishop there. Botulf returned to England after acting as guardian, in a French monastery, to two sisters of Ethelmund, king of the South Angles, a person otherwise unknown. Ethelmund, with his kinsmen Ethelhere and Ethelwold, kings of the East Angles (Flor. Wig. M. II. B. 636), and his mother Siwara, offered him an endowment from the royal demesnes; but he preferred a piece of public, uncultivated land, and this was granted him. He took possession of Ikanho, expelling, as usual, the evil spirits, and built his monastery, instituting the rule of St. Benedict. The anonymous life of abbat Ceolfriht, of Wearmouth, mentions a visit paid by him to Botulf, who had taught the Benedictine discipline in the East Anglian church. His death was commemorated on the 17th June. His relics were removed by St. Ethelwold to Thorney (Orderic. Vit. xi. 33). Brompton mentions St. Pegia as sister to Botulf (ed. Twysden, 868), and accounts for the distribution of his relics. The life by Folcard, although it contains some difficulties is, possibly, founded on an earlier tradition. (See Hardy's Catalogue of Materials for British History, i. 373-375; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 283-84.) Upwards of fifty churches in England are dedicated to him, ten of which are in Norfolk (Parker, Calendar Illustrated, p. 311).

(2) A reputed bishop, whose remains, with those of St. Germinus or Jarminus, the brother of St. Etheldreda, were buried at St. Edmunds (W. Malmesb. G. P. ed. Hamilton, p. 156). This is probably the same person as (1), the title being a mistake. [S.]

BOTWINE. (1) Abbat of Medeshamstede or Peterborough, mentioned in a grant of Offa to Eardulf, bishop of Rochester, in 765 (Kemble, C. D. i. 139). He attests many charters of Offa, in 774, 779, and for the last time in the council of Cealchyth in 789 (Kemble, C. D. i. 188; Councils, Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 466).

(2) Abbat of Ripon; he died in 786 (Sim. Dun. M. H. B. 666), and was succeeded by Albert. A letter addressed by an abbat Botwine to Lullus, archbishop of Mentz (S. Bonif. Epp. ep. 119), may have been written by either of the two Botwines; and some confusion between them may have prevailed very early, as, according to Hugo Candidus, the relics of abbat Botwine, of Ripon, were preserved at Peterborough (H. Cand. ed. Sparke, p. 36). [S.]

BRADANUS, ST., gave name to Kirk Bradan, near Douglas, in the Isle of Man (Acta Sanctorum, Oct. 20, viii. 887) in the 7th century. [C. W. B.]

BRAN was apparently a very common name in Ireland from the 7th to the 9th century, and used sometimes by itself, sometimes in composition, as Bran-beg, Brandubh, &c. Etymologically it signifies a "raven." In A.D. 735 St. Bran of Lann-Lala (Lynally) died, according to the Four Masters, but really A.D. 740 (Ann. Tig.). At May 18 stands the festival of Bran Beg, of Clenadh, in Ui Faelain, in Magh-Laighen, i.e. of Clane, in Kildare county, and plain of Leinster. This is Branuis, or Bran, one of the seven sons of Cuimne, eldest sister of St. Columba; his father was Degillus, and his brothers Mernoc, Lasren, and Maeldubh. (See Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 478, n.³, 479, n.¹², 488, n.¹²; Reeves, Adamnan, 246-7.) [A. P. F.]

BRANDAN, said to have been bishop of Man, but the early lists are doubtful (Stubbs, Registrum Sacrum, 154). [C. W. B.]

BRANDUBH. (1) Bishop—June 3. Mart. Donegal says, "This may be Brandubh, the bishop, son of Maenach, who is of the race of Mac Con, son of Maeniadh, king of Erin, of the race of Lugaith, son of Ith." Colgan (Acta SS. 596, n. 7) calls him bishop, and places him among the seven brothers who were saints, of St. Fagnenus or Fachtna, bishop of Ros-Alethir (now Ros-Carbery, in the county of Cork [FACHTNA I.]), in the country of the Desii, and province of Munster; while in Tr. Thaum. (383, n. 17), he gives his complete genealogy, up to Mac Con, king of Hibernia (A.D. 196-225).

(2) Of Loch-muinrehair, i.e. Loch Ramor, in Cavan—Feb. 6. Mart. Doneg. says, "There is a Brandubh, bishop, of the race of Eochaidh, son of Muireadh, who is of the race of Heremon." Among the saints belonging to the family of Maccarthennus and offspring of Eochaidh, Colgan (Acta SS. p. 741, col. 2) cites, "Brandubius Episc.; videtur esse qui colitur Lochmunreamhar in Ultonia, 6 Febr."

(3) Bishop—June 13. In Colgan's 'Life of St. Fintan' (Acta SS. 352, c. 20), there is mention made of a certain bishop, named Brandubh, "vir sapiens, mitis, humilis," from the district of Kinsealach, the most famous part of Leinster, who came to Abbot Fintan of Clonenagh, in his monastery of Achadh-Finglaiss, or Ardglass "in plebe Hua-drona" (Idrone county Carlow, over against Leighlin) to be a monk under him, and end his days in his monastery (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. Ir. ii. pp. 228, 230). Having had others under him, he wished now to be in subjection, and accordingly promised implicit obedience on this one condition, that if St. Fintan should die before him, he would soon come back to meet his soul. In three weeks or months after death St. Fintan returned with six companions "in vestibus albis cum magna luce," and called St. Brandubh away according to promise. St. Fintan died A.D. 634. (See Colgan's Acta SS. 352, c. 20 and 354, nn. 22-4; and also p. 355, c. 3, where "Sanctus Brandubius Episcopus, abdicato episcopatu," is enumerated among St. Fintan's disciples.) [A. P. F.]

BRANWALATOR, ST., whose name occurs in a Breton liturgy of the 10th century, in conjunction with St. Sampson (Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 82); and Middleton abbey, in Dorsetshire, which claimed to have been founded by Athelstan, was dedicated to these two saints in conjunction with some others. (Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus, Nos. 375 and 1119. Kemble marks the charters as spurious, but they are sufficient to prove that these two were the patron saints.) St. Branwalator's day is given as Jan. 19 in the calendars of Winchester and Malmesbury (in Hampson's Medii Aevi Calendarium, 422, 435, shewn to belong to these two places by numerous entries).

[C. W. B.]

BRAULIO, succeeded his brother John in 627 as bishop of Saragossa, of which he had been previously archdeacon. He was deservedly famous as one of the most learned men of his age, to whom Spain was largely indebted for the revival of the study of the Scriptures, and the awakening of a taste for classical literature, with which his letters shew great familiarity, containing frequent quotations from Horace, Virgil, Terence, Juvenal, &c., as well as for the reformation of ecclesiastical discipline. His contemporary and friend, Isidore of Seville, extols him for having raised Spain from the decay into which it had sunk; in re-establishing the monuments of the ancients, and preserving it from rusticity and barbarism. It was owing to his persevering importunity that Isidore commenced his great work, de Etymologiis, the incomplete MS. of which at Isidore's death was placed in Braulio's hands to arrange, and was published by him in its present form. Braulio took part in the 4th, 5th, and 6th councils of Toledo, and drew up the canons of the last, A.D. 638, and in the name of the bishops and clergy there assembled wrote to pope Honorius I. a letter refuting the calumnies brought against them, the exquisite style of which excited general admiration at Rome; "quam Roma urbium mater et domina satis mirata est" (Isid. Pacensis.). His voluminous correspondence includes letters between him and the kings Chindesvinthus, and Recesvinthus, and the bishops and presbyters of Spain and Gallia Narbonensis. There are also extant a life of St. Aemilianus (d. 564), one of the earliest promoters of the Benedictine rule in Spain, dedicated to Fruminianus, consisting chiefly of the miracles attributed to him; an iambic hymn in honour of the same saint; and Acta de Martyribus Caesarav. just. These are printed in Migne, Patrol. lxxx. 639-720. (Cave, i. 579; Ildefons. de Vir. iii. 12; Mabill. Saec. Bened. i. 205.)

[E. V.]

BREACA, ST. The connexion of the Celtic tribes with each other was very close in the early Christian times, as is clear from the lives of their saints; and Cornwall stood in a near relation with the three opposite Celtic coasts, by mere geographical position. From the Land's End to a point about half-way up the north coast of Cornwall, the saints after whom the churches are named were of Irish origin. Eastward of this, Welsh influence is predominant, while on the south-west coast the connexion is with the kindred race in Brittany. One of the companies of Irish ascetics is stated to have landed in the Hayle Estuary, on the north coast (Acta Sanctorum, Oct. 27; vol. xii. p. 293), the names given being Breaca, Ia, Uni, Sininus, Elwinus, Marnanus, Germochus, Crewenna, Helena, Etha (or Thecla), Gwithianus, Wynnerus, and most of these names are still found in the neighbouring parishes. The Irish annals, however, make hardly any mention of the missionaries who permanently left Ireland. The Celtic churches were mostly named after their founders, not dedicated to them, or to the saints whom we now find in the Roman calendar. The exceptions are characteristic, viz. St. Michael the archangel, St. Martin of Tours, and St. Germanus—the latter of course owing to the mission of the church of Gaul, during the Pelagian controversy. In Devonshire, which became English at an early period, the case is different, thus the churches dedicated to the Virgin are as common there as they are rare in Cornwall. Lives of Breaca, Ia, Elwinus, and Wynnerus, existed in Leland's time (Itin. 3, pp. 4, 15, 16, 21), which connected some of their companions with St. Patrick. It is possible that we may date the arrival of Breaca in the latter part of the 5th century, while the Welsh saints who settled in Cornwall must be dated in the latter part of the 6th. The pagan prince of the country, who killed some of the voyagers, is called Tewder in the Lives, and this is the name also of the persecutor in the curious miracle-play written in the Cornish language, on the life of St. Meriadoc (Beunau's Meriasek, ed. Whitley Stokes, 1872). Paganism lasted long in Cornwall, and in the tumuli which contain burnt bodies (the custom of burning can hardly have long survived the introduction of Christianity) coins of very late Roman emperors are found (cf. Haddan and Stubbs, ii. 73). Breaca is said to have been born on the confines of Ulster and Leinster, i.e. in East Meath. Can the name be connected with that of the district in which St. Brigid's oratory was situated—viz.: "Breacae campus," i.e. Magh Breagh, between the Liffey and the Boyne (Four Masters, anno 226, p. 111; O'Donovan, Book of Rights, p. 11; Todd's St. Patrick, p. 406). The Cornish parishes of St. Ives (Ia), Crowan, Germoe, Gwithian, Gwinnear (Wynnerus), are all near the parish of Breage; and St. Uni is the patron saint of Lelant, the next parish to St. Ives, and has chapels in several other places; St. Breaca's day is June 4. Breage and Germoe are united parishes, and a curious old Cornish proverb couples the names together in the distich,

"Germoe mather, Germoe a king; Breaga lavethes, Breaga a midwife."

[C. W. B.]

BRECAN (BRACAN, BROCAN, BERCHAN). Of those bearing this name it is difficult to define what properly belongs to each, especially as one, like the saint of Echdrum and son of Saran, is indifferently called Berecan and Brecan.

(1) Bishop of Ard-Braccan—Dec. 6. He was of the race of Eoghain, son of Niall (Mart. Doneg.), and bishop of Meath, but the name of his place is derived from Breacan of Ara and Killbraccan.

(2) Of Cill-mor-Dithruibh—Aug. 9. He is one of the nineteen saints of Kilmore, near the Shannon, in the territory of Tir-Briuin, co. Roscommon. (Four Masters, by O'Donov. i. 327, n. *; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 214.)

(3) Of Cluain-catha and Ard-bracan—July 16. In Mart. Doneg. he is Breacan, of Cluain-catha (battle-field), in Inis-Eoghain (Inishowen, county Donegal), bishop of Ard Breacain, and abbat of Magh-bile (Movilla, county Down). He was of the race of Eoghan, son of Niall. Another dedication may be April 29 (Mart. Doneg. and Tull.; Colgan, Acta SS. 650, c. 8).

(4) Of Ros-tuirc—Sept. 17. Mart. Doneg. calls him Bracon, and that of Tull. Broccan, of Rostuirc, in Magh Raighne, in Osraighe, or of Cluain-iomorchuir. His name is still found in Kill-braghan, a townland in the parish of Kill-alo, co. Kilkenny (Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. v. 212, new series). In Colgan's Life of St. Abban (March 16) an account is given of a meeting between the two saints Abban and Breacan, the latter being abbat of the two monasteries in the region of Ossory, Rostuirc and Cluain-imurchuir. St. Abban had come for the recovery of some of his monastic property; and after the purpose was effected by means of a miracle, their friendship was cemented by a perpetual bond; but we must doubt the legend, which says this bond included St. Brendan of Clonfert (May 16), St. Moling (June 17), St. Flannan (Dec. 18), and St. Munna (Oct. 21). (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 618, c. 34; p. 624, nn. 40-4.)

(5) Bishop—May 1. This was Breacan of Ara, and of Cillbreacain, in Thomond (North Munster), of the race of Corbmach Cas, son of Oilill Olum. He was son of Eochaidh Baldearg, son of Carthine or Carthen Finn, both princes of Thomond, and the latter being baptized by St. Patrick. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 158, c. 45; Acta SS. 17, n. 5) In the island of Inishmore, in Galway Bay, and diocese of Tuam, formerly called "Ara-na-naomh," i.e. "Ara of the saints," there is, says Colgan (though he entirely errs in his geographical account of the Arran Isles, and gives it as if this church stood in Inisheer, or the Eastern Island), a beautiful church, once a parish church, called "Templum Breacain," Breacan's church (Acta SS. p. 715, c. 7, n. 13). This Temple-braccan was S. Breacan's principal establishment, but he also founded and gave his name to Ardbraccan, the diocesan seat of the bishop of Meath, near Navan, co. Meath. (Petrie, Round Towers. 139; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 268 n. *; Journ. Hist. and Arch. Ass. Ir. 3 ser. i. 78-9.) [A. P. F.]

BRECC FELE, of Bealach-Fele—Jan. 15. Mart. Doneg. adds that he is of the family of Fiacha Suidhe, son of Feidhlimidh Reachtmhar. His father was Silan, descended from the family of St. Ita and house of the Desii (county Waterford), and Bealach Fele is now identified with Ballyfoyle in Kilkenny. (Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. iii. 376, v. 191; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 220; Colgan, Acta SS. p. 73, c. 2.) [A. P. F.]

BRECNAT, V.—July 3. She was also Brig-nat, received the veil from St. Patrick, and is named among the disciples or attendants of St. Monenna or Modwenna, St. Brigida's mistress. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 270, c. 1; 623, c. 13; Vit. S. Monenn. c. 14, 16.) [A. P. F.]

BREGUSUID (Beorhtswith, Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 632), the mother of St. Hilda and wife of Hereric; she had a vision of her daughter's greatness in her infancy (Bed. H. E. iv. 23). [See HILDA.] [S.]

BREGWIN, BREGOWINUS, the twelfth archbishop of Canterbury, succeeded archbishop Cuthbert, who died in 758, and was consecrated on St. Michael's Day, 759 (Chr. S. Flor. Wig. M. H. B. 545). His appointment is dated 761, in the Chronicle of Mailros, but the weight of evidence is in favour of the earlier date. His pontificate lasted, according to Osbern, for seven years (Ang. Sac. ii. 76), according to Eadmer for only three (Ib. 187). Although the majority of the historians follow Eadmer, the evidence of Osbern is confirmed by the charters, and his death may be fixed to the year 765, the day being Aug. 24 (Flor. Wig.) or Sept. 1 (Osbern), or Aug. 26 (Obit. Cant. Ang. Sac. i. 52). He was buried in the chapel of St. John the Baptist, at the east end of the cathedral church. His life was written by Osbern and Eadmer, neither of whom, however, gives any historical particulars about him, simply the dates of his pontificate and a few miracles (Ang. Sacra, ii. 75-77, 184-190). The historians of St. Augustine's (Elmham, 328) say that he repeated the artifice of his predecessor, directing the clergy to conceal his death until he was buried, lest the monks of St. Augustine's should claim his body. The most important relic of him is a letter addressed by him to Lullus, archbishop of Mentz, about 762, in which he offers him presents, and informs him of the date of the death of the abbess Bugge (S. Bonif. ep. 130). From the same letter we learn that Bregwin had visited Rome, and had met Lullus there, probably about 751. A synod held by Bregwin is mentioned in an act of the council of Clovesho, in 798, the subject being the detention of one of the estates of the see, which had been granted by Ethelbald of Mercia (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 399). Ralph de Diceto (Ang. Sac. i. 87) says that Bregwin received the pall from pope Paul I., but this was probably a mere matter of calculation. The charters which bear his name are from the cartularies of St. Augustine's, dated 761 (Kemble, C. D. i. 129, 131), 762 (Ib. 132, 133, 137), and Rochester, dated 762 (Kemble, C. D. i. 134), 764 (Ib. 135), and 765 (Ib. 137, 139). See also Acta Sanctorum, Bolland. August, v. 827-835. [S.]

BRENDAN (BRANDAN, BRENAINN) is the name, according to Colgan, of fourteen Irish saints: the Mart. Doneg. attaches ten to different days. But two of these are so conspicuous as to cast all others into the shade. With the exception of Brendan, abbat of Fobhar (now Fore, county Westmeath), on July 27th, there is scarcely anything known beyond the place and day of dedication of the other minor saints. The name is recognised now as belonging generally to St. Brendan of Birr and St. Brendan of Clonfert, who are counted among those who compose the second order of Irish saints: they are also two of the twelve apostles of Ireland.

(1) ST. BRENDAN OF BIRR—Nov. 29. He was son of Neman and Mansenna, of the race of Corb Oluu, son of Fergus, grandson of Rudh-raighe, the founder of the Clanna Rudraighe, and is said to have had a similarity in habits and life to St. Bartholomew the apostle. (Mart. Doneg.; Reeves, St. Adamnan, 210; Four Masters by O'Donov. i. 190, n. ^a) But Lanigan (Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. 38) prefers calling him son of Luaigene, and criticizes Ussher who calls him sometimes the one, sometimes the other. The monastery over which he presided, and from which he received his designation, was called Birr or Bior, "a stream," and is now represented by Parsonstown, at the south-west extremity of King's county, in Leinster. Among the scholars attracted to the school of St. Finnian of Clonard, were the two Brendans—Brendan son of Finnlogh, and Brendan of Birr "qui Propheta in scholis illis et etiam Sanctorum Hiberniæ habebatur." He was sometimes called Senior Brendanus, to distinguish him from St. Brendan of Clonfert. (Colgan, Acta SS. 113, c. 7, 395, c. 19.) It is said that, as a prophet, he foretold the birth of St. Colum-Cille some time before it took place. He was an intimate friend and companion of St. Columba, and seems to have aided him at the Synod of Teltown, near Kells, in Meath, and protested against the attempt to excommunicate him. (Reeves, St. Adamnan, iii. c. 3, and notes; also his Appendix to Pref. ib. pp. lxxiii-iv.) When St. Columba, in consequence of the proceedings against him on account of the battle of Cooldrewny, wished to leave his home in Ireland, and cross the sea into exile, he sent a messenger to "Seniorem Brendanum," abbat of Birr ("a man endowed with the spirit of wisdom and counsel in devising and carrying out whatever would be useful and pleasing to God"), that he might point out where he should decide to remain in exile. (Vit. Brend. Birr, in Colgan's Tr. Thaum. p. 462, c. 44.) The ascension of St. Brendan in a chariot into the sky is given by the Four Masters, in A.D. 553, and in the Annals of Clonmacnoise in 562. He died on the eve of Nov. 29, in the 80th year of his age, A.D. 571, say Ussher and the Four Masters, but it is more likely to have been in A.D. 573. (Four Masters by O'Donovan, i. 206-7; Reeves, Adamn. 210; Ussher, de Ecl. Brit. Prim. Dubl. 1639, pp. 882-3, 955, 1064; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. 38, 39, 149 sq.; Ware Ir. Writ. 4.) St. Columba got instant notice of his death in Ireland, by seeing a company of angels ascending into heaven with his soul (Adamn. iii. c. 11). His Acts are preserved in the Cod. Salmant., from which Colgan published the portion relating to St. Columba (Tr. Thaum. 462, c. 44); and in O'Donell's Life (Quint. Vit. S. Columb.) iii. c. 41, in Tr. Thaum. 438), there is mention of how "encomiasticis versibus S. Brendanus et S. Dalanus ejus synchroni et amici cecinerunt;" but these were probably only lines in praise of his virtues. His body is said to have lain in one grave with those of SS. Fursey, Conall, and Berchan, in the cemetery of the church called Tempull an Cheathruir Aluinn, i.e. "The church of the four beauties," in Inishmore or the Great Island of Arran, in Galway Bay (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 715, c. 7, n. ¹²), but this at best could only have been relics.

(2) BRENDAN of Clonfert, A. C.—May 16, A.D. 577. The founder of the church of Cluain-fearta (the Lawn, Meadow, or Bog-island of the Grave, now Clonfert, in the barony of Longford, co. Longford) was son of Finnlogh, of the race of Ciar, descendant of Rudhraighe, and is often known by the designation Mocualti, derived from his great-grandfather Alta. His brother was Domaingen, bishop of Tuaim-Muscraighe (April 29), and his sister Brigh or Briga, abbess of Enach-duin or Annadown (on the east margin of Lough Corrib, in the barony of Clare, county Galway). He is said to have been like the apostle St. Thomas, in manners and life. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 9, 35, 113, 129; Reeves, Adamn. 221, n.) Full accounts of his life and seven years' voyage are given in the Breviary of Aberdeen, and in two remarkable lives of St. Brendan in the Brussels MS. Lives of the Saints, fol. 69, 189. (See Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 284-6; O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. iv. 125, 141; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 129-30; Colgan, Acta SS. and Tr. Thaum., in Incl. Hist.; Alb. Butler, Lives of the Saints, v. 266, sq.; Reeves, Adamnan, 55, 220, 223; Ussher, de Brit. Ecl. Prim. Dubl. 1639, c. xvii.; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. ii. 28 sq.; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad., viii., 429-30; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. ii. 474.) From these, we gather that he was born about A.D. 482 or 484 in Kerry, West Munster, and at an early age was under the charge of Bishop Erc, who placed him under St. Ita, with whom he became a special favourite, and whom he ever after regarded as a friend and spiritual mother. (Colgan, Acta SS. 67-71.) By her advice he attached himself to St. Jarlath, and he is also traditionally connected with St. Fianian's school at Clonard. But Lanigan questions this relation between St. Fianian and St. Brendan, as the latter was not younger than his reputed master. He was always closely associated with his namesake of Birr, and, like him, was regarded as one of the second order of Irish saints, and one of the twelve apostles of Ireland: like St. Columba, he was a priest, and had a bishop attached to the monastery for the higher functions of the ministry. (Reeves, Adamnan, 222.) Like his namesake, too, he must be regarded as a prophet. (Colgan, Acta SS. 309, c. 3; 310, nn. ¹, ¹⁹⁻²¹.) Butler (v. 266) and Ussher (p. 955) say he was in Wales under St. Gildas and in the Abbey of Llancarven in Glamorganshire, building also the monastery of Ailech in Britain, and a church in a territory called Heth. (Colgan, Acta SS. 190.) But that for which the name of St. Brendan is most famous is the seven years' voyage in search of the Fortunate Islands ("quaerendo terram repromissionis"), which Colgan (Acta SS. Ind. Chron.) puts as commencing in A.D. 545, and which speaks, at least, of the bold enterprise and Christian zeal so characteristic of those times. (Grub, Ecl. Hist. Scot. i. 55-6; Ulst. Journ. Arch. iv. 104-6. For the probable reason for his long voyage, see Colgan, Acta SS. 74, 619, c. 43, 624, n. ⁴⁵, who is ready to do battle with all who count it fabulous.) When he returned from his voyage and his sojourn in Brittany, he founded the monasteries of Clonfert and Annadown, placing his sister Briga over the latter. For the monastery at Clonfert and several others connected with it he drew up a particular rule, which was so highly esteemed as to be observed for many centuries by his successors, and was believed to have been written at the dictation of an angel. The dates of the erection of the monastery of Clonfert vary in the Annals from A.D. 553 to 564. It is said that he built many monasteries and cells through Ireland, where he had 3000 monks under him. (Ussher, ut supra, 910; Archdall, Monasticon Hibern. 73; Colgan, Acta SS. 192, 310, nn. ¹¹ and ¹³.) He died in his sister's monastery in Eanach-duin, or Annadown, in A.D. 577. Archdall says that after his seven years' peregrinations he returned to Ireland, and became bishop of Kerry, where he ended his days, and lies buried at Cluenarua, otherwise called Luarca (Mon. Hiber. 37, 359), but his connection with a bishopric seems a fable (Lanigan, Ib. ii. 30, 37). Colgan (Tr. Thaum. p. 50, n. ⁵⁹) has a learned note on the dates of his birth and death, in connection with the prophecies uttered by St. Patrick regarding him; and in Mart. Doneg. (p. 130) there is a beautiful story of the heavenly music he heard from the altar, and his distaste ever after for any earthly music. He was contemporary with SS. Finbar, Kieran, Finnian, and Lenan, and at a late period of his life was one of the four holy founders of monasteries who found St. Columba in the island of Hinba. (Admnum, iii. c. 17. For a bibliographical history of the legends connected with St. Brendan, see Reeves, Admnan, p. 221, n.; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 153, 166; Baring-Gould, Myths, 250 n.; Ware, Ir. Writ. 4, 26.)—But St. Brendan has a connection with Scotland as well as with Ireland. Fordun states that he erected a cell in Bute, which took its name from that Bothy—"idiomate nostro bothe," and lived in Scotland about A.D. 531. He had many dedications all through Scotland, but another St. Brendan of a later date is imagined by Camerarius and Dempster (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 286-7; Skene, Fordun, ii. 381).

BRESAL (BREASAL). (1) Son of Seghene, abbat of Iona from A.D. 772 to 801; his dedication is May 18 (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 232, 252). During his presidency two Irish kings were enrolled under him, and Iona became a celebrated place of pilgrimage. (Reeves, Admnan, 386, 388; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 500.)

(2) Another is mentioned by Tirechan, and cited by Ussher, as one of the disciples of St. Patrick. (Colgan, Acta SS. 378, n. ²²; Ussher, de Brit. Eccl. Prim. Dublin 1639, p. 950.)

(3) The Four Mast. give the obit of Bresal, son of Colgan, abbat of Farna (Ferns), at A.D. 744, but the true date is A.D. 748. (Colgan, Acta SS. 223.)

[A. P. F.]

BRICIN. of Tuaim Dreacain—Sept. 5. Martyrology of Donegal gives him as of the race of Tadhg, son of Cian, son of Oilill Olum. At Tuaim Dreacain (the mount or tumulus of Drecon, and now called Toomregon, near Ballyconnell, on the borders of Cavan and Fermanagh, Four Masters by O'Donovan, i. p. 45, n. ¹) he had a famous college, consisting of three distinct schools under three different professors—viz. of Feinechas or Brehon law, of poetry and general Gaelic learning, and of the classics. Amongst other pupils at his schools, St. Bricin had the most remarkable man of his age, Cennfaeladh, "the learned" [CENNFAELADH]. (See O'Curry's Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 77, 92-3.)

[A. P. F.]

BRIGH (BRIGA). At Jan. 7 the Mart. Doneg. and Tull. place Brigh of Coirpre. In Evinus, Trip. Life of St. Patrick (lib. iii. c. 19) there appears a certain pious matron named Briga, the daughter of Feargna, who did what she could to aid St. Patrick on the banks of the Liffey, and Colgan (Tr. Thaum. p. 185, n. ²³) thinks this pious matron and Brigh of Coirpre may be the same, and one of the "daughters of Feargna" celebrated on this day. But O'Clery (in Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 9) evidently inclines to the belief that it refers to Briga, the sister of St. Brendan of Clonfert. If daughter of Feargna, she was probably a Palladian Christian, and lived at Glashely, near Narraghmore (Journ. Roy. Hist. Arch. Ass. Ir. 4 ser. ii. 498, 559-60); O'Hanlon (Ir. Saints, i. 390 sq.) gives the speculations regarding several of this name. [A. P. F.]

BRIGIDA (BRIDGET, BRIGHT, BRIDE). In the 4th Appendix to his Lives of St. Brigida, Colgan (Tr. Thaum. pp. 611-13) gives a list of fourteen Brigidas who are distinguished from each other, and another list of eleven who are not so distinct. He also gives a learned criticism of the lists of Severinus Ketinus and Aengus the Culdee. As regards many of these, little can be said; and even of those who are better known there is no little difficulty in keeping the lines of distinction clear.

(1) Daughter of Aedh. On Sept. 30 the calendars give the name "Bright" without dedication, but Colgan identifies her with the daughter of Aedh, son of Eochadius, son of Colla, son of Coelbadius of the Dal-aradii, and says that Colla or Colladius was he who gave to St. Patrick the site for the church of Dornnach Combuir, or Magh-combuir, in Connor. She is probably the Brigida of Moinmiolain (March 9), in Dalaradia, the district which was governed by the offspring of Coelbadius. (Colgan, Acta SS. 376, c. 7, 730, c. 10-11; Tr. Thaum. 611.)

(2) Daughter of Darius—May 13 and 24. Darius was son of Fergus, son of Ende Niadh, of the royal house of Leinster, and Colgan thinks that this Brigida is she who nursed so carefully her infirm husband and converted him; when after his death she dedicated all her property to God and St. Mochteus, the saint advised her to return to her father's house, build her cell, and there await the resurrection. (Colgan, Acta SS. 730, c. 10.) Colgan tries to identify her also with Brigida of Huachter-aird (Oughterard, co. Kildare), and Brigida of Senboith or Shanbo, in Wexford (Tr. Thaum. 611-12).

(3) Daughter of Leinin, of Cill-inghen-Leinin (Mart. Don.)—March 6. Among the saints descended from the family of St. Foillan, Colgan (Acta SS. p. 104, c. 2) enumerates "Brigida V. filia Lenini," &c., who is venerated on March 6, in the church of Kill-nanningean, in the district of Ui-Briuin. This "church of the Sisters" is dedicated to her and other five daughters of Lenin (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 612, col. 2).

(4) Daughter of Neman and sister of St. Sedna or Sedonius (March 9), abbat of Killaine; sister also of SS. Gorba, Lassara, &c., who are all descended from Ere, son of Eochaidh, from whom the kings of Albanian Scotia are descended, through Loarne (brother of Fergus), son of Ere. (Colgan, Acta SS. p. 569, n. ⁴.)

(5) V., abess of Kildare—Feb. 1, A.D. 523. The designation "Fiery Dart" seems peculiarly appropriate for "the Mary of Ireland," who, although her fame on the Continent is eclipsed by the greater reputation there of her namesake the widow-saint of Sweden, yet stands forth in history with a very marked individuality, though the histories that have come down to us are mainly devoted to a narrative of the signs and wonders which God wrought by her. As to her acts, Colgan has published six Lives in his Iriais Thaumaturga, and the Bollandists five. Colgan's first Life is the metrical one by St. Brogan Cloen, who wrote her praises about A.D. 525, immediately after her death, or, as Ware and Lanigan say, in the 7th century. The second is by Cogitosus, or Cogitus, of whom Dr. Petrie (Round Towers of Ireland, pp. 199 sq.) seems correct in assigning the date as between A.D. 800 and 835. This Life is given by Canisius, Lectt. Antiq. tom. v.; by Messingham, Floril. Sactorum; by Surius, de Prob. SS. Hist.; and by the Bollandists, Acta SS. Feb. tom. i. [See COGITOSUS.] The third is attributed to Ultan, bishop in Ardbraccan, who flourished in the 6th century, and died full of years, A.D. 656. The fourth is by Anmchadh, or Animosus, who died in A.D. 980, or by Anmirius, who flourished before the end of the 7th century. The fifth is by Laurence of Durham, A.D. 1160. The sixth is by St. Chilian, or Coelanus, of Inis Kealtra, who flourished after the beginning of the 8th century; but the Bollandists decline to subscribe to Colgan's dates regarding this. The Bollandists, in addition to giving Lives two, five, and six above, publish one from an old MS. in the church of St. Audomar, carefully collated with an ancient codex, from the monastery of Ripen or Am Hoff, dedicated to St. Magnus, in the suburb of Ratisbon, and another Life from Hugo Wardeus, which Colgan edited, and Ussher refers to as "anonymous," "unelited," "old." Hugo lived before 1152. An abecedarian hymn in honour of St. Bridget, from the library at Basle, is given in the preface of the Arbuthnott Missal, p. xlii. In Messingham's Forilej. SS. are given, (at pp. 200 sq.) Capgrave's "Life of St. Brigida," and (at pp. 206 sq.) additions from various authors, and also the "Translation of SS. Patrick, Columba, and Brigida." (For later Lives of St. Brigida, see Sir T. D. Hardy's Catalogue, vol. i. 105-116. See an article on St. Brogan Cloen's hymn, in the Irish Eccl. Record, 1868, p. 222. See also Dr. Todd, St. Patrick, 11, and Book of Hymns, i. 60 sq.; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, ii. 2-18; Ware, Ir. Writ. 3, 26; Four Masters, by O'Donovan, i. 171-2, n. *2; Bishop Forbes, Kel. Scott. Saints, 287-91; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 379-81.) For the reason given above, it is more difficult to trace the historical points in St. Brigit's life than to recount the legendary accretions which testify to a basis of fact, could we but find it after so many centuries. In the legends there is no little beauty, and in almost all we find an undercurrent of true human feeling and deep Christian discernment. (See some of them given at length in Bishop Forbes' Kel. Scott. Saints, 288 sq., from Boece, Breviary of Aberdeen, and Colgan's Tr. Thaum. For a full and critical account of her Life, see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i.

68, 335, and chaps. viii. and ix. passim; Todd, Book of Hymns, i. 65 sq.; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, ii. 1 sq.; Baring-Gould, Lives of the Saints, ii., 14 sq.) She was of the race of Eochaidh Finnfuathair, son of Feidhlimidh Reachtmhar (the Lawgiver), and thus connected with St. Columba. (See the table of kindred in Todd, St. Patr. p. 252.) Her father was Dubtach, a man of Leinster, and her mother a slave or captive, whom Mart. Doneg. calls Broicseach, daughter of Dallbronach; and her mother's brother was St. Ultan, of Ardbraccan, who collected the accounts of her virtues and got Brogan to put them into poetry. She was born at Fochart (Faughard, where her stone-roofed well still remains), near Dundalk, about A.D. 450, and early brought up "bonarum literarum studiis." In order to avoid marriage, she betook herself to Bishop Macchille, at Usny Hill, Westmeath, who gave her the "pallium album et vestem candidam," dedicating her to virginity, about A.D. 467 (Lanigan, ut supra, i. 335, 377, 385 sq.), and soon acquired a name for wisdom and piety. In connection with the story of marriage, it is said that she prayed to become deformed, and that immediately one of her eyes swelled and burst. Her chief residence was the monastery of Kildare, "cella quercus," which she founded; but affiliated houses of both men and women ("de utroque sexu") were raised all over the country, she being abess above all other abbesses, and the bishop with her at Kildare being similarly above all bishops in her other monasteries. (On the monastic and ecclesiastical position of St. Brigida and the bishop she had with her in the monastery for the performance of the higher functions of the ministry, see Todd, St. Patrick, 10 sq. and Book of Hymns, ii. 299 sq.; see also Cogitosus, Prolog. to the Life in Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 518.) She is connected with Bishop Mel, disciple of St. Patrick. Her charity, piety, and miracles are shortly related in Mart. Doneg. on Feb. 1, and by the Four Masters at A.D. 525 (i. 171-3). Her lector and preacher was Bishop Nadfraoich; "for she said, after she had received orders from Bishop Mel, that she would not take food without being previously preached unto" (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 331), i. e. without having Scripture or some pious book read to her. In O'Donnell's Life of St. Columba (Fifth Life, l. i. c. 9 in Tr. Thaum. p. 390) it is related that she foretold the birth of St. Columba, as of a young scion that would be born in the northern parts, and would become a great tree, so that its top would reach over Erin and Albania. (For her connection with St. Ninnidhius of the clean hand, abbot and bishop, and the promise that he would give her the viaticum at death, see Colgan in "Life of St. Nennius," Jan. 18, Acta SS. 111-12, cc. 5, 6; Todd, Book of Hymns, i. 60, sq.; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 450 sq.) Thirty years after the death of St. Patrick, whose winding-sheet she prepared, and at the age of about seventy-four, St. Brigida departed to the Lord, but the year of her decease is uncertain. Montalembert (Monks of the West, Edinb. ii. 393-5) gives an account of St. Brigida and her monasteries, and places her birth at A.D. 467 and her death at A.D. 525. He says, "there are still eighteen parishes in Ireland which bear the name of Kilbride or the church of Bridget" (ib. ii. p. 395, n.). The Irish annals however vary as to the date of her death, but the most probable, and resting on highest authority, is A.D. 523 (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 13; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 287). Cogitosus (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. pp. 523-4) says that when she died she was buried at Kildare, her body and that of Bishop Conlaedh being placed on either side the decorated altar, and deposited in monuments adorned with gold, silver, gems, and precious stones, crowns of gold and silver also hanging above. (For a full and most interesting account of ecclesiastical art in this and the following centuries, with special reference to the tombs of St. Brigida and Bishop Conlaedh at Kildare, see Petrie's Round Towers, 197 sq.). But Ussher (De Eccl. Brit. Prim. Dubl. 1639, pp. 888 sq.) and others say that her body was afterwards translated to Down and deposited in one grave with St. Patrick and St. Columba. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. pp. 617-9. See this, however, controverted as an invention of the 12th century, in O'Donovan's note in Four Masters, i. 171; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. of Down and Connor, 224 sq.; but Dr. Todd, S. Patr. 489 sq., seems to prefer the story of the tomb at Downpatrick.) In the Scotch account, she was buried, or her relics were kept, at Abernethy (see Leslie and Boece, quoted in Ussher, ut supra, p. 888); but it is more probably another St. Brigida (see BRIGIDA (6) below). St. Brigida was a very frequent object of invocation; and churches dedicated to St. Bridget, St. Bright, and St. Bride, in all parts of the British Isles, attest the belief in the efficacy of her intercession. In Ireland they are almost numberless, and many forgotten. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. App. iv., 624-5; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. Down and Connor, 31, 34, 35, 64, 86, 232.) In Scotland also the cultus of this saint was very extensive, and, as might be expected, her dedications are chiefly found in those parts which were nearest to Ireland and under Irish influence. (For a short list see Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 290-1.)

(6) V.—March 14. It is probable there was a Scotch saint of this name, whose relics were kept at Abernethy (Ussher, Works, ed. Erington, vi. 256, 257, 451; Gorton, Monasticon, ii. 275-9). A Brigida is said, in the Irish Life of St. Cuthbert, to have been brought from Ireland, and educated by St. Columba the first bishop of Dunkeld, along with St. Cuthbert at Dunkeld. (Libellus de Nat. S. Cuth. c. xxi.; Reeves, St. Adaman, 297; Ussher, De Brit. Eccl. Prim. Dubl. 1639, pp. 703-4, who also cites the dedication of Abernethy to God and to St. Brigida by King Nectan.) The Brigida of Abernethy is associated with the Nine Maidens. (See MAZOTA. Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, p. 291.) [A. P. F.]

BRIOCUS, ST. As is not uncommon with the early Celtic saints, who led a very wandering life (Gildas says of them "transnavigare maria terrasque spatiosas transmeare non tam piget quam delectat"), he is claimed by several of the Celtic tribes. An old Life of St. Brioc is cited by Usher, 184 (see Leland, Itin. 3, p. 15), but his "Acts" are late and interpolated, and certainly rewritten in 1621. (Acta Sanctorum, May 1; vol. i. 91-4, and cf. vii. 539; Hardy, Catalogue of Materials, i. 103; Lobineau, Vies des Saints de la Bretagne, 11; Montalembert, Monks of the West, Edinb. ii. 273, 368, 373.) The "Acts" say that he was born in Corriticia (Cardigan), and educated from the age of ten by Germanus, bishop of Paris. His parents were idolaters (in Le Grand they are called Cerpus and Eldruda), until St. Brioc converted both them and his tribe. He at last settled in Brittany, where he died at the age of ninety. His monastery at St. Brieuc was made the centre of a bishopric, about 844; but his body was soon after translated to the monastery of SS. Sergius and Bacchus, near Angers, the monks flying before the Danes, as in so many other cases of the translations of relics. His bell was still existing in 1210—the importance attached to the bells of the Celtic saints is well known. St. Germanus of Paris died in 576, and this date would suit that of the plague, which is said to have ravaged Corriticia, and which may have been the yellow death, the plague of the 6th century. In this century too, there was a close connexion between South Wales, Cornwall, and Brittany, owing to the very considerable migrations which took place from Britain into Armorica, which account for the relation between the old languages of Cornwall and Brittany, and for the Celtic legends (such as that of Arthur) being transferred thither, and as it were localised. Those who place St. Brioc in the previous century, think that the Germanus meant in the original life was probably the more famous Germanus of Auxerre, well known for his mission to the British church. The count Rigual (Riwallus) mentioned in the "Acts" lived somewhere about the year 500. It is doubtful too whether idolatry lasted on to such an extent at so late a period. The parish of St. Breock, in Cornwall, is on the river Camel, just west of Wadebridge, and the parish fair is on May 1, the day of the saint's translation (see the Calendar in Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 31, and cf. ii. 73, 86); but his feast day at St. Poi de Léon was April 28 or 29. He is known in Scotland as Brayoch, Broc, Brock, Bryak, and had dedications at Montrose, Rothesay, and Dundrod in Kirkcudbrightshire, but does not appear in the Scotch calendars (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 291; Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 223).

[A. P. F. & C. W. B.]

BRISON, a eunuch of the Empress Eudoxia, an orthodox Christian, and a faithful friend of Chrysostom. He took the lead in the processions set on foot to overpower the litanies of the Arians, and in an assault made on them by their rivals received a serious wound in the head from a stone (Soc. vi. 8; Soz. viii. 8). When, on Chrysostom's first deposition, Eudoxia's fears had been aroused by the earthquake, Brison was one of the messengers sent to discover the archbishop's place of retreat. He found him and brought him back (Soc. vi. 16; Soz. viii. 18). On his arrival at Cucusus Chrysostom wrote to Brison giving an account of his journey and its miseries. He begged him not to endeavour to obtain for him a change of place of exile. He would rather stay at Cucusus, wretched as it was, than undertake another journey. (Chrysost. Ep. exc., ccxxxiv.) [E. V.]

BROC. [BRIOCUS.]

BROGAIDH, of Imleach-Brocadha—July 9. He is said to have been the son of Gollit, Coileach, or Gallus, a Briton or Welshman, and of Tigrida, sister of St. Patrick; he and his brothers came with St. Patrick into Ireland, and laboured with him to bring great stores of wheat into the heavenly garner. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 224 sq. for a full and learned chapter on the kindred of St. Patrick; see also Ib. 76; 177, 228, 259.) He was bishop or abbat of Imleacheach, in the barony of Castello, county Mayo, which from him got the name of Imleach-Brocadha. (See Todd, St. Patrick, 150 sq., 257 sq.)

[A. P. F.]

BROGAN (BROCAN). (1) BROGAN of Maethail-Brogain—July 8. He is said to have been one of the sons of Gollit the Welshman, and of Tigrida sister of St. Patrick, who accompanied their uncle into Ireland [BROGAIDH]. He was bishop of Bregmhagh or Maghbreg, in Meath, among the Ui Tortain tribe, near Ardracran, though Evinus (VII. Vit. S. Patr.) also calls him "presbyter." (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. p. 110, n. 51; 136, c. 52, 224 sq.) He founded the Abbey of Mothell, co. Waterford (Ware, Ir. Ant. 100). In the Kalendars he is called "Brogan the scribe," and in the Four Masters, A.D. 448, we have in St. Patrick's household "Brogan the scribe of his school." In the Introduction of the Mart. Doneg., edited by Drs. Todd and Reeves, there is mentioned, among "the more famous Books," "The Books of Brogan Scribhni" (p. xxxviii.), and in the Book of Lecan "Priest Brogan" is one of St. Patrick's "two waiters." (Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 139-40.)

(2) BROGAN CLOEN. He was the disciple of St. Ultan of Ardracran, uncle of St. Brigid; he is said to have put into a rhythmical form in Irish the accounts of St. Brigid's virtues and miracles which St. Ultan had gathered and put into his hand. This Irish hymn Colgan has translated into Latin, and given in his Trias Thaumaturga as the "First Life of St. Brigid;" according to Colgan, reasoning from its own preface, it was composed about A.D. 525. (Tr. Thaum. pref. to St. Brig., and pp. 515 sq.; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, ii. 6.) But Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 379) follows Ware in reckoning him among the writers of the 7th century. Colgan (Ib. 520, n. 1) seems to identify him with Breacan of Rostuirc on account of residence and day of dedication.

[A. P. F.]

BRON, bishop of Caisel-irrae, in Ui-Fiachrach-Muaidhe—June 8, A.D. 511. Dr. Kelly (Cal. Ir. SS. 4) identifies his see as Kilashuibrone, near Sligo, in Ireland. In Colgan (Tr. Thaum. p. 134, c. 35), he is "Episc. Bronus filius ignis, qui est in Caisel-irra, servus Dei, socius Sti. Patricii," but he can give no account of his receiving from Evinus the designation "filius ignis," except that his father's name may have been Aidh ("fire"). The Four Masters give his death at A.D. 511, and to this O'Donovan (I. 166-7, n. 8) adds a note on Cuil-irra, and traces, from the Annotation of Tirechan and the Book of Armagh, the wanderings of St. Patrick, till, "crossing the Muaidh (Moy) at Bertriga (Bartragh), he raised a cross there, and proceeded thence to the mound of Riabart, near which he built a church for his disciple, bishop Bronus, the son of Ienus. This is called the church of Cassel-irra in the Trip. Life of St. Patrick (part ii. c. 97), and now Cill earbuzbhoim—anglice, Killaspugbrone—from this bishop" (Petrie, Round Towers, 179; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 242, sq. 340, 410, 435.)

[A. P. F.]

BRONACH (BROMADA) V.—April 2. She was abbess of Glenn-siechis, otherwise called Glentegys, Clonfeys, and now Kilbroney since the 14th century (Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 115 sq. 309, 315, 318). She was also called St. Bromana, and her baculus or crosier seems to have been a relique which was preserved with great veneration and emolument in the parish church of Kilbroney, which derived its name from her.

[A. P. F.]

BRORDA, a Mercian ealdorman, also called Hildegils, whose death in 799 is recorded by Simeon of Durham (M. H. B. 671). He attests the charters of Offa from 764 to 795 (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i. 137-205), and, after the death of Offa, those of Ecgrith and Kenulf down to 798 (Kemble, C. D. i. 212). He is probably the person who is mentioned in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle as a benefactor of Medeshamsted in 777, although the passage is an interpolation (M. H. B. 335), and the monastery of which he was the patron was Woking in Surrey (Kemble, l. c. p. 205). He was present at the Legatine Synod of 787 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 461).

[S.] BROTENUS, ST., the founder of Llanfrothen in Merionethshire in the 6th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302). Rees says his festival day was Oct. 15, but the Acta Sanctorum gives him under Oct. 18 (viii. 358), in conjunction with the abbess Gwendolen (Gwyddelan) whose name is preserved at Llanwyddelan, in Montgomeryshire.

[C. W. B.]

BRUERDUS, ST., a name preserved in the Cornish parish of St. Breward, south of Advent (a corruption of Adwerna), and west of Alter-nun; the saint had also a chapel in the parish of St. Breock.

[C. W. B.]

BRUGHACH was bishop of Rath-maighe-hAenigh, a church situated in Tir-enna, in Tyrconnell, probably the church of Rath, near Manor Cunningham, county Donegal. (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 384-5; Colgan, Acta SS. 377, n. 6; Tr. Thaum. 148, c. 136, 183, nn. 227-9.) But Dr. Reeves (S. Adamnan, 192, n.) says it is what is now called Raymochy in the barony of Raphoe. He is said (Mart. Doneg.) to have been of the race of Colla da-Chrioch: he perhaps was son of Sedna and disciple of St. De-gaidh; and his dedication is given on Nov. 1. He was consecrated by St. Patrick for Rath-Mugeonaich, and afterwards himself consecrated St. Cairpre (Nov. 11). (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 394; Acta SS. 600, c. 7; Reeves, Eccl. Antiq. 245, 247.) But Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 77, 79) points out that Brugach must have been bishop there after St. Bolcan, and the latter could scarcely have been a bishop till after St. Patrick's death.

[A. P. F.]

BRUNSECH CAEL (the slender), daughter of Crimthan, and virgin of Magh-trea (Moytra, co. Longford)—May 29. Colgan (Acta SS. 459, c. 10, 789, c. 1) suggests that this may be the Bruinecha, a favourite disciple of St. Kieran's mother, Liadania (a widow-saint revered on Aug. 14 at the church of Kill Liadhuin). But instead of being daughter of Crimthan, some account her as one of the three sisters of St. Cronan, or Mochua of Balla (March 30), and thus belonging to a different race [MOCHUA], while others identify her with St. Buriëna who went to Cornwall [BURIËNA]. [A. P. F.]

BRYCHAN, king of Brecknock in the 5th century, who is said to have been the father of twenty-four sons and twenty-five (or six) daughters, who are called "the third holy family of Britain." Giraldus Cambrensis (Itin. Cambriae, i. 2) only mentions the daughters, quoting Historiae Britannicae, which with him usually means Geoffrey of Monmouth. The fact seems to be that Brecknock was at one time a great centre of missionary enterprise, and numerous inscribed gravestones are still found there (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 169), and an incised cross at Llan-spyddyd is still called Brychan's stone. The connecting various members of a tribe under the form of a genealogy is not uncommon, and the relationship of disciples to their spiritual teacher is easily regarded as that of children to their father. Anyhow the lists are valuable as shewing the connexion of the churches in South Wales and the opposite coast of Cornwall. Rees, (Welsh Saints, 138 seq.) gives them as follows: (1) sons—Cynog, Clydwyn, Dingad, Arthen, Cyfflefyf, Rhain, Dyfnan, Gerwyn (or Berwyn), Cadog, Mathaiarn, Pasgen, Nefai, Pabiali, Llecheu, Cynbryd, Cynfran, Hychan, Dyfrig, Cynin, Dogfan, Rhawin, Rhun, Clydog, Caian. (2) daughters—Gwladus, Arianwen, Tanglwst, Mechell, Nefyn, Gwawr, Gwrgon, Eleri, Lleian, Nefydd, Rhianger, Goleuddydd, Gwenddydd, Tydie, Elined ("Almedha," in Giraldus, who says that she suffered martyrdom on a hill called Pengingers, near Brecknock), Ceindrych, Gwen, Cenedlon, Cymorth (wife of Brynach), Clydai, Dwyngwen, Ceinwen (whom Cressy identifies with St. Keyne), Tydfyl, Enfall, Hawystl, Tybie. The practice of making such lists also prevailed in Cornwall, where "Brychan's children" only mean the devotees who came from the opposite coast of Wales. Leland gives them from a life of St. Nectan, thus: Nectanus, Joannes, Endelienta, Menfre, Dilic, Tedda, Mabën, Weneu, Wensent, Merewenna, Wenna, Juliana, Yse, Morwenna, Wymp, Wenheder, Cleder, Keri, Jona, Kananc, Kerhender, Adwen, Hclie, Tamalanc. William of Worcester gives this list, with a few variations, from the calendar of St. Michael's Mount, and most of the names are still recognisable in the names of Cornish parishes. [C. W. B.]

BUADMAELUS is given as one of the disciples of St. Patrick. When St. Patrick was passing through Connaught, it is said that Buadmal died and was buried in the place, where a church was built and took the name of Kill-Buadhmael, which was a Patrician church. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 134, c. 33, 176, n. 68.) Among the disciples of St. Benignus are included Buedanus and Buadmelus (Ib. 204, c. 28). [A. P. F.]

BUAIDHBHEO is given by Mart. Doneg. on Nov. 17, and as the same as Aenghus of Cillmor, of Airthir Fine, of the race of Irial, son of Conall Cearnach. In his Life of Olcan, or Bolcan (Feb. 20, see BOLCAN), Colgan says that Colladius, who gave St. Patrick a site for his church, had five of his seed noted for sanctity, e.g. St. Buabeo, son of Eochaidh (Acta SS. 378, n. 14). In Dr. Reeves's Eccl. Antiq. Down and Connor (p. 381 n.) mention is made of

Buaidh Beo, "son of Lughaih, son of Leathcu, son of Araidhe, a quo Dal Araidhe, at Loch Cuan" [A. P. F.]

BUAN, ST., the founder of Bodfuan, in Carnarvonshire, in the 6th century. His festival was held Aug. 4 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 280). [C. W. B.]

BUATAN, of Ethais-cruimm—Jan. 24. Thus he is designated in the Mart. Doneg., but that of Tallaght has "Batani Methais Truim, which Kelly (Cal. Ir. SS. 44) identifies as Mostrim. Colgan calls him "Baitanus de Fathui Cruim, 25 Januarii" (Tr. Thaum. 377, n. 63). [A. P. F.]

BUDDAS or TEREBINTHUS [MANES].

BUDDHA, BUDDHISM. The history of the rise and development of Buddhism is in itself one of the most interesting subjects of inquiry which modern researches have opened to us; but it is chiefly connected with the present work from the few allusions to it which occur in some of the fathers, and its supposed influence on some of the Gnostic heresies and Manichæism. Megasthenes is the earliest Greek writer who seems to mention the Buddhists; he is quoted in Strabo (p. 713) and Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. i. 15), but the two quotations differ from each other. That in Strabo speaks of the two classes of Indian philosophers as named Brahmins and Garmanes (Γαρμᾶνες or Σαρμᾶνες), and calls the most distinguished of the latter the Hylobioi; that in Clemens calls them respectively Sarmanai and Allobioi. It is doubtful however whether Megasthenes was really referring to Buddhists in his description (as the bark garments would rather apply to Brahmanical ascetics); and Clemens certainly could hardly have understood him to do so; for he goes on to add, apparently from some other source, "and there are Indians who obey the precepts of Boutta, and they honour him as a god for his exceeding dignity" (εἰσι δὲ τῶν Ἰνδῶν οἱ τοῖς Βούττα πειθόμενοι παραγγέλμασι τὴν δὲ δι' ὑπερβολὴν σεμνότητος εἰς θεὸν τετιμῆκασι). In another place (Strom. iii. 7), he mentions, apparently on the authority of Alexander Polyhistor, a class of Indians called Semnoi, who lived naked, and kept themselves strictly chaste, and worshipped a pyramid under which they supposed the bones of some god to lie; they also observed the heavenly bodies, and through them foretold future events; there were likewise women of this sect, Semnai, who also devoted themselves to a virgin life. Here again it is doubtful (see Priaux, Journal of the Royal As. Soc. 1862, p. 279), whether this is an exact quotation from Polyhistor, as the term Semnoi is not found in any known fragment of his, and Cyril (cont. Julian. iv. 133; cf. Clemens, Strom. i. 15) quotes him as mentioning the Bactrian priests called Samanaioi (Σαμαναῖοι). Origen (contra Celsum, Spencer's ed. p. 19) divides the Indian philosophers into Brahmins and Samanaioi. Both these words, however, Semnoi and Samanaioi, appear to represent the Pali word Samana, as Sarmanes, the original Sanskrit word Śramaṇa; this properly means a Brahmanical ascetic, but is also a favourite Buddhist term, and in its Pali form exclusively means a Buddhist priest.

Jerome had heard the tradition that the Indian

Gymnosophist Buddha was born from a virgin's side ("e latere suo virgo generavit," Adv. Jovinianum, i. 42). But the fullest account of Buddhism is to be found in a quotation from Bardesanes' Indica, preserved in Porphyry de Abstinentiâ, iv. 17. He divides the Indian Theologi into Brahmans and Samanaioi, and describes the latter at some length. He says that, unlike the Brahmans, they were not an hereditary caste, and admitted any one to their communion; but the novice must shave his body, assume a peculiar dress, and give up his property as well as abandon his family. They lived outside the cities in houses and temples of royal foundation; they prayed and took their meals at the sound of a bell, and were not allowed to marry or hold property. All this strictly agrees with Buddhism, and each particular may be illustrated from Mr. Hardy's account of the Buddhist monasteries in Ceylon at the present day. But the information from all these fragmentary notices in Western authors is at best meagre and unsatisfactory; we must turn to Buddhist sources for fuller and more definite knowledge.

Buddhism, though expelled from India, the birthplace of its founder, at the present time prevails in Nepal, Tibet, Burmah, Siam, Ceylon, Tartary, China, and Japan; and its followers undoubtedly comprise a larger portion of the human race than those of any other religion—recent calculations raise them to 450 millions. Within the last forty years stores of materials have been brought to Europe, and many of these have been diligently examined by various scholars, and we are thus enabled to trace with ever-growing fulness and certainty the history of this marvellous phenomenon of the human mind. Mr. B. H. Hodgson, the political resident in Nepal, was the first to procure copies of some of the Sanskrit canonical books of Buddhism, with their Tibetan translations; and about the same time Csoma de Kőrös published in the Researches of the Bengal Asiatic Society his analyses of some of the Tibetan works. Ceylon has supplied a still more important contribution in its Pali literature; and China has opened an immense store of Buddhist materials, especially in the accounts of Chinese Buddhist travellers in India. Much of the wide field thus opened to us remains as yet unexamined, but still Buddha and Buddhism are no longer mere names and abstractions. For the first a definite personality begins to detach itself from the mist of legend and miracle; and for the second we begin to be able to trace the causes of its rise, and to explain the course of development through which its doctrines have run.

It is important to bear in mind, however, that, with all this immense mass of literary materials, Buddhism cannot be strictly called an historical religion. Christianity and Muhammadanism still remain, of all the great religions of the world, the only two which are based on contemporary memorials. It is possible to treat of the first century of Christianity as an historical era, because we can appeal to the writings of those "who from the beginning were eye-witnesses and ministers of the word;" just as Dr. Sprenger has shewn in his life of Muhammad, how clearly and certainly we can watch the rise of Islâm amidst the confusion and moral anarchy of the 7th century. But the annals of Buddhism have no such power to transport us into the heart of the 6th century before Christ, and to give us eyes to see the rise of Buddhism as a protest against caste and Brahmanism. The earliest records of Buddhism actually are that to which Strauss would reduce the gospels—the mere mythic aggregations which a lawless popular imagination has crystallised round a few dimly remembered facts. Every step of our progress for the first two or three centuries is through fable; we find, in short, every sign which is held to distinguish a legendary from an historical period. We seem to possess a vast amount of materials, which only requires to be analysed to yield a residue of historical certainty; but (to use Dr. Arnold's words on early Roman history) "if we press on any part this show of knowledge, it yields before us and comes to nothing." We have no criterion except our own subjective impressions, whereby to distinguish fiction from truth; and we are in continual danger of mistake, if we try to transform the one into the other. The most unsatisfactory of all processes is to suppose that we have only to eliminate the miracles, and that the narrative so reduced may be received as authentic. We may thus indeed reduce the poetry to prose, but this is not transmuting the fiction into truth; it has been well said that "le vrai n'est pas toujours le vraisemblable," but in these recherches it is still more true that "le vraisemblable n'est pas toujours le vrai."

One of the great authorities for the life of Buddha is the Sanskrit book called the Lalitâ Vistara, which has been published in the Bibliotheca Indica by the Bengal Asiatic Society; M. Foucaux had previously published in 1848 the Tibetan version of the same work, called Rgya tch'er rol pa, with a French translation. This work professes to be related by Ananda, Śākya Muni's cousin, and he introduces his narrative by the formula, "this discourse was one day heard by me;" but the entire form and contents shew that this is only the fiction of a later disciple, in whose eyes the era of Buddha and his immediate followers had long receded into a distant land of wonder and mythology.^a Every event is related twice: first we have a prose account, written in a singularly bald Sanskrit style, which dwells on every detail with the most wearying minuteness, and continually digresses into long strings of epithets and idle

^a The real date of the composition of the Lalitâ Vistara is uncertain. M. Foucaux says that the Tibetan translation, which closely corresponds to our present Sanskrit text, is not older than the 6th or 7th century of our era; but four successive Chinese translations were made of a Sanskrit work which seems to have been the Lalitâ Vistara (see M. Julien's note, apud Foucaux, Rgya tch'er rol pa, Introd. p. xvii.). The first was made apparently between A.D. 70 and 76; the second A.D. 308: the third about A.D. 652; for the fourth no dates given. As only the third and fourth have the same division as the Sanskrit text into twenty-seven chapters, it would appear that the two earlier represent another text, but for an accurate judgment on these points we need a careful comparison, which has not yet been instituted. The Lalitâ Vistara is not found in Pali, but its legends are all well known in Ceylon. Mr. Hardy has given the Ceylonese legends (Manual, ch. 7) from the Pūjāvāliya (composed in the 13th century); and the Burmese version from the Pali is given in Bishop Bigandet's Life of Gaudama. They agree in the main very closely with the Lalitâ Vistara, but carry on the history to Buddha's death.

exaggerations when Buddha's name is mentioned; this is followed by a poetical version (gáthá) which generally goes over the same ground as the prose, but is written in a very peculiar dialect, bristling with curiously ungrammatical forms.^b These songs in this rude patois seem to us to be the original versions of the various legends, as they were recited by the unlettered multitude; and they have been reduced to prose by some Buddhist monk who wrote Sanskrit just as a mediaeval monk of France or Germany wrote Latin. Other details of Buddha's life, all more or less marvellous, can be added from the other works in the Sanskrit collection of Nepal and the Pali of Ceylon, and a large proportion of the legends are found alike in every Buddhist literature; but all are the production of a subsequent period. We thus see that the very foundations of early Buddhist history are unstable; we find ourselves face to face with sacred ballads, not contemporary chronicles; and we might as well attempt to build up a certain history of regal Rome or of Greece before Pistratus as to claim for the realm of authentic history the period of the first rise of Buddhism in India.

The dates of the birth and death of Śákya Muni, or Buddha, have been generally fixed by European scholars as B.C. 622 and 543;^c but Professor Max Müller (Ancient Sanskrit Lit. pp. 298, 299) has shewn good reason for preferring B.C. 556 and 477, though even these dates are only conjectural; Professor Kern has recently tried to fix the date of the Nirváṇa as B.C. 370 or 388. Buddha's proper name was Sarvārthasiddha or Siddhārtha ("he by whom all ends are accomplished," Lal. V. p. 109), but his more usual title is Śákya Muni, "the holy sage of the Śákyas." He is also called Gautama, "the descendant of Gotama," or more properly Śramaṇa Gautama, "the Gautamid ascetic;" but the origin of this name is obscure. The Buddhists derive it from an old ancestor of the solar race, whose son Ikshwáku is said to have reigned near Tatta on the Indus (but cf. Ind. Studien, v. 425), from whence long subsequently the Śákya branch of the family emigrated to Kapilavastu. On the other hand, Gotama is one of the old Vedic saints of Hindu tradition; and as we find some of his descendants in later Sanskrit legends living at the courts of the eastern part of India (Kuru-panchála, Videha, &c.), some of those who traced their descent from him may have been family priests of the Śákyas; and these latter may have assumed the family name of their spiritual directors (Burnouf, Introduction à l'Hist. du Bouddhisme Indien, p. 155).

^b This double narration distinguishes the so-called Vaiṣṭya sūtras, or "developed discourses," from the simple sūtras; the latter are the earlier (see Burnouf, Intro., pp. 64, 124). This peculiarity is not found in the Pali books.

^c The Buddhists of Ceylon give these dates, but even these seem to have been falsified. The other Buddhist nations differ widely as to the dates of the two events. Thus the Tibetan books (Foucaux, Rgya Tch'er rol pa, p. xi.) give fourteen different dates of Buddha's death, varying between B.C. 2422 and B.C. 576; and the Chinese dates similarly vary between B.C. 1130, 949, and 767 (Ibid.).

His father Suddhodana was the king of a little district called Kapilavastu, and belonged to the Kshatriya family of the Śákyas, who were a branch of the great family of Ikshwáku. Ikshwáku is also the ancestor of the Solar dynasty of Ayodhyá (Oudh), the family in which the demigod Ráma was born, whose exploits are the subject of the Sanskrit epic, the Rámáyana. It is curious that amidst the copious geographical notices which abound in Hindu Sanskrit literature, the name Kapilavastu never occurs; and Professor Wilson has even conjectured that it may have been merely an allegorical name as expressing the relation between Buddhism and the Sāṅkhya philosophy of Kapila.^d The universal tradition of all Buddhist nations is a strong argument that such a place must once have existed; yet it is singular that Brahmanical prejudice should have suppressed all notice of it. The Chinese Buddhist traveller Fahian (A.D. 399-414) describes Kapilavastu as in his time "a wilderness untenanted by man;" and Hiouen Tshang (A.D. 630-644) speaks of the royal city as in ruins; the palace was built of bricks, and its ruins were still lofty and solid, but deserted for ages. Still their reports only prove that the site was traditionally identified at that time; and as a thousand years had passed since Buddha's death, this popular belief may have had no better foundation than that which identifies Arthur with Glastonbury or Atreus with the treasury at Mycenae. Kapilavastu lay in the eastern part of the ancient kingdom of Kosala, and was probably to the north of the present Gorakhpur. It is said to have been besieged and destroyed, shortly after Buddha's death, by Virúdhaka, the king of Kosala.

The Lalitá Vistara is supposed to have been repeated by Buddha in a bamboo grove in the garden of Jetavana, at Śrávastí, to the Bodhisattvas and Śrávakas who attended him; one of these was Ananda, who professes to be the relator of the work in its present form. The recital commences with the second chapter, the scene of which is laid in the Tushita heaven, where Buddha, then a Bodhisattwa or potential Buddha, is represented as sitting in his palace, surrounded by countless millions of divine beings, who tell him that "the time is come." He then announces to them that he will be born in a mortal mother's womb in twelve years. Then follows a curious discussion as to the fated time, continent, region, and family, in which his last human birth is to take place. He can only be born in the full maturity of the world after one of its ever-recurring creations—in a central continent like India—in a central region of it, and in a family of the Brahman or Kshatriya caste, according as either may happen at the time to be pre-eminent. As at this particular time the latter is said to be the most honoured,^e Buddha

^d The Buddhists say that the exiled princes from Tatta (or Benares?) settled near the hermitage of the Rishi Kapila, hence the name of their city, Kapila-vastu, "the dwelling of Kapila." Vastu properly means "substance," but may be here used for vastu, ástu.

^e This seems to be connected with a very obscure point in Indian literary history. In the Rig Veda the caste system of later times is unknown; traces of the three twice-born classes are indeed found (thus the Brahmins seem referred to in the word brahman, "priest," and some-will be born in a Kshatriya family. Next are discussed the different royal families of India, and one by one each is rejected, until finally Buddha shews that the Śākya royal family of Kapilavastu possesses the requisite qualifications. Buddha then leaves the Bodhisattva Maitreya as his vicegerent in the Tushita heaven, during his absence on earth, and puts his own diadem on his head.

The scene of the legend now changes to earth. Māyādevī,^f the queen of King Śuddhodana, asks the king's leave to fast and practise austerities in a palace by herself; her abode is to be decked with every mark of honour, and to resound with music and song. While she is sleeping there, Buddha descends from heaven, in the form of a white elephant, attended by myriads of heavenly beings, and enters her womb. She perceives his arrival in a dream, and announces it to the king. He summons the Brahmans "skilled in the Rig Veda and the Śāstras," and they declare that the king who will be born, is destined either to be a universal emperor of ideal justice and glory, or, if he become a devotee, to be a Buddha who shall give blessings to all the worlds. (Similar pretended prophecies of the signs of a Buddha in the Vedas are mentioned in the Ceylonese legends, see Hardy, Manual, p. 371.)

When the time for Buddha's birth approached, the queen went with a royal retinue to the garden of Lumbinī, and there under a figus religiosa is Buddha born, coming forth miraculously from her right side. The gods, Indra and Brahmā, received the infant in their arms; his body is marked with thirty-two pre-eminent and eighty secondary marks; as a protuberance on the top of the skull, curled hair, a circle of hair between the eyebrows, &c., many of which peculiarities are still to be seen in all the images of times we have the actual word brāhmaṇa, and similarly we may find the initial hints of the later Kshatriyas and Vaiśyas), but, with the exception of one verse in the last book, it is entirely silent as to the fourth or śūdra caste. In the other Vedas we find the caste system fully developed. But in the upanishads, i. e. those treatises of religious philosophy which form a part of the later Vedic literature and subsequently gave rise to the Vedānta system, we find the great teachers of this highest knowledge to be Kshatriyas and not Brahmans, and Brahmans are continually represented as going to the great Kshatriya kings (especially Janaka of Videha) to become their pupils. In the Chhāndogya Upanishad, v. 3, the great sage Gautama Arṇi goes to king Pravāhana and begs to be instructed by him. The king complies, after first saying: "This knowledge before thee never came to the Brahmans; therefore hitherto in all worlds the right of teaching it has belonged exclusively to the Kshatriya caste." Similarly the gāyatrī, or most sacred verse of the Rig Veda, occurs in a hymn by Viśvāmitra, who in later tradition is described as a Kshatriya who by penances extorted his admission into the Brahmanical caste.

^f Her very name seems to indicate an allegory, as Māyā is the well-known Sanskrit word for "illusion," which is continually personified as Nature, to express the illusive character of all created things.

* The Lalitā Vistara nowhere states explicitly that Buddha's mother was a virgin; it only states (Sansk. text, p. 27, l. 13) that she had never brought forth children, and (p. 31, l. 11) that she had, with her husband's consent, made a vow of ascetic chastity for 32 months (cf. Hardy's Manual, p. 141). Csoma de Kőrös (As. Res. xx. 299) states that the belief of her virginity comes from Mongolia; but the tradition was known to Jerome, see sup.

Buddha. Śākya Muni is no sooner born than he takes seven steps towards each of the four quarters of the horizon, and also towards the nadir and zenith, each time declaring his own unrivalled superiority. [Buddha here interrupts his discourse in the original to prophesy that many of his future followers will disbelieve these miracles of his birth, and he forewarns them of the hell prepared for their punishment.]

Seven days after his birth, the queen dies; the infant is named Sarvārthasiddha, and is entrusted to the care of his maternal aunt Mahā-prajāpati Gautamī. Soon afterwards, an old sage named Asita,^h residing with his nephew on the side of Himālaya, having seen by his divine intuition what had come to pass, repaired to Kapilavastu to visit the infant. On being admitted to see him, he takes the child in his arms, and prophesies the future glory of his career. He then weeps to think that he himself is old, and cannot hope to live to hear the Buddha's doctrines from his own lips.

About this time the child is taken to the temples of the gods; directly he sets his foot within their precincts, all the images rise from their places and fall at his feet. [Cf. the falling down of the idols of Egypt in the Evangelium Infantiae, § 10.]

After some years he is taken with immense pomp to the writing school; on his entry the teacher Viśvāmitra, unable to bear the splendour of his appearance, falls to the ground before him. A deity raises him up and tells him who his pupil is. Buddha then takes a writing-tablet of sandalwood, and asks the teacher in which kind of writing he wishes to instruct him, at the same time enumerating sixty-four different kinds. Viśvāmitra, astonished, confesses that he does not even know the names of these kinds of writing; and Buddha then gives a lesson to the whole school, by which every letter of the Sanskrit alphabet becomes associated with some truth of Buddhist philosophy. [Cf. the legend in the Evangelium Infantiae, § 48.]

When he becomes a little older, he goes one day with some of his companions to wander in the fields; he turns aside and seats himself under a tree, and plunges into profound meditation, and there he is visited by the five heavenly sages. Meanwhile the king, uneasy at his long absence, sends his servants to look for him; one of the ministers finds him seated under the tree; the shadow of all the other trees had turned with the sun, but that under which he sat still kept its shadow over him.

When the prince is grown up, the king proposes that he should marry, as he hopes that in this way he may prevent the threatened danger of his son becoming an ascetic and abandoning all family ties. Śākya Muni describes the virtues which the woman must possess who is to be his wife, and the family priest is commissioned to seek in the city for a lady who fulfils the required conditions. "Whatever maiden has these excellences," says the king, "be she the daughter of a Kshatriya, a Brāhman, a Vaiśya or a Śūdra, bring her to us." The Brahman finds one Gopā, the daughter of a Kshatriya of the royal race, named Daṇḍapāṇi, who exactly answers the description; but her father demurs. "The young prince," he says, "has lived all his life luxuriously in a palace, and it is the custom of our family, that our maidens can only be given in marriage to one skilled in arts; now the prince knows nothing of the use of the sword, bow, or quiver." A public tournament is proclaimed for Gopá's hand, and the young prince first shows his superiority in writing and arithmetic; next in leaping, swimming, running, wrestling, archery, and then in a long list of other physical and intellectual accomplishments;¹ and Gopá is finally given to the victor as his queen. She takes the first place in a harem of 84,000 wives.

Śákya Muni remained for some time apparently happy in his palace, but the heavenly beings saw that the time was drawing near; and the 13th chapter, with a truer poetry than we usually find in Buddhist literature, describes how they now exerted their power to awaken him to the consciousness of his lofty destiny. As he sat in his chamber, listening to the musicians, a heaven-seut undertone pierced his soul amidst the jocund strains, reminding him that the time was come, and that all creation was awaiting its deliverer. The king Śuddhodana, now alarmed by a dream, builds three palaces for spring, summer, and winter, to divert his son from forsaking the world, as he suspected that he was thinking of doing. But nothing could stop the march of destiny. One morning the prince proposed to visit the great pleasure garden, and goes out by the eastern gate. The king had ordered his guards to keep away from the road everything which might offend the prince's eyes; but by accident he sees an old man in the road before him—his first sight of old age.² He at once stops and asks the charioteer the meaning of the spectacle. He asks whether it is a peculiar condition of one particular family, or common to all men; and on hearing his answer, the prince turns back at once to the palace. Similarly, another day he goes out by the southern gate and meets a man in a fever, and another time near the western gate a man lying dead on a bier; his first sight of disease and death. The next time, as he goes out by the northern gate, he meets an ascetic, calm and passionless, with his rags and begging-pot; and at the sight all his repressed emotions burst forth, and he resolves to become himself the same. The king, on hearing of this last encounter, has his son carefully guarded, and he redoubles his care to divert his mind by music and song; but one night the prince rises from his bed, when all are asleep, and goes to his faithful attendant Chhandaka, and reveals to him his purpose as well as his real nature. Chhandaka, weeping, yields to his entreaty, and saddles the prince's horse; and the two pass through the silent streets, and go out from the city. They had travelled thirty miles when day dawns, and the prince then sends Chhandaka back with the horse and all his ornaments; and having cut his hair, and changed garments with a hunter, pursues his way alone. Every scene of this memorable legend was holy ground to the Buddhist; and the Chinese travellers in India in the 5th and 7th centuries visited every spot in succession, and found each a place of constant pilgrimage.

Śákya Muni first goes to Vaiśálí, and begs a celebrated Brahman there, named Aráḍa Kálama, to initiate him as a religious student. The teacher at once discovers that he has nothing to teach his new scholar, and he begs him to join in instructing his 300 disciples. But Śákya Muni soon reflects that the Brahman's doctrine cannot bestow complete liberation, and he leaves Vaiśálí, and proceeds to the mountain Páṇḍava, near Rájagriha, in South Behar (Magadha), and there he remained some time, under the protection of the king Bimbisára. After a time he becomes a pupil of a great Brahman teacher in Rájagriha, named Rudraka, but the same result ensues as at Vaiśálí. The teacher soon acknowledges his pupil's superiority, and Śákya Muni again discovers that not by such teaching is complete liberation to be obtained. Five of Rudraka's disciples follow Śákya Muni, when he leaves Rájagriha, and go with him to Uruvilvá, near the river Nairanjaná, where for six years he practises the most tremendous asceticism; he surpasses in fact the different penances by which Hindu legends distinguish their sages. His body becomes emaciated to the last degree; and then Mára, the demon of desire, who had been long standing behind him, in vain watching his opportunity, appears to him and remonstrates against his destroying himself by austerities, as life is the indispensable condition of performing religious acts; and bids him present offerings to the gods. But Śákya Muni resolves to persevere, as he shall thus vanquish Mára and his allies, desires, passions, hypocrisy, praise, &c.; and the demon, abashed, vanishes. Now, however, Śákya Muni determines to adopt a totally different course, as he reflects that in his present emaciated state, even if he attained perfect intelligence, he would be too weak to communicate it to others, and so the grand end of becoming a Buddha would be unsecured; and he therefore begins to take proper food. His five disciples, disgusted at what they regard as a relaxation of his vow, leave him and go to Benares; while he remains in Uruvilvá, and ten village maidens bring him rice and other food. He clothes himself with a cloth from a cemetery, which he makes into a devotee's dress. He then goes to Buddha Gayá, and seats himself under the sacred figus religiosa, called the Bodhi tree,³ resolved that he will never rise from his seat until he obtains the perfect intelligence of a Buddha. He is here interrupted by Mára, who exerts his whole power to hinder the sage from attaining his object. He at first attacks him with armies of monsters, but their utmost efforts can do nothing against his calm patience, and no weapon can touch or harm him. He next tempts the sage with hosts of heavenly nymphs, but all their blandishments fail, and they end by singing his praise. Māra makes a final effort with all his armies to shake Śīkya Muni's fortitude, but fails; and he finally flies in confusion. [Cf. Josaphat's temptation in Barlaam and Josaphat.] The sage, thus left to his triumph, plunged into the depths of meditation, and is represented as revolving in his memory at once every past transmigration of every being in the universe; and he finally unravels the problem of existence, beginning from birth and misery, and step by step rising by twelve stages to ignorance as the ultimate cause of all things. This last being annihilated, all the subsequent causes and effects are annihilated; and thus at the last watch of the night Śīkya Muni accomplished his object, and in his thirty-sixth year attained the perfect intelligence of a Buddha, and thus himself became a Tathāgata.^m Māra now again appears to tempt Buddha by counselling him at once to enjoy his perfect liberation and enter nirvāna; but he declares that he will not enjoy it until he has established the "law" and the "assembly" in the world, and so provided for the happiness of mankind; and again the demon flies ashamed, crying "my empire is over." But though the external temptation fails, Buddha feels the full force of the same temptation from within; he reflects in his solitude how few will understand his words, and what toil and insults will attend him if he preaches his law; and he resolves to retain his knowledge to himself. Three times the gods, with Brahmā at their head, implore him in vain to change his purpose; but at last the sight of the miseries of the world overcomes him, and he resolves "to turn the wheel of the law." He then considers whom he shall first instruct. By his supernatural knowledge he sees that both his old masters Rudraka and Arāda Kālāma are just dead: he then bethinks him of the five disciples who had left him at Uruvilvā, but who were now at Benares in the deer park of Rishipattana. His disciples see him approaching, and at first agree together that they will pay him no respect; but his majestic air forces them to rise from their seats, and they fall at his feet, confess their error, and become once more his devoted followers. The gods and heavenly beings then crowd round to hear

^m This is the peculiar title of a Buddha—its signification is not quite certain, since it is differently analysed by Buddhist writers as tathā-gata or tathā-āgata. According to the former it would mean, "he who has gone as his forerunners went," according to the latter, "he who has come as his forerunners came." A similar term is Sugata, "he who has auspiciously departed or walks happily." The term Buddha means "awakened," "wise," from the root budh, "to know," whence also bodhi, "supreme knowledge."

Śīkya Muni, after he became Buddha, is also called Bhagavat, "adorable," a term continually applied to gods and saints in Brahmanical literature; and also Jina, "the conqueror," a term which afterwards produced the name Jaina as the title of the later sect which alone at the present time represents Buddhism in India. Hindu legend generally represents Buddha as the ninth incarnation (avatāra) of Vishnu, who descended in this form to delude the daityas. The name Buddha has probably no connection with Buddha, the regent of the planet Mercury.

Buddha's first discourse, in which he propounds "the four sublime truths," so celebrated in Buddhist literature: "pain—its origin—its prevention—the way." The southern Buddhists say that "though he spoke in the language of Magadha, each one of his hearers thought that he spoke in his own language; and all the different species of animals, great and small, listened to him under the same supposition." (Hardy, Manual, p. 187; cf. Lalita Vist., Foucaux, p. 399.)

The Lalita Vistara ends with this discourse at Benares, and we have from that time no ancient biography of Buddha; but we have an endless series of isolated details of his subsequent history, woven into the various Buddhist works, but all more or less overlaid with miracles and mythology. He lived for about forty years afterwards, and seems to have chiefly spent his time at Śrāvastī in Kosala, and Rājagriha in South Behar. The kings of both these places, Prasenajit and Bimbisāra,ⁿ protected him. Here the Chinese travellers found countless monuments, especially at Rājagriha, to commemorate various events in his life; and the Sūtras and Avadānas continually link their legends to some spot in this halloved neighbourhood. At Śrāvastī was the Jetavana garden, given to Buddha by the merchant Anātha Piṇḍada, where the scene of the recital of the Lalita Vistara is laid; and not far from the city Hiouen Tshang saw the tower where Buddha's aunt Mahā Prajāpati was buried. He also saw the spot, a few miles to the south, where Buddha first met his father again; and there is a legend of his visit to Kapilavastu, when the Śākya tribe adopted his religion, and his three principal wives became ascetics. His greatest enemy was his cousin (or, as he is sometimes called, his brother-in-law) Devadatta; and there are many legends which describe his controversies with the Brahmans, and the anger which they shewed against the daring innovator.

Later legends add stories of his supposed visits to the Deccan, Ceylon, and even beyond the Indus; but all accounts agree that he died, or entered into nirvāna, at Kūsinagara, under a Shorea robusta, at the age of eighty. General Cunningham identifies this place with the ruins near Kasia, thirty-five miles to the east of Gorakhpur, where one of the mounds is still called the "fort of the dead prince" (Anc. Geogr. of India, i. p. 431). His body was burned with all the ceremonies prescribed for an emperor (chakravartin), and the ashes were divided into eight portions for eight different kingdoms, and each erected a chaitya over their portion^o (Dulva, as given in As. Researches, xx. pp. 309-317).

ⁿ Bimbisāra was murdered by his son and successor Ajātasatru, who at first opposed Buddha, but afterwards embraced his doctrines and was one of the eight sharers of the sage's ashes.

^o It is curious that one of the few known incidents of the history of the Greek kings of Cabul is that recorded of Menander, that he died in camp and the cities contended for his ashes and at last divided his remains equally among them, and raised monuments to his memory (Plut. Reip. gerendae praecepta, § 28). It has been thought that this may be a confusion with the account of Buddha, but it seems very improbable. Menander appears to have had some special connection with the Buddhists, as there is a popular book in Ceylon, the Milinda panho, or dialogue between the Buddhist Nāga-

His two most distinguished and favourite disciples were Śāriputra and Maudgalyāyana, both of whom died before him. He is said to have had eighty other distinguished followers, but many of them evidently belong to a later date.

Śākyā Muni (like Socrates) had spent his life in proclaiming his doctrine orally, and he left nothing written behind him; the canonical books which contain his doctrines are avowedly the work of others. Three general councils play an important part in Buddhist legend; but it is not easy to reconcile the different traditions. All accounts agree that shortly after his death the first council was held at Rājagriha, while Ajātasatru was still reigning. Five hundred of the most distinguished disciples met there under the presidency of Kāśyapa, and there the three divisions of Buddhist doctrine are said to have been compiled, from the recollected discourses of the deceased master. That of the Vinaya, or discipline, was repeated by Upāli, a Śūdra; that of the Sūtras, or discourses of Buddha, by Buddha's cousin, Ananda; and that of the Abhidharma, or metaphysics, by the president. Each rehearsed what he remembered, to the assembly, and the whole assembly afterwards repeated with a loud voice what they had heard.^p Nothing is said as to anything having been committed to writing; and it is quite certain that, if such a collection was then made, it could have been only of the heads of the discourses. The very title, sūtras, which is a well-known technical term, and applied in Sanskrit only to a series of concise aphorisms, seems to shew that the original memoranda so called could not have been the voluminous and tautological works which at present bear that name. These three divisions are collectively called the tripiṭaka, or "triple basket." [For the tripiṭaka of the North, see Csoma de Kőrös, Asiat. Res. xx., Burnouf, Introd.; for that of the South, see Turnour, Mahāv. pref. p. lxxv., and Feer, Journ. Asiat. 1871.]

The second general council, according to the southern tradition, was held at Vaiśālī under the presidency of Sarvakāmin, where 700 monks met to consider some irregular deviations from traditional customs which had arisen in a great monastery in that city. The vinaya was the main object of their deliberations, and no doubt it was re-arranged and extended. This led to the first Buddhist schism, that of the Mahāsāṅghikas. The southern Buddhists (of Ceylon) place this council 100 years after Buddha's death in the reign of Kālāsoka, the sixth successor of Ajātasatru, but the very existence of this prince is in the highest degree problematical. The northern Buddhists (of Nepal) fix it 110 years after that event in the reign of Dharmāsoka, or in other words their second council is what the southern Buddhists reckon as the third. According to the southern authorities, the third council was held 235 years after Buddha's death, in Pāṭaliputra, sena and the Yonaka king Milinda of Sāgala (Hardy, Manual, 512-516), i. e. apparently the Greek (Yavana) Menander who reigned in Σαγγαλα B.C. 140, and whose name is written on his coins Menada, Minanda (Weber, Ind. Stud. III. 121).

^p Compare the Jewish legend of the repetition of the Mishna by Joshua to the elders.

in the seventeenth year of the reign of Dharmāsoka; according to the northern it was held in Cashmir, more than 400 years after Buddha's death, in the reign of Kanishka, apparently the Kanerki of the Indo-scythian coins. Dharmāsoka is, alike in Buddhist and Hindu tradition, the grandson of the Chandragupta, who, born of low origin, overthrew the nine Nandas who previously held the throne; but the traditions differ as to the names of the kings between these Nandas and Ajātasatru. Here we have to fall back on the great point of contact between Greek and Indian history in Chandragupta, who has long been identified as the Sandracottus (or Sandracoptos) of classical writers. The identification is almost certain; and in the utter confusion of all Hindu chronology it may well be called a "sheet-anchor," for "every thing in Indian chronology depends on it" (Prof. Müller's Anc. San. Lit. p. 274; cf. pp. 274-298). Sandracottus was the king of Palibothra (Pāṭaliputra), whose court Megasthenes several times visited, and with whom Seleucus Nicator (B.C. 312?) made a treaty. This synchronism enables us to grope our way in the maze of legend, and we may suppose Chandragupta to have begun to reign about B.C. 315. All accounts agree that he reigned twenty-four years, so that his son Bindusāra would begin his reign B.C. 291.

Bindusāra is said to have reigned twenty-five or twenty-eight years; this will give B.C. 266 or 263 for the date of his son Aśoka's accession, but his inauguration is said to have taken place four years afterwards. If we take the latter date B.C. 263 (the Ceylonese), that of his inauguration will be B.C. 259, and the council would be held in 242; and 242 + 235 gives us 477 B.C. the supposed date of Buddha's death (Müller's Anc. San. Lit. p. 298), but of course this is only conjectural. Professor Kern has recently put forward a theory that there were two divergent traditions in Ceylon as to the date of the Nirvāna, one fixing it 100, the other 118 years before Aśoka's accession; both were adopted by the Singhalese writers, and hence their two councils. He thus makes Aśoka begin to reign in 270, and places the Nirvāna in 370 or 388.

Aśoka (Dharmāsoka) was at first a zealous upholder of the Brahmans, but he was converted to Buddhism, and became in fact the Constantine of the new religion. He extended his empire over a large part of India, and is said to have erected 84,000 topes or monuments over the relics of Buddha, in different provinces.^q He is supposed on the authority of the southern Buddhists to be the Piyadasi, whose edicts, written in a kind of Pali, are found engraved on pillars at Delhi and Allahabad, and on rocks at Kapur di Giri in Afghanistan, Girnar in Guzerat, Dhanli in Orissa, and Bhabra on the road from Jaipur to Delhi. In some of these inscriptions we find mentioned as friendly princes the names of the Greek princes Antiochus (Antiyoko yona rājā), Ptolemy (Turanāyo), Antigonus (Antikona), Magas (Mako or Magā), and Alexander (Atikusunari). If Antiochus II. be meant (B.C. 261-246), the others may be Antigonus Gonatus (B.C. 276-243), Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 284-246), Magas of Cyrene (B.C. 308-258), and Alexander II. of ^q The Chinese traveller Hiouen Tsang finds them everywhere.

Epirus (B.C. 272-254); or they may be merely well-known Greek names added to fill up the list.

The inscriptions themselves breathe the merciful spirit of early Buddhism with none of the later mysticism; the king's subjects are exhorted to practise virtue, to abstain from killing cattle, to shew toleration to other creeds, to dig wells, to build caravanserais and hospitals for men and animals, and to hold public assemblies every five years for general confession. Burnouf has shewn (Lotus de la bonne loi, p. 727) that in the inscription at Bhabra is an edict addressed to "the assembly of Magadha" (Magadha sangham), where the king points out the necessity of holding fast the law of Buddha, especially the vinaya, the gāthās of the Muni, the sūtras of the Muni, the speculations of the son of Tissa (Śāriputra), and the instruction of Rāhula (Buddha's son). It seems certain that this must refer to the council held at Pāṭāliputra, the capital of Magadha or South Behar, in the seventeenth year of Aśoka's reign. It certainly seems to establish the historical truth of one of these celebrated councils, though, which it is, is not so clear.* It is most likely to have been the second, which the Ceylonese writers place under an unknown Kālāsoka, but which the northern Buddhists place under the great Dharmāsoka. This in turn lends credibility to the account of the northern writers, when they place the third council under Kanishka, in Cashmir.

The third council under Dharmāsoka was, according to Ceylonese books, presided over by Tisso Moggaliputto; 1000 monks were present at it; and the canon was subjected to a third revision, but nothing seems to have been committed to writing. None of our present Buddhist texts therefore can be earlier than this council, and probably even the oldest are more recent, at any rate in their present form. In the same year, after the conclusion of the council (according to Ceylonese tradition), while other missionaries were sent to Cashmir, Cabul, and other countries in the north, and to the Deckan, Mahinda, the son of Aśoka, went as a missionary to Ceylon, and spread the faith of Buddha there; but the Mahāwanso (p. 207) expressly states that the Tripitaka, which he introduced, was not committed to writing until the reign of Wattagāmini, B.C. 100-88;† and there is reason for suspecting some later additions by Buddhaghosha in the 5th century of our era. (See Weber, Indische Stud. iii. 178-181. Köppen, Religion des Buddha, i. 200.) We may still believe, in spite of tradition, that some of the sacred books may have been written down from the first; but these legends of successive recensions, and their oral transmission, must not be forgotten in the critical examination of the texts which we at present possess.

The very language in which they were at first compiled is disputed. The tradition of the northern Buddhists (Nepal, Tibet, and China) declares it to have been Sanskrit; and that of the southern (Ceylon, Burmah, and Siam) maintains that it was Pali. Burnouf (Lotus, p. 862) is inclined to think that there may have been two recensions current from the first, the one in the vernacular language (Māgadhī) current among the common people of Behar and Oudh; the other in Sanskrit for the learned. The one eventually may have developed into the Pali piṭakattāyān of Ceylon; the other into the Sanskrit tripitaka current in Nepal and Tibet. Both collections treat of the same subjects to some extent, and apparently some of these treatises are nearly the same; but unfortunately Burnouf's intended comparison of the two was interrupted by his death, and no one has as yet taken up his unfinished task. There can, however, be no question that the Pali texts represent the older form of Buddhism; but we must not forget that it is the Northern and later form which has influenced the human race so widely through its diffusion in China. The southern Buddhists know nothing of the council in Cashmir; this belongs only to the northern; and hence we may perhaps explain the difference between their respective forms of Buddhism: the one was reduced to writing about B.C. 90, the other, about the commencement of our era, assumed at Kanishka's council a form similar to that which we now find in the older Sanskrit writings of Nepal. At the last council (in Cashmir) we first hear of the rise of the school of Nāgārjuna, called "the greater vehicle" (mahāyāna), which plunges into the depths of transcendental philosophy.

[For the history of northern Buddhism we have Tāranātha's history, translated from the Tibetan by Schiefner, Geschichte des Buddhismus in Indien, 1869; but, though a very interesting work, it is quite a modern compilation, having been finished in A.D. 1608. With this should be read Wassilief's work on Buddhism, originally written in Russian, but translated into German by Benfey, and into French by La Combe. For the southern Buddhists we have the valuable Mahāwanso (partly translated by Turnour, 1837), which was compiled by Mahānāma about A.D. 480, chiefly from an older chronicle, the Dipawanso, which goes down to A.D. 302, and was probably written soon after that date.]

We now proceed to give some account of the tenets of the system founded by Śākya Muni. He himself, as we have seen, left no writings; and Buddhism, as we find it in its literature, has undergone a series of developments in the different countries where it is professed, which have widely altered its character from the simple creed first promulgated by its founder. His teaching seems to have had three great objects—morality, asceticism, and Nirvāpa; but on this foundation his followers have erected a system, which rivals the Brahmanical in extent and, to some degree, in extravagance.

Thus Buddhism has its own cosmogony, partly borrowed from the Brahmanical, but which has been in turn copied and exaggerated by the Purānas; this cosmogony, with a few small variations, is common to all Buddhist nations. The number of worlds is infinite. Each world is formed of a number of concentric circles of seas, separated by girdles of rocks, round a Mount

* Another proof of the spread of Buddhism at this time is the occurrence of scenes taken from the legends of Buddha's previous births, on the rail of the tope at Bhārahāt, discovered by Col. Cunningham.

† The Ceylon tradition states that at the same time the Singhalese commentary was composed, called the Aṭṭha-kāthā; this is however lost, and we have only the Pali translation by Buddhaghosha, which seems to be much more legendary than the Tripitaka.

Meru as the centre; outside of the last girdle, in our world, is our sea with the four continents corresponding to the four sides of Meru, viz., Pūrvavideha to the east; Jambudwīpa (or India and its adjoining regions) to the south; Godhanya, or Aparagodāna, to the west; and Uttarakuru to the north. The whole is enclosed by a huge iron wall, called Chakravāla, and under it are the principal hells. Each world has its own chakravāla, its own sun, moon, stars, hells, and heavens. Above Mount Meru, in each system, rise first the six heavens of the gods, which with the earth constitute the world of desire (Kāmadhātu); above these rises the world of form (Rūpadhātu), divided into four successive stages of Dhyāna, or contemplation; and lastly, the world without form (Arūpadhātu). There are six classes of beings: gods, men, asuras (or demons), beasts, pretas (or ravenous monsters), and the damned; these are the six gatis or "paths" of souls. Only the first two are the good paths; the others cannot in their present condition enter on the road to Nirvāṇa, though they may have the hope of it in some future birth.¹

The Hindu pantheon is transferred almost unaltered into the Buddhist system, but the gods are of course immeasurably inferior to its own peculiar spiritual powers. Indra is the king of the second heaven (or lowest but one); the third is that of the yāmas, the fourth is that of the Tushitas, where the Bodhisattvas reside, while awaiting their final birth on earth; the fifth and sixth are similarly appropriated to peculiar classes of celestial beings. Māra, the god of desire (whom we have seen as Buddha's tempter under the Bodhi tree), is located in the sixth, the highest stage of the world of desire, and has more or less influence over all the beings beneath him.

The lowest region of the world of form (rūpadhātu), corresponding to the first degree of contemplation, is ruled by Brahmā; the second belongs to the beings of light; the third, to the beings of purity; each of these regions consists of three stages; the fourth or highest consists of seven or nine stages, inhabited by various classes of beings, like those of the second and third regions, peculiar to Buddhist mythology. Here dwell certain arhats, or beings next below Buddhas and Bodhisattvas. Above these is the world without form (arūpadhātu), comprising four stages; this is the sphere of the Buddhas, or, according to the Southern scheme, of the formless Brahmās.

The Buddhist chronology consists of an endless series of aeons (Kalpas) on aeons, with perpetually recurring periods of wider or more limited destruction and renovation. The destruction is effected by fire, water, or wind. The details vary widely in different books, but the general outline is the same. We have here in fact a mere copy of Brahmanical yugas and days of Brahma; but Buddhism shews its posteriority by fresh additions and multiplications. The series has no beginning, and, until all souls are emancipated, it will have no end.

Buddhism, unlike the Sāṅkhya philosophy, admits no prakṛiti or śūn into its system, as the basis of the universe, which remains unchanged even during an aeon of destruction. Everything depends on the accumulated merit and demerit of individual souls; this merit or demerit regulates and causes everything, from the minutest incident of individual experience up to the revolutions of worlds.

Souls wander through the six orders of beings, but it is only in exceptional cases that they enter plants or inorganic bodies (Köppen, Religion des Buddha, i. 293). Each successive birth is determined by the actions of the soul in its former births, as every action inevitably ripens sooner or later, and brings a sensible fruit in some subsequent birth. This mechanical influence of former actions is the Buddhist fate, and, combined with the inherent attachment to existence in every individual soul, is the cause of all mundane phenomena. The latter is the gravitation to new life; the former supplies the direction. Some of the Buddhist schools (particularly those of Ceylon and Burmah) do not allow any identity between the souls of two successive existences; the soul dies at the end of each life, and transfers its responsibilities at death to a new entity, just as it had inherited its own from a previous one; but this is not the doctrine of Nepal or China, nor was it probably the original creed of Buddhism. Still, as we shall see, when we come to Buddhist metaphysics, it easily flows from the tenet of the five skandhas.

The cardinal tenet of Buddhism is the four sublime truths, "pain (duḥkha),—its cause (samudaya),—its prevention (nirodha),—the way (mārga). Pain is the eternal fact presented to consciousness throughout the entire universe of sansāra; it springs from desire which leads to action, and consequent merit and demerit; it can be prevented, but the only means is the law, as promulgated by Buddha. These four truths recur everywhere in Buddhist literature, and they no doubt formed one of the main features of Śākya Muni's teaching. They are arranged in two pairs, and the members of each pair are mutually related as effect and cause. They are repeated in a well-known stanza, which was first found on the pedestal of a Buddhist statue dug up at Bakhra, and then afterwards on a stone block discovered at Sirnāth, near Benares; they are also found in the Nepalese and Pali canonical books, and no doubt are a very ancient memorial. "Whatever laws (or qualities, dharmaḥ) arise from a cause, the cause thereof hath the Tathāgata declared; and what is the check to the same, that too hath the great ascetic explained"² (cf. Burnouf, Lotus, App. p. 522).

² The same division is found in Hindu philosophy; thus the Commentaries on the Sāṅkhya and Yoga both speak of the four heads of their school's doctrine, viz. mundane existence and its cause, or the conjunction of the soul and matter; and liberation, and its cause, or the

To proclaim the law, which is thus the sole means of escaping from the region of ever-renewed birth and death, is the office of a Buddha. Any individual soul, even the meanest worm under our feet, might eventually rise to that high station; but it is only a few who can pass through the long preliminary trials, and surmount the almost endless obstacles. The distinguishing characteristic of a Buddha is that he not only seeks nirvāna, but desires also to lead others into it. His aim is benevolent, not selfish.

There have been countless Buddhas in the past eternity: each has gradually attained this rank by steadily carrying out absolute self-negation and virtue through an enormous number of successive births, never losing sight of the high goal from the moment when it was first definitely set before him. At length he becomes a Bodhisattwa, i. e., a potential Buddha, one who has only one more birth remaining before he becomes a full Buddha, and meanwhile he remains in heaven until his period comes round. Every Buddha must finally be born as a man, since it is only in a human birth that any soul can attain that rank (Hardy's Manual, p. 363). It is curious to mark how the wildest freaks of imagination are inevitably limited by surrounding circumstances; and, just as Plato's republic is only a reproduction of Greek actualities, Buddhism could not escape from the conditions of Indian society, as this existed at the time of its rise. Thus every Buddha must be born as a male Brahman or Kshatriya: they are all born in Central India; they must all gain supreme intelligence under the bodhi tree at Gayā, and begin to preach in the deer-park at Benares; and their doctrine of course must be eternally the same. The names of a thousand successive Buddhas are preserved, but it is only the last four or seven who have any real celebrity.

The present Buddha, Śākya Muni, has established a law which is to last 5000 years; then when all traces of it have disappeared, the new Buddha, Maitreya, whom he left as the regent Bodhisattwa in Tushita, will appear on earth and restore the forgotten doctrine. It is easy to see that these anterior Buddhas are purely imaginary: they are simply an attempt of enthusiastic disciples to create a spurious antiquity for the great revolution inaugurated by Śākya Muni.

The hierarchy of beings in the Buddhist community is as follows:—

1. Buddhas, i. e., the perfect Buddhas (samyak-sambuddha);
2. Bodhisattwas;
3. Pratyeka-buddhas;
4. Āryas, or the spiritual saints;
5. Prithagjanas, or ordinary mortals.

The Buddhas are those who have successively obtained absolute knowledge and infinite power, and, after communicating the law to others, have entered nirvāna. If they have only attained it for themselves, they are Pratyeka-buddhas, "individual Buddhas;" these beings have attained to supernatural knowledge, and are freed from personality; but they have yielded to the temptation which Śākya Muni resisted at Gayā, and they have sought it only for themselves. The Bodhisattwas await the time of their becoming Buddhas in the Tushita heaven; the Lalitā Vistara in its opening chapter introduces us to 32,000 of these beings, who are described as listening to Buddha's words.

The Āryas are those who have entered on the road to nirvāna. They are divided into four classes (the four "paths"), and each of these is subdivided into those who are still in progress toward the end of their respective stage, and those who have attained it. Thus the lowest, the śrotu-āpannas, are they who have "entered the stream," that surely leads to nirvāna; they have learned the delusion of consciousness, and have full faith in Buddha and his precepts, and they can never be born again except as gods or men. After seven such future births they will become arhats. The next class is that of the śikrīd-āgāmins, those who have only one more birth as men and one more as gods, before they become arhats. The third is that of the anāgāmins, "those who return no more;" these will be born in the heaven of Brahmā, and there become arhats. The fourth is that of the arhats, who are perfectly pure and sinless. They are described as possessing the four forms of perfect understanding (pratisaṃvid) (Burnouf, Lotus, Append. 14, 17), and the five supernatural intuitions (abhijñā); by these last they behold all beings, hear all their words, know all their thoughts, and all their past existences, and can assume any form and appear anywhere. The perfect Arhat awaits calmly his appointed time, and then enters into nirvāna (Hardy's Eastern Monachism, p. 287). The three other paths all eventually end in Arhatship; but only the Arhat, whether in earth or heaven, passes into nirvāna, without any intermediate stage.

Below all these are the prithagjanas, or ordinary disciples, who content themselves with ordinary duties, and do not aspire to the transcendental perfections of the Āryas. It is important to notice that these different distinctions have no necessary connection with that between devotee and laic; a devotee (bhikṣu) may be only a pr-thagjana, and a laic (upāsaka) may be already far advanced in the scale of the Āryas.

(We may here mention a peculiar tenet of the northern Buddhist schools, that of the three yānas or "vehicles." It is said that Buddha, in compassion for mortal infirmity, has adapted his doctrine to the capacities of various intelligences, and consequently has revealed three different "means of transport," by which the Āryas may escape from transmigration, and attain a lower or higher degree of bodhi or transcendental knowledge. These are the lesser, middle, and greater Yāna. The lesser comprises morality and external observances (vinaya), while the others deal with Buddhist metaphysics. The first belongs to ordinary disciples (śrāvakas), who will thus become arhats; the second to the pratyeka-buddhas; the third to the Bodhisattwas. This idea, however, appears to be of later growth, and does not belong to the original Buddhist theory. In the Lotus de la bonne loi, edited by Burnouf, we find it maintained, that there is in reality only one yāna (the greater); the hypothesis of the others being only conceded as an accommodation to the dulness of Buddha's hearers.)

perfect knowledge of the twenty-five principles (see Sān-khya-pravachana-bhāṣya, p. 8, and Vyāsa's Comm. on the Yoga, ii. 15). We also find a very similar exposition of the theory of life in the Nyāya aphorisms, I. 2.

The five above-mentioned gradations, however, mostly belong to the unseen world; the visible Buddhist communion has necessarily other divisions.

The Buddhist "church" (if we may use the term) is called Saṅgha; and the tri-ratna, or "three precious things,"—Buddha, the law (dharma), and the assembly (saṅgha)—are continually mentioned in Buddhist formulae and books. It is impossible to believe that during the founder's life the Buddhist system was developed into the hierarchy which we find in the literature; but it would naturally grow up as the religion spread. The upāsakas, or lay-brethren, do not belong to the saṅgha; this is composed of bhikṣus (religious mendicants), who are also called śramaṇas (ascetics); and the elders among them are called stharīras (in Pali theros). Each member has to pass through a novitiate before he is regularly consecrated, when he takes vows of chastity and poverty. These vows however do not seem to have been at any period irrevocable, and they certainly are not so in Buddhist countries at the present day.

Buddha from the first discouraged in his disciples all those painful modes of asceticism which we find so prevalent in Brahmanism; but he laid great stress on a mendicant and celibate life. Throughout the legends we find him attended by male and female mendicants, dwelling sometimes alone, but more frequently as little separate communities in vihāras, or monasteries. They are represented as subsisting on alms, and the male members went out every day with their begging vessels to collect the gifts of the laity, just as they may be seen doing in Buddhist countries to the present day. Originally the Buddhist ascetics were only enjoined to live in a community and in a settled habitation during the four months of the rains, but gradually the monastic system developed itself in its permanent form. No bhikṣu can possess more than three garments, and those who aspire to a higher degree of holiness wear only one, and that of filthy rags. The vihāra, or community, may own property, and, from the accounts of the Chinese pilgrims in India, we see that at that time many of the establishments were very wealthy; but each individual took a vow of poverty.

In contradistinction to the bhikṣus and bhikṣuṇīs, we find in the Buddhist books continual reference to the upāsakas and upāsikās (literally, male and female servants, or worshippers) i.e., the pious lay men and women who continued in their household life, and supplied by their alms the wants of the mendicants.⁷ Thus there is a dialogue in one of the legends (Burnouf's Introd. p. 281), "What is one to do in the state of a mendicant?" "He must observe all his life the rules of strict chastity." "This is impossible; is there no other way?" "There is another, my friend; to be an upāsaka." "And what must one do in this state?" "He must abstain all his life from all inclination to murder, theft, unchastity, lying, and the use of intoxicating drinks." The duties of the laity are in fact said to be included in the three formulae of "taking refuge" (saraṇa) and the "five prohibitions." The former are, "I take refuge in Buddha, in his doctrine, and in his community;" the latter are to avoid the five sins just enumerated. These five prohibitions bear a singular resemblance to the last five of the ten commandments of the Old Testament, and may have come to the Buddhists from Jewish sources through Persia; and the obligation on the laity reminds one of the Talmudic ger toshar, "one who without being circumcised kept the seven precepts of Noah." Besides these five prohibitions, there is also a decalogue which forbids the sins of the body, the speech, and the mind.² Those of the body are murder, theft, and unchastity; those of the tongue, lying, slander, abuse, and idle words; those of the mind, covetousness, malice, and scepticism. By practising the opposite virtues, a laic, though as long as he remains such, he can never become an arhat, may obtain such merit as to be born hereafter in a position where he may obtain nirvāna.

The morality of Buddhism is its brightest side. Hardy says (Eastern Monachism, p. 169), "a collection might be made from the precepts of the Dhammapadam,* that in the purity of its ethics could scarcely be equalled from any other heathen author." Bishop Bigandet says, "most of the moral truths prescribed by the Gospel are to be met with in the Buddhistic scriptures; the essential, vital, and capital discrepancy lies in the difference of the ends the two creeds lead to, but not in the variance of the means they prescribe for the attainment of them." Universal charity, maitrī, towards all sentient beings is everywhere inculcated in Buddhist ethics; and the idea of self-sacrifice is undoubtedly put prominently forward, however feeble the motives supplied to carry the idea into practice. Brahmanism had been essentially selfish in its morality, till Buddhism widened its horizon; and those words of Buddha reported by Kumārila, the fierce opponent of Buddhism in the 6th or 7th century of our era, did not fall barren even on the Brahmins, "Let all the sins that have been committed in this world during the Kali age fall on me, and let the world be delivered."^b The highest ideal of the different

* It has been said that this ethical division is of Buddhist origin and thence passed, through the Persians and Manichaeans, to the Christian church. The division is found, however, in Plato's Protagoras, p. 348; but the Christian use of the phrase comes from the Sept. translation of Deut. xxx. 14. It is constantly adopted by Philo (as, e.g. Tauch. ed. ii. 23, iii. 217, 321, v. 296), and from him it probably passed into the Liturgy of St. Mark, which was used at Alexandria (Renaudot, Liturg. Orient., Coll. i. 132) and Origen (adv. Cels. Spencer's ed. pp. 200, 241, 273).

^a Edited, with a Latin trans. by Fausbøll, 1855, and translated into German by Weber (Zeitsch. d. Morg. Gesellschaft, vol. xiv.), and into English by Max Müller, 1870.

^b Quoted in Professor Max Müller's Anc. Sans. Lit. p. 80. It is one of the many Buddhist traces in the Kathāsārū-sāgara, where we find (lvi. 153) the disobedient son, who is condemned to wear on his head a revolving crown of red-hot iron,—saying, "May other sinners be released virtues is called the six pāramitās or "transcendental virtues." These are the perfection of liberality, moral conduct, patience, energy, contemplation, and wisdom; these high qualities are beyond the reach of ordinary men, and he who can attain to them becomes an arhat or a Bodhisattwa.

This moral purity of Buddhism has greatly influenced its literature. Buddhist books have generally little literary merit; but the purity and benevolence which so often pervade them, supply the want of poetry, and strongly excite the interest of the reader. Thus the legend of Pūrṇa (Burnouf, Introd. pp. 235, &c.), and still more that of the harlot Vāsavadattā (ibid. pp. 146, &c.), have a moral beauty and pathos which shine out all the more brightly from the absence of all polish in the style. Where this moral element is wanting, Buddhist books (especially the northern) are almost unreadable, as, for instance, the greater part of Le Lotus de la bonne Loi. Some of the Pali poetical works, however, as the Dhammapada and parts of the Sutta-nipāta possess considerable literary power.

As Buddhism does not recognise the idea of God, it has properly no worship or sacrifices; and originally there can have been no religious service or ceremonies, though the Northern Sūtras, by a natural anachronism, often represent Buddha's images and likenesses as worshipped even in his lifetime (Burnouf, Introd. p. 340); but as the religion spread among the common people, a cultus inevitably arose. Its objects of worship were the images and relics of Buddha himself, and the other holy personages of the legends. The ceremonies consisted of offerings of flowers and perfumes with music, and the recital of hymns and prayers. First Buddha himself was the sole object of worship; then the four preceding Buddhas of the present kalpa; but gradually Bodhisattwas and other saints were included, until the Buddhist pantheon rivalled the Brahmanical. All the statues of Buddha represent him with the same physical characteristics; but he is variously sculptured as sitting, standing, or lying down; in the first he is absorbed in contemplation, in the second he is the teacher, while the third reveals him as entered into Nirvāpa. In the pictures and bas-reliefs he and his principal disciples are represented with a glory round the head, and this idea has probably passed from Buddhism into Christian art (see Hardy, East. Monach. p. 416). The relics are either the ashes or other corporal remains (Śarīra, which is a Sanskrit word meaning "body," and is only used in this technical sense by Buddhist writers), as e.g. the eight hairs supposed to be buried under the Shwedagon at Rangoon, and the tooth still preserved in Ceylon; articles used by Buddha in his lifetime, as his alms bowl, which Fahian saw in Peshāwar, but which Hiouen Tsang mentions as being in his time in Persia (cf. Sir H. Rawlinson, Journal of the Royal As. Soc. vol. xi. p. 127; Ferrier, Afghanistan, Engl. transl. p. 318); or objects associated with certain incidents in his history, as the Bodhi tree (a branch of which is said to have been brought to Ceylon by Mahinda, and slips are planted in nearly every vihára there to the present day), and his footsteps on rocks, as that on Adam's peak. It has been mentioned before that Śākya Muni's ashes were enclosed in eight monuments (chaityas) after his death, and Aśoka is said to have erected 84,000 topes (stūpas) in different parts of India (for the difference between a chaitya and a stūpa, see Burnouf, Introd. p. 349); so that no doubt this reverence for relics grew up very early in the history of Buddhism. For a detailed account of the topes we must refer the reader to Ritter's Stupas (1818), Wilson's Ariana Antiqua (1841), Prinsep's Essays (Thomas's edit. 1858), General Cunningham's Bhilsa Topes (1854), and Ferguson's Tree and Serpent Worship (1868). The older topes are in the form of a dome resting on a cylindrical or square basement; they are surrounded by a peculiar balustrade, and surmounted by a simulated relic box (the tee) enclosing a support for one or more umbrellas; but this construction has been variously modified in Ceylon, Burmah, Tibet, Nepal, and China. In the topes of Afghanistan have been found coins of the first Caesars, and some of the Byzantine emperors of the 5th century, A.D.

The worship of the Bodhi tree is connected with an obscure but deeply interesting question, discussed at length by Mr. Ferguson, in his Tree and Serpent Worship. He maintains from the sculptures of the topes at Sānchi and Amravati, that Buddhism was originally a revival of the superstitions of the aboriginal races, purified by Brahmanical morality; and hence the frequent appearance of tree worship and snake mythology in the sculptures and in Buddhist legends. This of course is untenable; but there is every reason to suppose that these aboriginal superstitions may have helped to degrade the creed as it spread among the masses of the people.

The Buddhist service must originally have consisted of mere confessions of faith and ascriptions of praise; but formulæ of prayers have gradually come into use, although the idea of a being who answers prayer is utterly foreign to the system. The prayers are supposed to produce their effect by a kind of magical efficacy, a notion which we also find in the atheistical school of the Pūrva Mīmānsā philosophy among the Hindus. The Buddhists use a rosary of 108 beads; and the praying machines of Tibet and Mongolia are a singular but not illogical consequence of their fundamental notion of prayer. (For the curious resemblances between the ceremonies and services of the Buddhists, especially the lamas, and those of the Roman Catholic church, see Huc and Gabet's Travels ii. 110 and Hardy's Eastern Monichism, passim.)

The religious communities assemble for prayer three times a day, i.e. morning, noon, and evening. They publicly confess their sins on the days of the new and full moon; and the laity also attend for confession, and to listen to the reading of some sacred text. Besides these two days, there are several other fast days in the month; thus the Ceylonese and Nepalese Buddhists fast on the eighth day of each lunar fortnight; but we do not always find this lunar reckoning observed elsewhere.

The third division of the tripitaka is the abhidharma or metaphysics. Our knowledge of this from their sins,—may this crown circle round my head till all sin is destroyed." Cf. also Bhāgavata Purāna, ix. ch. 21.

part of Buddhism is at present very imperfect; * but one of its main features appears to be the theory of the twelve steps of successive causation (or the pratītya-samutpāda), by which Buddha is said to have attained to perfect knowledge under the bodhi tree at Gayā. These twelve steps are as follows. The great evils of embodied existence are age and death; these spring from our being born; this springs from existence; this from the inherent attachment to existence (upādāna); this from desire; this from sensation (vedanā); this from contact between the senses and their objects; this from the six organs of sense; these from the organism (nāma-rūpa, literally "name and form," but here used for the individual consisting of mind and body); this from incipient consciousness in the womb (vijnāna); this from the latent impressions (sanskārāḥ) of former actions involving merit or demerit (hence the southern Buddhists sometimes put karman "moral action" instead of sanskārāḥ), and these from the universal cause, ignorance (avidyā). Some of these terms are variously explained (see Burnouf, Introd. pp. 491-506; Hardy, Manual, pp. 391-396; Childers's note in Colebrooke's Essays, 2nd ed. i. 453-455); but the general outline seems sufficiently clear. The series extends over at least two births or existences of the sentient being: ignorance and merit or demerit belong to the first, the next eight steps to the life in the womb, the last two to the second existence; but the order of the middle steps is not always the same. A somewhat similar analysis forms the opening of the Nyāya Sūtras, the well-known text-book of the Hindu logical system. There we read, "Pain, birth, activity, faults, false notions; since, on the successive annihilation of these in turn, there is the annihilation of the one next before it, there is, on the annihilation of the last, final beatitude." In other words, we start, as in Buddha's series, with the present sad fact of consciousness, pain; this arose from our having been born; birth arose from the mistaken "activity" which led to actions in a previous existence, involving merit or demerit, which necessitated this present birth as a recompense. This mistaken activity was caused by the so-called "faults" of desire, dislike, or stupidity; and these were in turn caused by false notions inherent in the soul. The Nyāya philosophy, by inculcating true notions of things, cuts the root of the evil, and with this all the subsequent germination necessarily ceases. The general idea of this series is a fundamental position in Hindu thought; and Buddha no doubt, here as elsewhere, only adopted and amplified the current opinions of his time. The exact relation, however, of Buddhism to the various systems of Hindu philosophy is very obscure, as indeed is the relation of those systems to each other. The absence of all dates in Sanskrit literature renders a literary history impossible, and internal evidence is necessarily a very vague and uncertain basis for a chronological arrangement. But there are some indications that Buddhism and the Nyāya had some connexion. Not to mention the fact that the founder of the Nyāya is said to have been Gotama or Gautama (which is probably only an accidental coincidence), it is certain that one of its early teachers must have been a Buddhist, as the third work in the successive series of logical authorities, the vārttika of Ud-ḍyotakara, was expressly written to refute the erroneous interpretations of Dinnāga and others, and the name Dinnāga, the logician, is only known elsewhere from Buddhist literature (see Weber, Zeitsch. der D. M. G. xxii. 727). The Sāṅkhya, however, is the system most akin to Buddhism, and it is hardly possible to avoid the conviction that Buddha's teaching was based on this as its starting-point.

Another important feature of Buddhist metaphysics is the psychological division of the five skandhas, or, in Pali, khandhas. These appear to be the five forms of mundane consciousness. They are—1. rūpa, "form," or the organized body; 2. vedanā, "sensation," i.e. pleasurable, painful, or indifferent; 3. saññā, "perception," or "idea," i.e. the knowledge or belief arising from names, words, or signs; 4. sanskāra, apparently "feeling" or "imagination;" 5. vijñāna, "knowledge," or "consciousness," i.e. the consciousness of the uninterrupted flow of successive momentary sensations and ideas. All these terms, except saññā, have appeared in the twelve steps of causation, but their application is different. There they were employed to account for a man's embryo existence, and to connect it with his previous births; here they describe his nature when born, as an intellectual and moral organism.

Apart from these five skandhas (according to the stricter schools, even among the northern Buddhists, and to a still wider extent among the southern), there is no such thing as soul; it is only their aggregation (cf. the interesting passage in the Śīsupīla-badha, ii. 28). "The five khandas embrace all the essential properties of every sentient being; some beings possess them less completely than others, and the inhabitants of the four Arūpabrahmalokas do not possess the first khandha (rūpa) at all. When a man dies the khandhas of which he is constituted perish, but by the force of his kamma (karma), a new set of khandhas instantly starts into existence, and a new being appears in another world, who, though possessing different khandhas and a different form, is in reality identical with the man just passed away, because his kamma is the same. Kamma then is the link that preserves the identity of a being through all the countless changes which it undergoes in its progress through Samsāra" (Childers, Pali Dict. art. khandho). But this extreme view is not held by all the northern schools, and it certainly is not the view held by ordinary Buddhists. The Brahmanical commentators consider vijñāna to represent the soul, the other skandhas being its attributes. According to Julien (Mémoires sur les contrées occidentales, i. 385, note) the Chinese call the skandhas "the five shadows," "ces cinq choses peuvent couvrir et cacher la nature vraie de l'homme, et l'empêcher de se montrer dans toute sa pureté."

All existence is said to consist of a continued succession of momentary states, each arising from the preceding as an effect from its cause. The material and moral worlds are only different instances of this endless concatenation according to innate necessity. Thus in the material world we see the germ spring from the seed, the branch from the germ, the stem or culm from the branch, the leafy gem from the culm, the bud from the leafy gem, the blossom from the bud, the fruit from the blossom, and the seed again from the fruit, and so on in eternal succession. The twelve steps of Buddha's analysis, mentioned above, are, to a certain extent, an application of the same law to the mental and moral world. Existence in all its infinite forms everywhere exemplifies the same law of endless succession; inherent necessity, without any superintending providence, governs every development.

* There are said to be four great philosophical schools among the northern Buddhists, the Vaiśāhikas, the Sautrāntikas, the Yogācāras, and the Mādhyamikas, and each is divided into several different sects. Buddhist books speak of eighteen sects in all.

The end of the Buddhist system, as we have said, is nirvāna; but what is nirvāna? This is one of the most difficult problems in Buddhism; but unless it be answered, our idea of the system must be vague and imperfect, for nirvāna is the keynote which runs through every part. Now nirvāna is a technical term, and, though used in early Sanskrit as a passive past participle "blown out" (from nir + vā), its use as a neuter noun appears to have been introduced by the Buddhists, and to have been subsequently borrowed from them by the later Sanskrit writers (see Goldstücker's Pāṇini, p. 226). "The Brahmanic Hindus hope that their soul will ultimately become united with the universal spirit; which, in the language of the upanishads, is the neuter Brahman, and, in that of the sects, the supreme deity who takes the place of this philosophical and impersonal god. And however indefinite this god Brahman may be, it is nevertheless, to the mind of the Brahmanic Hindu, an entity. The final salvation of a Buddhist is entire non-entity. The various expressions for eternal bliss in the Brahmanic creed, like apavarga, moksha, mukti, nibhreyasa, all mean either 'liberation from this earthly career,' or 'the absolute good;' they therefore imply a condition of hope. The absolute end of a Buddhist is without hope, it is nirvāna, or extinction" (ibid.). The philosophical writings of the Buddhists represent a complete nihilism. In an important passage from the great text-book, the Prajñā pāramitā (quoted by Burnouf, i. 474), the five skandhas are said to be only an illusion—conscious existence is itself only as a magical show. Now in nirvāna the five skandhas are abolished, and what remains? In the Vedānta system, indeed, a somewhat similar phraseology occurs, since, in final emancipation, every upāhi, or "disguise" caused by ignorance, falls off, and the pure undisguised Brahman remains. This one absolute being had been concealed under the various forms of individuality as the rope is hid under the appearance of the snake for which it was mistaken; all individual existence (from the highest God Brahmā down to a plant) is but a similar delusive veil, and has no more reality than the snake thus created by our imagination. Yet beneath all these illusions there still remains the absolute Brahman, and mukti is thus the return to reality, when the various delusive veils are destroyed. But in Buddhism there seems to be nothing beneath the illusion—individual existence is not like the imagined snake which conceals the real rope, but it is merely a magic show, which, when it passes, "leaves not a rack behind."

But here we must carefully distinguish between the ordinary practical Buddhism and Buddhism as a strictly developed system. As a system, Buddhism can hardly admit of any goal short of absolute annihilation. Its aim is to enable its faithful disciple to enter one of the "four paths," and any one of these inevitably conducts, after a briefer or longer interval, to nirvāna. But it can hardly be disputed that the great mass of Buddhist believers in every age have given to nirvāna a vague meaning of future happiness; human nature has been too strong to be shackled by a theory—

"'Tis life whereof our nerves are scant,
Oh life, not death, for which we pant;
More life and fuller, that we want." ^d

Nor is it at all certain that the founder of the system held the transcendental nihilism in which subsequent philosophers of his sect have lost themselves. His aim seems to have been ethical rather than metaphysical; and even among those philosophical sects, which allow a soul as distinct from the five skandhas, nirvāna can hardly mean absolute annihilation. Hence in the ordinary Buddhist books we find frequent mention made of three kinds of nirvāna, which have been by some supposed to correspond to the three previously mentioned yānas or vehicula, i. e. nirvāna, parinirvāna, and, lastly, mahāparinirvāna. But just as we saw that in le Lotus de la bonne Loi, it was expressly declared that in reality there was only one yāna, so the same book as expressly affirms that there is only one, and that the absolute, nirvāna. Similarly among the southern Buddhists we find the word nibbāna applied to two different things,—that annihilation which is the goal of Buddhism, and the state of blissful sanctification or arhatship which is destined to end in annihilation. [For further details respecting nirvāna, cf. Burnouf, i. 516, 589 ff.; Köppen, i. 304–309. St. Hilaire, le Bouddha (3rd ed.), i. – xxvii., 132–140; Max Müller, Chips, i. 279–290, Lecture on Buddhist Nihilism, 1869; Childers, Pāli Dict. art. nibbāna.]

In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to give a general sketch of Buddhism as it existed in its flourishing state in India and Ceylon, as far as this can be gathered from the older writings in the Sanskrit of the northern Buddhists and the Pali of the southern; but of course with the lapse of time the religion gradually underwent many changes, especially as it extended to other countries with an inferior or different civilization. Its subsequent history in India itself is obscure, and Tāranātha's "history" will need a rigorous sifting by European criticism, to separate the fragments of truth from its mass of legend. We find from the accounts of the Chinese travellers in India, Fa Hian (A.D. 399–414) and Hiouen Tshang (629–645), that in their time it was still flourishing throughout that continent. The latter, especially, represents Brahmanism and Buddhism as existing side by side; and, though he often has to lament the wide spread of heresy, it is still evident from his pages that in most of the kingdoms into which India was divided, Buddhism had a strong hold on the population, and in many it was even the predominant faith. Shortly after that time it must have begun to decline. Hindu legend assigns the commencement of its overthrow to a persecution brought about by Kumārila, the celebrated commentator on the Pūrva mimānsā philosophy, who is supposed to have flourished in the 7th century; but, as the persecution is also placed in the time of Śankara Ācharya, who probably flourished towards the end of the 8th century, we may assume that Buddhism was not suddenly uprooted by any universal revolution. Gradually, however, it did cease to exist; and in the 16th century the Mogul emperor Akbar is said to have sought in vain for a single Buddhist in his dominions. Later Sanskrit writers generally confuse the Buddhists with the Jains. This latter sect profess many of the tenets of Buddhism, but they have also many peculiarities of their own, and they seem to have only risen into importance as the older faith declined. Professor Wilson thinks (Essays on the Religion of the Hindus, i. 334) that they arose in the 6th or 7th century,* reached their highest prosperity in the 10th or 11th, and declined after the 12th. They never spread much in the north of India, and are at present found chiefly in Guzerat, Rajputana, and Canara.

But though Buddhism thus faded away in India, it was destined to spread far and wide outside that continent. Its conquests, however, were not, like those of Islām, made by the sword, but by the moral influence of missionary preaching. The records of every Buddhist country tell the same story of Buddhist disciples bringing the doctrine to their ancestors; and the early enthusiasm of these Buddhist missionaries cannot be better expressed than in the following remark by the author of the Mahāwanso, when he tells the story of Aśoka's messengers coming to Ceylon. "These disciples, following the example of the all-compassionating Buddha's postponement of his own entry into Nirvāna, laid aside the exalted state of happiness attained by them, and for the benefit of mankind undertook these missions to various countries. Who is there who would demur when the salvation of the world is at stake?"

Buddhism seems to have found an early home in Cashmir. Wassilief calls that country its "second native land;" from thence it spread into Cabul, Bactria, and Tibet.

In Nepal we meet with a theistic Buddhism, however contrary to the original creed as founded by Śikya Muni, though even there it is an innovation of comparatively modern date. An Ādi or "primordial" Buddha is acknowledged, from whom have emanated five Dhyāni or "contemplative" Buddhas, who in turn have produced certain Bodhisattwas, who are the creators of the successive worlds. Our present creation is the work of the Bodhisattwa Avalokiteśwara or Padmapāni, who is the active representative of the fourth Dhyāni Buddha Amitābha, and to whom is addressed the well-known Tibetan formula "Om mani padme hūm" (Köppen, ii. 59-61). Besides these superhuman Buddhas, there are also certain Mānushi or "human" Buddhas, who have risen from men to that eminence; these are, as it were, the reflections in the lower world (Kāma-dhātu) of the Dhyāni Buddhas, who rule in the world of Form (rūpadhātu) (Köppen, ii. 26). In Nepal, Tibet, Mongolia, and China, the Bodhisattwas Avalokiteśwara and Mañjuśrī have become prominent objects of worship (Burnouf, i. 112-117); the former is said to have vowed that he will not enter nirvāna until he has declared 'the law' to all beings in every world, and his 'descent into hell' to preach there is a famous Northern legend; and the sacred books of Nepal and Tibet include an extensive body of mediæval works called Tantras, which enjoy the highest repute at the present day. In these we find a strange mixture of Buddhist notions with the obscene tenets of the Saiva sect of the Brahmanical religion, together with puerile superstitions and magical ceremonies (ibid. 522-554).

In Tibet Buddhism has in modern times undergone a singular development. In the 14th century a young priest named Tsong kha pa inaugurated a new system in the place of the old hereditary priesthood, the Sakia hierarchy. From his time Tibet has been ruled by a "double Papacy," the Dalai Lama at Lhasa, and the Panchen Rin poche in Further Tibet, the latter being abstracted from all worldly affairs, and the former being the chief spiritual as well as secular authority. Each is supposed to be the incarnation of one of Tsong kha pa's two disciples, who succeeded him at his death; and as each office becomes vacant, a child is sought out to fill it, into whom the soul of the deceased is supposed to have migrated. Tibet is now governed by China, and the Dalai Lama acts as a regent, assisted by a native council and two Chinese commissioners; and thus the system has become a well-organised engine of statecraft in the hands of the Chinese officials (Köppen, ii.). Mongolia is dependent on Tibet, and the superior of the Mongolian monasteries is very commonly a boy from Tibet, into whom the deceased superior is believed to have passed, just as in the case of the Dalai Lama. Mongolia swarms with Lama-serais, and the emperors of China encourage Lamaism as a means of repressing the warlike spirit of the Tartar population.

In China Buddhism is one of the three co-ordinate religions, being recognised by the state with those of Confucius and Laou-tsoo, though Confucianism is the proper state creed and the religion of the learned class. Buddhism was introduced into China from India in the 1st century of our era, and its temples are found everywhere, and it has largely influenced the religious belief even of those who profess the other creeds. The popular Buddhism, however, has considerably degenerated from the original form as we find it in the old Sanskrit or Pali books; beside the homage paid, as in Nepal, to Mañjuśrī, two deities, Amitābha, the lord of the western heaven, and Kwan yin, the goddess of mercy (who represents Avalokiteśwara), have risen to equal pre-eminence with Buddha himself. Nirvāna is still recognised as the final goal in the metaphysical books of the Chinese Buddhist schoolmen; but it is far beyond the horizon of the ordinary worshipper; his prayer and hope only extend to a new birth on earth in some more prosperous condition, or, at best, in the western heaven of Amitabha.

* This, however, must be too late a date if, as seems most probable, the Nirgranthas, so often mentioned in Hiouen Tshang, were Jains (see A. C. Burnell, Indian Antiquary, i. 310).

From China Buddhism has spread into Corea, Japan, and Cochin China, as from Ceylon it spread into Birmah and Siam.

But wide as Buddhism has thus extended in the East, it has not been without its influence also on the West. It is true that no Buddhist communion has ever been established in Europe or Western Asia, but Buddhist ideas have filtered westwards through Gnosticism and Manichaeism. These systems were an attempt to unite Christianity and Oriental philosophy, and many of the ideas of Manichaeism were but fragments of Buddhism. But rightly to estimate this Buddhist influence on the world, we must remember that Buddhism sprang up in India; nearly all its tenets were based on the immemorial belief of the Hindu mind. It was the moral teaching of Buddha and his proclamation that the highest religious truth was open to all castes alike, which formed the special features of his system; all else he only borrowed or modified from the Brahmans whom he opposed. There were, in truth, only three creative national intellects in the ancient world, the Hebrew, the Greek, and the Hindu; and Buddhism is that product of the Hindu mind, which, for good or for evil, has most widely influenced mankind.

[In addition to the special works already mentioned in the course of this article, we would single out the following from the wide literature on the subject. For the general subject, C. F. Köppen's Die Religion des Buddha und ihre Entstehung, 1857, a most able review of Buddhism, only marred by the needlessly hostile tone adopted towards Christianity; a second vol. appeared in 1859, Die Lamaische Hierarchie und Kirche; St. Hilaire, Le Bouddha et sa Religion, 1866. For the northern Buddhism, Burnouf's Introd. à l'histoire du Bouddhisme Indien, 1844; and Le Lotus de la bonne Loi, 1852 (a transl. of one of the canonical books of Nepal, with copious notes and appendices); Foucaux's transl. of the Lalita Vistara, Rgya tch'er-rol-pa ou développement des jeux, 1848; Wassilief, Der Buddhismus, 1860, translated by Benfey (there is also a poor French transl. by La Comme, 1863); and Julien, Voyages des pèlerins Bouddhistes, 1853-8. For Mongolian Buddhism, the numerous publications of Schmidt in the transactions of the Imperial Academy of St. Petersburg. For Chinese Buddhism it will suffice to refer to Beal's Catena of Buddhist Scriptures from the Chinese, 1871, and the works mentioned therein.

For the southern Buddhism, Turnour's Mahāwanso, 1837; R. S. Hardy's Eastern Monachism, 1850, and Manual of Buddhism, 1853; the latter work, though chiefly composed from Singhalese authorities, is an invaluable compilation; Bishop Bigandet's Life of Gaudama, 1866; Max Müller's transl. of the Dhammapada, printed in Rogers's transl. of Buddhaghosha's Parables, 1870; Childers' Pali Dictionary; and various articles by D. J. Gogerly in the Ceylon Friend and the Journal of the Ceylon branch of the R. A. S. [E. B. C.]

BUDOCUS, ST., an abbot and confessor of the 6th century, said to have succeeded Maglorius, in the see of Dol, in Brittany (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, 2, 88). The parish of St. Buadock is just west of Falmouth (which was once included in it), and the church of his disciple St. Winwolaus (Gunwallo) is south of this, in the Lizard district. His feast day was Dec. 8 (see Leland, Itin. 3, p. 25). The Close Rolls, i. 498, 529, mention a church of St. Budock, in Oxford. [C. W. B.]

BUGGA, BUGGA. (1) A nun, daughter of the abess Dunna, to whom Oshere, under king of Hwiccia, gave lands on the river Tillath to found a monastery; she appears to have married and had a daughter, Hrotwari, who succeeded to the monastery by her grandmother's gift (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. i. 98), under her mother's guardianship. When Hrotwari came of age Bugga refused to surrender the monastery, and was only dislodged by decree of a council in 736 or 737 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 337). The story is of importance as illustrating the state of monastic discipline, and the hereditary transmission of monastic property, so severely commented on by Benedict Biscop and Bede.

(2) Bugga, also called Eadburga or Heaburga, the third abess of Minster, in Thanet. She appears, from the letters of Boniface, to have been the daughter of an abess Eangyth (ep. 30); and from a poem preserved among Alcuin's works we learn that her father was a king of Wessex, "Eutwin," whom Mabillon identifies with Escwin, who died in 676. It is, however, more probably, Kentwine, who died in 685 (Act. SS. O. S. B. saec. iii. 424-426). She is recorded to have rebuilt the monastery of St. Mildred (Elmhams, ed. Hardwick, p. 219), and the poem above referred to seems to have been composed on the occasion (Alc. Opp. ed. Froben, ii. 549). She is, however, best known from the letters of Boniface. Between 719 and 722, her mother writes to Boniface stating that a pilgrimage which she had many years before proposed to make to Rome had been prevented by the infancy of her daughter, and asking his prayers and advice about the journey (ep. 30). A little later Bugga herself writes to him, sending him fifty solidi and an altar-cloth, congratulating him on his success and asking him to write to her (ep. 3). The next letter is probably much later in date, Boniface condoles with her on the troubles which had befallen her in her old age, and seems, in a mystical way, to refer to her buildings at Minster (ep. 31). In another he addresses her as abess, congratulates her on having found a resting-place at Rome (ep. 32). She appears to have gone to Rome after she undertook the abbacy, and there to have met Boniface, who through her sent a message to king Ethelbert of Kent, promising him his prayers. Ethelbert reminds him of his promise some years after, but unfortunately the date of the letter cannot well be fixed (ep. 84). Finally, archbishop Bregwin, writing to Lullus, between 759 and 765, mentions that Bugga died on the 27th of December, and begged him before her death to convey the news to Lullus. Elmham (ed. Hardwick, p. 220) dates her death in 751, but this is certainly too early. These particulars, from three several sources, are well put together by Mabillon, who did not however perceive that the identity of Bugga and Eadburga is proved, rather than disproved, by the concurrence of the West Saxon and Kentish authorities. That she was a

West-Saxon lady is confirmed by her close friendship with Boniface, and that she was a Kentish abbess is illustrated by the evidence of king Ethelbert. The two together throw great light on the poem. Some of the other letters of Boniface, addressed to nuns unnamed, may possibly be referred to her [S.]

BUIITE. [BOETHIUS.]

BULGARANUS, a Spanish count of Gothic descent, governor of Gallia Narbonensis, under Gundemar king of the Visi-Goths, c. 610. Letters of his addressed to Gundemar, and the chief bishops of the district, of some value for the history of his age, are printed in Migne Patrol. lxxx. 107-112, from Mariana Istor. de Esp., vol. iii. append., who copied them from MSS. in the libraries of the churches of Oviedo and Alcalá (Complutum). They chiefly refer to the danger impending from the designs of Brunehild, who had instigated the king of the Avars against Theutibert, and urge the appointment of days of humiliation, with fastings and litanies, to avert the calamity. (Cf. Cl. Anton. Biblioth. Hispan. Vet. tom. i. lib. 5, c. 5; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 574.) [E. V.]

BUNDUS (Βοῦνδος), a Manichean sectary (Jo. Malalas, Chron. xii. p. 410), who added some doctrines of his own, and taught them in Rome during the reign of Diocletian, and afterwards in Persia. He held that God had made war with the evil principle and conquered it; and that men ought to worship the conqueror. Malalas adds that his doctrine was called in the Persian language τὸ τῶν Δαρισηθῶν, ὃ ἐρμηνεύεται τὸ τοῦ ἀγαθοῦ. [E. B. C.]

BURIENA, ST., one of the Irish ascetics (said to have been the daughter of a king), who settled in the wild Land's End district, in Cornwall, during the 6th century (Leland, Itin. iii. pp. 7, 8, 18; Acta Sanctorum May 29; vol. vii. p. 37, cf. Alford, Annals, 460, num. vi. on the Irish saints in Cornwall). The two churches which have been always connected with St. Burian, are those of St. Senanus and St. Levanus, also from Ireland. Athelstan defeated the Cornish king Howel, 926-8, in which last year he held a Gemot at Exeter, and made Conan bishop of Cornwall. He completed the conquest of Cornwall and the Scilly Islands, in 936. In gratitude for his victory, he is said to have founded a collegiate church in honour of St. Burian, as well as a monastery at Bodmin, in honour of S. Peckock, also an Irish Saint. The clergy who served the collegiate church (called Eglosberrie in Domesday—the prefix Eglos is much rarer in Cornwall than the Cymric prefix Lan, which again seldom occurs in Scotland) seem to have been seven in number. The charter of Athelstan, however, which the canons produced, was denounced by bishop Grandison, in Edward III.'s time, as a forgery, and it is only valuable as shewing the extent of the lands and their old boundaries (Kemble, Codex Diplomaticus, No. 1143, Oliver's Monasticon Diocesis Exoniensis). St. Burian's day is May 29, or June 19 ("Register of St. Buriena," quoted in Wilson's Martyrologium, ed. 2, 1640), or June 4 (Alban Butler) or May 1. The parish feast is on the nearest Sunday to old May Day. In fact parish feasts were often transferred in later times to the Sunday nearest to some special day. The Mar-tyrologium of the Church of Exeter placed it on May 1, and adds "Sanctæ Berionæ Virginis meritis filius regis Gerontii a paralysis morbo curatus est" (Oliver's Monast.). The first two Cornish kings of that name are placed in 530 and 596 respectively, the third was living in 705, when Aldhelm wrote him a celebrated letter. [C. W. B.]

CABADES, Cabat, Coades, Cobad, are sundry representations of a name borne by a Persian king, spelt on his coins כּוּוּד (Covád), and supposed by Longperier (Mémoires des Sassanides, p. 68) to be derived from the ancient name of the sun-god. Cabades I. was succeeded by his son, Chosroes I., A.D. 531; for part of the history of his war with Rome, A.D. 502, see CELER; for his life see CHOSROES. Cabades II. or Siroes murdered his father, Chosroes II., A.D. 628, and died of plague not long after. [E. B. B.]

CABBALAH (קבלה) or KABBALAH and CABBALISTS or KABBALISTS. By the first term is meant that famous system of religious philosophy or theosophy; and by the second term, the disciples and promoters of this esoteric doctrine, known in the Christian church ever since the middle ages. Though this mysterious doctrine is of peculiarly Jewish origin, and those who developed it, and explained Holy Writ in accordance with its principles, were chiefly Jews, yet as such distinguished scholars as Raymond Lully (1234 or 1235-1315), John Reuchlin (1455-1522), John Pico di Mirandola (1463-1494), the leaders of Christian opinion abroad, and our own celebrated countrymen Robert Fludd (1574-1637), and Henry More (1614-1687), not only found in the Cabbalah an explanation of the secret tie which binds all created things together and unites them with the Creator, but introduced this doctrine into the Christian church, a succinct account of the marvellous system is absolutely necessary in a Dictionary of Christian Literature.

I. NAME AND ITS SIGNIFICATION.—The name Cabbalah (קבלה from קבל to receive), which primarily signifies reception, and secondarily, a doctrine received by oral tradition, has been given to this theosophy, because its advocates maintain that it is of pre-Adamite existence, and that ever since the creation of the first man it has been received uninterruptedly from the mouths of the patriarchs and prophets. God himself taught it first to a select company of angels, who after the fall most graciously communicated it to the disobedient child of earth, to furnish the protoplasts with the means of returning to their pristine state of happiness and communion with the Deity. From Adam it passed over to Noah, Abraham, and gradually to Moses, who covertly laid down the principles of it in the first four books of the Pentateuch, withholding them however from Deuteronomy. Moses also initiated the Seventy Elders into its secrets, and they again transmitted them, in an unbroken line of tradition, to David, Solomon, and so on till Simon ben Yochai, the last depositary of this tradition. Having been condemned to death by Titus, Rabbi Simon managed to escape from prison, and concealed himself with his son in a cavern for twelve years. In this subterranean abode, where he was visited by his disciples, he discoursed on this sublime doctrine. It is from these discourses the Cabbalists maintain that his son Rabbi Eliezer, and his secretary Rabbi Abba, as well as his disciples, compiled the celebrated work called Sohar (זהר) i. e. Splendour, which is the grand storehouse of Cabbalism; and it is from this circumstance that the believers in this theosophy named it Cabbalah. But though Cabbalah is its classical and acknowledged appellation, it is also called Secret Wisdom (חכמה נסתרה), because, as its disciples maintain, the doctrines of the Cabbalah are indicated in the Scriptures by signs which are hidden from and are unintelligible to those who are not initiated into its mysteries. It is also called Grace (חן). This name is obtained from the initial letters of חכמה נסתרה Secret Wisdom.

II. THE CARDINAL DOCTRINES OF THE CABBALAH.—The fundamental doctrines of the Cabbalah embrace (1) the Nature of the Supreme Being; (2) the Emanations or Sephiroth; (3) the Cosmogony; (4) the Creation of Angels and Man; (5) the Psychology; (6) the Destiny of Man and the Universe; and (7) the Import of the Revealed Law. How these subjects are treated will be seen from the following analysis.

1. The Supreme Being or the En Soph.—God is boundless in his nature; there is nothing without him; he is the space of the universe containing the $\tau\delta\ \pi\acute{\alpha}\nu$, but the universe is not his space. Hence he is called En Soph (אין סוף = $\acute{\alpha}\nu\epsilon\pi\omicron\varsigma$), Endless, Boundless. This idea of the divine nature, which obtained among the Jews at a very early period, gave rise to the designation of God by Makōm or Hannmakōm (מקום), and they saw the Place, which explains the otherwise inexplicable Septuagintal rendering of $\text{וַיִּרְאוּ אֶת אֱלֹהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל}$ (Ex. xxiv. 10), by $\text{καὶ εἶδον τὸν τόπον, and they saw the Place}$. As he cannot be comprehended by the intellect, or described in words in this boundlessness, the En Soph is in a certain sense Ayin (אין) = non-existent (Sohar, iii. 283 b). Nor can He be the direct creator of the universe, because the act of creation involves intention, desire, thought, words, and work, properties which imply limit, and belong to a finite being; and because the imperfect and circumscribed nature of the creation precludes the idea that the world was created or even designed by him who can have no will nor produce anything which is not like himself boundless and perfect. As the design, however, displayed in the mechanism of the world plainly indicates an intelligent designer, the En Soph must be regarded as the creator in an indirect manner.

2. The Emanations or Ten Sephiroth.—To become the creator in an indirect manner, the En Soph, or the Aged of the Aged (עתיקא דעתיקין) or the Holy Aged (עתיקא קדישא) as God is alternately called, sent forth from the fulness of his infinite light one spiritual substance or intelligence. This first Sephira, which existed in the En Soph from all eternity, has no less than seven names. They are as follows:—i. The Crown (כתר), because it occupies the highest position. ii. The Aged (עתיקא), because it is the oldest, or the first emanation. iii. The Primordial or Simple Point (נקודה פשוטה) נקודה ראשונה (נקודה ראשונה), because, as the Sohar (i. 15a) tells us, when the Concealed of the Concealed wished to reveal himself, he first made a single point. The Infinite was entirely unknown, and diffused no light, before this luminous point violently broke through into vision. iv. The White Head (הוי"ש הוורה) v. The Long Face, the Macroprosopon (ארך הנפין) because the whole of the ten Sephiroth represent the Primordial or Heavenly Man (אדם עליון) of which this Sephira is the head. vi. The inscrutable Height (רום מעלה) because it is the highest of all the Sephiroth, proceeding immediately from the En Soph. "No one," the Sohar (ii. 100 b) tells us, "can see the King." And vii. this Sephira is expressed in the Bible by the Divine name Ehieh or "I am" (אהיה), Ex. iii. 4, because it is absolute being, representing the infinite as distinguished from the finite; and in the angelic order it is indicated by the celestial beasts of Ezekiel, called Chayoth (חיות). The first Sephira contained the other nine Sephiroth, which it produced in the following order. From its bosom proceeded Wisdom (חכמה), the second, and Intelligence (בינה), the third Sephira. The first of this twin, which is a masculine or active potency, is represented by Jah (יה, Is. xxvi. 4) among the Divine names, and by Ophanim (אפנים), Wheels among the angelic hosts; whilst the second, which is a feminine or passive potency, is called by the Divine name Jehovah (יהוה), and by the angelic name Arëlim (אראלים). These two potencies, united by the first potency form the first triad of the Sephiric decade, and constitute the Divine head of the Archetypal Man, as will be seen in the subjoined figure. The junction of Wisdom and Intelligence, its second and third Sephiroth, respectively denominated Father (אבא) and Mother (אמא), yielded the masculine potency Mercy, Love, or Greatness (נדולה), the fourth Sephira, and the feminine potency Justice or Strength (נבורה פחד רין), the fifth Sephira. Of these two, which constitute the Divine arms in the Archetypal Man, the first is represented by El (אל) among the Divine names, and by Chashmalim, the שמשים, (Ezek. i. 4) among the angelic hosts, whilst the second is called by the Divine name Eloah (אלה), and by the angelic name Seraphim (שפים), Is. vi. 7). From them emanated Beauty or Mildness (תפארת), the sixth Sephira, which is the chest in the Archetypal Man, and is called by the Divine name Elohim (אלהים), and by the angelic name Shaninim (P's. lxxviii. 18). By the union of Love and Justice, effected through the medium of Beauty or Mercy, the second trinity of the Sephiroth is obtained. Beauty, the sixth Sephira, and the uniting principle of the fourth and fifth Sephiroth, beamed forth the masculine potency Firmness (נצח), and this again produced Splendour (הוד), which are the seventh and eighth Sephiroth, and form the Divine legs of the Archetypal Man. Firmness, the seventh Sephira, which is the right leg, is called by the Divine name Jehovah Sabaoth (יהוה צבאות), and by the angelic name Tarshi- shim (תְּרִישִׁים, Dan. x. 6), whilst Splendour, the eighth Sefhira, which is the left leg, has the Divine name Elohim Sabaoth (אֱלֹהִים עֲבֹת), and the angelic name Benei Elohim (בְּנֵי אֱלֹהִים, Gen. vi. 4). From the latter emanated Foundation or Basis (יְסוּד), the ninth Sefhira, which is the genital organ in the Archetypal Man, and is represented by the Divine name El Chai (אֵל חַי, the God of Life), and by the angelic name Ishim (אִשִּׁים, Ps. civ. 7), and which is the uniting principle between Firmness and Splendour, the two opposites thus yielding the third triad in the Sefhiric decade. The ninth Sefhira sent forth Kingdom (מַלְכוּת), also called Shechinah (שְׁכִינָה), the tenth, which encircles all the others, and is represented by the Divine name Adonai (אֲדֹנָי), and by the angelic name Cherubim (כְּרוּבִים).

Now, in looking at the grouping of the Sefhiroth, it will be seen that the three triads respectively represent intellectual, moral, and energetic or stable qualities. Hence the first is called "the Intellectual World," the second "the Moral" or "Sensuous World," and the third

"the Material World." Looking at the Sefhiroth longitudinally, it will be seen that the three Sefhiroth on the right of the Archetypal Man are masculine, and represent the principle of vigour; the three on the left are feminine, and represent the principle of mercy; whilst the four uniting Sefhiroth, which occupy the centre, represent the principle of mildness. From this aspect, therefore, the right is called "the Pillar of Judgment," the left "the Pillar of Mercy," and the central is denominated "the Middle Pillar." From the important position which these uniting Sefhiroth of "the Middle Pillar" occupy, they are synecdochically used to represent the worlds which the respective opposite pairs yield by means of their uniting power. Thus the Crown, which unites Wisdom and Intelligence, and which, together with these two opposites, yields the first triad, called the Intellectual World, is, by itself, denominated the Intellectual World. Again, Beauty, the sixth Sefhira, which unites Love and Justice, yielding the second triad, or the Sensuous World, is, by itself, used to denote the Sensuous World, and in this capacity is called the Sacred King, or simply the King: whilst Kingdom, the tenth Sefhira, which unites the whole, is used to represent the Material World, and as such is denominated the Queen or the Matron (מַטְרוֹנִיתָא). Hence within the trinity of triads a higher trinity of units is obtained, consisting of the Crown, Beauty, and Kingdom, and representing the potencies of all the Sefhiroth.

It is of the greatest importance to observe that the Cabbalah enforces the following points with regard to the Sefhiroth. i. That they were not created, but emanated (נִצְטָל) from the En Soph, since creation implies a diminution of strength on the part of the Creator, which is not the case in emanation. ii. That they form among themselves, and with the En Soph, a strict unity, and simply represent different aspects of one and the same being; just as the different rays which proceed from the light, and which appear different things to the eye, form only different manifestations of one and the same light. iii. That since they simply differ from each other as the different colours of the same light, all the ten emanations alike partake of the perfections of the En Soph: and iv. That as emanations from the Infinite, the Sefhiroth are infinite and perfect like the En Soph, and yet constitute the first finite things. They are infinite and perfect when the En Soph imparts his fulness to them, and finite and imperfect when that fulness is withdrawn from them. In this respect, therefore, the Ten Sefhiroth correspond to the double nature of Christ—his finite and imperfect human nature, and his infinite and perfect divine nature.

3. The Cosmogony, or the Creation.—It was only by means of the Sefhiroth that creation became possible. Worlds indeed came into existence before the En Soph assumed this human form, but they were abortive, since they could not continue, because the conditions of transmitting life and procreation, which appeared with the sexual opposites of the Sefhiroth, were as yet absent. Or as the Sohar, the Bible of the Cabbalah, states it, "there were old worlds which perished as soon as they came into existence—they were formless, and were called sparks; just as the smith, when hammering iron, lets the sparks fly in all directions. These sparks are the primordial worlds, which could not continue, because the Sacred Aged [= God] had not as yet assumed his form [of opposite sexes, of the King and Queen], and the master was not as yet at his work" (Sohar, iii. 292 b). "The Holy One, blessed be he, created and destroyed several worlds before the present one was made; and when this last work was nigh completion, all things therein, all the creatures of the universe, in whatever age they were to exist, before ever they entered into the world, were present before God in their true form. . . . The lower world is made after the pattern of the upper world; everything which exists in the upper world is to be found, as it were, in a copy upon earth. Nevertheless the whole is one" (Sohar, ii. 20 a; iii. 61 b). This world, however, is not a creation ex nihilo, but is simply an immanent offspring, and the image of the King and Queen; it is a farther expansion or evolution of the Sephiroth, which are the emanations of the En Soph; and it reveals and makes visible the Boundless and the Concealed of the Concealed. And though it exhibits the Deity in less splendour than its Sephiric parents, because it is farther removed from the primordial source of light than the Sephiroth, still as it is God manifested, all the multifarious forms in the world point out the unity which they represent. Nothing therefore in the universe can be destroyed; everything must return to the source whence it emanated. The universe is composed of four different worlds, each of which has a separate Sephiric system, consisting of a decade of emanations. i. The World of Emanations (עולם האצילות), alternately called "the Image" and "the Heavenly Man," which by virtue of its being a direct emanation from God, and most intimately allied with the Deity, is perfect and immutable. ii. The World of Creation (עולם הבריאה), also called "the Throne" (כורסיא), which is the immediate emanation of the former, and whose ten Sephiroth, being farther removed from the En Soph, are of a more limited and circumscribed potency, though the substances they comprise are of the purest nature and without any admixture of matter. iii. The World of Formation (עולם היצירה), which proceeded from the former world, and whose ten Sephiroth, though of a still less refined substance, because still farther removed from the primordial source, are yet without matter. It is also called the World of Angels, because those intelligent and incorporeal beings reside therein, who are wrapped in a luminous garment, and who assume a sensuous form when they appear to men: and iv. The World of Action (עולם העשייה), also called the World of Matter (עולם הקליפות), which emanated from the preceding world, the ten Sephiroth of which are made up of the grosser elements of all the former three worlds, and which has sunk down in consequence of its materiality and heaviness. Its substances consist of matter limited by space, and perceptible to the senses in a multiplicity of forms. It is subject to constant changes, generation, and corruption, and is the abode of the Evil Spirit. These four worlds, which have thus successively emanated from the En Soph, and from each other, sustain the relationship to the Deity of first, second, third, and fourth generations.

4. The Creation of Angels and Men.—"God," says the Sohar, "animated every part of the firmament with a separate spirit, and forthwith all the heavenly hosts were before him" (iii. 68 a). These angelic beings consist of two classes, good and bad, have their respective princes, and occupy the three habitable worlds in the following order. The angel Metatron inhabits the second world, called the World of Creation. He alone constitutes the world of pure spirits, and is the garment of Shaddai (שדי), i.e. the visible manifestation of the Deity. His name is numerically equivalent to that of the Lord (Sohar, iii. 231 a). He governs the visible world, preserves the unity, harmony, and the revolutions of all the spheres, planets, and heavenly bodies, and is the Captain of the myriads of the angelic hosts who people the third world, or the World of Formation. The angelic hosts who occupy this world are divided into ten ranks, answering to the ten Sephiroth; and each of the multitudinous angels is set over a different part of the universe. One has the control of one sphere, another of another; one has the charge of the sun, another of the moon, another of the earth, another of the sea, another of the fire, another of the wind, another of the light, another of the seasons, and so on. These angels derive their names from the heavenly bodies, or the elements which they respectively guard (Sohar, i. 42 b). The demons, which constitute the second class of angels, inhabit the fourth world, or the World of Action. And though they are the grossest and most deficient of all forms, and are the shells (קליפות) of being, still they form ten degrees, answering to the ten Sephiroth. In their ranks darkness and impurity increase with the descent of each degree. The first two degrees are nothing more than the absence of all visible form and organisation, the third degree is the abode of darkness, whilst the remaining seven degrees, or "infernal halls" (שבע היכלות = Hells), are occupied by the demons, which are the incarnation of all human vices. These seven hells are subdivided into endless compartments, so as to afford a separate chamber of torture for every species of sin. The demons here are occupied in torturing those poor deluded beings who suffered themselves to be led astray by them in this world. The prince of this region of darkness is Samaël (סמאל = angel of poison or death). He is the evil spirit, the serpent who seduced Eve. He has a wife called the Harlot, or the Woman of Whoredom, who, together with him, are treated as one person, and are called "the Beast" (Sohar, ii. 255-259 with i. 35 b).

As to man, he was not created by the En Soph, or God, but "the heavenly Adam (i.e. the ten Sephiroth), who emanated from the highest primordial obscurity (i.e. the En Soph), created the earthly Adam" (Sohar, ii. 70 b). Man is both the import and the highest degree of creation, for which reason he was formed on the sixth day. As soon as man was created, everything was complete, including the upper and nether worlds, for everything is comprised in man. He unites in himself all forms" (Sohar, iii. 48 a). Originally man was created with faculties and features far transcending those of the angels; and even his body was not of that gross matter which constitutes our present bodies. He was wrapped in that luminous ethereal substance in which the celestial spirits are clad, and which is neither subject to want nor to sensual desires. It was only after the fall that the protoplasts obtained the garments of skin, which mean our present body, in order to adapt them to the changes which the fall introduced. Still even in their present form the righteous are above the angels. Every man is still the microcosm, and each member of his body corresponds to a constituent part of the visible universe. "The mystery of the earthly man is after the mystery of the Heavenly Man. Just as we see in the firmament above, covering all things, different signs, which are formed of the stars and planets, and which contain secret things and profound mysteries, studied by those who are wise and expert in these signs; so there is in the skin, which is the cover of the body of the son of man, and which is like the sky that covers all things, signs and features which are the stars and planets of the skin, indicating secret things and profound mysteries, whereby the wise are attracted, who understand to read the mysteries in the human face" (Sohar, ii. 76 a). Even now man is the presence of God upon earth; and the very human form depicts the Tetragrammaton, the ineffable Jehovah (יהוה). The head is the shape of the letter Yod (י), the arms and the shoulders are like the letter He (ה), the breast is in the form of the letter Vau (ו), whilst the two legs with the back resemble the form of the second He (ה). Comp. Sohar, ii. 72 a. All human countenances are divisible into the four primordial types of faces, which appeared at the mysterious chariot throne in the vision of the prophet Ezekiel, viz., the face of man, of the lion, of the ox, and of the eagle.

5. The Psychology.—The doctrine about the nature of the human soul is one of the most important features of the Cabbalah. All souls are pre-existent in the World of Emanations, and without exception are destined to inhabit human bodies, and pursue their course upon earth for a fixed number of years. "When the Holy One, blessed be he, wished to create the world, the universe was before him in idea. He then formed all the souls which are destined for the whole human race. All were minutely before him in the same form which they were to assume in the human body. He looked at every one of them and there were some among them which would corrupt their way upon the earth" (Sohar, i. 96 b). Being an emanation of the ten Sephiroth, and in the likeness of this Archetypal Man, the soul has ten potencies, which are divided into a trinity of triads. (i.) The Spirit (נשמה), which is the highest degree of being, and which both corresponds to and is operated upon by the Crown, representing the highest triad in the Sephiroth, called the Intellectual World. (ii.) The Soul (רוח), the seat of moral qualities, which both corresponds to and is operated upon by Beauty, representing the second triad in the Sephiroth, called the Moral World: and (iii.) The Cruder Spirit (נפש), which, immediately connected with the body, is the direct cause of its lower functions and the animal life, and which both corresponds to and is operated upon by Foundation, representing the third triad in the Sephiroth, called the Material World. "Each soul, prior to its entering into this world, consists of male and female, united into one being. When it descends on this earth the two parts separate and animate two different bodies. At the time of marriage the Holy One, blessed be he, who knows all souls and spirits, unites them again as they were before, and they again constitute one body and one soul, forming, as it were, the right and the left of one individual. . . . The union, however, is influenced by the deeds of the man, and by the ways in which he walks. If the man is pure, and his conduct is pleasing in the sight of God, he is united with that female part of his soul which was his component part prior to his birth" (Sohar, i. 91 b).

6. The Destiny of Man and the Universe.—It is an absolute condition of the soul, which underlies its very nature, to return to the Infinite Source from which it emanated, after developing on earth the perfections, the germs whereof are implanted in it. If the soul, after assuming a human body and its first sojourn on earth, fails to acquire that experience for which it descends from heaven and becomes contaminated by sin, it must reinhabit a body again and again till it is able to ascend in a purified state. This transmigration, however, is restricted to three times. If two souls, on their third residence in human bodies, are still too weak to acquire the necessary experience, they are united and sent into one body, in order that by their combined efforts they may be able to learn that which they were too feeble to effect separately. The world, too, being an expansion of the Deity's own substance, must ultimately share that blessedness which it enjoyed in its first evolution, and which is indicated in the letter B (ברכה, i. e. blessing, wherewith the history of the creation begins. Even Satan himself, the archangel of wickedness, "the Venomous Beast," Samael, will be restored to his angelic nature, inasmuch as he too, like all other beings, proceeded from the same Infinite Source of all things. He will then drop the first part of his name (סם), which signifies venom, and retain the second El (אל), which is the appellation of all the angels. This universal restoration will take place at the advent of Messiah. And though the soul of Messiah, like all other souls, has its pre-existence in the world of the Sephiroth, it cannot be born, and hence the Saviour cannot make his appearance till all human souls have passed through their period of probation on earth, since it is to be the last born at the end of days. Then the great Jubilee year will commence when the whole pleroma of souls (אוצר הנישמות), cleansed and purified, shall return to the bosom of the Infinite Source. Then hell shall disappear. There shall be no more punishment, nor temptation, nor sin. Life will be an everlasting feast; a Sabbath without end. Then all souls will be united with the Highest Soul, and supplement each other in the Holy of Holies of the Seven Hails (Sohar, i. 45, 168 a; ii. 97 a).

III. THE CABBALISTIC VIEW OF THE OLD TESTAMENT, AND ITS RELATION TO CHRISTIANITY.—The view which the Cabbalah takes of the Hebrew Scriptures, and the mode of interpretation to which it resorts in order to obtain these doctrines, are best exhibited in the words of the Sohar, which, as has already been remarked, is the Cabbalistic Bible. "Woe be to the son of man who says that the Torah (= Pentateuch) contains common sayings and ordinary narratives. If this were the case we might in the present day compose a code of doctrines from profane writings which would excite greater respect. If the Law contains ordinary matter, then there are nobler sentiments in profane codes. Let us go and make a selection from them and we shall be able to compile a far superior code. No. Every word of the Law has a sublime sense and a heavenly mystery. . . . As the spiritual angels had to put on earthly garments when they descended to this earth, and as they could neither have remained nor be understood on the earth without putting on such a garment, so it is with the Law. When it descended on earth the Law had to put on an earthly garment, to be understood by us, and the narratives are its garment. . . . Those who have understanding do not look at the garment but at the body beneath (i. e. the moral), whilst the wisest, the servants of the Heavenly King, those who dwell on Mount Sinai, look at nothing but the soul," i. e. the secret doctrine (Sohar, iii. 152 c). To obtain from the obvious and simple words of the Bible the mysteries of the Cabbalah, definite hermeneutical rules are employed, the most important of which are as follows:—(1) Every letter of a word is reduced to its numerical value, and the word is explained by another of the same quantity. This rule is called Gematria. (2) Every letter of a word is taken as the initial or abbreviation of a word. This is called Notaricon. (3) The initial and final letters of several words are respectively formed into separate words. (4) Two words occurring in the same verse are joined together and made into one word. (5) The words of those verses which are regarded as containing a peculiar recondite meaning are ranged in squares in such a manner as to be read either vertically or boustrophedonally, beginning at the right or left hand. (6) The words of several verses are placed over each other, and the letters which stand under each other are formed into new words. (7) The letters of words are changed by way of anagram and new words are obtained. The commutation is effected according to fixed rules. Thus the alphabet is bent exactly in the middle, and one half is put over the other, and by changing alternately the first letter, or the first two letters of the beginning of the second line, twenty-two commutations are produced. These anagrammatic alphabets obtain their respective names from the first two specimen pairs of letters which indicate the interchange. For instance, the first alphabet thus obtained is called Alboth (אלבּת) from the first words, the second Asgath (אסגת), and so on. Of course, with such exegetical canons, any system of theosophy, or anything else, may be obtained from the Bible.

That the Cabbalah favours, to a certain extent, the doctrine of the Trinity and the Atonement, is not only admitted by many Jewish literati who are adverse to the theosophy of the Cabbalah, but by some of its followers. We subjoin the most striking passages in the Sohar bearing on this subject. Discussing the import of the liturgical declaration about the Divine unity (Dent. vi. 43), where Jehovah occurs first, then Elohenu, and then again Jehovah, it says: "The voice though one consists of three elements, fire (i.e. warmth), air (i.e. breath), and water (i.e. humidity), yet all these are one in the mystery of the voice and can only be one. Thus also Jehovah, Elohenu, and Jehovah, constitute one—three forms which are one" (Sohar, ii. 43 b). "Come and see the mystery of the word (i.e. Jehovah). There are three degrees, and each degree exists by itself (i.e. in the Deity); although the three constitute one, they are closely united into one, and are inseparable from each other" (Sohar, iii. 65 a). Indeed one Codex of the Sohar had the following remark on the words, "Holy, holy, holy is the Lord of hosts" (Is. iv. 3): (וזה בן קדוש זה אב קדוש וזה רוח הקדוש), the first holy denotes the Holy Father, the second the Holy Son, and the third the Holy Ghost. Equally distinct is the teaching of the Atonement. "The Messiah invokes all the sufferings, pain, and afflictions of Israel to come upon him. Now if he did not remove them thus and take them upon himself, no man could endure the sufferings of Israel, due as punishment for their transgressing the law: as it is written (Is. liii. 4), 'surely he hath borne our griefs and carried our sorrows'" (Sohar, ii. 12). That these and similar statements favour the doctrines of the New Testament is moreover attested by the fact that a large number of Cabbalists, who occupied the highest position in the synagogue, both as pious Jews and literary men, have from time to time embraced the Christian faith. We need only specify Paul Ricci, physician to the emperor Maximilian I.; Julius Conrad Otto, author of the Unveiled Secrets (נלאת רזיא); John Stephen Rittangel, grandson of the celebrated Don Isaac Abravanel; and Jacob Frank, the great apostle of the Cabbalah in the 18th century, whose example in professing Christianity was followed by several thousands of his disciples. The testimony of these distinguished Cabbalists, which they give in their elaborate works, as to the affinity of some of the doctrines of this theosophy with those of Christianity, is fully corroborated by some of the most orthodox Jews.

7. The Canonical Codes of the Cabbalah.—The two works which the Cabbalists claim as the authoritative exposition of their doctrine, and which they indeed regarded as inspired records, are (1) the Book of Creation (ספר ציירה) and (2) the Sohar (זוהר). THE BOOK OF CREATION pretends to be a monologue of the patriarch Abraham, and assumes that the contemplations it contains are those which led the father of the Hebrew race to abandon the worship of the stars and to embrace the faith of the true God. The whole treatise consists of six Perakim (פרקים) or chapters, subdivided into thirty-three very brief Mishnas (מישנות) or sections. As the Hebrew alphabet has twenty-two letters, and as these letters are not only used phonetically but are employed as numerals, which are represented by the fundamental number ten, the patriarch Abraham thus obtains thirty-two mediums or ways of secret wisdom by which God created the universe, and shews from the gradual and systematic development of the creation, and from the harmony which prevails in all its multitudinous component parts, that one God produced it all, and that He is over all. The patriarch Abraham deduces this from the analogy which subsists between the visible things and the letters which are the signs of thought, or the means whereby wisdom is expressed and perpetuated among men. The doctrines thus propounded are delivered in the style of aphorisms or theorems, and are laid down very dogmatically as becomes the authority of the great patriarch Abraham.

The renowned Sohar, however, is, par excellence, the Bible of the Cabbalists. It is a commentary on the Pentateuch, according to its division into the fifty-two hebdomadal lessons. Originally its name seems to have been "Midrash" or "Let there be Light" (מדרש יה אור), deriving its title from the words in Gen. i. 4, with the exposition of which it begins. As its opening theme is light, it afterwards obtained the laconic name Sohar (זוהר), i.e. Light, Splendour, an expression of frequent occurrence in the first page. It is also called "Midrash of R. Simon b. Yochai," because this Rabbi is its reputed compiler. Interspersed throughout the Sohar, either as parts of the text with distinct titles, or in separate columns, are the following eleven dissertations. (1) Tosephta and Mathanithan (תוספתא ומתניתן), or Additions and Supplements which briefly discuss the topics of the Cabbalah, calling the attention of the initiated to some doctrine or explanation. (2) Hechaloth (היכלות) or the Mansions and Abodes, describing the structure of Paradise and Hell. (3) Sithre Thorah (סתר תורה), or the Mysteries of the Pentateuch, describing the evolution of the Sephiroth, primordial light, &c. (4) Midrash Ha-Nēclam (מדרש הנעלם), or the Hidden Midrash, which deduces from the narratives in the Pentateuch the esoteric doctrine by allegorical rules of interpretation. (5) Raya Mehemana (רעיא מהמנא), or the Faithful Shepherd, recording the discussions between Moses the faithful shepherd, the prophet Elijah, and R. Simon b. Yochai. (6) Razē Derazin (רזי דרזין), or the Secret of Secrets, discoursing on physiognomy and psychology. (7) Saba Demishpatim (סבא דמישפטים), or the Aged, i.e. the prophet Elijah, who discourses to R. Simon b. Yochai on metempsychosis, based on the pericope called Mishpatim, i.e. Exod. xxi. 1–xxiv. 18. (8) Siphra Detziutha (ספרא דציניעותא), or the Book of Secrets, discoursing on the cosmogony and demonology. (9) Idra Raba (אדרה רבא), or the Great Assembly, giving the discourses of

R. Simon b. Yochai to his numerous assembly of disciples, on the form of the Deity and on pneumatology. (10) Yanuka (יָנוּכָא), or Discourses by the young men of superhuman origin on the mysteries of ablutions: and (11) Ibra Suta (יְבְרָא סוּטָא), or the Small Assembly, giving the discourses of R. Simon b. Yochai on the Sephiroth to the small congregation of six surviving disciples.

8. Date and Origin.—To determine the rise and age of this esoteric doctrine, great care must be taken to distinguish between the essential features which constitute it a separate system within the precincts of Judaism, and those collateral ideas which were afloat among the Jews from time immemorial, and which the Cabbalists made contributory to the exposition of their theosophy. That everything is in the Deity, that worlds were created and destroyed prior to the present creation, that Metatron is at the head of the angelic hosts, that the serpent which seduced Eve is identical with Satan, that man is androgynous, that the righteous are greater than the angels, that all human souls are pre-existent, that the soul is subject to transmigration, that the Bible under the garment of the letter conceals deep mysteries, that these recondite thoughts are to be evolved by peculiar exegetical rules involving the transposition and commutation of the letters, that all this and many other topics propounded in the Sohar are to be found in the earliest extra-canonical Jewish writings, are facts well-known to those who are conversant with Rabbinical literature. These, however, are simply so much old material used up in the erection of the building, but do not constitute the edifice itself. The cardinal doctrines of the Cabbalah, which constitute its distinguishing features, are the speculations about the En Soph, the Sephiroth, the Archetypal Man, and the evolution of the creation. Now the Book of Creation, which the Cabbalists claim as their oldest document, being as they assert the production of the patriarch Abraham, has nothing whatever in common with these vital dogmas. Even its treatment of the ten digits, as part of the thirty-two ways of wisdom whereby God created the universe, which has undoubtedly suggested to the authors of the Cabbalah the idea of the ten Sephiroth, is quite different from the mode in which the Cabbalistic Sephiroth are depicted. When it is added that the language and whole complexion of this pseudograph, as well as the train of ideas therein enunciated, shew unmistakably that it is a production of the 9th century of the Christian era, we at once see that the doctrines of the Cabbalah could not have originated prior to this period. It is true that the Sohar, which is the sacred canon of the Cabbalists, pretends to be a revelation from God communicated through R. Simon b. Yochai, who flourished about A.D. 70–110, and that such distinguished Christian scholars as Lightfoot, Gill, Bartolucci, Pfeifer, Knorr von Rosenroth, Molitor, &c., have ascribed this date to it. The fact, however, that the Sohar praises most fulsomely R. Simon b. Yochai, its supposed author, exalting him above Moses, mystically explains the Hebrew vowel-points, which did not obtain till A.D. 570, borrowed two verses from the celebrated hymn called the Royal Diadem by Ibn Gebirol, who was born about A.D. 1021, mentions the crusaders, the taking of Jerusalem by the Crusaders and the retaking of it by the Saracens, speaks of the comet which appeared at Rome, July 15, 1264, under the pontificate of Urban IV., and by a slip assigns a reason why its contents were not revealed before A.M. 5060–66 = A.D. 1300–1306, shews beyond doubt that its author lived in the 13th century of the Christian era. This is fully confirmed by the fact that the doctrine of the En Soph, the Sephiroth, and the metempsychosian retribution, was not known before the 13th century, and that the very existence of the Sohar, according to the confession of staunch Cabbalists themselves, was not known before this period. For these and many other reasons the most distinguished critics now admit that Moses da Leon († 1305), who first published and sold the Sohar as the production of R. Simon b. Yochai, was himself its author, as was indeed confessed by his own wife and daughter.

CADAN. [CATAN.]

CADAR (CADOC), third archbishop of London in British times, in the list compiled by Jocelin of Furness in the 12th century. He also occurs at Caerleon. (Godwin, Praesul. 170; Usher, Brit. Ecc. Ant. Wks. v. 88; Le Neve, Fasti, ii. 273, ed. Hardy; Stubbs, Regist. Sac. 152.) [C. H.]

CADDA (1) (CEADDA, CHAD), grandfather of Caedwalla, king of the West Saxons (A. S. C. an. 685). The reading Ceadda in two MSS. (ed. Thorpe) is adopted by Ingram, who in his translation writes it Chad. [C. H.]

(2) a bishop whose name is attached to a spurious charter of A.D. 706 (Kemble, C. D. No. 58); possibly Hedda or Headda, bishop of Lichfield. [HEADDA.] [S.]

CADELL, king of Powys. [CATELL.]

CADELL, Welsh saint of the 7th century, patron of Llangadell, a church formerly in Glamorganshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 295; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 498.) [C. H.]

CADEOLDUS (EDALDUS), St., bishop of Vienne. Originally a monk, he became abbat of Grison and finally bishop of Vienne. He died in 696. The mode of spelling his name is doubtful (Acta SS. Boll. Jan. i. 975). [H. W. Y.]

He occurs in the Martyrologium of Usuard, with an alius Eoldus (see also the Obs. and Auct.). Commemorated Jan. 14. [C. H.]

CADFAN (1), a Celtic saint of the 6th century, of good birth in Armorica, who crossed over into Wales at the head of a large company, most of them of princely rank and his own relatives, exiled, it is conjectured, in consequence of the Frankish invasion, which had reached their peninsula. He is chiefly known as the first abbat of a monastery founded by him in conjunction with Einion Frenhin, in the Isle of Bardsey, off the promontory of Carnarvonshire (Rees, Essay on Welsh Saints, 213 sq.; E. Williams, Tolo Manuscripts, 499). An ancient Welsh inscription, almost the only one of the kind remaining, upon a rude pillar at Tywyn, in Merionethshire, where was one of the many churches of his foundation, is considered as probably referring to him; it is given by Haddan and Stubbs (i. 165) among the sepulchral Christian monuments of Celtic Britain. [C. H.]

CADFAN (2) (CADUANUS, CATUAN), king of Venedotia, Guenedotia, or Gwennyd, who is said in the Annales Eccles. Menevensis (Wharton, Angl. Sacr. II. xxxi.) to have reigned between the years A.D. 575 and 610, although a later date (616-630) has been given. By this authority, and by the Brut y Tywysogion, he is made the father of Cadwallader and grandfather of Cadwallader, whereas usually these two names are considered but varieties of one, Caedwalla. A Latin inscription on a tombstone at Llangadwaladr, or Eglwys Ael, in Anglesey, supposed to have been erected by Cadwallader to king Cadfan, is given by Haddan and Stubbs (i. 165) among the sepulchral Christian antiquities referred to in the preceding article. (See also Rees, Welsh Saints, 301.) [C. H.]

CADFARCH, Welsh saint about the middle of the 6th century, founder of the churches of Penegos in Montgomeryshire and Abererch in Carnarvonshire. Commemorated on Oct. 24. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 270; Acta SS. Oct. x. 763, 764.) [C. H.]

CADFRAWD, early Welsh saint. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 92, 100.) [C. H.]

CADGYFARCH, early Welsh saint. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 102.) [C. H.]

CADIOCENUS (THADIOCENUS, THADIACUS), a supposed archbishop of York who retired into Wales A.D. 586. (Stubbs, Regist. 153.) [C. H.]

CADO (CATAW), Welsh saint of the 6th century. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 232.) [C. H.]

CADOC (CADOCUS, DOCUS, CATHMAEL, CATTWG DDOETH, or CATTWG THE WISE), abbat of Llanarvan, was the son of Gundleus or Gwynllyw Filwr, by Gladusa or Gladys, daughter or grand-daughter of Braghan or Brechan, from whom Brecknock took its name. In the Welsh annals he occupies a period immediately succeeding that assigned to King Arthur. His life has made a deep impression upon the Celtic race, and his name, which was long popular in Wales, still remains so in Brittany. He was educated by an Irish anchorite, Meuthi, and, refusing to succeed his father in his principality, he went to Gwent or Caerwent, in Monmouthshire, where he studied under the Irish St. Tathai. He was cousin to St. David of Menevia, and nephew to St. Canoc of Gallen (Feb. 11): and with his friends St. David and St. Gildas he gave a mass to the second order of Irish saints. From Gwent he removed to Glamorgan, and founded the monastery of Llanarvan, near Cowbridge, of which he became first abbat. This house became a famous centre of sacred and secular learning, where the Holy Scriptures chiefly, but also the great authors of antiquity, were studied and transcribed. There he is said to have had St. Gildas the Wise teaching in his school, and St. Cainech of Aehadbo one of his pupils. He was the friend of Dubricius, and the means of the conversion of St. Illutus. It is impossible to fix the dates of his life, but he was probably born about the beginning of the 6th century. In order to fulfil the conditions of being master of St. Cainech, contemporary of St. David and St. Gildas, and helper of these two in giving a mass to the second order of Irish saints, who are usually said to have extended from about the year 542 to 599, this saint must have flourished in the early part of that period. Colgan and Lanigan assign 570 as the date of his death, by martyrdom according to the former and others, or in his own monastery at Llanarvan as says the latter. He was commemorated on Jan. 14. A list of the churches he is considered to have founded may be seen in Rees; and a large collection of his maxims and moral sayings, both in prose and verse, is preserved in vol. iii. of the Myvyrian Archaeology.

The Fables of Cattwg the Wise are printed in a volume entitled Tolo Manuscripts, edited by Edw. Williams in 1848 for the Welsh MSS. Society. It is observed by Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, i. 158 n.), that Cadoc's college at Llanarvan, with two others at Caerworgern and Docwinni [see ILLTYD and DOCWINUS], were the three great monastic establishments of the diocese of Llandaff. His Life in the Acta SS. of the Bollandists occurs Jan. ii. 602. The manuscript Lives are described by Hardy, Desc. Cat. I. 146-151.

Colgan (Tr. Thawn. 152, 185, n.³⁸) seeks to identify the Moehatocus left by St. Fiac at Inisfail as the Cadocus of Wales, but the dates do not harmonise; neither can ours be the Docus of the Annals of Ulster, who died A.D. 473. He has also been confused with St. Sophias of Beneventum. His Scotch dedication was at Cambuslang, co. Lanark. (See Colgan, Acta SS. 158-161, where he gives two lives; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 489 sq.; Ussher, De Brit. Eccl. Prim. ch. xiii.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scot. Saints, 292 sq.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, i. 344; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 415 sq.; O'Connor, *Rer. Hib. CAECILIA, ST., (1) a Roman lady, one of the four principal Virgins and Martyrs of the Western church, commemorated in the Latin and also in the Greek church on the 22nd November. Of her life and history, however, hardly any authentic account has come down to us.

The veneration paid to this saint can be traced back to a very early period. The martyrdom of St. Caecilia and of her three companions is referred to in nearly all the most ancient Latin breviaries and missals. It is mentioned in the Sacramentary of Pope Gregory; in the breviary and missal of the church of Milan ascribed to St. Ambrose; in the Mozarabic or Spanish liturgy, with proper prayers and prefaces; and a grand office for her feast will be found in the Gallican missal, which is believed to have been in use in Gaul from the 6th century down to the time of Charlemagne. Under the date of the 22nd November, her name appears in the Martyrology attributed to Jerome, in that of Bede, and in all the others. In these collections her martyrdom is placed at Rome.

Yet it is very difficult, says Tillemont, to find the true place of St. Caecilia in the chronology of the saints. The earliest writer who makes mention of her is Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers, at the end of the 6th century. According to his account she died in Sicily between the years A.D. 176-180, under the Emperor M. Aurelius or Commodus. The life of St. Caecilia that we owe to Symeon Metaphrastes, a Hagiographer of the 10th century, makes her contemporary with Urban, and places her martyrdom at Rome under Alexander Severus about the year A.D. 230. The Greek menologies relate that she suffered there in the time of Diocletian (284-305). On the other hand, the Roman calendar drawn up at Rome under Pope Liberius, about the middle of the 4th century (A.D. 352-366), contains no mention of her name. This, indeed, is not a complete list of martyrs, but a feriale, or list of the chief feasts (Rossi, i. 116). Her body must, however, have been removed thither from the place of her first sepulture not long after this period; for in the time of Pope Symmachus (A.D. 498) there was a church of St. Caecilia at Rome, in which he held a council.

The account of her life and martyrdom by Symeon Metaphrastes, to be found in Surius, is of no authority. The narrative is full of marvels and improbabilities, and the internal evidence alone is quite sufficient to prove its legendary character. This was long ago pointed out, among others by Tillemont. Some modern critics have, however, of late endeavoured to uphold the credibility of the work, and to refer its compilation in the form which has reached us to the commencement of the 5th century (cf. Ceillier, Hist. des Auteurs Sacrés, vol. ii. Paris, 1859).

There can be little doubt that these Acts of St. Caecilia were composed to be read in the church of the saint on the day of her feast. According to the legend, "she was born at Rome of a noble family. After she had heard the sweet voice of Christ and had believed in Him, she resolved, from love to her dear Lord, to devote herself evermore to Him by a vow of perpetual virginity. Her parents wished her to marry Valerian, a young Roman, who at that time was not a Christian. Caecilia so far complied with their wishes as to go through the marriage ceremonies; but when alone with her young husband, she told him of the vow that she had made, and Valerian allowed her to keep it. Yielding to her entreaties, he sought out the retreat of Urban, and received baptism at his hands. On returning to his spouse, wearing the white robe of a neophyte, he found her praying in her chamber, and an angel of God at her side. In answer to Valerian's prayer, the angel promised that his brother, Tiburtius, should become a Christian, and he foretold that both brothers should receive the crown of martyrdom.

"In the year A.D. 230, the Emperor Alexander Severus was absent from Rome, waging war against the Persians. Turcius Almachius, prefect of the city, took advantage of the emperor's absence to give free vent to his hatred of the Christians, and daily put many to death. Valerian and Tiburtius were soon brought before his tribunal. After having been scourged, the two brothers were commanded to offer incense to the gods. On their refusal they were condemned to be beheaded, and given in charge to Maximus. So moved was he by the exhortations of these two martyrs, that in the night he and all his family, together with the lictors, believed and were baptized. On the morrow his prisoners were beheaded at the place called Pagus Triopius on the Via Appia at the fourth mile from Rome. When the news reached the Praefect that Maximus also had become a Christian, he ordered him to be scourged to death with a scourge of leaden balls. Soon afterwards he sent his officers to Caecilia and bade her sacrifice to the gods. On her refusing to do so, he commanded her to be shut up in her bath, and that the furnace should be heated with wood seven times hotter than it was wont to be heated. But a heavenly dew falling upon the spouse of Christ refreshed and cooled her body, and preserved her from harm. A day and a night the Praefect waited for news of her death. Then he sent one of his soldiers to behead her; but though the sword smote her neck thrice, the executioner could not cut off her head, and he departed, leaving her on the floor of her bath bathed in blood. For three days longer she lived, never ceasing to exhort the people whom she loved to continue steadfast in the Lord, and watching over the distribution of her last alms. Having given her house to the church, she gave up her precious and beautiful spirit into the hands of the living God. Urban and his deacons buried her in the cemetery of Calixtus on the Via Appia near the third milestone. Her house he consecrated to God as a church for ever."

It is alleged that her body was found at Rome by Pope Paschal I., in the year A.D. 821, in the cemetery of Praetextatus, adjoining that of Calixtus on the Via Appia, and that it was removed by him to the church of St. Caecilia, he was then rebuilding, which stands, as is said, on the site of her house, at the extremity of the Trastevere. Here, it is said, her body was again discovered at the end of the 16th century in the time of Clement VIII. Baronius has given a long account of the circumstances connected with this pretended discovery, of which he was a witness (s. an. 821).

The legend of this saint has furnished the subject of several remarkable pictures. The oldest representation of her is a rude picture or drawing on the wall of the catacomb, called the cemetery of San Lorenzo, of the date probably of the 6th or 7th century. (See D'Agincourt, plate xi.) In this she appears with the martyr's crown on her head. In the 13th century Cimabue painted an altar-piece, representing different episodes in the life of the saint for the church dedicated to her at Florence. Here she again appears with the martyr's crown. In fact, before the 15th century, St. Caecilia is seldom seen depicted with her musical instruments. She has generally the martyr's palm and the crown of red or white roses. At what time she first came to be regarded as the patron saint of musicians is unknown. In the ancient documents that have come down to us, there is nothing to shew that she ever made use of instruments of music. The most celebrated of the modern representations of St. Caecilia as patroness of this art is the picture executed by Raphael in the earlier years of his residence at Rome (A.D. 1513), now in the gallery of Bologna. After this date, representations of her in this character are very common.

In 1584, in the time of Pope Pius V., an academy of music was founded at Rome, and placed under the tutelage of St. Caecilia. From that time forward she came to be more and more regarded as queen of harmony, and Dryden's well-known ode has rendered her familiar to Englishmen in this character.

For a more detailed account of St. Caecilia, reference may be made to the following works:—De Vitis Sanctorum, ed. Surius, Venice, 1581, tom. vi, page 161, s. d. Nov. 22; Acta Sanctorum, by the Bollandists, s. d. April 14, p. 204; Baronii Annales s. an. A.D. 821; Tillemont, vol. iii. pp. 259–689; S. Caeciliae Acta a Laderchio, Rome, 1722, 2 vols. 4to. incorporating the work of Bosio, with large additions; Sacred and Legendary Art, by Mrs. Jameson, 3rd edition, London, 1857, pp. 583–600; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs Sacrés, vol. ii. Paris, 1859; S. Cécile, par Dom. Guéranger, Paris, 1874. [T. D. C. M.]

Tillemont supposes her to have suffered in Sicily (ii. 348, iii. 260, 690). De Rossi (Roma Sott. ii. xxxii.–xliii. 113–161) believes the author of the Acts to have lived in the 4th or 5th century, and gives reasons for supposing Caecilia to have sprung from a Christian branch of the senatorial family of the Caecilii Maximi Fausti, and that the true date of her martyrdom is that found by Ado in old MSS., namely, under M. Aurelius or Commodus. [E. B. B.]

Caecilia is four times mentioned in Bede. She stands in his prose Martyrology and in his metrical one. In the hymn in praise of Etheldritha and virginity she receives a line, in society with Agnes, who is honoured with another—

"Laeta ridet gladios ferro robustior Agnes, Caecilia infestos laeta ridet gladios,"

(H. E. iv. 20). Again Bede writes, "in the church of the holy martyr Caecilia, and on her natal," the English Wilbrord was ordained by Pope Sergius, A.D. 696, archbishop for the Frisians (v. 11). The tradition which connected her name with music is easily accounted for. Pope Paschal, for the future protection of the relic which he had found, built on to Caecilia's church a monastery, to which he gave a handsome endowment to provide that the religious should guard the bodies of the saint and her companions, and chant the praises of God around her tomb day and night. (Baillet, Vies des Saints, ad diem. Nov. 22.) Such a service of song could not but kindle a legend-loving imagination, and the story grew that often, while the Saviour's praises arose in vocal music, Caecilia's own instrumental accompaniment was heard. In England, at the latter part of the 17th century, her day was found a convenient one for holding an annual festival that was set on foot for the encouragement of music. This celebration brought the lyric poet also into requisition, and odes for St. Caecilia's day were annually offered to the public. It need not be added how the genius of Dryden and Pope sent all the other essays into oblivion. [C. H.]

CAECILIA. (2) Martyr at Carthage with DATIVUS, in A.D. 304. [E. B. B.]

(3) The exact date of this saint, who is also called Clara, is not known, but she is supposed to have lived in the 7th century, and to have been abbess of Remiremont in Lotharingia for a period of thirty years. She is commemorated Aug. 12. (Acta SS. Boll. Aug. ii. 732.) [H. W. Y.]

CAECILIANUS (1). Jerome says that Cyprian was converted "suadente presbytero Caecilio, a quo et cognomen sortitus est," and this statement probably influenced most editors to substitute Cucilius for Caecilianus in the texts of the Life of Cyprian by his own deacon

Pontius. All the manuscripts which Hartel has used have Caecilianus, as Manutius also reads, and Ruinart (Acta Mart. Sinc.), though he has Caecilus, admits that the two (vetustissimi Hartel. Praef.) codices Fossatensis and Floriacensis had Caecilianus. There can be no doubt then that Caecilianus is correct, and Jerome's story falls to the ground as does also the suggestion (otherwise valueless though most adopted) of Don Maran, that he was the Caecilius Natalis of Minucius Felix. Baronius boldly conjectured that he was the tutor of Diadumenus, and again quotes Pontius to the effect that Cyprian in giving up the world commended his wife and children to Caecilius; whereas what Pontius says is that Caecilian dying commended his family to the piety of Cyprian. He was aetate as well as honore presbyter, and Cyprian [CYPRIANUS], as a deacon, probably lived with him, reverencing him greatly "as the father of his new life." All that Pontius farther tells is that he was justus et laudabilis memoriae. He appears afterwards as venerabilis sacerdos (Bolland. Acta Sanct. Jun. t. i. p. 264, § 3, Henschen), and was inserted as Sanctus Caecilus in the Roman Martyrology (June 3) by Gregory XIII. (Morcelli, Afr. Christiana, vol. ii. p. 76; and see Papebroch in Acta Sanct. l. c.) [E. W. B.]

CAECILIANUS (2). First archdeacon, then (A.D. 311) bishop, of Carthage. His name is of importance in connexion with the Donatist controversy. [DONATISM.] When archdeacon, Caecilian resolutely supported his bishop, Mensurius, in his opposition to the fanatical craving for martyrdom. The Christianity of Northern Africa exhibited an extravagance on this subject which reached its height after the Diocletian persecution. Men courted death at the hands of the Pagans, that after death they might be honoured as martyrs and confessors; some, without doubt, in a spirit which commands our respect, however much we may consider the enthusiasm mistaken; but others in a spirit which fostered the supposition that the martyr's cross would wash away for eternity the misery, the follies, the sins, and the crimes of a whole life. It was hopeless to attempt discrimination between these classes, and in either case the only sound policy seemed to be to suppress such extravagance; if possible, kindly, but where kindness failed, by stern and rigorous measures.

On the death of Mensurius, Caecilian was nominated as his successor. The part he had taken against the would-be martyrs was then remembered, and brought up against him. The religious world of Carthage was thrown into a ferment, and divided itself broadly into two sections, the moderate and the rigoristic parties, or the supporters and the opponents of the principles of Caecilian. At the head of the latter was a devout and wealthy lady named Lucilla, who had been severely rebuked by the archdeacon on account of her superstitious veneration for martyrs' relics. The rebuke was also a rebuke to the principles and practice of the rigoristic party; it was accepted as such, and when the vacancy in the see occurred, this party prepared to fill it with one of their own followers. Caecilian's party hastened matters to a conclusion; the election took place, and the archdeacon was consecrated by Felix, bishop of Aptunga: whether in the presence of any Numidian bishops or not seems uncertain.

Secundus, primate of Numidia and bishop of Tigisis, was presently invited to Carthage by the rigoristic party. He came, attended by seventy bishops, and cited Caecilian before them. Charges personal and ecclesiastical were made against the newly-consecrated bishop. Felix of Aptunga was denounced as a "traitor" (i. e. one who had delivered up the sacred writings in his possession), and consequently any ordination performed by him was to be rejected, according to the principles of the North-African church, as invalid. Caecilian himself was charged with unnecessary and heartless severity to those who had visited the confessors in prison; he was denounced as a "tyrannus" and a "carnifex." Caecilian declined to appear before an assembly so prejudiced; but he professed his willingness to satisfy them on all personal matters, and offered, if right was on their side, to lay down his episcopal office, and submit to re-ordination at their hands. Secundus and the Numidian bishops answered by excommunicating him and his party, and ordaining as bishop the reader Majorinus, a member of Lucilla's household. "As weeds are mown down," said one of Caecilian's opponents, "and cast away, so traitors and those who are schismatically ordained by traitors cannot remain in the church of God, except they acknowledge their error, and become reconciled with the church by the tears of repentance."

The church of North Africa now became a prey to schism. The party of Caecilian broke off relations from the party of Majorinus, and the Christian world was scandalised by fulminations, excommunications, invectives, charges, and countercharges. Both parties confidently anticipated the support of the state; but Constantine, who was now emperor of this part of the Roman world, took the side of the Caecilianists. In his largesse to the Christians of the province, and in his edicts favourable to the church therein established, he expressly stipulated that the party of Majorinus should be excluded: their views were in his opinion the "madness" of men of "unsound mind." This imputation was intolerable; the rigoristic party at once appealed to the justice of the emperor, and courted full inquiry. They asked only, as a special favour, that the inquiry might be conducted in Gaul—at a distance, that is, from the spot where passions and convictions were so strong and one-sided.

A council met A.D. 313 at Rome, in the Lateran. It was presided over by Melchades (Miltiades), bishop of Rome, who had as his assessors the bishops of Cologne, Arles, and seventeen others. Caecilian appeared with ten bishops; Donatus, bishop of Casae Nigrac, in Numidia, headed the party of Majorinus. The personal charges against Caecilian were examined and dismissed, and his party proclaimed the representatives of the orthodox Catholic church; Donatus himself was declared to have violated the laws of the church, and his followers were to be allowed to retain their dignity and office only on condition of re-union with Caecilian's party. The bitterness of this decision was modified by Caecilian's friendly proposal of compromise; but his advances were rejected, and the cry of injustice raised. It was wrong, the rigorists pleaded, that the opinion of twenty should overrule that of seventy; and they demanded first that imperial commissioners should investigate matters at Carthage itself, and that then a council should be summoned to examine their report, and base their decision upon its information. Constantine met their wish. Jurists went to Carthage, collected documents, tabulated the statements of witnesses, and laid their report before the bishops assembled (A.D. 314) at Arles. This council, presided over by Marinus, bishop of the see, and composed of about 200 persons, was the most important ecclesiastical assembly the Christian world had yet seen; and its decisions have been of permanent value to the church. As regarded Caecilian personally, the validity of his ordination was confirmed, the charge raised against his consecrator, Felix, being proved baseless; and as regarded the general questions debated—such as treasonship, its proof or disproof; ordination by traitors, when valid or not; baptism and re-baptism—canons of extreme importance were passed (see 'Arles, Synod of,' DICTIONARY OF CHRISTIAN ANTIQUITIES).

The temper displayed by the victors was not calculated to soothe the conquered; and an appeal was at once made from the council to the emperor himself. Constantine was irritated; but, after some delay, ordered the discussion of the question before himself personally. This occurred at Milan (A.D. 316). The emperor confirmed the previous decisions of Rome and Arles, and followed up his judgment by laws and edicts confiscating the goods of the party of Majorinus, depriving them of their churches, and threatening to punish their rebellion with death.

From this time the schism in the North-African church lost whatever purely personal questions, as between Caecilian and Majorinus, had been imported into it, and became a stern religious contest on questions of discipline (see DONATISM). Whether or not Majorinus was alive at the time of the council of Arles seems doubtful: some writers put his death in A.D. 313, others in A.D. 315; but he was succeeded by Donatus—called "the great," to distinguish him from Donatus of Casae Nigrae—who gave his name to the party; and with him compromise was impossible. Caecilian lived to about A.D. 345, probably occupied in practising towards his opponents and their fanatical offshoots, the Circumcellions, Agonistici, etc., the toleration which the letters of his imperial master inculcated, and which his own Christian feeling dictated. (For authorities, etc., see DONATISTS.) [J. M. F.]

(5) Martyr at Carthage with DATIVUS in 304.

CAECILIANUS (6) Prefect of the praetorians A.D. 359 (Cod. Theod. vi. tit. 23, law 47), not to be confounded with the following:—

(7) Vicarius under Honorius A.D. 404, in the 4th law in the code of Justinian on assessors. Prefect of the Praetorians at Rome A.D. 409 (Cod. Theod. i. ii. 8, ix. 2, 5, etc.). Zosimus (v. 44) tells us that he was one of the legates sent by the senate to Honorius at Ravenna to deplore the miserable state of things in Rome, where Alaric did not fulfil his engagements, in A.D. 409. The embassy was fruitless, but Caecilianus was appointed to succeed Theodorus in the chief office of the prefects. Niebuhr thinks this means in the praetorian prefecture.

Symmachus writes to Ambrose (Sym. Ep. iii. 36) begging him not to admit to his episcopal court or favour a suit of one Pirata against this Caecilianus, who was then praefectus annonae. He writes to Caecilianus himself (ix. Ep. 49 or 50), and addresses him as a friend and as a judge whose decision was final.

Augustine writes to him, Ep. 86 (60), begging him to extend to Hippo the measures that he was enforcing against the Donatists in other parts of Africa. Godofredus says that it is by mistake that Augustine here calls him "praeses." Tillemont thinks that the letter was written in A.D. 405, and that he was then vicarius of Africa (xiii. 428). Perhaps his office as praefectus annonae gave him power in the great corn-bearing province. There was indeed a "Praefectus annonae Carthagini," v. Godofred. ad Cod. Theod. xi. 1, 13 (vol. iv. p. 22), Walter, Geschichte des Römischen Rechts, p. 374. But this office seems to have been subordinate to the vicarius.

We find Caecilianus in A.D. 414 commissioned with Flavianus, the ex-prefect of the city, the son of his old friend Symmachus, to go to Africa and inquire into the complaints of the provincials there, and also into the corn-tax for the support of the soldiers quartered in Africa.

But he had been at Carthage in A.D. 413, as appears from the other epistle which Augustine wrote to him, as Tillemont supposes (xiii. 1005), when he reached Africa on this mission. Aug. Ep. 151 (259). Tillemont thinks that this letter refers to the death of Marcellinus, who had been put to death on the charge of being involved in the revolt of Heraclianus, but really, as the Catholics believed, because he had made himself obnoxious to the Donatists. Augustine mentions no names, but the execution of Marcellinus and his brother, by order of Marinus, the count who was sent to suppress the revolt, seems to be meant. (Tillem. xiii. 612 ff.) Now the revolt of Heraclianus took place in A.D. 413, in the spring, and Marinus was in Africa to execute justice on his accomplices in the autumn of that year. Orosius tells us that Marcellinus was put to death by Marinus. Caecilianus had once received a somewhat sharp answer from Marcellinus, and a very grave injury from his brother. The persecutor on the other hand was an old friend of his, and he was with him when the order was given for their arrest, and frequently closeted with him during the course of the trial. It was a reign of terror, and false witnesses were to be had in plenty, and one false witness was enough to condemn a man. It was hinted that something might be effected by episcopal intercession, and a bishop was despatched to court (ad comitatum) on the understanding that nothing further should be done till he returned. Meanwhile Caecilianus came to Augustine and told him he hoped that he should obtain the release of the men as a parting favour, as he was to leave Carthage next day, and that he had told Marinus, "All your private interviews with me will be a burden, not an honour, to me otherwise, as no one will doubt that their death has been arranged between us." He stretched out his hand to the altar and swore that such had been his words. And the day after his departure, which was St. Cyprian's eve, Sept. 13, the men were executed.

The next communication that passed between Caecilianus and Augustine was, that Caecilianus brought letters from Pope Innocent, which he forwarded to Augustine without enclosing with them a line of his own. So the saint did not venture to trouble the statesman with a letter till he had real occasion to recommend a friend to him. Caecilianus did all he was asked, and wrote complaining of Augustine's silence, and fearing that in the letter he had last written he had hinted at grave suspicions. Augustine writes back to return thanks for the favour, to explain his previous silence, to testify his own unshaken belief in his friend, to point out to him how suspicious his conduct must have appeared to the world, and to beg him, for love and not for hatred, to break off from all association with the judicial murderer, if he has continued to associate with him. He also tells him that a man of his age and probity should not be content to remain a catechumen, "as though the faithful could not, the more faithful they were, so much the more faithfully administer the commonwealth." What reason can he have for his laborious life unless it be philanthropy? He professes his own intention of giving all the leisure Hippo leaves him to the service of posterity. [E. B. B.]

CAECILIUS. [CAPELLA.]

(2) CAECILIUS NATALIS, the pagan in the dialogue of Octavius, by Minucius FELIX, is supposed by Tillemont to be no imaginary personage, but a real convert (H. E. iii. 164-6). Tillemont discusses his identity with CAELIANUS, and with the married presbyter who converted Cyprian (Till. iv. 46, 47, 50; Hier. V. Illus. c. 67; Pontius, p. 3; A.A. SS. June, i. 270).

(3) Presbyter; friend of Cyprian. See CAECILIANUS (1).

(4) One of the seven bishops said to have been ordained by the apostles at Rome and sent into Spain; namely, Torquatus of Cadiz, Ctesipho of a see near Almeria, Secundus of Avila in Castille, Indaletius of Arbucesa (Arce), Caecilius of Elvira, Eusebius of Cazorla (Carcesi), Euphrasius of Andujar (Illiturgi). The seven are celebrated together in a Choriambic hymn, full of false quantities, in the Mozarabic Liturgy on May 15 (A.A. SS. May, iii. 441).

It is observable that Caecilius, whether (3) or (4), is commemorated in the Calendar of Carthage May 14. In the Spanish Gothic Calendar (Migne, lxxxv. 1051) we have only mention of "TORCHRIST. BIOGR.

quatus and his companions, confessors," on the 1st of May. Each, however, has now his separate festival, Caecilius on February 1, Ctesipho April 1 (see A.A. SS. Feb. i. 4-19).

We hear nothing of any of them till the 9th century: then legends began to spring up thick and fast. They were all supposed to have accompanied James from Jerusalem, and after his return and martyrdom to have carried back his relics into Spain. James carries with him some of all the seven orders, except deacons and subdeacons. Caecilius is a reader. Numerous writings are ascribed to him.

CAECILIUS (5) The martyrdom of a Caecilius on the further side of the Tiber is assigned to Nov. 17 in the Mart. Hieron.

(6) Bishop of Biltha (Bilta, Vilta), in proconsular province of Africa, a member of the Committee de Virginibus subintroductis (Ep. 4), A.D. 249; sat in each of the synods, de Pace maturius danda (Ep. 57), de Basilide et Martiali (Ep. 67), de Baptismo Haereticorum I. (Ep. 70), and as senior bishop spoke first with aged violence in the synod de Baptismo III. (Sentt. Epp. 1). He is not impossibly (Routh, Rel. S. vol. iii. p. 190) also the same bishop who is addressed by Cyprian on the subject of the mixed chalice (Ep. 63).

[E. W. B.]

CAEDMON (CEDMON), an English poet and singer living in the seventh century. Everything known about his personal history is recorded by Bede. (Hist. Eccl. iv. 24.) Caedmon seems to have been a lay brother of the monastery of Streaneshalch or Whitby, whilst Hilda was abbess. He had reached a somewhat advanced age, ignorant altogether of song; to such an extent, indeed, that, when on festive occasions it was usual to sing in turn in the common hall, the sight of the harp coming round, which was to give the singer his note, was enough to send Caedmon from the room. One evening he had retired for this cause to the stables, of which he had the charge that night, and in his sleep a man seemed to stand by him and bade him sing something. Caedmon replied that he could not do so. "Nay, but thou hast something to sing to me," was the answer. "What must I sing?" said Caedmon. "Sing of the creation." The new poet burst into unexpected song on the theme, and when he awoke the words were in his memory, and he was able to exercise his new power of versification. In the morning he told everything to the bailiff, his master. He was taken to the abbess, narrating his dream and reciting his verses. All thought that he had received a gift from God. They explained to him next some portion of the Bible, and desired him to put it into metre. In the morning the lines were ready. Hilda, after this, made Caedmon enter the monastery as a monk, and took care that he was made acquainted with the Scriptures. Everything that he heard he versified with sweetness and power, whilst his life was a pattern of devotion and obedience. Sir Francis Palgrave points out the curious fact (Archaeologia, xxiv. 341) that a similar story is told of a peasant poet in France, and considers that Bede's legend is only an attempted localisation of a floating tradition not peculiar to England. Judging, however, from the dates, it seems probable that the French story was derived from Bede.

Bede describes Caedmon's decease in his happiest manner. Fourteen days before he died, Caedmon was seriously unwell, but was able to speak and walk. He was not far from the chamber or house into which, according to monastic usage, the sick and dying were carried. On the evening before his death he bade his attendant to make up a bed for him there. The request was wonderingly obeyed. They entered the place, and after some pleasant converse with the inmates, as midnight drew on, Caedmon asked if they had the Eucharist within. When in astonishment they doubted his need of it, he repeated his question and wish. The Eucharist was brought and received, the sick man obtaining from his audience the forgiveness which he gave to them himself. He then asked them how long it would be before Nocturns began, and learning that the time was near, he expressed his joy, and his resolve to wait for that service. He crossed himself, and falling asleep passed away shortly afterwards in his slumber.

Caedmon is supposed to have died about A.D. 680, and was buried at Whitby. William of Malmesbury records the discovery of the poet's remains in his own day (Gesta Pontiff. p. 254, ed. Hamilton). They were considered to have the power of working miracles.

We are indebted to Bede for a general description of Caedmon's poems. He put into verse, among many other things, the books of Genesis and Exodus. In the New Testament he sang the chief incidents in our Lord's life, the descent of the Holy Spirit, the teaching of the Apostles. On the terrors of the coming judgment, the pains of hell, and the blessedness of heaven, he wrote numerous poems, and many on the goodness and visitations of Providence. Bede gives us a translated fragment of the poem that the new-made poet sang to the mysterious visitant who first awoke his inspiration. King Alfred, in his version of Bede, gives the words in the vernacular, and as these are found in the margin of a MS. of the Historia Ecclesiastica, which is believed to be contemporaneous with the author (MS. Bibl. Publ. Cant. Kk. 5. 16. See Hardy's Cat. i. pt. i. 433-4), it is probable that the king is quoting Caedmon's own words. If this be so, these few lines are of great value as a test of identity. In the 17th century Archbishop Usher presented to Francis Junius a MS. of old English poetry, which answers in some respects to the description which Bede gives of Caedmon's verse. This MS. (Bodl. Junius, xi.) came to the Bodleian Library in 1678 with the rest of Junius's Anglo-Saxon MSS. (Macray, Annals of Bodl. Libr. 102). The work, which seems to have been written at the close of the 11th century (Archaeologia, xxiv. 329), is divided into two books, the first of which contains a metrical version of portions of the Old Testament, especially of the Genesis and the history of Daniel. The second is fragmentary, and relates to New Testament subjects, especially to our Lord's descent into hell.

Junius ascribed the MS. to Caedmon, and printed it at Amsterdam, in 1655, under his name. He was induced to do so by its general similarity in subject and style to what Bede says and gives of Caedmon's work. This is really all that can be said in favour of Junius's view. George Hickes considered the MS., from internal evidence, to be the composition of some imitator of Caedmon in the 11th century (for he was the father of a school of poetry), and asserted that it was written in the Dano-Saxon dialect (Thesaurus, pp. 133-4; Bishop Nicholson's Correspondence, i. 119-21). Wanley follows Hickes (apud Hickes, 77). The view of these two scholars as to the dialect of the poem cannot be maintained, but it is quite possible that they are right in their general estimate of the age and authorship of the poem. The test-verses, it must be observed, are not to be found in it, although there are some which resemble them greatly. Speaking on the question of authorship, Professor Conybeare observes, "the question must be considered as undecided and, unless some perfect copy should be discovered (an event not to be hoped for), incapable perhaps of decision" (Anglo-Saxon Poetry, 185). Sir F. Palgrave considered Caedmon himself to be as mythical as the story of his conversion (Archaeologia, xxiv. 342). Notwithstanding its doubtful authenticity, the work ascribed to Caedmon is a noble poem, and a worthy commencement of English literature.

The first printed edition of the poems ascribed to Caedmon is that of Junius. "Caedmonis monachi paraphrasis poetica Genesis ac praecipuarum Sacrae Paginae Historiarum, abhinc annos mlxx. Anglo-Saxonice conscripta, et nunc primum edita a Francisco Junio, F. F. 4to, Amstelodami, 1655." This was reprinted in 8vo, in 1832, with many corrections, but with other mistakes and deviations from the MS., by Mr. Benjamin Thorpe for the Society of Antiquaries of London. 'Caedmon's Metrical Paraphrase of parts of the Holy Scriptures in Anglo-Saxon, with an English translation,' etc. An earlier and better translation by Edward Lye, the lexicographer, exists in MS. in the possession of the Society of Antiquaries of London. There is an account of the Bodleian MS. with woodcuts of its numerous illustrations, in the Archaeologia, xxiv. 329 et seqq. Professor Conybeare gives an abstract of the work with specimens (Illustrations of Anglo-Saxon Poetry, 8vo, 1826, pp. 183-7). See also Wright's Biogr. Brit. Literaria, i. 193-200; Dr. Guest's History of English Rhythms, ii. 23-50, where there is the best account of Caedmon's rhythms; Morley's First Sketches of English Literature, 16-21; and a small volume of popular lectures on Caedmon, by Robert Watson of Newcastle-on-Tyne, published in 1875. [J. R.]

Caedmon occupies a marked place in Anglo-Saxon poetry, not to speak of the part he must have filled in the struggling cause of Christianity. He was distinct from the established minstrel on the one hand and from the novel Anglo-Latin versifier on the other. In Caedmon a man had arisen to start new and nobler topics for the minstrel, with a genius that could perpetuate the attempt through a school of successors, and so the pagan self-glorifying lyrics current in his day found their rival in his cheerful didactic verse. Like the minstrels hitherto, Caedmon's verse ran in the vernacular. The Anglo-Latins had not yet risen, for the great patrons of classical culture, Theodore and Adrian, had not yet produced their Aldhelm and Alcuin; while these, when they did appear, composed for the schools, and not for the people. That an acceptable minstrel should have been produced in a monastery rather than have been trained in the festive hall, was something for a monastery to chronicle. That biblical lore should now, through the channel of native minstrelsy, be able to spread among serfs, shepherds, and traders, was a great thing in aid of Christianity; and the more so when we remember that the new religion had been introduced by the upper ranks, and had still to win the lower. That this should have occurred so very soon after the first disturbance of the reign of paganism, was certainly remarkable; and the advent of Caedmon must have been hailed by the Christian teachers much as if a native Milton were in our days to arise in some Hindoo or Chinese mission to propagate the truth among his countrymen whom the preacher could not reach. It is no wonder that a legend like that in Bede, attributing a preternatural visitation, should have become fixed in Christian tradition.*

Caedmon was commemorated on Feb. 11, at which day the Bollandists have given his Vita, apparently taken wholly from Bede. (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 552.) [C. H.]

CAEDUAL (Bede, H. E. v. 7, edd. Smith, M. H. B., Stevenson, Moberly); CAEDUALD (Ibid. v. 24); CAEDUALLA (Ibid. iv. 12, 15; v. 7, 8), king of the West Saxons. [CAEDWALLA (2).] [C. H.]

CAEDUALLA (Bede, H. E. ii. 20, edd. Smith, M. H. B., Stevenson, Moberly), king of the Britons. [CAEDWALLA (1).] [C. H.]

CAEDWALLA (1), a British king, who with Penda, king of Mercia, rebelled against Edwin, king of Northumbria, and slew him in a great battle at Haethfelth (Hatfield chase?) on the 12th of October, 633. In consequence of this defeat archbishop Paulinus retired into Kent, taking with him Ethelburga, Edwin's widow. Caedwalla was a professor of Christianity, and his triumph resulted, not in the extinction of religion, but in the temporary re-establishment of his own British church. Soon after this he surprised and killed Osric and Eanfrid, two of Edwin's kinsmen, and then reigned for about a year over Bernicia and Deira, a terror and a bane to his subjects. In 634 the intruding monarch and his troops were utterly vanquished by Oswald, Edwin's nephew, at Hefenfelth. This place may be identified with an elevated plateau of ground, a few miles to the north of Hexham, in the corner of which there is a little chapel dedicated to St. Oswald (Memorials of Hexham, ed. Surtees Soc., i. Pref. xi.—xiii.). Caedwalla during the fight was slain at Denisesburna, a rivulet on the southern bank of the Tyne, which bore that name in the 13th century. (Ibid. Appendix, i. ii.) Bede, to whom we are indebted for what we know of Caedwalla, gives a graphic account of the scene and incidents of his last battle (Hist. Ecol. ii. 20; iii. 1). Nennius calls Caedwalla "Catgublaun," and the scene of his last fight Catscaul (M. H. B. 76). [J. R.]

Caedwalla or Cadwallader claims attention in ancient British history. In him terminated the last series of 'kings of Britain,' who with diminishing lustre were reckoned to have held supreme sway over the native race from the most ancient times, and to have handed on the sceptre of Arthur. He thus forms the goal of some historians and the starting-point of others, as the titles themselves often shew (see Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 350, 352, 360). Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain concludes with Cadwallader's imaginary abdication: for later Welsh writers fondly suppose that it was he who died at Rome, and there reconciled the British church to the great body of Western Christendom, and thus they avoid chronicling his defeat. The work of Diceto, carefully numbering the kings of the British succession, makes him the 88th (the number however being suppressed, no doubt through the genealogical difficulty) and the last. The Brut y Tyngysogion, or Chronicle of the Princes of Wales, opening with Cadwallader's death at Rome, remarks, "thenceforth the Britons lost the crown of the kingdom and the Saxons gained it." Of Ivor, who came next, it is carefully noticed that he "reigned not as a king, but as a chief or prince."

Though holding the supreme authority, Caedwalla is represented with a special and more limited territorial title. He was king of Gwenedota, Guenedotia, or Venedotia, more commonly written Gwynedd, though from Bede and other English writers we can get nothing less vague than "king of the Britons." He thus seems to have corresponded among his own people to the Bretwalda of the heptarchy. Materials are more copious than precise, as Lappenberg (Lapp. i. 122) remarks, for forming definite geographical boundaries. The Gwynedd of Spruner's atlas and of Mr. E. A. Freeman's map (Old Engl. Hist. 1869, p. 38) place it in the north of Wales, reaching from the Dee to Holyhead. Lappenberg describes it (Anglo-Sax. Hist. i. 120, 121) as occupying the greater part of north Wales, having the royal residence at Aberfraw, now a village, on the south-west face of Anglesey, where the Fraw flows into the sea. South of this and east of Snowdon was Powys, the princes of which resided at Mathraval in north Montgomeryshire, in the upper part of the vale of Meifod, near the junction of the two streams that form the river Eryrwy. Powys extended somewhat eastward of Gwynedd, and territory on the right bank of the lower Dee was reckoned to it [DINOTHUS]. Others give a much more extensive boundary to the kingdom of Caedwalla. In the Journal of the Archaeological Association (vol. xi. p. 54), Mr. G. V. Irving remarks, "Gwenedota is admitted on all hands to have occupied Westmoreland and north Lancashire, to which I would add Cumberland." Camden also calls Caedwalla "king of Cumberland as it seems" (Camd. Britan. ed. Gough, iii. 234). The discrepancy is not irreconcilable. If those northern districts were not in Gwynedd, they were, as we may safely assume, in the dominions of the king of Gwynedd, or at all events of Caedwalla. Gwynedd was in constant warfare with Northumbria as well as with Mercia (Lapp. i. 122). If the rule of Caedwalla was not confined to the north-west of Wales, it is easier to account for him so far from home as Hatfield Chase eastward of Doncaster, and very easy to account for a battle at Denises-burna by Hexham. He does not on this occasion appear as an invader, but it is Oswald who marches against Caedwalla, and the march is evidently not a lengthened one before the foe is met. Camden understands this battle to have been fought on the site of Heofenfelth, which he identifies with Haledon, though here he does not seem to keep Bede in sight so much as a poetical Life of Oswald, several lines of which he quotes. But Camden's editors (as Gibsons's Camden, ii. 207, and Gough's Camden, iii. 249) criticise the passage, saying that Oswald's cross was erected on Heofenfelth while the battle was fought at another place in the neighbourhood, Denises-burna, perhaps Dilston. According to this view we may imagine that Oswald in the course of his march, finding himself on some commanding ground, took the name for an omen (for heofen is both high and heaven), and erected his cross for a pledge of victory. Two other geographical names in connexion with Caedwalla may here be noticed. The Annales Cambriae make him in A.D. 629 besieged "in insula Glannauc," which is identified with Priestholm near Anglesey (M. H. B. 832), and there he is in Gwynedd proper, not far from the royal residence. His last campaign is called by the same authority (ad an. 635) "bellum Cantscaul," which in Nennius is Catisgual, for which the editors of the Monumenta suggest "pugna infra murum" (M. H. B. 76), in allusion to the Roman Wall running through that district.

* The part of Paradise Lost which most closely corresponds to Caedmon's poem was not included in Milton's original conception, and does not seem to have been added till after his friend Junius had shewn him his version of Caedmon. (Masson, Milton's Poems, i. 46, iii. 117; Morley, English Writers, 302-318.) [E. B. B.]

The ferocity of Caedwalla is described by Bede (H. E. ii. 20) in his most trenchant style; his alliance with the Mercian pagan is dwelt upon, and his own barbarity worse than any pagan's. What made it so terrible to Bede, himself an Angle and a Northumbrian, was that disaster to the infant Northumbrian Christianity which ensued from the battle of Haethfelth. Seven years had passed since the arrival of Paulinus in the north; Edwin and the national chiefs had been but six years in submission to Christ, when this sudden collapse overtook the most important and promising mission that had issued from Kent. Then followed the re-establishment of Christianity on the Hiberno-Scottish model, and the long controversy with the Roman communion. We may read a world of meaning in that expression of an historian trained under the most thorough Roman sympathies, as he opened his account of the calamity inflicted by Caedwalla with "Quo tempore maxima est facta strages in Ecclesia vel Gente Nordanhymbrorum." But are we obliged from this to picture Caedwalla as simply instigated by a rival church interest? The ecclesiastical aspect of the event no doubt touched the heart of the monk of Jarrow. But the Gens Nordanhymbrorum under Edwin's reign might well tempt a man like Caedwalla to arms and to a pagan alliance. The great Bretwalda, in the mightiest of all the invading nations that were fast driving the old race towards the western sea, had reduced under his dominion all the kings, as well of the Angles as of the Welsh (Wend. F. H. ed. Coxe, i. 116); so that "genti Anglorum simul et Brittonum gloriosissimè preesset" (Bed. H. E. ii. 20). His arms were feared, his power was supplicated not only by the nations of Britain, the Angles, the Scots, the Picts, but the islands of Oreades and Anglsey also (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 69); at which last name we get sight of our British king, and find the Cambrian annalist's entry (ad an. 629) accounted for, "obsessio regis Catguollan in insula Glannauc." The king, who represented the ancient glories of his race, and was fondly looked up to by the brave occupants of all the mountains of Britain, saw that a contest for final supremacy must come now or never. Hence the revolt, as Bede expressly calls it ('rebellavit,' ii. 20) against Edwin. It was a blow for independence in the north, as the earlier Arthurian struggles had been in the south; and we are not surprised at the impressive language that found its way into future annals when, after his brief triumph, Caedwalla was finally overthrown by Oswald and it was chronicled how the Britons lost the crown of the kingdom and the Saxons gained it.

The varieties of this king's name are as follows:—CADWALADER, CADWALLA, CADWALLO, CAEDUALLA, CAEDWAL, CASWALLON, CATGUBLAUN, CATGUOLLAAN, CATGUOLAUM, CATGUOLLAUN, CATHILON, CEADUALLA, CEADWALA, CEADWALE, CEADWALLA, CEASWALA, CEDWALA, CEDWALLA, CHON. [C. H.]

CAEDWALLA (2), king of the West Saxons 685–688. He was the son of Kinebert, a great-grandson of Ceaulin, born about 659, and rose to power during the ten years of division which followed the death of Coinwalch. During part of this time he was in exile, and employed himself in ravaging Sussex at the head of his followers. Ethelwalch, the king, fell a victim to him, but he was subsequently expelled by the ealdormen Berthun and Andhun. His action in Sussex brought him in contact with Wilfrid, who, according to Eddius, acted for some time as his chief adviser. This must have been about 685, in which year, according to the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, Caedwalla began to strive for the kingdom; Wilfrid may not have been disinclined to help him against Centwine and his queen, who had shewn him so little hospitality; or there may have been a string of Northumbrian intrigue running through the anarchy of Wessex at the time. On Centwine's resignation or death, in 685, Caedwalla obtained possession of the whole of Wessex, and signalized his reign by cruel invasions of the Isle of Wight, Sussex, and Kent, where, in 687, his brother Mul was burned. In remorse for his savage conduct he resigned his kingdom in 688, went to Rome, and was there baptized by pope Sergius, under the name of Peter. He died shortly after, on the 20th of April, 689, and was buried in St. Peter's. Bede gives his epitaph (H. E. v. 7). Spurious charters of Caedwalla to Malmesbury are printed in Kemble (C. D. Nos. 24, 29). The glories of his reign are described in the poem 'Ad Templum Bugge' (Alc. opp. ii. 519). On his relations with the Britons, and the confusion between Caedwalla and Cadwallader, see Lappenberg, Hist. Enyl. ed. Thorpe, i. 258, 259, 261. [S.]

Caedwalla's baptism and death furnish some illustrations of ancient Christian customs. Bede says that it was "die sancto sabbati paschalis," or holy Saturday before Easter, that he was baptized. In A.D. 689 this Saturday was April 10. On the Easter season for baptizing, see DICTIONARY OF CHRIST. ANTIQ., art. 'Baptism,' p. 165. For the Saturday, Stevenson (ad Bed. H. E. v. 7, § 372) refers to two treatises by J. J. Homborg, de Paschate Vett. Christ. § 9, Helmst. 1683, and de Quadragesima Vett. Christ. § 67, Helmst. 1677. Caedwalla died, as Bede states, "in albis adhuc positus;" according to A. S. C. (ad an. 688) in the course of seven nights after his baptism, in his crism-cloths; and to Henry of Huntingdon, "infra septem dies in albis" (M. H. B. 723). These garments (for the nature of which see DICTIONARY OF CHRIST. ANTIQ. as before, p. 163) were worn until the first Sunday after Easter (cf. Duncange, s.v. Dominica). We gather therefore that the West Saxon king died not later than April 17. Bede's text says April 20, but the inscription which he quotes shews that he was buried, "depositus," on that day. The inscription makes Caedwalla to have lived "annos plus minus triginta," and accordingly Bede describes him as "juvenis strenuissimus" when he first betook himself to Sussex. Lappenberg (Hist. Eng. i. 286, tr. Thorpe) gives him a wife Cenethryth, but without any reference; Florence's genealogy (M. H. B. 633, 641) is silent as to her; there is no mention of children. He was succeeded on the throne by a distant cousin, Ina. The long metrical inscription, without the prose addition of Bede, has been preserved from the original stone in old St. Peter's at Rome, and a copy of it exists in the valuable work of John Gruter, first published in 1601 (Inscript. Antiq. Amstel. 1707, p. MCLXXIV. ii.) as well as in Raffael Fabretti (Inscript. Antiq. 1702, Rome, p. 735, No. 638, where see note).

Caedwalla was the first of the Anglo-Saxon kings who quitted the throne for the "limina Apostolorum," and his example was subsequently followed by three others, Coenred of Mercia, Offa of the East Saxons, and Ina of the West Saxons. His motives, if Bede knew them, illustrate the religion of the age; they were that he might obtain an everlasting kingdom; that he might enjoy the distinguished honour of being baptized in the Church of the Apostles; and his desire was that shortly after that rite he might be released from the flesh and pass at once to eternal joys (H. E. v. 7; cf. iv. 12). From the last expression, it might be conjectured that he found his health failing. Possibly his intercourse with Wilfrid, whose partiality for Rome is well known, may have encouraged the idea. The intimacy, as related by Eddius (cap. 41), was very close. From the wilds of "Ciltina et Ondred," to which the prince first resorted, he sought the bishop out in his peninsula of Selesu, entreated his friendship, and begging he would be a father to him "in doctrina et auxilio," vowed to be his obedient son, and then the two exiles entered into a compact, taking God to witness. Malmesbury goes so far as to relate that on gaining Wessex, Caedwalla set that able bishop over the whole kingdom "ut magistrum et dominum," and took no step without his consent (G. P. ed. Hamilton, 233). Hedda, the West Saxon bishop of that reign, also had intercourse with Rome. A continental writer of the 8th century, Paulus Winfridus or Paulus Diaconus, gives us a glimpse of the English king (whom he calls Theodaldus and Cedoaldus) on his journey out, telling us how he visited the court of Cunibert, king of the Lombards, by whom he was "mirificè receptus," which is all we learn (Paul. Diacon. de Gestis Longobard. vi. 15, Patrol. xc. 632).

The varieties of his name are—CAEDUAL, CAEDUALD, CAEDUALLA, CAEDUUALA, CAEDUALLANUS, CAEDUUALHA, CAEDUUALA, CEADUALLA, CEADWAL, CEADWALA, CEADWALE, CEADWALHA, CEADWALLA, CEDOALDUS, CEDUALLA, CEDUALLANUS, CEDUUALA, CEDWALDA, CEDWALE, CEDWALL, CEDWALLA, KEDWALLA, THEODALDUS, PETRUS. [C. H.]

CAELFHINN. [CAELLAINN.]

CAEL, in Irish, passes into many forms and combinations in proper names, and has carefully to be distinguished from Cill, which in form resembles it, but in signification is different. While the latter is equivalent to Cella, and appears in Cillinus and Columille, &c., the former, meaning lean or slender, is found in Caelan, Coelan, Coelian, &c. (See Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 379 n.⁷, 596, col. 2.) The Latin form of Cael is Coelius.

(1) At Oct. 26 the Mart. Doneg. cites Cael, virgin, as one of the four daughters of Mac Iaar, of the Dal Messincorb; "and they were of Cill-na-ninthen" (i.e. the church of the daughters) "by the side of Tamlacht to the south," that is, somewhere in Londonderry, or at Killinenny, near Tallaght, co. Dublin. But the Mart. Tallaght places their abode at Cill-maignend, i.e. Kilmainham, near Dublin. (Colgan, Acta SS. 391 n.⁵; Jour. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4, ser. iii. 287 n.)

(2) Colgan mentions a Caila, whom he also calls Coelius, whose festival is Nov. 10, on which day Mart. Doneg. gives "Cael Craibhdeach," and the Table to the Martyrology "Caol, the Devout (Coelius);" and another Coelius is connected with Athrumia (Trim), Feb. 17. But little more can be said of these (Colgan, Acta SS. 318 n.¹, 391 n.⁵).

(3) Cruimther Cael of Kilmore—May 25. Colgan (Acta SS. 709, c. 26) connects him with St. Endeus, but gives no account of his relation to Kilmore, to which he is attached in the Kalendars. [J. G.]

CAELAN. On this diminutive of Cael see Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 379, n.⁷, 596, col. 2). There are several saints of this name, in the Celtic Kalendars, such as Caelan of Cill-eo, June 30; Caelan of Doire or Doire-chaolain, June 19; Caelan of Echinis, Sept. 25; and Caelan of Tigh-na-Manach, Oct. 29. But the most notable is Caelan of Inis-Cealtra, July 29; who under the names Caelan, Coelan, or Chilian, is usually considered the writer of the Life of St. Brigida which stands as the sixth memoir of that saint in Colgan's Trias Thaumaturga. But little seems known of him. He was a monk of Inis-Cealtra (now Inishealtra, an island in the north-west of Lough Derg, near the village of Scariff, in the county of Clare), and probably flourished after the beginning of the 8th century. (See Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 596-7 n.¹, giving an account of the manuscript and what is known of the writer; Four Must. by O'Donov. i. 187; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, ii. 13; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 381. [BRIGIDA (5) of Kildare.] Caelan is another name for Mochai.) [J. G.]

CAELESTIACUS, senator of Carthage, driven from Africa by the Vandals in A.D. 439, on whose behalf Theodoret wrote to Apellio, to Aerius the Sophist, to Domnus, bishop of Antioch, to bishop Theoctistus, to count Stasimus, to count Patricius, and to Irenaeus, bishop of Tyre, who is asked to interest others in his case. He was the more helplessly dependent on charity, as he had carried his wife, children, and servants away with him. He rejoiced in his misfortune as the saving of his soul (Theod. Epp. 29-35). The name is from Caelestis, or Urania, the goddess of Carthage. [COELICOLAE.] (Ceillier, x. 65-67.)

CAELESTINUS, Pope I. [COELESTINUS.]

CAELESTIS, ST., confessor and bishop. He was bishop of Metz in Lotharingia at the beginning of the 4th century, and is supposed to have died about the year 320. His acts are doubtful. He is commemorated Oct. 14. (Acta SS. Boll. Oct. vi. 480.) [H. W. Y.]

CAELESTIUS (1), one of the chief presbyters of Carthage—Botrus was the other—who summoned the neighbouring bishops and those of Numidia to elect a bishop, and being disappointed at the election of CAECILIAN made a party against him. (Optat. Don. i. 18, pp. 17, 18, Migne, Patrol. xi. 918.) [E. B. B.]

(2), the Pelagian. [COELESTIUS.]

CAELIANUS, not Caecilius nor Caecilianus, is the MS. form of the name of the preceptor of Diadymenus, son of Macrinus, and there is no reason for identifying him with any Christian Caecilius, or for supposing him a Christian at all (Tillem. iv. 601). [E. B. B.]

CAELICOLAE. [COELICOLAE.]

CAELIN or CELIN (1), brother of bishops Cceda and Ceadda, a priest in the household of Aethelwold, king of Deira. He is mentioned by Bede as introducing his brother Cceda to the notice and favour of his master, circa A.D. 653 (H. E. iii. 23).

(2) Provost of Ripon. In A.D. 709 Wilfrid allowed him to seek a more retired life, and Tathberht seems to have been chosen provost in his place (Eddius, Vita S. Wilfridi, cap. lxi.). The name occurs in the Liber Vitae of the church of Durham (p. 24, ed. Surtees Soc.). [J. R.]

CAELLAINN (CAELFIHINN).—Feb. 3. She was daughter of Cael, son of Fionnchadh, of the race of Ciar, descended from Rudhraidhe, monarch of Ireland. Her church is now called Tearmon Caelaine and Tearmonn Mor, in the parish of Kilkeevin, near Castlereagh, co. Roscommon. She was the special patron of her kinsmen the Ciarraidhe in Connaught, and the legend places her in the reign of Aedh, son of Eochaidh Tirmcharna, king of Connaught, who was slain A.D. 574 (Colgan, Acta SS. 13 n. 7; Book of Rights, by O'Donov. 100 n. 4.) [J. G.]

CAEMGHEN, or St. KEVIN, of Glendalough, June 3. [COEMGEN.] [J. G.]

CAEMH (CAOIMHE)—At April 4, Mart. Doneg. has "Caemh, virgin, of Cill-Caoimhe," and Mart. Tallaght "Coine, Cilli-Coine." Again at Nov. 2, Mart. Doneg. gives "Caoimhe, the Albanan, of Cill-chaoimhe," which Dr. Reeves

(Mart. Doneg. 294 n.) interprets, "of Alba, the modern Scotland." [J. G.]

CAEMHAN. Under the form Caemhan, Caiman, Coeman, Cayman, Coemhoc, Mochoemoc, this name is of frequent occurrence among the saints of Ireland, and the work of identification becomes extremely difficult (Colgan, Tr. Th. 177 n. 86).

(1) Of Ard-caemhain—June 12. He was son of Coemloga and Caemell, and appears to have been uterine brother of St. Coemgen or Kevin [COEMGEN]. He was thus descended from Corb Olum, from whom "Oilioll Olum, king of Munster and ancestor of the most powerful families of Munster, was the fourth in descent" (Four Masters, by O'Donov. i. 95 n. 1) The Mart. Doneg. calls him Caomhan (or) Sanct-Lethan, of Ard-Caomhain (now Ardcahan, on the peninsula N.E. of Wexford), by the side of Loch Garman, in Leinster. Colgan (Acta SS. 584, c. 1, 586 n. 4) cites St. Caeman, Abbas Airdnensis, among the children of Coeltigerna, who was in fact Caeman's sister, and wife of Colman or Colmadius. Lanigan (Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 221, 223) fixes his date, as brother of St. Coemgen, to the period of the second class of Irish saints, that is, to the second half of the 6th century (Jour. Kilk. Arch. Soc. iv. 57 sq.).

(2) Of Enach-Truim—Nov. 3. He is said to have been of the race of Labraidh Lore, monarch of Ireland, but Colgan (Tr. Thaum. p. 177 n. 88) is probably mistaken in calling him brother of St. Coemgen of Gleudalough, when he and others identify him with Caemhan, son of Coemloga and Caemell, of Ardcahan. Along with St. Fintan and St. Mochumin of Tir-da-glas, St. Caemhan was under the direction of St. Colum, son of Crimthann of Tir-da-glas (Dec. 13), and with the rest constantly followed him. He founded the monastery of Enach-truim, now Annatrim in Queen's County, and flourished in A.D. 550. There he spent the remainder of his days in great sanctity, and died on the 3rd of November, but the year is unknown. (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 71, 222-5; Ussher, de Brit. Ecc. Prim. 441, 962, and Index Chron. A.D. 550; Colgan, Acta SS. 192, col. 1, 312, c. 5, 350, c. 3; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 136 n. 7; O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. iv. 125.)

(3) Feb. 14. This saint appears under the names of Caomhan, Coman, Comman, Conan, Conran, Convan, and in the Table of the Mart. Doneg. is also Pulcherius. In Acta SS. 335, Colgan gives a memoir "De S. Convano, seu verius Conano vel Romano;" and according to this account, he belonged to a noble stock in Scotland, but spurning all earthly delights withdrew to the Orkneys, where he built a monastery, and after living in great sanctity as a bishop and confessor, died there about the year 640. At Kirkwall and throughout the islands his memory was long revered, and many altars were raised to his honour. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 311; Butler, Lives of the Saints, ii. 185.)

(4) Brec—Sept. 14. St. Caemhan Brec or Brec (the spotted), of Roseach (now Russagh, near the village of Street, in the barony of Moygoish, in the north of Westmeath), is carefully to be distinguished from St. Mac Nissi (Sept. 3), who is known by the same name, and founded Connor. Ussher places the birth of

Caemhan Brec in Hibernia in A.D. 529, and his death in A.D. 615, which is a century after that of Mac Nissi (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 238; Ussher, de Brit. Eccl. Prim. Dubl. 1639, p. 962; Colgan, Acta SS. 131-2, cc. 14, 15). [J. G.]

CAEMHLACH (CAMULACUS), of Rathain—Nov. 3. He was one of the bishops, of the first class, ordained by St. Patrick, and his house was at Rahen, in the barony of Ballycowan, King's County. He is called the Commensian, and the 'Hymn of Camelac' is in the Antiphony of Bangor (Ussher, de Brit. Eccl. Prim. c. xvii.; Tirechan, Vit. S. Patr. in the Book of Armagh, ff. 9-11; Ulst. Journ. Arch. i. 174). [J. G.]

CAEMHOG—July 22. This is one of those saints whose sex has been made uncertain, from the female termination being given to the name, or from other circumstances. (For an explanation of the change of sex, see Reeves, Culdees, 34, n. And for this same person or at least an exactly parallel case, see KEVOCA, who is a saint of the male sex, and is called Caemhog and Mochaemoc, pronounced Keevog and Mokeevoc.) Caemhog, known also as Coemaca, was son of Coemloga and Caemell, daughter of Ceannafionán or Cenandan, and thus brother of St. Coemgen of Glendalough. Both Colgan and Lanigan have regarded this person as a female, and are in confusion as to the identity, the one making her the same as Caoiltighern, regarded as the daughter of Coemloga and wife of Colman or Colnadius, and the other taking her to be Coemaca, erroneously supposed to be a sister of Caviltighern and St. Coemgen. (Colgan, Acta SS. 584, c. 1, 586 n. 48; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 45, 223.) [J. G.]

CAENCHOMHRAC.—July 23. Mart. Don. (by Todd and Reeves, 199) gives him as bishop, first at Cluain-mic-Nois, and next at Inis Endaimh, in Loch Ribh (Inchenagh or Inishenagh, in Lough Ree, near Lanesborough, co. Roscommon). He left Cluain on account of the popular veneration given him as a prophet, and sought for solitude in Lough Ree. [J. G.]

CAERLAN (CAIRLAN), bishop of Armagh—March 24. A short memoir of this saint is given by Colgan (Acta SS. 744), which seems to contain all that is known of him. He was born in, and by descent belonged to, the district of the Hy-Niellan or O'Niellan, in the present county of Armagh; according to the author of the Life of St. Dageus, or Daigh (Aug. 18), he was over a monastery in the same place, about the year 546, and was finally raised to the episcopate. He succeeded Feidlimidh Finn there in 578, and died in 588 (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 183; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 212, n. 213; Colgan, Acta SS. 193, 744; Ware's Bishops, ed. Harris, 38, 39). [J. G.]

CAERNAN—Jan. 31. Mart. Doneg. gives Caornan in the text, but in the table Caornan of Cill-Chaornain (now Kilocornan, a townland in the parish of Stradbally, bar. Dunkellen, co. Galway). Among the disciples and relatives of St. Columba is enumerated "Cairnaan, filius Branduib, filii Meilgi," as coming with St. Columba on his first voyage to Britain, but there is no proof to shew whether the Cairnaan thus named is the Caernan of Jan. 31, or he of Cluain-each, April 28. (See Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 488, col. 1; Reeves, Adam- nam, 246; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 294; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 599.) [J. G.]

CAESAR, bishop of Dyrrhachium, is given by Dorotheus as one of the 70, and is said to be mentioned by Paul, on the strength of the verse "Greet them that be of Caesar's household." This is corrected in the Latin version. The Menology (Dec. 9) makes him bishop of Corona. (Tillem. i. 574.) [E. B. B.]

CAESAREUS, deacon, mentioned in Bede's Martyrology (ad Nov. 24) as suffering in the persecution of Maximian with Largus and Smaragdus. Smith here points out that this person must be intended for Cyriacus, commemorated with the same two companions on March 16 and Aug. 8 (Bede, ed. Smith, 448). [C. H.]

CAESARIA (1), or CAESARIUS (MSS. vary), had consulted St. Basil to know whether it were lawful and expedient to partake of the eucharist daily by oneself. St. Basil approves of daily communion, though himself communicating only four times a week, and he permits the reservation and solitary participation of the consecrated elements. (Basil, Ep. 93; Ceillier, i. 447.) [E. B. B.]

(2) CAESARIA and her daughter Lucilla were among the nine or ten Manicheans who were all that were known to FELIX, the convert from that sect, in North Africa in the 5th century. (Augustin Opera, ed. Migne, t. viii. 518; Baronius, Annales, t. v. App.) [E. B. B.]

(3) ST. of Arles. Born at Châlons and educated at Marseilles, this saint became abbess of Arles when her brother St. Caesarius was bishop of that see. He drew up the rules of her convent and procured their ratification by pope Hormisdas. After governing 206 nuns for 30 years, she died about the year 530. Her monastery was demolished during the invasion of Arles by Theodoric in 507, but Caesarius rebuilt it (Acta SS. Boll. Jan. 12, i. 729). [H. W. Y.]

(4) A later abbess of the same nunnery, writes to St. Rhadegunda defining a Christian's three duties, prayer, bible reading, and thanksgiving, and sending her, as requested, a copy of a letter of Caesarius, about A.D. 560. (Ceillier, xi. 317.) Her letter is given by Martene (Anecdota, t. i. 3, Paris, 1717). [E. B. B.]

CAESARIUS (1) A deacon from Africa, martyred with the presbyter Julianus, at Terracina, in Campania, where he was seized while preaching against idolatry. He was thrown into the sea in a sack, but his body was recovered and buried near Terracina. His story in Bede includes the fall of a temple at his prayer, a celestial light encompassing him, the conversion and joint martyrdom of Leontius his persecutor. Bede and Usuard place him in the reign of Claudius; but another account makes him to have buried Domitilla and her companions in the reign of Trajan. (Bede, Mart. p. 439 in Smith's Bede, where note quoting Baronius; Usuard, Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.) [C. H.]

(2) ST. of Nazianzus, physician, son of Gregory, bishop of Nazianzus, brother of St. Gregory of the same place, and youngest of the family, date of birth uncertain, probably about A. D. 330. His death occurred in A. D. 368 or 369.

Name.—The name is simply a derivative from Caesar, originally adopted in compliment to the reigning family.

Authorities.—The funeral oration by his brother, St. Gregory Nazianzen (the 7th, in some edit. the 10th); two letters addressed by Gregory to Caesarius and one to the Praeses Sophronius (numbered 17, 18, 19 or, more commonly, 50, 51, 52) and a few lines in the Carmen de Vita Sua of the same. Photius, Bibliotheca Cod. 210 (p. 168 ed. Bekker, Berolini, 1824).

Life.—According to the testimony of his brother, Caesarius owed much to the careful training received from his parents. The schools of Palestine, though excellent as regards instruction in rhetoric, did not stand high in respect of the physical sciences. Accordingly, at a time when Gregory, who aimed at being a preacher, was content to remain in Palestine, Caesarius betook himself to Alexandria, "the workshop of every sort of education." There he behaved as a model student, being very careful in the matter of companionship, and earnest in pursuit of knowledge, more especially of geometry and astronomy. This last-named science he studied, says his panegyrist, in such wise as to gain the good without the evil; a remark readily intelligible to those who are aware how deeply a fatalistic astrology was at that period associated with the study of astronomy. (It may be sufficient to refer on this head to the Confessions of St. Augustine and his writings against the Manichæan, Faustus.) But the forte of Caesarius was his medical skill, in which he outshone all his fellow-students.

After refusing a post of honour and emolument at Byzantium, he came home for a time, but to the regret of his friends returned to the court and was much noticed and honoured by Julian. There is here a slight, but not perhaps irreconcilable, discrepancy between the funeral oration delivered by Gregory and the letter (17 or 51) which he addressed to his brother while alive. The oration seems to depict Caesarius as from the first spurning all offers of Julian, but the letter severely rebukes Caesarius for becoming a member of the imperial household, and taking charge of the treasury. Such a step is called a scandal in a bishop's son, and a great grief to his mother. Caesarius, however, finally avowed himself a Christian, and broke with Julian. His conduct, together with that of Gregory, caused Julian to exclaim, "Oh happy father; oh unhappy sons."

Under subsequent emperors, more especially under Valens, Caesarius more than regained his former honours, and became quaestor of Bithynia. A remarkable escape from a terrible earthquake at Nicaea, apparently about A.D. 367 or 368, to which many distinguished men fell victims, induced Caesarius, at his brother's suggestion, to arrange for retirement from worldly cares. He received baptism (which in the well-known case of the emperor Constantine and many other eminent men of that date had been deferred until late in life), and soon after fell sick and died. He was unmarried and left no children. His property was sadly pillaged, despite the unavailing protests of his brother (letter to Sophronius and Poem by Gregory). [J. G. C.]

[Basil wrote to him his Ep. 26 (362), congratulating him on his escape, and relates how at death he said, "I wish all my goods to go to the poor," and his servants obeyed the injunction, so that his brother got none. Ep. 32 (84). Gregory also writes to him his Ep. 14 (105), on behalf of Eulalius, and 23 (106) on behalf of Amphiloehus. This with Ep. 20 (16) are the only letters extant that passed between the brothers. The numbering of the letters is very diverse. Migne gives them thus. The following particulars of the life of this Caesarius are given by Gothofredus in his edition of the Code of Theodosius, vol. vi. p. 354 (Lyons, 1665): He was count of private affairs under Valentinian A.D. 364 (Cod. Theod. x. 1, 8), and prefect of Constantinople in A.D. 365 (Amm. Marcell. xxvi. 7; Zos. iv. 6), and thrown into prison by Procopius that same year.] [E. B. B.]

The Πύστις or Quæstiones (sive Dialogi) de Rebus Divinis, attributed to this physician may be safely ascribed to some Caesarius. But the name was not an uncommon one, and the following considerations seem to show that the author was not Caesarius of Nazianzus. (a) Photius, who, while admitting the orthodoxy of the work, is not very complimentary to its style, treats the supposed authorship as merely a current unexamined tradition (εἶναι δὲ φασὶ Γρηγορίου, οὗ τὸ θεολόγος ἐπώνυμον, τὸν συγγραφεῖα ἀδελφόν). (b) The book refers to Maximus, who lived subsequently. (c) Neither St. Gregory nor St. Jerome mention its existence. (d) It is highly improbable that a mere Catechumen, like Caesarius, would put forth a book bearing on abstruse questions of controversial theology. The Quæstiones have, however, been printed in some edd. of the works of St. Gregory Nazianzen, and by Fronto Ducaeus in the Bibliotheca Patrum published at Paris in 1644 (tom. xi. p. 545). [J. G. C.]

CAESARIUS, (3) ST., sometimes called of Châlons (Cubillonensis seu Cubellinensis) from his birthplace Châlons-sur-Saône; but more usually known as Caesarius of Arles (Arelutensis) from his see, which he occupied for forty years. He was certainly the first ecclesiastic in the Gaul of his own age, and probably not inferior in importance to any Gallican bishop included within the limits of this work, if we except the names of Irenæus, of Martin and of Hilary of Poitiers. The date of his birth is not quite certain; but it lies between A.D. 468 and 470; the date of his death is the 27th August, A.D. 542. Usuard places his natalis at Aug. 27. (Usuard, Mart.)

Name.—See the preceding article. It may be added, that the fame of the great Roman conqueror of Gaul would have a tendency to make the name specially frequent in that part of the Roman Empire. Its feminine form, Caesaria, seems to have been very common amongst women.

Authorities.—1. The biography, written by his admiring disciple, St. Cyprian, bishop of Toulon (Tolonensis) with the aid of other ecclesiastics (edited by D'Achery and Mabillon in the Acta Sanctorum Ord. S. Benedicti, Venet. 1733, tom. i. p. 636, et seqq., and reproduced by Surius in the Bollandists' Acta Sanctorum under date of August 27th). 2. His will, first published by Baronius (Annal. tom. vi. ad ann. 508) from archives preserved at Arles; also given by Surius loc. cit.; a document of some interest for the student of Roman law. 3. Acts of the council of Agde (Agathense) A.D. 506; of the 4th council of Arles (Arelatense) A.D. 527; of that of Carpentras (Carpentoratense) also in A.D. 527; and of the 2nd council of Orange (Arausicanum) A.D. 529; and the 2nd of Vaison (Vasense) also A.D. 529; over all of which, Caesarius presided (Labbe, Concilia, tom. ii. pp. 995-1098, ed. Parisiis 1714). 4. The Regula ad Monachos and Regula ad Virgines, drawn up by him for a monastery and a convent of his own foundation (edited by Holstenius in his Codex Regularum, and by P. de Cointe in his Annales Ecclesiastici Francorum). Trithemius, fixing the date of Caesarius much too late, fell into the error of supposing him to be a Benedictine. 5. His sermons. Of these forty were published at Basle in 1558; forty-six in a Bibliotheca Patrum, edited at Leyden in 1677; fourteen more in another Bibl. Patr. of Gallandi, Venice 1776 (cf. Oudin in Comment. de Script. Eccles. vol. i. p. 1339) and 102, formerly ascribed to St. Augustine, are by the Benedictine editors assigned to Caesarius (Appendix to tom. v. of the works of St. Augustine). Others have been separately published by Baluz; but Neander justly remarks, that "a complete collection of these sermons, conveying so much important information respecting the character of Caesarius and his times, still remains a desideratum" (Church Hist. vol. v. p. 4, note).

Life.—Caesarius was born at Châlons about A.D. 468 of pious parents. His sister Caesaria afterwards presided over the convent, which he founded, and to her he addressed his Regula ad Virgines. From his earliest years he shewed a charitable disposition and a predilection for a monastic life. At the age of thirteen he betook himself to the famous monastery of Lerins (Lerinum), where he rapidly became master of all which the learning and discipline of the place could impart, and was made the wine-dispenser (Cellarius) of the institution. Having injured his health by austerities, he was sent to Arles (Arelate) to recruit. There the bishop Eonus, who had also been a native of the district of Châlons, made his acquaintance; and, having obtained the consent of Porcarius, abbat of Lerins, ordained Caesarius deacon and then presbyter. Here, as at Lerins, he displayed the keenest sense of duty, combined with a calmness and humility, reflected, says his biographer, in the very expression of his countenance (ita ut vultus ejus qualitas nescio quid semper videretur renitere caeleste). For three years he presided over a monastery in Arles; but of this building no vestige is now left.

At the death of Eonus, and in accordance with the suggestions made by that prelate before his decease, the clergy, citizens and persons in authority proceeded to elect Caesarius, sincerely against his own wish, to the vacant see. He was accordingly consecrated bishop of Arles in A.D. 502, probably about the 33rd year of his life. His fulfilment of his new duties was most apostolic. He was courageous and unworldly, but yet exhibited great power of kindly adaptation to persons and circumstances. It is curious to find that the knowledge of Greek to which Caesarius testifies (B. G. lib. vi.) still existed in the southern Gaul of the 6th century; and that both at Arles and Marseilles that language was still employed in some of the church's services. Caesarius took great pains to induce the laity to join in the sacred offices, and encouraged inquiry into points not made clear in his sermons. He also bade them not to be content with what they heard of Holy Scripture in church, but to study it at home, and to treat the word of God with the same reverence as the sacraments. He was specially zealous in the redemption of captives, often selling for this purpose even ornaments belonging to the church.

The political troubles of the age did not leave Caesarius untouched. A notary, named Licinianus, accused him to Alaric as one who desired to subjugate the civitas of Arles to the Burgundian rule. Caesarius was for a time exiled to Bordeaux, but was speedily, on the discovery of his innocence, allowed to return. He interceded for the life of his calumniator. At a later period, on the occasion of the siege of Arles by the troops of Theodoric, apparently about A.D. 512, he was again accused of treachery and cast into prison. An interview with the Ostrogothic king at Ravenna in A.D. 513, speedily dispelled these troubles, and the remainder of his episcopate was passed in peace; Childebert, who was allowed to govern from A.D. 538, proving to be anti-Arian and most favourable to the clergy.

The directions of Caesarius for the conduct of monks and nuns have been censured as pedantic and minute. They certainly yielded to the spread of the rising Benedictine rule. But they must be judged by their age and regarded in the light of the whole spirit of monasticism. (Milman, Lat. Chris. bk. iv. ch. iii. has some good remarks on the general subject, though he, somewhat unaccountably, omits all mention of Caesarius.)

As the occupant of an important see, the bishop of Arles exercised considerable influence, official as well as personal. Caesarius was liberal in the loan of sermons, and sent suggestions for discourses to priests and even bishops living in Spain, Italy, Gaul and France (i. e. the province known as the Isle of France). The great doctrinal question of his age and country was that of Semi-pelagianism. Caesarius, though evidently a disciple of St. Augustine, displayed in this respect considerable independence of thought. His vigorous denial of anything like predestination to evil caused some slight suspicion. He seems to have been accused of a tendency towards anti-Augustinian doctrine, and a slight shade of difference respecting the amount of honour due to his memory may perhaps be traced in writers according as they incline respectively towards the Jesuit or the Jansenist views concerning divine grace.

Of the local councils over which Caesarius presided the most important was that of Orange. Its statements on the subject of grace and free agency have been justly eulogized by modern historians (see e. g. Canon Bright's Church History, ch. xi. ad fin.). The following propositions are laid down towards the conclusion of canon 25: "This also do we believe, in accordance with the Catholic faith, that after grace received through baptism, all the baptized are able and ought, with the aid and co-operation of Christ, to fulfil all duties needful for salvation, provided they are willing to labour faithfully. But that some men have been predestinated to evil by divine power, we not only do not believe, but if there be those who are willing to believe so evil a thing, we say to them with all abhorrence anathema. This also do we profess and believe to our soul's health, that in every good work, it is not we who begin, and are afterwards assisted by Divine mercy, but that God Himself, with no preceding merits on our part, first inspires within us faith and love." That is remarkable, that on the express ground that these doctrines are as needful for the laity as for the clergy, certain distinguished laymen (illustres ac magnifici viri) were invited to sign the canons of the council. They are accordingly subscribed by eight laymen, and at least twelve bishops, including Caesarius.

As a preacher, Caesarius displays great knowledge of the contents of Holy Scripture, and is eminently practical in his exhortations. Besides reproofs of the ordinary vices of humanity, he had often to contend against lingering pagan superstitions, as auguries, heathen rites on the kalends, &c. His sermons on the Old Testament are not critical, but dwell on those typical aspects, so popular from the days of Augustine to our own time.

Besides certain jealousies and suspicions of individuals, some rivalry appears to have existed in the 6th century between the sees of Arles and of Vienne. This matter was adjusted by pope Leo, and the adjustment was confirmed by Symmachus. Caesarius was in favour at Rome. A book he wrote against the Semipelagians, entitled De gratiâ et libero arbitriâ, was sanctioned by pope Felix; and the canons passed at Orange were approved by Boniface II. The learned antiquary Thomassin believes him to have been the first Western bishop who received a pall from the pope. But these circumstances have not prevented him from receiving the fullest justice at the hands of foreign Protestants, such as Guizot and Neander. The former, in his Civilisation en France, cites part of one of his sermons as that of a representative man; while Neander, who seems to have been specially interested in him, has nothing but eulogy for his "unwearied, active, and pious zeal, ready for every sacrifice in the spirit of love," and his moderation on the controversy concerning Semi-pelagianism. This is indeed the great glory of Caesarius. He more than anticipates the famous picture drawn in a later age by Chaucer of a teacher, earnest, sincere, and humble, but never sparing reproof where it was needed. "He is to be ranked," adds Neander, "with those men, who knew how to assuage by the glowing zeal of Christian charity, and whatever that can do, even the physical distress of those times of desolation."

CAESARIUS. (4) Martyr at Caesarea in Cappadocia under Decius. Commemorated Nov. 3. (Bede. Mart. Auct.; Usuard. Mart.; Vet. Rom. Mart.)

(5) Father of Eudoxus the Arian. He endeavoured to wipe out a life of vice by a martyr's death at Arabissa in Lesser Armenia under Diocletian. The authority for his story seems to be ultimately Phavorinus, copied by Suidas (Tillem. v. 172, 649). [E. B. B.]

(6) Master of the offices under Theodosius the Great in A.D. 389, Cod. Theod. viii. 5, 49, and said to be a personal friend of that emperor, was sent by him with troops to chastise Antioch. (Theodoret. v. 19.) An oration of Libanius, addressed to him about that business, is extant (Liban. Or. 13 (20)), and a homily of Chrysostom (ii. 171).

He was prefect of the praetorians at Constantinople under Arcadius from A.D. 395 to A.D. 401, either at intervals, or sharing the office with Aurelius and Eutychian. In A.D. 397 he was consul with Atticus. He built over his wife's grave a church to St. Thyrsus, at Constantinople (Soz. ix. 2; Tillem. iii. 344), and removed the body of Eunomius to Tyana, to prevent the Eunomians doing it honours (Tillem. vi. 511). See De Broglie, vi. 144; Godofred. Cod. Theod. vi. 354. [E. B. B.]

CAESARIUS (7). Among the works attributed to Chrysostom is a treatise entitled, Ad Caesarium Monachum Epistola contra Apollinaristas. We only possess it in a Latin translation, though a few fragments of the Greek original are found in Anastasius and John Damascene and elsewhere. This tract, the literary history of which is very curious, is of disputed authenticity. If we accept it as genuine, we learn from it that Caesarius had embraced a religious life from his childhood, and had become a monk; that his piety had secured Chrysostom's affection, and that at one time he had lived with him. Meeting with some Apollinarists, he purchased a book written by Apollinaris which led him eagerly to embrace those views. Full of joy at having passed from darkness to light, he wrote to Chrysostom to tell him of his new-found happiness. The intelligence caused great grief to Chrysostom, who was then in exile at Cucus, who composed this letter containing a refutation of the Apollinarian heresy, which he sent to Caesarius, in the hope of delivering him from his errors. It contains a celebrated passage illustrating the doctrine of the two distinct natures in the one person of Jesus Christ by reference to the holy Eucharist, in which he speaks of the nature of bread as remaining in that which by the sanctifying grace of God is freed from the appellation of bread and thought worthy to be called the body of the Lord. This passage was adduced in controversy about the year 1548 by Peter Martyr, who deposited a transcript of it in Archbishop Cranmer's library. After Cranmer's death this document was destroyed or lost, and Martyr was accused of having forged it (Perron, De l'Euchar. 381-3). His reputation was cleared by the rediscovery by Emeric Bigot, in a Florentine library, of doubtless the very MS. which Martyr, himself a Florentine, had used. Bigot printed the epistle with Palladius's life of Chrysostom in the year 1680. Previous to publication, through the influence of two censors of the Sorbonne, the alarm of Louis XIV. was excited, and he ordered the leaves containing the letter to be cancelled. An account of the ingenious way in which the mutilation was effected is given in Mendham's Index of Pope Gregory XVI. xxxii.-iv. But Bigot having made known his discovery to literary friends, the suppression was made matter of expostulation by Allix (preface to Anastasius in Hexaameron), 1682, and the cancelled leaves were printed by Le Moine, Varia

Sacra, 1685, by Wake, 1686, and by Basnage, 1687. The Jesuit Harduin published the epistle in 1689, accepting it as Chrysostom's, and vindicating the consistency of its doctrine with that of his church. It is accepted as genuine by Tillemont and Du Pin. The genuineness was first assailed by Le Quien (1712) in the preface to his edition of John of Damascus, and his arguments were adopted and enlarged by Montfaucon. Maffei found a Greek fragment also at Florence, proposing to be from Chrysostom, the first sentence of which is identical with one in this letter, but proceeding to illustrate its doctrine by two similes not found in the Latin. The extract was printed by Basnage in Canisius's Lectiones Antiquae, Antwerp, 1725, pp. 285-7. It is natural to conjecture that the second paragraph is taken from a different work, but the MS. gives no indication of a change of author. Perhaps the Latin does not represent the whole of the letter.

Against the genuineness it is urged that Caesarius is not mentioned elsewhere by Chrysostom, though the letter implies that they had been intimate from youth; that the style (if it be fair to judge when so little of the Greek has been preserved) is rugged and abrupt, and the tone more scholastic than is common with Chrysostom; that though quoted as Chrysostom's by several Greek authors, the earliest of these is scarcely earlier than the 7th century, and yet we should expect it to have been used in the Eutychian disputes, and quoted in the Acts of the 4th, 5th and 6th Councils. Le Quien also urged that language is used which is not heard of until employed by Cyril of Alexandria in controversy with Nestorius. Montfaucon, however, has produced precedents for much of this language from Athanasius, and he has clearly proved that the letter was directed not against Eutychianism, but against Apollinarianism; and with much probability he identifies the work assailed with a work of Apollinarius quoted by Eulogius (ap. Photium, Cod. 230, p. 849). This being so, we are more inclined to accept the letter as written while the Apollinarian disputes were raging than, as Montfaucon conjectures, forged a century or two afterwards for the purpose of being used in the Eutychian controversy, since one of the arguments against the genuineness is that there is no evidence that it ever was so used.

On the controversy as to the genuineness, see the authorities referred to by Fabricius, Bibl. Gr., ed. Harles, i. 699; Chrys. iii. 747-760, and xiii. 496, ed. Migne; iii. 736-746, ed. Montfaucon; Tillemont vii. 629, and xi. 340-343; Routh, Opuscula, ii. (479-488). [E. V.]

CAETI (CAOIDE, COEDDI, CAIDEUS, CAIDOCUS, CETI).—Oct. 24. The Mart. Doneg. gives two entries of saints under these names at Oct. 24 and 25, and there are five insertions of Caoide's name in different parts of the Brussels MS. (See Dr. Reeves's note in Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 285.) The table of the Martyrology (ibid. 375) identifies these names as belonging to one person, but it seems more probable that one name under these different Celtic and Latin forms belongs to at least two individuals. Colgan (Acta SS. 162 n. 2) gives them as distinct.

CAETI (1), Caeti, Caette, or Coeddi, a bishop at Iona, whom Colgan calls Caideus and Caidinus, died according to the Four Masters in A.D. 710, but other authorities give 711 and 712, the latter being probably the true date. He is commemorated on Oct. 24 (Lanigan, Ecll. Hist. Ir. iii. 153; Reeves, Adamnan, 380).

(2) Caoide, Caideus, or Caidocus—Oct. 25. He was abbat of Domnach Caoide at the Dannaid foot in Tir-Eoghain, that is, "the church of Caoide," now Donaghedy, in the north of Tyrone, and bordering on Londonderry. [J. G.]

CAFFO AB CAW, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron of Llangaffo, a chapel under Llangeinwen in Anglesey (Rees, Welsh Saints, 227; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 497). [C. H.]

CAIAN, Welsh saint of the 5th century, patron of Tregaian, a chapel under Llangefui in Anglesey; commemorated on Sept. 25 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 146). [C. H.]

CAIANI. [CAINITES.]

CAIANUS. [GAIANUS, CAIUS (10).]

CAIDOCUS, apostle of the Morini—Jan. 24. Of this saint there is a short memoir by Colgan (Acta SS. 161, quoting from Alcuin's Life of St. Richarius; Jac. Malbrancus, de Morinis, ii. c. 55; Hugo Menard, in App. ad Mart. Benedict. p. 136). Of the many disciples of St. Columbanus and companions of his journey, not the lowest place belongs to St. Caidocus, the priest and apostle of the Morini. He and an associate, Fricoreus or Adrian, seem first to have gone to Lower Germany to teach the Gospel, but being driven from that country, they came into the region of Ponthieu in Picardy, in the reign of king Dagobert, who ascended the throne in A.D. 622. There again being badly received and roughly treated by the rustics, they were on the point of giving up their mission, when a young nobleman named Richarius delivered them from their enemies, received them into his house, and had the glad tidings of the Gospel blessed to his own soul. Under the direction of St. Caidocus and St. Fricoreus he retired from the world, distributed part of his wealth among the poor, and with the remainder founded the monastery of Centula, where St. Caidocus spent the rest of his days, and at his death was buried, about A.D. 640, within the precincts of the monastery. But in his account of St. Caidocus, Lanigan (Ecll. Hist. Ir. ii. 442-5) points to the chronological difficulty of his being a companion of St. Columbanus, and yet coming into Picardy in the reign of king Dagobert. St. Caidocus therefore and his companion must either have spent a good many years in Lower Germany, if they left Ireland with St. Columbanus, or they, like so many others, merely followed his example after his death and forsook the land of their birth to evangelize the present France and Germany (O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Script. iv. 187). [J. G.]

CAILA. [CAEL (2).]

CAILCON, Irish saint. [COLGA (5).]

CAILLAN.—Nov. 13. He was son of Niatach, son of Dubhan, of the race of Conmac, son of Fergus, son of Ross, son of Rudhraighe: his mother was Deidi or Deviva, daughter of Tren, son of Dubhthach, and his brothers were St.

Diermitius, abbot of Inis Clotra (Jan. 10), etc. He is said to have been brought up with his relation St. Jarlath, under St. Benen of Armagh (Nov. 9), and to have been a disciple of St. Columba, though these two things are evidently inconsistent, and the latter alone seems the more likely, especially as in the Life of S. Maedhóg or Modocus of Ferns, who was born A.D. 558 at East Breifny, St. Maedhóg is said to have been his school-pupil. It is clearly an anachronism to represent him as burying Conall Gulban in A.D. 464 as the Life of S. Cailin and the Irish Annals do. He was one of the chief saints of Ireland, and presided over the church at Fiodnach in Magh-Rein (Fenagh or Feenagh, c. Leitrim), and his monastery became a famous school of divinity. (Colgan, Acta SS. 51-2; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 308-9; Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 448; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 56-7; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 146, n. °, 147.) [J. G.]

CAILTAN is mentioned by St. Adamnan (St. Columb. i. c. 31) and by O'Donnell (St. Columb. ii. c. 44) as a monk who was in charge of a "Cella Diuni," in "stagno Abae fluminis," and was suddenly sent for by St. Columba, who saw his death to be at hand; and next night on his arrival Cailtan became ill and died. There is a doubt as to the site of his cell, but the most probable spot is on the creek or bay in Mull called Loch Buy, or on the freshwater lake Loch Ba. Camerarius gives the commemoration of "St. Cailtanus Abbas" at Feb. 25. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 172; Reeves, Adamnan, 60; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 294.) [J. G.]

CAIMAN. [CAEMHAN.]

CAIMIN, of Inis-Cealtra in Loch Deirgdheire (Inishcaltra, at present a parish partly in co. Cork, partly in co. Galway, including some small islands in Loch Derg). He was of the race of Cathaoir Mór of Leinster, and was in manners and life like unto Pacomius the monk. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 85.) His festival is March 24. St. Caimin belongs to the third order of Irish saints, and was descended from the princely house of Hy-kinselagh by his father Dima, of the stock of the kings of Leinster: his mother was Cuminia, Cumania, or Mumania, daughter of Dalbronach; and king Guaire Aidhne, son of Colman, king of Connaught (who died A.D. 662, and is so celebrated by the Irish poets for his unbounded hospitality and munificence) was his half-brother by the same mother. (See Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 273, upon the mother of Guaire Aidhne.) Tired of the world, he retired for solitude and devotion to an island in Loch Derg, and lived there in the first half of the 7th century. (For an account of the remains of the church, which was built on the original 7th-century one, see Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 821 sq.) He died A.D. 653, and was buried at Inishcaltra. (Colgan, Acta SS. 148, n. °, 337, c. 7, 746-7; Tr. Thaum. 463, n. °; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 11-13; Butler, Lives of the SS. iii. 335; Ussher, De Brit. Eccl. Prim. Dubl. 1639, p. 975; Todd, Book of Hymns, 87, 90.) [J. G.]

CAIN, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patroness of Llangain in Carmarthenshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 228; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 497.) [C. H.]

CAINDER. [CAINNER.]

CAINICHUS (Usuard, Mart. ad diem Oct. 11), abbat in Scotland. [CAINNECH (3).]

CAINITES. A branch of the OPHITES. The name is variously written; Kaivoi (Hippol. Ref. viii. 20; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. i. 15); Caini (Praedest. Cod.); Kaivovral (Clem. Alex. Strom. vii. 17. See CANISTAE), Kaivoi (Epiphanius, Haer. 38; Origen, contra Celsum, iii. 13, but his translator Gelenius gives Cainani); Caiani (Philast. 2; Augustin. Haer. 18, Praedest. 18, codd.); Gaiana haeresis (Tertullian de Praescrip. 33, and de Bapt. 1), but Jerome writing with a clear reference to the latter passage of Tertullian has Caina (Ep. 83, ad Oceanum, and contra Vigilantium). Elsewhere he seems to have Cainaei (Dial. adv. Lucifer. 33); but many MSS. here have Chaldaei. So also Cainaei (Pseudo-Tertullian, 7), Cainiani (Praedest. Codd.). Irenaeus (i. 31) describes the doctrines of the sect, but gives them no title. Some of these forms suggest a question whether heretics taking their name from some Caius may not possibly have been confounded with those called after Cain, but there is no satisfactory evidence of any heresiarch Caius. Harnack (Quellenkritik, 58) finds a heretic Caius in Tertullian (adv. Valent. c. 32), and the same view is taken by Lipsius (die Quellen des A. K. 68), but this seems to be a misunderstanding of the passage in Tertullian, where the expression "Marcus or Caius" seems to describe nothing more than a person of the male sex. The Caianus referred to by Harnack, as mentioned by Melito of Sardis, is a later person, the mention being really by Anastasius Sinaita (Routh's Reliquiae, i. 145). [GAIANUS.]

All the Ophites in common regarded the Creator of the world and God of the Jews as a being of limited nature, who in consequence of his imperfection and ignorance, at times at least, worked in opposition to the will of a higher power; but the Cainites looked on the maker of the world as actually an evil being, resistance to whom was a virtue. Consequently they reversed all the moral judgments of the Jewish Scriptures, and honoured as heroes Cain and others whom the writers of the Old Testament had branded as enemies of their God. They held that Cain and Abel were the offspring of different spiritual powers, and that the death of Abel at the hands of Cain proved that the power from which the latter sprang was higher and more powerful than that from which the former was derived. From the same power as Cain were derived also Esau, the people of Sodom, Korah; and according to their version of the story the supposed swallowing up of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, was a rescue proving the impotence of the maker of the world. He had striven to hurt the children of the higher power, but had not been able; for they had been hidden from their persecutor (an angel having blinded the eyes of Moses), and transferred to the company of their parent power. There is a noteworthy difference in this part of the story between the versions of Irenaeus and Epiphanius. Irenaeus does not intimate a rescue of the bodies of Korah and the rest; he says that Sophia, the higher wisdom, took to herself that which was of her own in them, that is to say the heavenly principle of light which she had bestowed, their bodies being left to the corruption of earth. This distinction disappears in the account of Epiphanius, who says instead that Wisdom took them to herself as being her own. Epiphanius is here apparently copying Hippolytus, but he had independent knowledge of a Cainite work in which the removal of Korah was treated of, and where possibly a bolder account may have been given than that known to Irenaeus.

In any case the Cainites gloried in claiming kindred with the race of Cain, which they maintained had established its superiority over that of the feeble ruler of the world, and they declared it to be the duty of every man to adhere to the stronger power and separate from the weaker. They held that Judas Iscariot had knowledge of these truths not possessed by the other apostles, and that he betrayed our Lord in order to accomplish the dissolution of the power of him who made heaven and earth. But there was a difference between them as to the grounds of this betrayal. Some arrayed themselves in open opposition to Christ, and held him to have been justly consigned to death on account of his attempts to pervert the truth which Judas was zealous to maintain. Such would seem to be the Ophites, to whom Origen (contra Celsum, vi. 28) refuses the name of Christian, declaring them to be as great enemies of Jesus as Celsum himself; who did not even allow Jesus to have been a wise or virtuous man, and who admitted no one into their society until he had first cursed his name. But in the view which seems to have found most acceptance among the Cainites, the goodness of Jesus was acknowledged, yet his betrayer was glorified, as having deliberately done a good work needful for our salvation, inasmuch as he knew the benefits to the world which the Crucifixion was to gain. A book purporting to be the Gospel of Judas is mentioned by Irenaeus as in circulation among these heretics. Irenaeus tells also of other writings of theirs in which they exhort to undo the works of Hystera, by which name the maker of the world was intended. Epiphanius mentions another tract of theirs (Ἀναβατικὸν Παύλου), which professed to contain the unspeakable words heard by the apostle on his ascension to the third heaven.

The charges of immorality brought against the Cainites become credible when we consider the attitude of opposition which they took to what the bulk of Christians venerated. Disowning the God of the Old Testament, they could teach their disciples to do on set principle the things which he forbade. We are told that adopting the current names of angels or inventing new ones, they assigned one as the patron of each particular form of immorality, invoking him as they committed it, counting it necessary to their perfection to have complete experience of all, and holding it to be "perfect knowledge" not to shrink from deeds which it is not fit to name.

It has been thought that the Cainites are the false teachers denounced in Jude's epistle, where we have mention made of Cain, of Korah, and of Sodom; while the heretics in question are spoken of as turning the grace of God into lasciviousness, as filthy dreamers, who defile the flesh, despise dominion, and speak evil of dignities. The coincidences are certainly remarkable, and it may easily be allowed that some form of immoral Gnosticism is assailed in the epistle; but the theories which may be specially called Cainite, are clearly later than its date. For in the epistle the fate of Sodom is without misgiving urged as a warning, and Cain and Korah are used as terms of undoubted reproach. On the other hand, it would be an occurrence to which many parallels could be produced if some bold spirit among the Gnostic sectaries had taken the terms of reproach used against his sect by their orthodox opponents, and taught his brethren to accept them, and deny that they had any cause to be ashamed of them.

It is likely that these Cainite doctrines were never more than the frenzy of a few, and that they did not originate very early, nor continue very long. Though not quite extinct in the beginning of the third century, they had by that time ceased to be troublesome in the west, for Hippolytus in his later work on heresies dismisses them as unworthy of notice. Tertullian deals with the opposition to the rite of Baptism made by a female member of the sect, but seems to be under no necessity of controverting the distinctively Cainite notions described in this article. On the other hand, it may with some probability be asserted that the propagation of these notions was later than Justin Martyr.

In the articles EPIPHANIUS and HIPPOLYTUS will be explained how Lipsius has in great measure restored the lost earlier compendium of Hippolytus against heresies by means of the independent use of it made by Epiphanius, Philastrius, and Pseudo-Tertullian. In this way it is ascertained that that compendium contained an article on the Cainites coming in the same place as in the work of Pseudo-Tertullian. Philastrius, induced probably by the names, transfers to the very beginning of his treatise the articles on the Ophites, Cainites, and Sethites, which he treats as pre-Christian heresies, but he leaves in situ those paragraphs of the article on the Cainites which relate to Judas Iscariot. Comparing then the recovered article of Hippolytus with that of Irenaeus, the differences and the resemblances are found to be such as seem to indicate that Hippolytus neither copied Irenaeus, nor is absolutely unrelated to him, but that both used a common authority. Lipsius put forward the theory that one authority used by Irenaeus was the lost treatise on heresies of Justin Martyr; that this supplied materials for the account which Irenaeus gives of the heresies from Simou to Marcion (i. 22-27); but that the later chapters of the first book in which the section on the Cainites is included, are an appendix added by Irenaeus from his own resources. In his latest essay Lipsius has withdrawn much of this theory; but this much it seems safe to adopt, viz., that while it is likely enough that Justin's work was one of the sources used by Irenaeus, it did not supply materials for the section on the Ophites. Justin (Diálogo. cum Tryphone, 35) speaks of heresies as all known by the name of the heretic who introduced them, and this is the way in which the heresies are designated in the section of Irenaeus, which was claimed as derived from Justin; while in the later section no mention is made of the founders of the sects treated of. It would seem then that the heretical treatise of Justin contained no mention of the Cainites, and there are some slight indications in the extant works of Justin that he was ignorant of them, on which, however, we will not venture to lay too much stress. There are other points in the treatise of Irenaeus which would be affected by the hypothesis that he uses different authorities in the sections 22-27, 29-31. For instance, there are some striking coincidences between the theory of Saturninus, c. 24, and that of the Ophites, c. 30, such as the account of the worm-like motions of the first created man, and the ascription of the books of the prophets to the world-making angels. Now sects put apart by Irenaeus might possibly be referred to the same school, if we understand the descriptions to be of different dates and by different authors. [G. S.]

CAINNECH (CANICUS, CANICE). (1) Jan. 23. Colgan thinks this may be the St. Cannechus, who was baptized by St. Patrick, became "praefectus monachorum S. Patricii et episcopus," and built the church of Kealltag in the same district of Corco-themne (i. e. Corcobenny, co. Tipperary), where he was baptized. But his only reason for the supposition is that no other history is given to the St. Cainnech of this day. (Colgan, Acta SS. 139, c. 70, 179 n. 128, 267, col. 1; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 409.)

(2) Jan. 31. In Mart. Doneg. is Cainneach, son of Ua Chil, priest: Mella was the name of his mother, and also the mother of Tighearnach of Doire-Melle. But as to Cainnech, his father, or his life, we have nothing better than supposition. (Colgan, Acta SS. 796; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 601.)

(3) Abbat of Achadh-bo,—Oct. 11, A.D. 600. This great saint, who in Ireland is better known as St. Canice, and in Scotland as St. Kenneth, was of the race of Ciar, son of Fergus, son of Ross, son of Rudhraighe. Achadh-bo (now Aghaboe, or Aughavoe, a parish in the baronies of Clondonagh and Clarmellagh, in Queen's County, was his principal church; he was patron also of Kilkenny, which derived its name from him, and of Ossory. On the west coast of Scotland and at St. Andrew's we find many traces of his memory. A life of St. Cannicus is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Oct. tom. v. 642-6). The late Marquis of Ormonde printed privately the life of this saint from the Codex Salmaticensis, in the Burgundian library at Brussels, marked p. m. s., which formerly belonged to the Irish College at Salamanca, and contains the lives of forty-six saints. Another life is found in what is incorrectly called the Liber Kilkenniensis, in Primate Marsh's library in Dublin, marked v. 3, 4. (Reeves, Adannan, xxvi., xxxi.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 295.) St. Cainnech was born A.D. 517, of the tribe of Corco Dalann, "de genere Corcotolare ab aquilonari parte hujus insulae." Unlike most of the saints of his country, his parents were poor. His father was a bard, Laitech Luerd, Lugayl, or Lughteach, son of Lughaidh, son of Dalann, of a race originally settled in the island of Nulage, probably Inis Doimble, or Little Island, on the Suir, S. E. of Waterford (for his genealogy see Reeves, Adannan, 220). His mother Meld, or Mella, was of the race of Maguais or Macnaes. The place of his birth,

Kiannaght, is in the county Derry, and is termed "Vallis pellium," or Dungiven: in the barony of Keenaght stood his principal northern church, called Drumachose, where for many centuries his memory was specially revered, and the superior of which was styled "the Coarb of S. Cainnech in Cianacht;" and he himself is called in the life in the Book of Kilkenny (fol. 124) "Canicus sanctus abbas de genere Connach Duine-Gembyn," i. e. of the tribe of Keenaght about Dugiven. Being baptized by Bishop Luceth of Lryrech, he was brought up in his mother's country at a place not now identified. He went over to St. Cadocus (Cattwg Ddoeth) in Wales, whose love he won by the spirit of obedience, which was so prompt that, when called by his teacher, he left a letter half finished in the transcription. Conquering the envy of his companions by miracle, he afterwards proceeded to Italy, to the "limina apostolorum." Apparently after his return, he studied under Mochi Clairenach at Glasnevin, and under St. Finnian at Clonard, where his companions were SS. Ciaran, Comgall, and Columba. He seems to have subsequently gone to Scotland, and been with St. Columba in Iona, and sojourning with him in the western isles, working, it is said, many miracles. He was closely connected with St. Columba, and a lively interest was manifested by them for each other in their distant monasteries, as we see by the story in Adamnan (St. Columb. ii. c. 14). He was likewise connected by ties of friendship with other great men of his time, such as the two Brendans, St. Comgall, St. Fintan of Clononagh, and, in his later days, with St. Mochaemog or Pulcherius of Liathmor (March 13). The exact date of the foundation of Aghaboe is not known, but it probably was before 577, on land granted him by his patron Colman, son of Fearadach, lord of Ossory, who succeeded Fearadach A.D. 582. (On the name Aghaboe, "Ager Boum," see Reeves, Adannan, 121 n.; Ussher, de Brit. Eccl. Prin. Dublin, 1639, p. 957. For a detailed account of his life and the wonders he wrought, see Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 125, 138 sq.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 295-7; Butler, Lives of the Saints, x. 300; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 188, 200 sq.; Trans. Soc. Ant. Scot. iv. 300 sq., with special reference to his connection with St. Andrew's; Reeves, Adannan, 121, 220, and Eccl. Ant. 374; O'Connor, Rev. Hist. Scrip. iv. 125; Ware, Ir. Writ. 6, 27, and Ir. Ant. 137.) He was fond of solitude, and went from time to time into places of retreat for study and devotion: when teaching he was very remarkable for his eloquence and power. On an island in Loch Ree, he wrote a copy of the Four Gospels, which at the time of the composition of the Life was still extant under the name of Glass-Kinnich, the "chain" or "Catena" of Cainnech, and may have been a commentary. At last, blessed with the holy sacrifice received from the hands of St. Fintan, he departed to the Lord, A.D. 600, in the 84th year of his age. Besides his Irish dedications at Kilkenny, Aghaboe, and Drumachose, and his being honoured as patron of the diocese of Ossory, St. Cainnech or Kenneth is, next to St. Brigida and St. Columba, if we may measure popularity by dedications, the favourite Irish saint in Scotland (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 297; Ulst. Journ. Arch. ii. 7, 235, 242; Montalembert, Monks of the West, iii. 230). [J. G.]

CAINNER (CAINDER, CANNERA, CIN-NERA, CUNNERA, KENNERE), (1) Jan. 28.
Mart. Doneg. calls her daughter of Cruithnenechan, at Cill-Chuilinn, in Cairbre, but Mart.
Tallaght has "Cainech (Cainer) ingen Cruithne-chan mic Laighne i Fail Fobhair." Colgan (Acta SS. 174) gives an account of her acts, and calls her S. Canner, daughter of Cruthnechan and Cumania, in Bentraighe (a district near Bantry Bay). She betook herself to solitude and ascetic devotion, and had as a friend St. Senan of Inis-cathey (now Cattery Island in the Shannon).
When the time of dissolution drew near, she was removed to his monastery where she died, and was buried on the shore of Scatterly Island, outside the monastic precincts. She flourished about A.D. 530, and in St. Senan's Life is called Kynnera. Being descended from a distinguished family of ancient Carberry, county Cork, she was much revered in that district, especially at Cillchuilinn, which can hardly be the Kilcullen in county Kildare, but some place as yet unidentified in Bentraighe. (See Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 6; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 461 sq.)

(2) Oct. 29.—St. Kennere, virgin martyr, is given on this day in the Scotch calendars.
She is said to have been one of the companions of St. Ursula, on the Lower Rhine, in the middle of the 5th century, but to have escaped when the rest were martyred. She was afterwards murdered through jealousy, and special honour was given to her relics by St. Willebrod (A.D. 692-741). She had dedications in the south-west of Scotland. (Brev. Aber- don. pars aestiv. f. cxxxiii. a; Butler, Lives of the Saints, x. 547; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 361; Bolland, Acta SS. Oct. tom. xii. 904, "tempore incerto.") [J. G.]

CAIREACH DERGAIN.—Feb. 9. She was sister of St. Enna, of Arran, in Galway Bay, and of the race of Colla-da-chrioch and family of the Orgielli in Ulster. Her father was Conall Derg (Rubeus), son of Daimhin, son of Coirpre Domhairgid. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 43, 83.) Her death is entered by the Four Mast. at A.D. 577, but though her monastery is placed at Clonburren, in the parish of Moore, bar. Moycarnan, co. Roscommon, there is no little doubt as to her place and time.
(Colgan, Acta SS. 68, c. 17, 72, n. 20; Four Mast. by O'Donov. 209; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist.
Ir. i. 399, ii. 234-36.) [J. G.]

CAIRELL (CARELLUS)—June 13. On this day Mart. Doneg. and Tallaght put Cairell bishop of Tir-Rois, and the former adds from the Life of St. Colman Ela, that Bp. Carell was along with him when he went to Lann-Ela, that is, in the end of the 6th century (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 169). There were two of this name, and Colgan seems confused in trying to distinguish them. But if we follow our chronological notes this must be Carellus, son of Nessan, of Leinster descent, who is the contemporary of SS. Colman Ela and Senan, and the bishop at Tir-Rois. (Colgan, Acta SS. 611, rectè 529, and Tr. Thaum. 135, c. 43.)

CAIRLAN. [CAERLAN.]

CAIRNECH. (1) One of this name (written Cearnach) appears in the Four Masters among the deaths under A.D. 779 (rectè 784), as son of Suibhne, and prior of Armagh: in the Annals of Ulster, A.D. 783, he is called "Cernach mac Suibne equonimus Ardmacae," i. e. house-steward of Armagh (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 385 and note).

CAIRNECH. (2) B.—March 28. His father was Saran and his mother Pompa or Bebona: the former belonged to the race of Colla-da-Crioch, and the latter was daughter of Loarne, king of the Dalriadic Scots. He was born after the middle of the 5th century: his brothers were St. Berchan of Echdruim (May 7) and St. Ronan (May 27); and his monastery was probably at Cruachan Ligean on Lough Foyle, near Lifford. He must have died about A.D. 530, and thus could scarcely have been associated with St. Patrick in revising and purifying the Irish laws. (Colgan, Acta SS.
782 sq.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 89;
Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 134-5, 173; Reeves, Adamnan, 329; Irish Nennius, App. No. xxi. pp.
ci. sq.; Skene, Chron. Picts and Scots, 52 sq.)

(3) Of Tuilen.—May 16. The more recent hand in the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 132 n.) adds that "he was of the Britons"
(and regarding this, see Appendix to Dr. Todd's Irish Nennius, pp. ci. ex. 178, and the Life of St.
Cairnech in Rees's Welsh Saints, p. 209). He is probably the S. Carnocus Episc. Culdaeus of the 15 June of Camerarius. He flourished about A.D. 450, and is called by the Irish writers Cairneach, and in Latin Carantocus. Tinnmuth and Capgrave call him the son of the chief "Cœreticæ regionis apud Cambrobritannos." Colgan identifies him as "S. Carantocus Episcopus, Carnechus, et mendosè Maccarthein dictus, inter filios Daræcæ," sister of St. Patrick. He was the son or grandson of Ceredig. His father wished to resign the kingdom to him, but he preferred the religious life. He passed into Ireland impelled by his love for St. Patrick. Going forth to evangelize the country, they agreed to meet every year. He returned to Britain, but eventually died in Ireland. Colgan cannot decide whether this Cairnech or the one preceding is the Carnechus Moel who wrote the Acts of his master St. Ciaran: he says that Cairnech, the Briton, lies at Inisbaithen in Leinster. (Colgan, Acta SS. 263, 473, 717-18, and Tr. Thaum. 127, 231; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 298; Bollandists, Mai. tom.
iii. 582-5, "De S. Carentoco seu Cernatho E. A.
in Wallia et Hib.") [J. G.]

This Cairnech or Carentocus is said to have come from Cornwall to join St. Patrick, and to have helped him to compile the Brehon Laws (Senchus Mor 1, p. xix., 2, p. v.-viii).
He therefore lived in the fifth century. His burial-place is said to be at Dulane, in Meath.
The Welsh represent him as the son of Ceric, the fifth son of Cunedda, and say that he was born in Cardigan. His life in the Cotton MS. Vesp.
A. xiv. (No. 114), made use of by John of Tinnmouth, and hence by Capgrave (fol. lxxvi.), is "suspected of much falsehood" (Acta Sanctorum, May 16,
iii. 585-7; see Hardy, Catalogue of Materials,
l. 46, 47). The parish of Crantock is on the Irish Sea in Cornwall, and there was a collegiate church there before the Conquest. The sand which has blown up along this coast has nearly obliterated the remains of the college, but the holy well remains. The parish feast is on the nearest Sunday to the 16th of May (see Oliver's Monasticon Diocesis Exoniensis).

[C. W. B.]

CAIRPRE (CARBREUS, CORPREUS). There were several Irish saints of this name, but most of them are very obscure, such as Cairpre, the bishop of Maghbile (Moville), May 3; Corprens of Clonmacnoise, with his 12 presbyters, Nov. 1; and Cairpre, bishop of Cill-Chairpre in Tir-Aedha, near Eas Ruaidh, (Tirhugh in Tirconnell, near the Salmon Leap on the river Erne.) (Colgan, Acta SS. 312, c. 5, nn. 14, 15; Reeves, Adamnam, 300; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 426.) In Acta SS. 509, Colgan gives a memoir of St. Corprens Crom of Cluanmnicnois (March 6), who died A.D. 889. Among the disciples of St. Finian (Feb. 23) is given St. Carbreus, bishop of Cuil-rathain, son of Decill or Degillus, son of Nadsluagh, of the race of Irial, son of Conall Carnach: he was venerated on Nov. 11 (Colgan, Ibid. 406, c. 3; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 305). He is said to have been a disciple of St. Monenna or Nennius of Clonfert (March 1), and in the Life of that saint there is an account of St. Cairpre's being carried by pirates into Armorica in Gaul, and there engaged with others in grinding corn for the Gallic king; but, after a miracle performed by him, he was released and kindly received at "Rosnatense Monasterium." This, or the fact on which it is based, probably happened before he became bishop. He was consecrated bishop by St. Brugacius, a pupil and bishop of St. Patrick's ordination, flourished at Cuil-rathain, now Coleraine, "the ferny corner," in A.D. 540, and died about A.D. 560. (Colgan, Acta SS. 406, c. 3, 438, and Tr. Thaum. 148, 183; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 75, 138, 247; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 77-79.) [J. G.]

CAISSIN. [CASSAN.]

CAIUS (1). The reign of this emperor (A.D. 37-41), better known by the sobriquet of Caligula, had perhaps an indirect influence on the growth of the Christian church. It was shortly after his accession that the persecution which had originated in the preaching of Stephen, and which had been so relentless and systematic (Acts viii. 1, ix. 1; Gal. i. 13; 1 Tim. i. 13), suddenly stopped, and "then had the churches rest throughout all Judaea and Galilee and Samaria" (Acts ix. 31). With this security there was at once an inner and an outer growth. They walked "in the comfort of the Holy Ghost" and were "multiplied." The history of Caligula's relations to Judaea as shewn in the narrative of Josephus (Ant. xviii. 8) throws light on the causes of this change. It was not only that the leading persecutor had become a preacher of the faith. The whole attention of the rulers and people of Jerusalem was absorbed by another danger. Caligula, in his mad impiety, had given orders to Petronius, the governor of Syria, to compel the Jews to join in the worship which other provinces paid him. The attempt to enforce that worship in the synagogues of Alexandria had already caused tumults and outrages of all kinds there, and had led the Jews of that city to send an embassy to the emperor (Philo ad Flaccum, de Legatione). An altar to the emperor had been erected by Capito, a publicanus in Judaea, at Jamnia, and had been thrown down by the Jews. Now the command went forth that a statue of Caligula should at all hazards be placed in the temple, and sacrifices offered to it. The Jews were horror-stricken. They rushed, by tens of thousands, to Ptolemais to entreat Petronius to suspend the execution of the edict. They gathered round him at Tiberias and offered themselves to death. The cultivation of the soil was neglected.^a At last he consented to delay till he should receive further orders. Agrippa I., on whom the emperor had conferred the tetrarchate of Philip and the title of king, was fortunately at Rome and high in the emperor's favour. Caligula was invited to a banquet, and promised to grant any boon that Agrippa might choose to ask, and the king was patriotic enough to beg only that the edict which had caused such horror might be rescinded. It was then precisely in this interval that the church enjoyed the temporary tranquillity which was so favourable to its growth. It is noticeable that when the danger had blown over, and Agrippa had returned to Palestine in the character of king, it burst out again with renewed violence (Acts xiii. 1).

So far we have been dealing chiefly with the churches of Judaea. But another of Caligula's acts may have had a special influence on the Christian disciples in Galilee. Herodias, stung with jealousy at her brother's success in gaining the title of king through his intimacy with Caligula, stirred up Antipas to apply for a like honour (Joseph. Ant. xviii. 7). The two went together to Italy and found the emperor at Baiae. They were foiled, however, by the representations of Agrippa, who had sent despatches after them accusing Antipas of disloyalty, and the tetrarch and his wife, instead of gaining fresh privileges, lost what they had, were deposed and banished to Lugdunum, and the tetrarchy of Galilee added to Agrippa's kingdom. It is clear that the state of things, in the interval between the departure of Antipas, and the transfer of power to Agrippa, must have been more or less favourable to the Christian disciples there. When Agrippa begins to persecute, the first objects of attack are the Galilean apostles. The probable connection between Acts ix. 31 and Caligula's attempt seems to have been first noticed by Lardner (Credibility, i. 1, ch. 2).

CAIUS (2), an ecclesiastical writer at the beginning of the third century, is commonly described as a presbyter of the Roman church; but this, though a natural, is not a necessary inference from what is stated of him by Eusebius; nor does any authority earlier than Photius directly assert either that he was a presbyter, or that he was a member of the church of Rome. Eusebius makes mention of but one work of Caius, to which he refers four times (H. E. ii. 25; iii. 28, 31; vi. 20), and from which he gives some short extracts. This was a dialogue which purported to be a report of a disputation held at Rome during the episcopate of Zephyrinus (A.D. 201-219) between Caius and Proclus, a leader of the sect of Montanists, apparently the same as the Proclus who is commended by Tertullian (adv. Val. 5), and as the Proclus who in the list of heresies appended to the treatise De Praescrip. Haer., is said to have been at the head of one of the two parties into which the Montanists were divided. This dialogue is mentioned by the following writers, not one of whom, however, enables us positively to assert that he had derived his knowledge of it from a perusal of the work itself, and not merely from the account given by Eusebius (Hieron. de Vir. Ill. 59; Theodoret, Haer. Fab. ii. 3; iii. 2, where the present text, doubtless by a transcriber's error, reads Patroclus instead of Proclus, Niceph. Call. H. E. iv. 12, 20, Photius, Bibl. 48). None of these authors except the last attributes any other work to Caius. Theodoret says that he wrote against Cerinthus, but he is probably referring not to a separate work, but to a part of the dialogue to be noticed presently.

In the short fragments preserved, Proclus defends the prophesying of his sect by appealing to the four daughters of Philip, who with their father were buried at Hierapolis; Caius, on the other hand, offers to shew his antagonist at the Vatican and on the Appian Way, the tombs of the apostles "who founded this church." That Caius should have conducted a disputation at Rome does not of itself prove that he, any more than Proclus, permanently resided there. Yet the expression just cited conveys the impression that he did; and it would seem that Eusebius was of that opinion, for elsewhere (vi. 20) having mentioned that Caius only counted St. Paul's epistles as thirteen, omitting that to the Hebrews, he adds that even in his own time "some of the Romans" did not ascribe that epistle to the apostle. It is just possible that we are still in possession of the list of genuine apostolic writings which Eusebius (l. c.) intimates that Caius gave, in order to rebuke the rashness of his opponents in framing new Scriptures. Muratori attributed to Caius the celebrated fragment on the canon published by him, which concludes with a rejection of Montanist documents [see MURATORIAN FRAGMENT]. But it is difficult to believe that if this were the list referred to by Eusebius, he would not have quoted it more fully. Among the heretical writings rejected by Caius was a book of Revelations (Eus. ii. 25) purporting to be written by a great apostle and ascribed by Caius to Cerinthus, in which the author professes to have been shewn by angels that after the resurrection Christ's kingdom should be earthly, that men should inhabit Jerusalem, should be the slaves of lusts and pleasures, and should spend a thousand years in marriage festivities. It has been conjectured that the book intended is the canonical book of the Revelation. The strongest reason for thinking so is that Dionysius of Alexandria (Eus. H. E. vii. 25) asserts that some of his predecessors had maintained that the Apocalypse is the work of Cerinthus, and describes their views in language strongly resembling that of Caius. On the other side it is urged that the author of the canonical book does not expressly claim the title of an apostle, nowhere describes millennial happiness as consisting in sensual gratifications, and teaches concerning our Lord's person doctrines irreconcilable with those known to be held by Cerinthus; that Eusebius does not seem to have understood Caius as referring to the canonical book; that Theodoret certainly did not, who (Haer. Fab. iii. 3) says that Cerinthus invented certain revelations, pretending to have seen them himself; and lastly that Caius gives no sign that he is putting forward an opinion opposed to that of the Roman church of his time, which, as we know from Hippolytus, and from the Muratorian fragment, recognised the Apocalypse as St. John's.

A deep obscurity covers the personal history of Caius. Eusebius describes him as a member of the church (ἐκκλησιαστικὸς ἀνὴρ), and as very learned (λογιώτατος), but gives no indication that he knew anything more of him than he gathered from the dialogue against Proclus itself. And there do not seem to be any trustworthy materials for filling up the blank. St. Jerome, who might be expected to know something of the traditions of the Roman church, gives no sign of being in possession of independent information, and only loosely repeats what had been said by Eusebius. The Roman church does not include Caius in its martyrology, and does not honour him with the title of Saint. There is but a single notice with any pretensions to antiquity which speaks of Caius in any other way than as the author of the dialogue. The extant MSS. of the martyrdom of Polycarp profess to be ultimately derived from a transcript made at Corinth by one Socrates from a copy taken from the writings of Irenaeus, the disciple of Polycarp, by Caius, who was intimate with Irenaeus. Notwithstanding the difference of place, and the commonness of the name, we can scarcely help supposing that the Caius intended was the Roman Caius, the only notable Caius contemporary with Irenaeus. It is doubtful whether we can place more confidence in this note than in those which ascribe to Julius Africanus the composition of the history of certain Italian martyrdoms; but there would be no difficulty in supposing that Caius was of Greek extraction (in fact the dialogue against Proclus appears plainly to have been written in Greek), that he had known Irenaeus in the East, and, like him, afterwards travelled westward. Some French writers, indeed, claim Caius for their country, and make him to have received his instructions from Irenaeus in Gaul.

Photius tells us (l. c.), apparently on the authority of a note which he found in the MS. of a work attributed to Caius: "They say that Caius was a presbyter of the Roman church, during the episcopates of Victor and Zephyrinus, and that he was elected bishop of the Gentiles (ἐθνῶν ἐπίσκοπον)." The strangeness of this expression sufficiently explains why, although there is exactly the same authority for calling Caius a bishop as a presbyter, he is habitually known by the lower title. Different explanations of this phrase have been given, and conjectural emendations proposed, Ἀθηναίων by Fabricius, ἑσθινῶν by Wordsworth; but it is needless to discuss minutely a statement which, when traced back as far as we can, is separated by an interval of 600 years from the death of Caius. Photius, on the authority of the same MS. notes, with some hesitation ascribes to Caius a work on the cause of the universe, and another called the Labyrinth, the authorship of which was unknown to previous writers who had quoted it. In the article on HIPPOLYTUS the authorship of these works is discussed; as well as the question whether the last is to be identified with the Little Labyrinth mentioned by Theodoret. Photius asserts that a separate work against the heresy of Artemon was also ascribed to Caius, but it is generally agreed that this work is not to be distinguished from the Little Labyrinth, which was directed against that heresy. The "Refutation against all heresies," the greater part of which was recently brought to light and published in 1851, has been attributed by several critics to Caius, whose claims may be supported by many arguments. But every one of the same arguments may be urged with equal force in favour of the claims of Hippolytus, to whom it is now by general agreement ascribed. The difficulty of making a case for Caius which will not be equally strong for Hippolytus arises from the fact, noticed by Professor Lightfoot, that almost everything that has been asserted of Caius is predicable also of Hippolytus. Both flourished at Rome during the same episcopate; both wrote in Greek; both were disciples of Irenaeus; both were men of great learning at a time when the Roman church was devoid of literary eminence; both counted Paul's epistles as thirteen, excluding the epistle to the Hebrews; and the title of bishop of the Gentiles, ascribed to Caius, not inaptly describes the office held by Hippolytus, who is said to have been bishop of Portus, which, as the principal harbour of the Imperial city, was thronged by a motley crowd of strangers; and who more than once in the Refutation speaks of the Gentiles as though they were his special charge (x. 31, 32, 34).

The singular absence of any notice of the personal activity of a writer so distinguished as Caius is explained if we adopt Professor Lightfoot's conjecture (Journal of Philology, i. 98) that the disputation against Proclus was in fact conducted by Hippolytus, who in his report of the dialogue styles himself by his praenomen, as Cicero does in his philosophical works. Those into whose hands the book fell, unless in possession of some other information about the author, would naturally describe him merely as Caius. If this conjecture could be strengthened by any independent proof that the praenomen of Hippolytus was actually Caius, there is no formidable difficulty in the way of the identification. The greatest is that in the Syriac catalogue of Hebed-Jesu, who lived about the year 1300 (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. iii. 15), among the works of Hippolytus, is enumerated "Heads (theses) against Caius." A corruption in the text had been suspected from the difficulty of finding either a heretic of the name of Caius (see CAINITES), or any conceivable subject of difference between Hippolytus and our Caius. The idea that we are to identify these "Heads" with the book otherwise known to have been written by Hippolytus "In defence of the Gospel and Apocalypse of St. John" is refuted by the fact that this is enumerated as a distinct work in the same catalogue of Hebed-Jesu; as well as by the impossibility that Caius would have rejected St. John's Gospel, whatever we may think of his reception of the Apocalypse. There has, then, been given no explanation of the title of this work of Hippolytus so satisfactory as to exclude the conjecture that the work intended to be ascribed to him is no other than the well-known dialogue, here described, not as usual, the disputation against Proclus, but by the name of the other interlocutor, the disputation against Caius. [G. S.]

CAIUS (3). Pope from Dec. 17 (16?) A.D. 283 (9 or 10 days after the death of his predecessor Eutychianus), to Apr. 22, A.D. 296, i.e. for 12 years 4 months 1 week (Pontifical, Bucher, p. 272), but only for 11 years according to Anastasius (c. 24) and to most Latins, and for 15 years according to Eusebius, who speaks of him as a contemporary (H. E. vii. 32; Chron. 284). He is probably the same as Caius the deacon, imprisoned with pope Stephen, A.D. 257 (Anastas. c. 24). Just as he was raised to the chair, the stern old Roman Carus died mysteriously in a thunderstorm in the East, and his profligate son Carinus succeeded to the empire at Rome. These events would seem to make a persecution, such as is assigned to this period by various martyr acts, not in itself improbable, and though the acts in question are untrustworthy (see Tillemont, iv. 565), we are hardly justified in taking Eusebius for a witness to the contrary, as far as concerns the West. The probability is confirmed by the delay of the funeral of Eutychianus till July 25, 284 (v. Rossi, ii. 378). The persecution is not represented as general, but as aimed at a few obnoxious devotees, and Caius does not appear as leading, accompanying, or inciting them, but only as exercising a fatherly supervision. (See under SEBASTIANUS.) It is probable that the persecution continued for some time under Diocletian. The early Pontifical, as well as Anastasius, makes Caius of Dalmatian origin and cousin to this emperor. The acts of St. Susanna confirm this, but are wholly untrustworthy. That a heathen, Gabinus, her father, should call his brother the pope, Your Holiness, is not so very incredible, but other statements are. It is not likely that Christians prostrated themselves to the pope (Till. iv. 760). Gaius is said in the early pontifical to have avoided persecution by hiding in the crypts. During his latter years the church must have enjoyed peace. The church of Rome in his days was still in great part Greek (Rossi, ii. 72), as is inferred from the epitaph of Eutychianus. He is said by Anastasius to have established the 6 orders of usher, reader, exorcist, subdeacon, deacon, and presbyter, as preliminary stages necessary to be passed before attaining the episcopate, and also to have divided Rome into regions, and assigned them to the deacons. He is said to have sent Protus and Januarius on a mission to Sardinia (Mart. Rom. Baron. Oct. 25). He died in peace according to the 6th cent. pontifical, and is not called a martyr by any one earlier than Bede and Anastasius. He was succeeded by Marcellinus. A decretal is ascribed to him. From a confusion between the calends of March and of May, in the Mart. Hieron. Rabanus assigns his death, and Notker his burial, to Feb. 2) (Rossi, ii. 104). His commemoration on July 1 in the Mart. Hieron. is unexplained (Ib. p. 105). He was the last of the 12 popes buried in the crypt of Sixtus, in the cemetery of Callistus (Ib. p. 105). He is therefore mentioned again, Aug. 9, at which date a copy of the inscription set up by Sixtus III. was placed in the margin of the ancient martyrology (Ib. pp. 33-46). It was impossible to identify his portrait in the series at San Paolo (Bulletini, 1870, p. 124).

CAIUS (4). Only one Gaius is named among the 70 disciples by Dorotheus, and is said to have succeeded Timothy in the see of Ephesus. So also in the Menology, where he is commemorated Nov. 4, along with Patrobas, Hermes, and Linus. This may be the Gaius who is addressed in the third epistle of John, if we suppose Diotrephes to have held the see when the epistle was written. [But see Bibl. Dict. JOHN, THIRD EPISTLE OF.]

(5) "Gaius mine host" (Rom. xvi. 23) is said, in Origen's comment on the passage, to have been afterwards bishop of Thessalonica. He may have confused him with Gaius of Macedonia (Acts xix. 29). Orig. in Rom. x. 41, vol. iv. p. 289.

(6) Oct. 4, Usuard, Mart. and the Mart. Rom. Parvum have "Apud Corinthum Crispus et Caius" (1 Cor. i. 14).

(7) Caius, bishop of Pergamos, is named in the Apostolical Constitutions, vii. 46.

(8) 21st bishop of Jerusalem (Eus. H. E. v. 12), called Gaius in the Chronicon (sub anno 160 P.C.); as also by Epiphanius (Haer. 66, p. 637).

(9) 23rd do. (ib.), called Gaius in the Chronicon also (ib.). Only one of these is named in Rufinus.

(10) Martyr, of Eumenea, at Apamea, refused to be reckoned with Montanist martyrs (Apollin. ap. Eus. H. E. v. 16). Commemorated March 10 (Usuard, Mart.; Mart. Rom.). Not in the Menology.

(11) Arrested with DIONYSIUS of Alexandria, A.D. 250, and forcibly rescued and confined with him in a desert place of Libya (Eus. H. E. vi. 40, vii. 11, pp. 236, 261, quoting from Dion. Ep. x. and i.), and commemorated with him by the Greeks, Oct. 4, as a deacon and martyr.

(12) Priest of Didda, excommunicated, with the approval of CYPRIAN, for receiving the lapsed without penance. (Cypr. Ep. 28 (34)). He is supposed by Tillemont (iv. 94) to have been one of the 5 schismatics named in Ep. 40.

(13) FORTUNATUS, Gaius, and Antus, patron saints of Salerno, commemorated there Aug. 28, are supposed by Ferrari to have been companions of FELIX (Till. v. 698). They are not mentioned in the martyrologies on that day, but Gaius and Fortunatus are frequently joined in the Mart. Hieron. See, for instance, Jan. 19, Feb. 2, March 4. (Acta SS. Aug. vi. 163.)

(14) One of the MARTYRS OF SARAGOSSA.

(15) Martyr at Nicomedia, Oct. 12, with twelve soldiers. (Usuard, Mart.; Mart. Rom. Parv.) [DASIUS.]

(16) One of the FORTY MARTYRS OF SEBASTE. The other mentions of the name in the Mart. Hieron. are numerous. Why the Mart. Parvum should have selected only those on April 19 at Militana, in Armenia, and on Nov. 20 at Messina, and Usuard have added one at Bononia in the East (Bologna?) Jan. 4, and one drowned March 4, it is not said when or where, does not appear.

(17) Persecutor of ST. AFRA.

(18) Deacon of Alexandria, followed Arius, and signed his letter to S. Alexander (Till. vi. 246, 256).

(19) Orthodox bishop of Thmuis in Egypt. Assisted at the Councils of Tyre, Sardica, and Nice (Till. vi. 639). He had to flee from the Arian persecution, and perhaps appears at the Council of Alexandria in A.D. 362, as bishop of Paretonia in the Libyan Desert (ib. viii. 697).

CAIUS (20) Arian, bishop of Pannonia, was at the Council of Milan in A.D. 355, and at the Council of Rimini in A.D. 359, maintained the 3rd confession of Sirmium and was deposed (Till. vii. 535, vi. 447). His condemnation is referred to by Athanasius in his epistle to Epictetus (i. 720). Afterwards (ib. 459) he was reinstated, and sent on a deputation to Constantius. The Semi-Arians who were deposed at Constantinople, in A.D. 360, wrote and asked the Western churches to hold him excommunicated in A.D. 366, which they accordingly did in A.D. 371 (ib. viii. 400). Before then he had complained to Germinius of ill-treatment from some of his ecclesiastics, and wrote praying that bishop to hold fast to the formulary of Sirmium (Till. vi. 546).

(21) Tribune, guarded Lucifer and Florentius in A.D. 355 (Till. vii. 545).

(22) Heretic, to whom Augustine writes in A.D. 390 his Epistle 19 (84), sending him all his books (Till. xiii. 141).

(23) Supposed Donatist bishop at Carthage. Others read Carus. (Tillem. vi. 713.)

(24) Patriarch of Alexandria. [GAIANUS.] [E. B. B.]

(25) Monk. [DIONYSIUS THE AREOPAGITE.]

CALAIS. [CARILEFUS.]

CALAMANDA, virgin martyr, honoured Feb. 5 at Calais in the diocese of Vico in Spain, of whose history nothing is known (Till. v. 550). [E. B. B.]

CALANDIO or CALENDIO (Καλανδίου), succeeded Stephen II. as bishop of Antioch, A.D. 481. There is no doubt that he owed his promotion to the episcopate to the emperor Zeno, and Acacius, bishop of Constantinople; but the exact circumstances of his appointment, in common with many of the events of the stormy period in which Peter the Fuller is the chief character, are hard to ascertain with any precision. His predecessor in the see, Stephen II., had been chosen and consecrated bishop at Constantinople, by Acacius, to whom the emperor Zeno had entrusted the appointment, fearing to hazard an election at Antioch, after the shocking murder of Stephen I. in his church by the partisans of Peter the Fuller. This uncanonical proceeding was reprobated against by pope Simplicius in his letters to Zeno and Acacius; and he only consented to sanction such a breach of ecclesiastical usage on the ground of absolute necessity, and with the assurance of Zeno, backed by an oath, that it should not occur again (Simplicii Epistolae, xiv. xv. apud Labbe, Concil. iv. 1034-5). There is a large body of evidence (not however to be admitted without grave question), that in spite of this solemn promise Calandio's election was of the same uncanonical character; that being at Constantinople, on business connected with the church of Antioch at the time of the vacancy of the see, he was chosen bishop, and ordained by Acacius. The authorities for this version of the facts are Theophanes, p. 110, c., Gelasius, Gesta de Nomine Acacii, Labbe, Concil. iv. 1082, Theodor. Lector. p. 566, and perhaps Candidus, p. 19, B. (though Tillemont gives a different interpretation of the passage); and it is accepted by Valesius (De Petro Antioch. Epis., annexed to his edition of Evagrius, p. 175). The same authorities add that the eastern bishops had in the meantime met, and canonically reappointed the deposed bishop of Antioch, John Codonatus; but that Acacius had sufficient influence to establish the election of his nominee; Codonatus being bribed to retire by the appointment to the archbishopric of Tyre. Calandio thus quietly succeeded to the see and was recognised not only by the eastern bishops, but also by pope Simplicius (Theophan. u. s. Victor Tunensis, ad ann. 488, Valesius, u. s.).

Clear and straightforward as this narrative is, the letter of pope Simplicius to Acacius, dated July 15, A.D. 482, conveying his sanction of Calandio's election (Labbe, Concil. iv. 1035), renders it very doubtful whether it does not seriously misrepresent the facts, in consequence of a confusion between the election of Calandio and his predecessor Stephen II., who is entirely passed over by Theophanes. After the weighty remonstrances against the violation of the Nicene Canon addressed by Simplicius to Zeno and Acacius, and the solemn assurance given to him that future elections should be regular, it is incredible that if the same breach of canonical rule had taken place in this election, the letter of Simplicius should contain no allusion to it; but should simply remonstrate with Acacius for the delay that had occurred in his being apprised of the appointment, and for having permitted him to learn it first from Calandio's own letters, and those of his synod which had been despatched by the hands of Anastasius, an eastern bishop, as he passed through Constantinople, and that he should at once admit Calandio into full communion as a brother bishop, without the least reference to any irregularity in the form of his election. The whole question may be seen carefully and fairly argued by Tillemont (Mémoires, xvi. 760-762, note xiv.), and he appears to demonstrate satisfactorily that the account given by Theophanes, etc. is incorrect, and that though Calandio was probably chosen by Zeno and Acacius, and presented himself at Antioch with letters commendatory which hardly permitted a refusal, he was really elected and ordained at Antioch according to canonical rule by the bishops of his province.

Calandio commenced his episcopate by the customary measure of excommunicating his theological opponents. He refused communion with all who declined to anathematize Peter the Fuller, Timothy the Weasel, and the Encyclic of Basiliscus condemning the decisions of the council of Chalcedon (Evag. II. E. iii. 10; Niceph. II. E. xv. 28). He is reported to have endeavoured to counteract the Monophysite bias given to the Trisagion by Peter the Fuller in the addition of the words ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς, by prefixing the clause χριστῷ βασιλεῦ. (Theodor. Lector. p. 556, B.) Calandio rendered his short episcopate still further illustrious by translating the remains of Eustathius, the banished bishop of Antioch, with the permission of Zeno, from Philippi in Macedonia where he had died, to his own city—a tardy recognition of the falsehood of the charges against Eustathius, which had the happy result of reuniting to the church the remains of the party that still called itself by his name. (Theodor. Lector. p. 577, Theophanes, p. 114.)

Calandio did not remain long in favour with his imperial and episcopal patrons. He fell into disgrace and was banished by the emperor Zeno, at the instigation of Acacius, to the African Oasis, A.D. 485, where he probably ended his days. The charge brought against him was political: that of having erased from the diptychs the name of Zeno, as the author of the Hemoticon; and of having favoured Illus and Leontius in their rebellion, A.D. 484. But the real cause of his deposition was the theological animosity of Acacius, whom he had offended by writing a letter to Zeno accusing Peter Mongus of adultery, and of having anathematized the decrees of the Council of Chalcedon (Evag. II. E. ii. 16); and by his refusal to forswear communion with John Talajas, bishop of Alexandria, and Pope Felix III., by whom the Hemoticon had been severely condemned, and its adherents anathematized. (Liberatus Diaconus, Breviar. c. xviii.; Gelasius, Epist. xiii. ad Dardm. Episc.; Labbe, iv. 1208-9, xv. ad Episc. Orient. Ib. 1217.) On his deposition, the victorious Peter the Fuller was recalled to occupy the see of Antioch. [E. V.]

CALAPATAUROTH, an archon placed to guard the mysterious book of Jeû, written by Enoch in paradise [PISTIS SOPHIA, p. 354].

[G. S.]

CALDONIUS, bp. of unknown African see; discreet man, well-read in Scripture (Cyp. Ep. 25): much trusted by Cyprian. He was not a well-educated man (see Hartel upon his style, p. xlviil. praef., and the vll in Ep. 24), using priorem delictum; extorretes for extorres. He first appears Ep. 24, in which he begs the opinion of Cyprian and Carthaginian presbyters (possibly not aware of Cyprian's retirement, for to omit consistentibus in title is arbitrary) as to whether 'peace' may not be given to lapsi, who, on subsequent confession, suffered confiscation and banishment. Cyprian praises his tone, and sends copies of his letter and the reply to the clergy of both Carthage and Rome. In A.D. 251, he is appointed by Cyprian to visit [Carthage] with two other bishops, HERCULANUS (Ep. 41) and VICTOR (Ep. 41, 42), to relieve sufferers by persecution, assist them in resuming their trades, to influence the lapsi (Ep. 25), and recommend suitable persons for minor ecclesiastical offices. Afterwards (he was not at Carthage when Ep. 41 was written, see § 2) he is charged further with the excommunication of Felicissimus the deacon and his adherents (Ep. 41), who resented the appointment of the commission; Ep. 42 is the excommunicatory letter. In same year he was sent to Rome from the Carthaginian synod with bishop Fortunatus to report on the circumstances of the election of Cornelius and the position of Novatian, Ep. 44, 45 (cf. POMPEIUS). They also conveyed to Cernelius the last synodical letter about Felicissimus, and copies of Cyprian's 41st and 43rd epistles on the same subject.

In 252 he appears as second bishop by seniority, Conc. 2, Carth. sub Cyp. (Ep. Synod. 57), and in 255 in same rank at Conc. Carth. 5 (Ep. Synod. 70), but not in 7th Council at all. [E. W. B.]

CALEMERUS, deacon of Antioch at the Council of Alexandria in A.D. 362 (Tillem. viii. 206, Ath. Ep. Conc. Alex. de Eccl. Ant.).

[E. B. B.]

CALENDIO. [CALANDIO, CANDIDIANUS (10)].

CALEPODIUS (1), Roman presbyter, made the cemetery three miles from Rome on the Aurelian way, in which, instead of in his own cemetery, Callistus was buried. These makers of cemeteries seem to have been martyred by popular fury in spite of the favour of Alexander Severus (v. Till. iii. 252; Rossi, Rom. Sott. ii. 51). The distinguished conversions he made at Rome jointly with Pope Callistus, whose presbyter he was, his old age, his sufferings, his burial in his own cemetery by the care of Callistus, his appearing in a vision after death to Callistus in his martyrdom, the burial of Callistus in the cemetery of Calepodius, are related in Bede (Mart. May 10, Oct. 14) and partially by Usuard. His natale was May 10, as recorded also in Mart. Rom. Parv. [E. B. B.]

(2) Bishop of Naples and legate of the pope at the Council of Sardica (Till. viii. 682). But according to Athanasius two presbyters signed for the Pope, and Calepodius for himself only (i. 767, ed. Paris). Perhaps the same by whom Liberius wrote to Eusebius of Vercelli in A.D. 354 (Ib. vii. 534).

(3) Donatist, bishop of Bazar, in Africa, in A.D. 411 (Till. vi. 190). [E. B. B.]

CALES, bishop in Hermethe. His name was on the list handed over by Meletius to ALEXANDER. [E. B. B.]

CALES. [CARILEFUS.]

CALETRICUS, ST., confessor and bishop of Chartres. This saint was present at the third council of Paris in 557, and also took part in the second council of Tours in 567. He seems to have died either in the year 571 or 573 (Acta SS. Boll. Oct. iv. 278). [H. W. Y.]

CALIBIUS, Calidius or Claudius Saturninus, or Saturianus and Calibus the younger, surnamed Gratianus, were successively curators of Aptunga in 303 and 314, and concerned in the trial of the claims of Caecilian. (Aug. ii. 304.)

CALIGULA. [CAIUS (1).]

CALINICUS, martyr at Apollonia in the reign of Decius; commemorated on Jan. 28 (Usuard, Mart.). [C. H.]

CALIPPUS, a deacon represented as the bearer of the spurious correspondence between Sabinus and Polybius (Vita Epiphaniü, ii. 379).

[G. S.]

CALLEN—Nov. 28. In the parish of Rogart, in Sutherland, the church, dedicated apparently to a saint locally known as St. Callen, was repaired between 1602 and 1619. In 1630 a yearly fair, named St. Callen's, was held at Rogart (Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 719-721). It may be that this saint is Colga (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 294). [J. G.]

CALLICRATES (1) Macedonian, bishop of Claudiopolis in Pontus, joined in petitioning Jovian against the Arians. (Socr. iii. 2, 5; Tillem. vi. 5, 29.)

[E. B. B.]

CALLICRATES (2) Sergeant, who wrote down the dispute of Basil against Photinus, A.D. 351. (Tillem. xiii. 353.) [E. B. B.]

CALLIGONUS, eunuch and chamberlain to Valentinian II., insulted Ambrose, A.D. 385, as that father relates in a letter to his sister (Ambr. Ep. xx. (1); iii. p. 859). He conveyed a message, or reported a saying of the emperor's, and added, "While I am alive, dost thou contemn Valentinian? I will remove thy head from off thee." Ambrose answered, "God grant thee to fulfil thy threat; for I shall suffer what bishops suffer, and thou wilt do what eunuchs do. And would that God would avert them from the church, that they might turn all their weapons on me." Calligonus was afterwards put to death on another and peculiarly infamous charge (Augustine, contra Julianum, vi. 14, vol. x. 845). Tillemont (x. 175) supposes that these events were in the mind of Ambrose when he wrote the 6th chapter of his book on Joseph. This is very probable, but the further inference that that book was written two years later seems to be wholly erroneous. The event that occurred after two years was the usurpation of Maximus. It is just possible that Ambrose encountered two eunuchs. Cf. also De Broglie, l'Église et l'Empire, vi. 173. [E. B. B.]

CALLINICE [CONSTANTINUS SILVANUS, PAUL OF SAMOSATA].

CALLINICE (1) A Greek sophist and rhetorician, usually assigned to the reign of Gallienus (A.D. 259-268). Among the works ascribed to him by Suidas (p. 1961 B) are ten books on Alexandrian history, referred to by Jerome (Proem. Com. in Ianiel). But Clinton (Fasti Rom. ann. 266) points out that the sophist is also assigned to a later date, and thinks Suidas may have confounded two Callinici. See Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. s. v. [H. W.]

(2) Patriarch of Constantinople, A.D. 693 or 692 till 705. He had previously been presbyter and treasurer of the church of Blachernae (Niceph. Constant. Chron.; Theophanes, Chron. p. 302, A.M. 6177). Soon after his appointment the emperor Justinian, wishing to remove a church dedicated to the Virgin Mary in order to erect a fountain and seats on its site, requested the patriarch to compose a form of prayer fitting for the occasion. Callinicus replied that he had many forms of prayer for laying the foundation of a church, but none for pulling one down. When the emperor pressed him more urgently to comply, and threatened to use force in the event of his continued refusal, he simply said, "Glory be to God, who endures always, πάντοτε ἀνεχομένως, now and for ever." (Theophan. Chron. p. 307; A.M. 6186.) It appears that he offended the emperor by his conduct on this occasion, for soon afterwards it came to his ears that orders had been given to Stephen, the governor of Constantinople, for a great massacre of the inhabitants, beginning with the patriarch. (Ib. p. 307; A.M. 6187.) This intelligence must have disposed him to receive Leontius as a deliverer. Either willingly or by compulsion he accompanied that usurper to the font on his entry into the city, and publicly welcomed him with the cry, "This is the day which the Lord hath made." (Ib. Niceph. Constant. Bre- viarium de rebus post Mauricium gestis, 25.) On the return of Justinian in A.D. 705, Callinicus was deprived of his eyes and banished to Rome. (Theoph. Chron. p. 313; A.M. 6198; Niceph. Constant. Breviarium, 28.) [P. O.]

CALLINICUS (3) Martyr of Cilicia, made to run six miles in boots bristling with nails inside, to Gangra in Paphlagonia, where he was burnt, and where his church was afterwards famous. (Menol. July 29; Till. v. 564.)

(4) Meletian bishop of Pelusium, slandered Athanasius in A.D. 331, accused him at Tyre in 335 of breaking a chalice, and of deposing and ill-treating himself (Callinicus). He was present at the Council of Sardica (Till. viii. 19, 38, 95). He asked permission to persevere in schism after the Council of Nice (Ib. vi. 234). [E. B. B.]

(5) Bishop of Perga, in Pamphylia, at the Council of Nice, A.D. 325. (Labbe, Conc. ii. 53.)

(6) Bishop elect of Sangra, sent by Eusebius of Ancyra, who was himself unwilling to ordain him, to Proclus, patriarch of Constantinople (A.D. 434-446), for ordination, but sent back to Eusebius to be ordained, who thereupon did ordain him. (Tillem. xiv. 712; Labbe, Conc. iv. 815, 818.) He died soon after.

(7) Bishop of Apamea in Bithynia, named the Patriarch of Antioch, as well as those of Rome and Constantinople, as leading him to condemn Dioscorus at the council of Chalcedon. (Tillem. xv. 663; Labbe, Conc. iv. 445.) [E. B. B.]

CALLIOPIUS, a Pamphylian, brought before Numerius Maximus, and scourged and crucified on Good Friday, April 7, A.D. 304. His mother Theodeia is said to have given the officers five pieces of gold to have him crucified head downwards. It is not quite clear whether he was fixed to the cross or expired just at the third hour. His mother is said to have expired upon his dead body. (Menol. Basil. and Till. v. 69.) [E. B. B.]

(2) Bishop in The-saly, whom Pope Boniface (A.D. 422), in writing to Rufus (Ep. 13) declares separated from his communion, as far as we can gather, for resisting the authority of the see of St. Peter. (Epist. 9, Decretal. tom. i.; Migne, Patr. xx. 776, p. 1034; Ceillier, viii. 10.) [E. B. B.]

(3) Bishop of Nice, to whom, about A.D. 425, Atticus, patriarch of Constantinople, sent 300 pieces of gold, at a time when a multitude of people in Nice were starving, with directions to distribute without regard to the religious opinions of the recipients, but with careful regard to their personal characters, so that not the professional beggars, but the really needy, who were ashamed to beg, might get help. (Socr. vii. 25.) [E. B. B.]

CALLISTA (1) and CHRISTA. [The names are also written Calliste; and Christe, Christina, Christiana, Christena, Christela, Caelestene, Boll. Acta SS. Feb. i. 771.] Two sisters who had lapsed, to whom DOROTHEA was intrusted that they might persuade her to imitate them. She found them in despair, and encouraged them to renewed confession. They were tied back to back and thrown into a boiling caldron. (Till. v. 497.) [E. B. B.]

(2) [CALCOÆRUS.]

CALLISTHENE, daughter of Adanctas, Christian duke at Ephesus under Maximian, was sent to Mesopotamia by her father to escape the lust of that emperor. The father was therefore accused on the ground of his religion and put to death. On the accession of Licinius, permission was obtained by the wife and daughter from the emperor for the translation of his relics to Ephesus, where Callisthene died (Men. Bas. Oct. 4.) [E. B. B.]

CALLISTHENES, a layman of Cappadocia, to whom Basil wrote on behalf of the slaves of a certain Eustochius who had aided their master in some outrageously offensive conduct towards him, and who, in apprehension of Callisthenes's vengeance, had taken refuge with Basil as their spiritual father. Callisthenes having demanded that the slaves should be given up to him to be punished according to law, Basil wrote to him at considerable length deprecating his anger, and begging him to exhibit his magnanimity and Christian spirit by pardoning their offence, resting satisfied with the terror he had caused, and the correction administered by Basil (Basil, Epist. 388). Basil wrote also at the same time to Hesychius, entreating him to use his influence with Callisthenes to obtain the pardon of the culprits (Ib. Epist. 351) [E. V.]

CALLISTIO, addressed by Rhodo in his book against the Marcionites (Eus. H. E. v. 13). Caspere remarks that this Callistio was probably a tolerably well-known person, otherwise Eusebius, instead of saying that the book was addressed to Callistio, he would be likely to have said "to a certain Callistio." [G. S.]

CALLISTRATUS (1) Father of the successor of Basil of Amasea. (Tillem. v. 517.)

(2) An Isaurian bishop, a friend of Chrysostom. Callistratus having written to Chrysostom to excuse himself for not having visited him at Cucusus on account of the length of the journey, and the inclemency of the season, Chrysostom replied early in the winter of 404 thanking him for his letters, and expressing a hope that Callistratus might be able to visit him at some future time, and would meanwhile gratify him with frequent letters (Chrysost. Epist. 200; Tillemont, xi. 280.) [E. V.]

(3) Legendary Martyr, Sept 27 (Menol. Bas.).

CALLISTUS (1) (i. q. formosissimus; later spelt Calistus, but Calixtus first in the 11th century, Bunsen's Hippolytus, i. 131, note), the successor of pope Zephyrinus in A.D. 218, said to have been a Roman, and the son of Domitius.

Nothing was known of Callistus, except that the Martyrologium Romanum contained a tradition of his martyrdom, till the discovery of the Philosophumenci in 1850. This work, which first appeared under the name of Origen, but has since been agreed to be by Hippolytus, almost certainly the contemporary bishop of Portus, gives an account of the life of Callistus which is scarcely credible respecting one of the bishops of Rome, who before had been honoured as a saint and martyr. Accordingly, much controversy has sprung up round the names of Callistus and Hippolytus. If Hippolytus is to be believed, Callistus was an unprincipled adventurer: if Callistus can be defended, grave doubt is thrown upon the veracity of Hippolytus. Bunsen and Wordsworth adopt the former view: Döllinger the latter, in an ingenious treatise, of which a translation by Mr. Plummer has just (1876) been published by Messrs. Clark of Edinburgh. No doubt it is a peculiarly hard fate to be known to posterity only from the pages of an unsparing rival: yet the story as told by Hippolytus is lifelike and natural, and, however much we may allow for personal rancour, we cannot but believe it to be substantially true, at least in its main features.

He tells us that Callistus was originally a slave in the household of a rich Christian called Carpophorus. His master intrusted to his charge a bank in the Piscina Publica, where Callistus induced his fellow-Christians to deposit their savings upon the security of the name of Carpophorus. The bank broke, and Callistus fled; but Carpophorus tracked him to Portus, and found him on board an outward-bound ship. The slave threw himself overboard in despair, intending suicide; but he was picked up, and delivered to his master, who brought him back and put him to the pistrinum, or mill worked by the lowest slaves, for a punishment. After a time, however, he was set at liberty, on the petition of some fellow-Christians, apparently the sufferers from his bankruptcy, who represented that he was hindered by his captivity from collecting money due to him, to which his creditors would now be entitled. But the plea was false: and being released he only sought to compass his former end of suicide, and for this purpose raised a riot in a synagogue of the Jews. By them he was seized and brought before Fuscianus, the praefectus urbi, who, in spite of the fact that Carpophorus claimed him as his slave, condemned him, as a disturber of public worship allowed by the Roman laws, to be sent to the mines of Sardinia (Philosophumena, ed. Miller, pp. 286, 287).

Of the narrative so far everything is plain except the last scene; but his supposed desire for death is certainly an inadequate motive for his raising the riot in the Jewish synagogue. Döllinger supposes that, while claiming his debts at the hands of members of the Jewish synagogue, his zeal for religion impelled him to bear witness for Christ, and that thus his exile to Sardinia was a species of martyrdom for Christianity (Döllinger, Hippolytus u. Callistus, p. 119). The date of his exile is proximately fixed by the fact that Fuscianus served the office of praefectus urbi between A.D. 188 and A.D. 193 (Bunsen's Hippolytus, i. 138).

Some time after, proceeds Hippolytus, Marcia, the Christian mistress of Commodus, persuaded the emperor to grant an amnesty to the Christians who were undergoing punishment in Sardinia; and Callistus, at his own entreaty, was released, although his name was not on the list (which had been supplied by the then bishop Victor) of those intended to benefit by Marcia's clemency. Callistus reappeared in Rome, much to the annoyance of Victor, for the outrage on the synagogue was recent and notorious. He therefore sent him to Antium, making him a small monthly allowance (Philosophumena, p. 288). Milman thinks that this must have been about A.D. 190—the very year of Victor's accession (Lut. Christ. i. 55, note).

Here we see plainly that the narrative of Hippolytus wants explanation, which is not given; though perhaps the circumstances under which he is recounting the early life of a theological rival sufficiently explain the omission. But that Carpophorus's runaway slave should suddenly have become of such importance that the pope should buy him off with an allowance, and insist upon his residing at a distance, shews that Callistus was already thought to be no ordinary man.

He must have resided at Antium for a long time; for we are told that Zephyrinus, Victor's successor in the bishopric, recalled him, and Zephyrinus did not succeed till A.D. 202, twelve years after the presumed date of Callistus' going to Antium. The new bishop placed him in offices of trust: "gave him the control of the clergy, and set him over the cemetery" (Phil. p. 288). This notice makes us believe that Callistus had been ordained during his residence at Antium; and the last-quoted words, that Zephyrinus "set him over the cemetery" (εἰς τὸ κοιμητήριον κατέστησεν), have a special interest for us; for one of the largest of the catacombs in Rome goes by the name of the Coemeterium Sti. Calixti. We can hardly doubt that this was the cemetery over which Callistus was set; or that De Rossi is right in his conjecture from these words, that "this was the first common cemetery given to the pope by some noble family for the use of the whole Christian community" (Roma Sotterranea, by Northcote and Brownlow, p. 86). That the care of this should have been intrusted to the same man to whom also was given the control of the clergy, proves what a high value was set upon this first public burial-place of the Christians in Rome. As a matter of fact, thirteen out of the eighteen popes next after this time are said to have been buried here; and the names of seven out of the thirteen (Callistus himself being one of the exceptions) have been identified from old inscriptions found in one crypt of this cemetery (Id. pp. 130-151).

It was now (A.D. 202) for the first time that Callistus became a power in the Roman church. To Hippolytus, who held a double position in that church [HIPPOLYTUS], he became especially obnoxious. As he was the archdeacon, so to speak, who was set over the Roman clergy, he was over Hippolytus, who was the presbyter of one of the Roman cardines or churches; but as a presbyter himself, he was inferior in ecclesiastical position to one who was also the bishop of Portus. It is easy to read some such feeling of rivalry beneath Hippolytus's account of the church in Rome at this time. They were probably the two most prominent men in the Roman church under this episcopate, and yet opposed to one another on all questions of doctrine and practice. Hippolytus claims to have detected Callistus's double-dealing from the first: but he tells us that Callistus, aspiring as he did to be bishop of Rome himself, would break openly with neither party. The question which now divided the church was that of the Monarchia, or how to reconcile the sovereignty of the Father with the Godhead of the Son. Callistus, who had obtained a complete ascendancy over the mind of Zephyrinus, according to Hippolytus an ignorant and venal man, took care that he should use language now agreeing with the Sabellians, now with Hippolytus. At the same time he personally sided with Sabellius, called Hippolytus a Dithesist, and persuaded Sabellius, who might otherwise have gone right, to coalesce with the Monarchians. His motive in all this, says Hippolytus, was that there might be two parties in the church which he could play off against each other, continuing on friendly terms with both (Phil. p. 289).

As to the practice of the church under Zephyrinus, we find from contemporary accounts that there was a liberal tendency in its rulers, which can hardly have been less distasteful to Hippolytus than their heretical views. We find from Tertullian that Zephyrinus began, no doubt under Callistus' influence, the relaxation of discipline which he himself afterwards carried farther when he became bishop. Till this time it had been the practice to exclude adulterers from the church communion, and not to readmit them even upon repentance. Under Zephyrinus first the practice obtained of allowing such offenders to be re-admitted after public penance (De Pudicitia, i. 21; Döllinger, pp. 126-130).

Zephyrinus died in A.D. 218, and Callistus was elected bishop instead. That they preferred him to Hippolytus shews the popularity of his liberal church policy among the Roman clergy: and Hippolytus does not scruple to avow that by this act the Roman church had formally committed itself to heresy. He regards his own as the orthodox church, in opposition to what he henceforth considers as only being the Callistian sect (Phil. pp. 289, 292).

Yet the first act apparently of Callistus as bishop was a step towards conciliating his rival. He threw off, perhaps actually excommunicated (ἀρέωρε) Sabellius, whom till now he had protected. But he only did this, says Hippolytus, to proclaim a heresy quite as deadly as the other. If he is to be believed, he is right in thus characterising it. The Father and the Son, Callistianism said, were one; together they made the Spirit, which Spirit took flesh in the womb of the Virgin. Callistus, says Hippolytus indignantly, is as Patripassian as Sabellius, for he makes the Father suffer with the Son, if not as the Son (Id. pp. 289-330).

But this charge against Callistian doctrine, if the gravest, is not the only one. Hippolytus brings against him several other grave accusations of further relaxing the bonds of church discipline (Id. pp. 290, 291). But all his accusations run up into four. 1. He relaxed the terms of readmission into the church: accounting no sin so deadly as to be incapable of readmission, and not exacting penance as a necessary preliminary to it. This, it may be observed, was but to develop the church policy which had already obtained under Zephyrinus. But certainly, if the last part of Hippolytus's accusation is true, Callistus's acts were reversed by later bishops. 2. He relaxed the terms of admission into orders, ordaining even those who had been twice or thrice married; and permitting men already ordained to marry freely. Here too appears the liberal reformer; though we can well understand with what horror such reforms would be treated by the more strictly orthodox, and also how an unscrupulous man like Callistus might be impelled thus to pack the clergy in the hope of gaining more support. 3. He also relaxed the marriage laws of the church, thereby bringing them into conflict with the laws of the state. How far he went in this direction is not clear, for the exact words of the passage in which Hippolytus makes this charge are hopelessly corrupt. But it is clear that he looks upon it as the gravest he has yet made: for he says that a general immorality was the consequence of this step. How far this was the actual consequence, or only what the more orthodox thought must of necessity follow, may be doubted: and Döllinger pertinently observes that Hippolytus does not even hint a charge of personal immorality against Callistus, though no doubt he would not have refrained from so doing, had such charges been afloat. (Döllinger, Hippolytus und Callistus, p. 195.) 4. He allowed second baptisms. Hippolytus does not explain his charge, and it is not easy to see what it means, unless that a repetition of baptism was substituted for the penance which had been necessary at the re-admission of grievous sinners into the church. This is the only accusation which Döllinger meets with a distinct contradiction, on the ground that no such practice was known in the later Roman church (p. 189). Yet it surely is not as inconceivable as it seemed to him that later bishops of Rome might have reversed the acts of their predecessor, if he had really ventured on such a step.

This is all that Hippolytus tells us about Callistus, and this is all that we know about his life. He is said to have died in A.D. 223 (Eus. H. E. vi. 20). Tradition tells us that he was scourged in a popular rising, thrown out of a window of his house in Trastevere, and flung into a well. This would account for no epitaph being found to Callistus in the Papal crypt of his own cemetery in the catacombs. We do not know the nature of the tumult which caused his death: but we do not hear of any persecution by the civil power in Rome between the reigns of Marcus Aurelius and Maximin. Either, therefore, it was a tumult among the Christians themselves, which is not impossible from the excited state of controversial feeling shewn by Hippolytus; or it was an outbreak of pagan hostility which was not countenanced by the civil power. [G. H. M.]

CALLISTUS (2) A deacon who accused Pope DAMASUS of adultery, and was expelled from the church by the Council of Aquileia. (Tillem. viii. 415.)

(3) Prefect of Egypt, killed by his servants, Sept. A.D. 422; to which event a passage of CYRIL's homily the next Easter (Hom. Pasch. 11, c. 8) is supposed by Tillemont to refer. (Tillem. xiv. 282; Theophan. Chron. p. 72, ed. Paris, 1655.) [E. B. B.]

(4) Son of a Roman prefect, and the subject of a miracle of healing in the legendary Life of Epiphanius (ii. 337). [G. S.]

(5) A servant of Marcellus ('Disputation of Archelaus and Manes,' Routh, Rel. Sac. v. 48). [G. S.]

CALLITROPOS, sister of Epiphanius (Vita Epiphani, ii. 318). [G. S.]

CALLWEN, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patroness of a church in the parish of Delynog in Brecknockshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 153).

[C. H.]

CALMAIG. [COLMAN (20) of Druim-mór or Dromore.]

CALMINIUS, ST. This person is commonly known by the French as St. Carméry, or St. Calmèle. Both Carméry and Calmèle are said to have founded the monastery of Manzac or Mozac in Auvergne belonging to the church of Clermont, and the monastery of Moustier-St.-Chaffre belonging to that of Velay. The uncertainty about them, however, is illustrated by the fact that Carméry is celebrated on the 19th of August, Calmèle on the 22nd of November; Carméry is said to have died both in the 6th and 7th centuries, Calmèle at the beginning of the eighth.

The anonymous Vita Calminii, edited by Thomas Aquinas, states that the saint lived in the time of Justinian. The first Justinian died in 565, the second in 711. But there is no reason for trusting this date. The same document makes him senator and duke of Aquitaine.

Among the letters of St. Sidonius Apollinaris, who died at the end of the 5th century, occurs one addressed to a Calminius of Auvergne, who was in arms for the empire against his native district, which was in the hands of the Visigoths. Sidonius bewails it, begging him to come and see him, now that a truce gives him a chance.

This is one of the later letters of Sidonius, and is placed by Tillemont in 474. If Calminius was now a young man, he may well have reached senatorial rank in the time of Justinian I.

There are not however sufficient materials to determine the identity of the correspondent of Sidonius Apollinaris with the ambiguous St. Calminius, Calmelius, Carméry, or Carmèle. Both are of Auvergne. (AA. SS. Bolland. Aug. iii. 759; Tillemont, Eccl. Hist. xvi. p. 249; Sidonius Apollinaris, Epist. lib. v. num. 12, Patrolog. Lat. lviii. p. 543; Gallia Christiana, ii. p. 352; Migne, Encycl. Théol. xl. pp. 547, 522.)

[W. M. S.]

CALOCAERUS and PARTHENIUS, eunuchs, chamberlain and major-domo (Mart. Hieron. Berne MS.) to Aemilianus, a Christian of Armenia, who was consul under the emperor Philip, and to his daughter Anatolia Callista. He left them as his executors to have charge of his daughter, and to distribute his wealth to the poor. Decius interfered, and is said, after himself first trying them with offers of friendship if they would sacrifice, and menaces of death if they would not, to have left them to his prefect, Libanius, who had them separately into his closet to tempt and to torture, Calocaerus first, then Parthenius. Their acts, which only exist in a form not earlier than the 6th century, relate that Calocaerus's tortures were cut short, because the prefect perceived him rather to desire than to fear them, and ordered him to be removed and the other brought; that Parthenius told the gospel history, and so shocked the prefect by what he said of Jove, that both were at once condemned to the stake; that the flames would not burn, and therefore the martyrs were dispatched by a blow on the head with a burning log; and that, while the prefect was being informed of it, the bodies were stolen by their fellow-servants, at Anatolia's bidding. The martyrdom was on the 19th of May. The bodies were transferred to a safer crypt during the persecution of Diocletian, Feb. 11, A.D. 304 (Rossi, ii. 210; Acta SS. May, iv. 300). [E. B. B.]

CALOCAERIUS (2) Said to have been deputy and successor of APOLLINARIS at Ravenna, and to have held the see from the time of Vespasian to the time of Adrian. (Acta SS. Feb. ii. 508.)

(3) Martyr (under Adrian?) at Albenga, on the coast of Genoa, put by Usuard at Brescia, March 19 or April 18 (v. Till. ii. 249). [E. B. B.]

CALOGERIUS, bishop of Claudiopolis, in Pontus, at the council of A.D. 449, at Ephesus; was represented by a deputy. (Tillem. xv. 551.) [E. B. B.]

CALOPODIUS, eunuch and presbyter, Eutychian, deposed by Anatolius A.D. 451 (Labbe, Conc. iv. 521; Tillem. xv. 637). One Calopodius stole the authentic copy of the acts of the council of Chalcedon from the altar of the great church of Constantinople, of which he was steward, and brought it to the Emperor Anastasius, who tore it up, A.D. 511. (Tillem. xvi. 690; Theoph. Chronog. p. 133, Patrol. cviii. 365, 366; Niceph. Callist. Hist. Eccles. lib. xvi. c. 26, Patrol. cxlvii. 167.) The first must have been a very old man then, if his identity with the second is assumed. But in the affair of A.D. 451, as related in Labbe, he is called presbyter as well as eunuch; while in the theft of A.D. 511 he is spoken of by Theophanes and Nicephorus as eunuch and oeconomus only. The disgraced heretic of some rank in his party, which the narrative of A.D. 451 shews that he was, is not quite in place as the steward of the great church in 511, with the slur of obscurity—"a certain Calopodius," which is all Nicephorus calls him. [E. B. B.]

CALOSYRIUS, a suffragan of Cyril of Alexandria, who writes to him about A.D. 444, a letter to be read in all the monasteries of his diocese of Arsinoë, especially in one that stood on a very desolate mountain, called Calamo, against Anthropomorphism, and against confounding idleness with sanctity. The same bishop at Ephesus in A.D. 449 declared that he had always maintained communion with EUTYCHES. (Cyrl. Ep. 83; Conc. iv. 119, 271, 315, 322; Tillem. xv. 662.) [E. B. B.]

CALPHURNIUS. See MACARIUS. (Cyp. Epp. 21, 22.) [E. W. B.]

CALPURNIUS (1) Father of Pope PONTIANUS.

(2) [ST. PATRICK.] [E. B. B.]

CALUPPANUS, ST. Born in the year 527, this saint in his early years lived at the monastery of Incla, where he was especially noted for his humility and gentleness. His self-denial in the matter of food was so excessive that he was unable, through weakness, to perform his share of the ordinary work of the monastery. The other monks reproached him on this account, and treated him so unkindly in consequence, that he at last withdrew from them altogether, and took up his abode in a cave in the neighbourhood where he built himself an oratory. Study and prayer occupied his entire time, while his fasts were most severe; even such scanty food as he possessed he gave to the poor who flocked to his cave. While in this retirement, it is said, he was much persecuted by evil spirits; but he vanquished them all by using the sign of the cross and repeating the Lord's Prayer. St. Avitus visited him at his cave and ordained him deacon and priest. From this period until his death he is said to have performed many miracles of healing, which are duly recorded by his biographers. He died in the year 576, aged about fifty. St. Gregory of Tours, who accompanied St. Avitus, speaks highly of his piety, and gives an account of his visit to the cave in which St. Caluppanus dwelt (Acta SS. Boll. Mart. i. 262). [H. W. Y.]

CALVINUS, CALWINUS, a presbyter addressed by Alcuin in two letters, dated respectively, in the edition of Frobenius, circ. A.D. 797 and A.D. 800. From his being mentioned in connexion with "Symeon sacerdos" (under which name Alcuin is thought to have intended, after a manner usual with him, Eanbald archbishop of York) it is conjectured that he was an Englishman. In the first letter (Ep. 73, Patrol. c. 245, Ep. 58, ed. Frob.), wherein he is exhorted to a contempt of wealth and worldly honours, it is added—"nil tibi deesse aestimo in cella sancti Stephani honestae conversationis," but Frobenius is ignorant whether this cell is some English monastery, or whether it was that of St. Stephen at Choisy in France, to which Calvinus might have retired. The second letter (Ep. 116, Patrol. c. 347, Ep. 175, ed. Frob.) is addressed to him jointly with Cuculus, and they are bidden to exhort "Symeon" to fortitude under his tribulations. He tells them he has laid down the burden of his pastoral duties, and is now tranquilly awaiting his last summons at St. Martin's. He entreats their prayers, and begs them to remind all his friends, especially his "son Symeon," to join in supplication for him. His salutations are sent to Credulus, but as this name occurs nowhere else in Alcuin's writings, it gives us no help in discovering who Calvinus and Cuculus were. [C. H.]

CAMERUS, ordained deacon by Polycarp, succeeded Papius in the see of Smyrna, according to Metaphrastes. (Till. ii. 372). [E. B. B.]

CAMILLA (1), ST., of Auxerre, went with St. Germanus to Ravenna, but is said to have died on the return journey in the year 437 (Acta SS. Boll. Mart. i. 342). [H. W. Y.]

(2) Widow related to ENNODIUS. She had dedicated her child to the service of the church before giving him a liberal education; for which Ennodius rebukes her, but says that a liberal education must thenceforth be thought of no more. (Enn. Ep. ix. 29, in De la Bigne, Bibliotheca, t. vi. p. 238). [E. B. B.]

CAMILLIANUS, ST., confessor and bishop of Troyes. Is supposed to have died in the year 525 or 536, but the precise date is not known. He was present at the first council of Orleans in the year 511. His acts are doubtful (Acta SS. Boll. Jul. vi. 566). [H. W. Y.]

CAMILLUS (1) Presbyter of Genoa, who consulted St. Prosper respecting some propositions of Augustine on predestination, after that father's death, and to whom Prosper addressed his book of Answers to the Genoese. (Ceillier, x. 300; Prosper, p. 242.)

(2) A.D. 473, father of St. ENNODIUS, bishop of Pavia. (Ceillier, x. 569; Enn. Ep. iv. 25.)

CAMMARCH, Welsh saint of the 6th century, founder of Llangammarch in Brecknockshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 233). [C. H.]

CAMPANIANUS, correspondent of Sidonius (Ep. i. 10, p. 24). He had recommended the prefect of the granaries to Sidonius, who was prefect of the city (see Dict. Class. Biog. 'Sidonius'). Patrol. viii. 465. [E. B. B.]

CAMPITAE, MONTENSES, or RUPITANI, a small congregation of Donatists at Rome, mentioned by Jerome, Optatus, and Augustine. Optatus says that their first bishop was Victor of Numidia, and that among the forty or more churches at Rome he and his flock had no place to assemble. So they surrounded a cave outside the city with wattles, and used it for their conventicle. Jerome says that they met on a mountain. The three names are of course derived from canjnas, mons, and rupes, in allusion to their place of meeting. (Historia Donatistarum, Patr. Lat. xi. 798; Hieronymus, Dialogus adv. Luciferianos, Patr. Lat. lxxiii. 201; Augustine, de Haeresibus, Patrol. Lat. xlii. 43; Augustine, Ep. liiii., Patr. Lat. xxxiii. 195.) [W. M. S.]

CAMULACUS. [CAENILACI.]

CANACARES (Photius, cf. Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vii. 318), or CANACARIUS. [CONSTANTINUS SILVANUS.]

CANDIDA (1). (Cyp. Epp. xxi. xxii.) See CELERINUS. [E. W. B.]

(2) A Manichean woman, of Thipasa in Northern Africa, in the 5th century. (Augustin. t. viii.) [E. B. C.]

CANDIDIANUS (1) Son of Galerius, adopted by Valeria, daughter of Diocletian, put to death by Licinius. (Lact. de Mort. Pers. 50; De Broglie, i. 271.)

(2) Governor of Cappadocia under Julian, though a Pagan, was friendly to Basil (Till. ix. 40), and to Gregory Nazianzen, who wrote to him his Epistle 194 (Ib. 360). He may perhaps be the general whose daughter Bassianilla was eminent for piety at the opening of the 5th century (Ib. xi. 522), and the friend to whom, in 404, Chrysostom writes his Letter 42 (Chrys. iii. 633). [E. B. B.]

(3) An old and intimate friend of Chrysostom, to whom he wrote from Cuculus in 404, acquainting him with his sufferings from the inroads of the Isaurians, by whom the town was blockaded, and from his own ill-health, and requesting him to cheer his solitude with frequent letters, which would be doubly welcome if they brought the news of his being in good health (Chrysost. Epist. 42). [E. V.]

(4) A correspondent of Ambrose (Ep. 91). [J. L. D.]

(5) Bishop, carries a letter to Pope Siricius (Till. x. 157, 362). Perhaps the same as the bearer of a letter from Victoricius at Rouen, to Paulinus, and perhaps also to Pope Innocent (Ib. 674). He may be the same as the brother and fellow presbyter known to Augustine by the letters of Paulinus, welcomed by him with all his heart, and sent back with the book on the care of the dead, which, at his instance, Augustine wrote. (Aug. Cur. Mort. 23; Tillem. xiii. 834.)

(6) A lay correspondent of Nilus in the 5th century, who is informed by the saint why monks fasten the pallium on the left shoulder while men of the world fasten it on the right. (Nilus, ii. Ep. 245; see Ceillier (ed. Paris), viii. 219.)

CANDIDIANUS (7) Deacon, A.D. 431, carries the letter of Alypius of Constantinople to Cyril of Alexandria (Labbe, Conc. iii. 786; Ceillier, viii. 291).

(8) Count of the horse guards, A.D. 431, sent by Theodosius II. and Valentinian III. to keep order at the council of Ephesus, and instructed not to intermeddle in theological debates, but to remove and prohibit from the city all lay strangers and foreign monks, for the prevention of bigotry and tumult, and to keep the bishops in Ephesus, like jurors, not permitting them to return home or visit the court or go elsewhere till the dispute was settled, nor yet to attack any other questions before they had done with the main question of the Nestorian dogma, nor to start any pecuniary or criminal accusations at all. When, on June 22, sixteen days after Pentecost, the festival appointed for the meeting of the council, the fathers grew tired of waiting for John of Antioch, and demanded to begin at once, Candidianus demurred, but at last, for the avoidance of tumult, consented to read the imperial mandate, which was received with applause, and to leave them to their deliberations, charging them to do nothing rash. Afterwards, when requested to obey the mandate, they would not listen, but drove out with contumely the bishops that Nestorius had sent to them, and Candidianus himself for venturing to expostulate. This is his own account, confirmed by Nestorius (who bases his refusal to attend the council on the fact that he waited to be duly summoned by Candidianus, and represents the various messages sent by Cyril to summon him as the beginning of a seditious uproar, in which his own friends were denied a place of session or sanctuary, and were all threatened with death), and by Theodoret, Ep. 152, t. 4, p. 1314; Mansi, Conc. iv. 1271.

The Acts of the council say nothing of such disorderly proceedings. Next day, when the act of deposition of Nestorius was posted up, Candidianus tore it down, sent it to the emperors, forbade the criers to proclaim it, and collected the Nestorian bishops to await the arrival of John of Antioch and form another council in opposition. This they did five days after, June 27, as soon as John arrived at his inn; and Candidianus, after telling the above story, left the Syrians and Nestorians to their deliberations, and they deposed Cyril and Memnon. On June 29, the emperors wrote back, reprobating the hasty proceedings of Cyril, and commanding all the bishops to wait till the council could be duly held in the presence of John of Antioch, of Candidianus, and of another count, whom they promised to send, for fear, perhaps, that Candidianus had been too much the partisan of Nestorius. Such was the accusation brought against him by the council, who wrote on July 1, accusing him of refusing to let the real acts of the council be transmitted, and of sending the acts of the opposition council at once to the emperors, so as to preoccupy their ears (Labbe, Conc. iii. 444, 452, 566 590 ff., 703, 747; Mansi, iv. 1117, 1130, 1233, 1259, 1378, 1422; Ceillier, viii. 575 (xiii. 723); Fleury, ch. xxv. §§ 34-46, vol. vi.; Neale, Alexandria, i. 256-266; Socrates, vii. 34; Gibbon, ch. xlvii. notes 43-46. Compare Isidore, Ep. i. 311.) Candidianus is not mentioned in Godfred's Prosopographia of the code of Theodosius.

CANDIDIANUS (9) Mentioned by Olympiodorus (Photius, Bibliothec. cod. 80) as despatched along with Aspar to put down the usurper John at Ravenna (A.D. 423-425), may be the same as the above. It is just possible that he may be identical with (11). He has been conjectured, without grounds, to be the grandfather of the latter.

(10) Bishop of Antioch in Pisidia at the synod of Constantinople in A.D. 449, which condemned Eutyches, and whose acts were read at Ephesus and Chalcedon (Conc. iv. 236, 237). He upheld the same acts at Ephesus the same year, where he claimed to have been bred in the catholic faith from childhood, and to have been archdeacon in the royal city (Ib. 304). Theodoret, in his epistle to John of Germanica (Ep. 147, vol. iv. 1109 [1275], ed. Migne), tells us that on this occasion he was accused of many adulteries and other iniquities, and the president answered, "If you accuse his doctrines, we receive your charges; but we are not here to judge adulteries." See also Conc. iv. pp. 262, 309, and p. 108, where his name is written CALENDIO (Tillem. xv. 579).

(11) Friend or kinsman of Sidonius, addressed by him (Ep. 8) from Rome (A.D. 456 or 458-461, or 467-472), with jests against his birthplace, Cesena, and his domicile Ravenna, in retaliation for his jests against the wintry regions of Clermont (Ceillier, x. 383). [E. B. B.]

(12) A martyr who suffered by fire with Polinectus and Filotomus, according to Florus, who gives no particulars. Commemorated Jan. 11. (Florus, in Bed. Mart.) [C. H.]

CANDIDUS (1), author of a work on the Hexameron, of which mention is made by Eusebius (H. E. v. 27). He is classed by him among orthodox church writers, and placed under the reign of Severus, A.D. 193-211; but no great stress can be laid on this date, since Eusebius appears to have known only the work, and to have had no information as to the history of the writer. [G. S.]

(2) A Valentinian, who held a disputation with Origen about the year A.D. 228; the result of which was that Origen incurred censure, as having fallen into errors no less grave than those of his antagonist. In particular, it was said that in repelling the Valentinian doctrine that the Son was an emanation, he had made him but a creature, and that while maintaining that, even in the Devil's case, sin resulted from an abuse of free will, and not from any necessity of nature, he had taught that the Devil's nature was capable of repentance and ultimate salvation. This disputation is not extant, and is only known by the references made to it in the controversy between Jerome and Rufinus (see Hieron. Apolog. ad Rufinum, ii. 512 Vallarsi; and Rufinus, de adulteratione librorum Origenis). Rufinus l.c. gives an extract of a letter of Origen, in which he complains that his antagonist in a disputation had published an unfair account of it; and it seems more likely that the disputation with Candidus is intended than, as De la Rue supposes (Origen, i. 6), the disputation referred to in the letter of Africanus. [G. S.]

CANDIDUS (3) Vespronius Candidus, mentioned by Tertullian (ad Scap. 4). He is adduced by him, with other examples of humane governors, such as Cincius Severus, Asper and Pudens, as having resisted the clamours of persecuting mobs. He excused himself from delivering up a certain Christian to death on the plea that it might cause a riot. [C. H.]

(4) An Arian controversialist, c. 354, the friend of the celebrated African rhetorician, Fabius Marinus Victorinus, whose conversion to the Christian faith in his old age is narrated so graphically by St. Augustine in his Confessions (viii. 3). A controversial treatise of Candidus's, de Generatione Divini Verbi, addressed to his old friend Victorinus, called forth a reply, Confutatorium Candidi Ariani, to which it is usually prefixed. Candidus's only answer was the sending back a translation of the letter of Arius to Eusebius of Nicomedia, written in the early stage of the controversy, and that of Eusebius to Paulinus of Tyre, given by Theodoret (H. E. i. 5, 6) and by Epiphanius, which formed the groundwork of Victorinus's four books adversus Arium. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 229; Maii Collect. iii. part 2, p. 1; Tillemont, x. 404; Migne, Patrol. viii. 1013, 1036.) [E. V.]

(5) A bishop of the Anomoean party, consecrated, together with Arrianns, by Aetius and Eunomius at Constantinople in the year 363, to superintend, the one the churches of Lydia, the other those of Ionia. This ordination was by no means popular with the Eunomians generally, who took offence at it as the act of the leaders of the party alone without consulting the members of the body. The disaffected party was headed by Theodosius, and appealed to Eudoxius, who supported them in their opposition to the newly appointed prelates. Candidus and Arrian used their influence with Jovian, whose kinsmen they were, against Athanasius, but ineffectually (Philostorg. H. E. viii. 2, 4, 6, 7). [E. V.]

(6) Donatist bishop of Villa Regia, who returned to the church, and was continued in his office (Aug. contra Crescon. ii. 10). Tillemont supposes him to have returned in the time of Macarius, A.D. 348 (vi. 120). He was probably deceased when Augustine wrote, A.D. 402, as Cresconius was then the Catholic bishop of Villa Regia. Augustine does not quote the other (Donatist) Cresconius verbatim, as the italics in Migne would seem to imply. [E. B. B.]

(7) Bishop of Sergiopolis, A.D. 544 (Procop. Bell. Pers. ii. 5), had died before A.D. 554. (Tillem. v. 493.) [CUOSROES.] [E. B. B.]

(8) One of the two more distinguished ("nobiliores") of the forty soldiers martyred at Sebaste in Armenia Minor in the time of king Licinius under the praeses Agricolaus. Bele and Usuard both mention him, but give the days respectively March 9 and March 11 (Bed. Mart.; Usuard, Mart.). [SEBASTE, MARTYRS OF.] [C. H.]

(9) Archimandrite, to whom, in A.D. 449 or 450, Theodoret wrote (Ep. 128), telling him to get coadjutors in his old age, to be to him as Aaron and Hur, for it was not a time for his hands to be slack, when heretics, heathens, and Jews were at peace, and only the church oppressed (Tillem. xv. 300).

CANDIDUS (10) A presbyter sent by Gregory the Great into Gaul (A.D. 595) with letters to queen Brunchilda and king Childebert, charged with the administration of the little patrimony of St. Peter in Gaul, to collect the revenues of the same, and invest them in raiment for the poor, or in English slave lads of 17 or 18, to serve in the monasteries,* as Gallic gold was not current in Rome; and because the boys would be heathens, he was to be sure to send a presbyter with them, to baptize any of them in case of accident or illness on the way (Greg. Epp. 5, 6, 7, lib. vi.). He was commended, along with St. Augustine, to Pelagius of Tours and Serenus of Marseilles (Ep. 52, ibid.). Virgil, bishop of Arles, is warned not to imitate his predecessor in applying the dues of St. Peter to the purposes of his own diocese (Ep. 53, lib. vi.). In June, A.D. 597, he was charged to redeem four Christian captives that a Jew had bought and held in slavery at Narbonne (Ep. 24, lib. vii.). He had in A.D. 593 been "defender of the church" in Rome, and charged with paying a blind man, named Albinus, son of Martin, two tremisses, about 8s. yearly (Ep. 28, lib. iv.). In A.D. 598 or 599 he distrained upon a Jew named Jannus, took his ship and all his goods, and then—at least so the Jew represented to the pope—refused to restore the bond that he had against him. Gregory writes to Faustinus, who held a similar office at Palermo, to investigate the affair (Ep. 56, lib. ix.). In A.D. 601 we find Candidus attempting to excuse bishop Desiderius for the enormity of teaching grammar (Ep. 54, lib. xi.). A priest named Aurelius was sent to him, and he was charged, if he found any place in want of a priest or abbat, to put the said person into the living (Ep. 70, ib.).

(11) Bishop of Civita Vecchia (Greg. Mag. Ep. 8, lib. ii.; Ep. 28, lib. vi.), is directed in A.D. 592 not to mulet a man of his pay because of sickness, and is allowed in A.D. 596 to ordain some monks of monasteries in his diocese to serve as presbyters under him, as he had complained that he had none. He is enjoined to choose them wisely.

(12) Gregory's successor as abbat of the monastery of St. Andrew, is warned in A.D. 598 not further to molest Maurentius, master of soldiery, brother and heir of a deceased monk in his monastery, as the suit between them had been settled once by the pope in the brother's favour (Ep. 11, lib. viii.). In February 601 he was sent by Marinianus, bishop of Ravenna, to Gregory for relics, and found the pope ill of gout (Ep. 32, lib. xi.).

(13) Episcopus Dulcimensis or Fulginiensis at the third Roman council under Gregory, July 596 (Fronto, ad Kul. Rom.). [E. B. B.]

CANDIDUS (14) ISAURUS, an orthodox Christian historian who flourished in the reign

* The mission of Candidus (A.D. 596) coincides in time with the mission of AUGUSTINE. It appears from the sixth section of the second book of John the Deacon's Life of Gregory, that the English slave lads were not improbably intended for choristers, for that was how lads were employed in monasteries. Gregory hopes they will "get on and do good" (proficiant).

of Anastasius, A.D. 491–513. He was a native of Isauria Tracheia, and was by profession a notary, and one of the most influential men of his time in his own country. Photius informs us (Codex, 79) that Candidus wrote a history of his own times in three books, from the accession of Leo the Thracian, in 457, to the death of Zeno the Isaurian, in 491. Photius severely censures his style, which he characterises as harsh and inharmonious, abounding in novel constructions, and in poetic diction unsuited to the gravity of history. He commends him, however, as a zealous maintainer of the faith as set forth at Chalcedon, and an opponent of all innovators. This history is lost, with the exception of the few extracts given by Photius, and a small fragment in Suidas (sub voc. Χειρί(σ)τε). These are printed in the Corpus Hist. Byzant. ed. Labbe, vol. i. p. 154, seq. (Fabricius, Bibl. Graec. vi. 239, lib. v. c. 5; ix. 276, lib. v. c. 34; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 466; Migne, Patrolog. lxxxv. 1741.) [E. V.]

CANDIDUS (15) THEBAEUS, martyr, commemorated on Sept. 22 (Bed. Mart.; Usnard, Mart.) [THEBAEAN LEGION.] [C. H.]

CANDIDUS (16) WIZO, otherwise surnamed WITTO, WITSO, WISO, presbyter, a disciple of Alcuin, in whose writings his name appears for the space of about 10 years, ending A.D. 802. His home was the monastery of St. Martin of Tours, the residence of Alcuin, who usually mentions him, and never but in language of fatherly regard, in connexion with errands to and from distinguished persons, one of whom was Arno, bishop of Saltzburg, and another Charlemagne himself. Subjoined are the epistles in which he is named, according to the edition of Frobenius, whose dates also are adopted:—circ. A.D. 793, Ep. 14; A.D. 796, Epp. 39, 38 (thought to be alluded to); A.D. 797, Epp. 55, 54; A.D. 799, Ep. 76; A.D. 800, Ep. 176; A.D. 801, Epp. 109, 188, 101, 105; A.D. 802, Epp. 118, 193; anno incerto, Ep. 123. Alcuin dedicates his commentary on Ecclesiastes "dilectissimis in Christo filiis, Oniae sacerdoti, Candido presbytero, Nathanaeli diacono" (tom. i. 410); here for the first and only time calling Candidus a presbyter. From internal evidence the dedication must have been written in A.D. 802.

The earliest mention of Candidus represents him as bringing his master accounts of king Charles; so that about A.D. 793 he must have been beyond the age and status of a pupil, though he is ever addressed as filius. When named in the letters to great persons, he is always their servulus or famulus; but this is only the language of deference, and he remained until nearly the last in the employment of Alcuin. In A.D. 800 he is the bearer of Alcuin's work Adversus Felicem to Charles (tom. i. 788, 921). In A.D. 801, just after the great coronation, he brings good news from Rome and the now imperial court; and in the same year, on the emperor's return home, he has the honour to convey his master's congratulations. This evidently leads to his advancement, for in A.D. 802 he is seen established at court, in company with the two ecclesiastics already named, receiving paternal advice from his old master who hopes he will continue to please God, be faithful to the emperor, and set an example in the palace. He and Nathanael having lately quitted the parental nest of their education, as Alcuin expresses it, are now on their own wings in the open sky of public life. In the dedication of the commentaries the same phrases recur, which fix the chronology, while it is obvious how the volume, Ecclesiastes, suits the situation of the young men.

It seems impossible to trace the name of Candidus through the passages we have enumerated without a conviction of his identity throughout; and we make this remark in consequence of inferences that have been drawn from a passage in Ep. 39. Alcuin here writes that he is like one bereft of his children, for that Damoetas is gone to Saxony, Homerus to Italy, and "Candidus Britanniam recessit;" an expression which of course excites the attention of English writers, while it has given rise to some speculation, not to say invention. It may be accounted for very naturally on the supposition that Candidus was on one of his numerous missions; and accordingly we find under the date of this year, A.D. 796, several of Alcuin's letters addressed to persons of rank in Britain, including Offa king of Mercia (vid. Epp. 42, 43, 165, 166, 167, 169, 170). As a minor confirmation we may add that in another letter of the year (Ep. 38) where the bearer is spoken of, instead of Candidus it is "hunc puerulum." In A.D. 797 Candidus is back again and employed as before.

We notice therefore what Leland says on the passage, premising that that excellent antiquary had not the advantage of referring to a long series of Alcuin's collected epistles like those in the great printed editions of our times. He explains the solitary expression that mentions Britain by a letter which he adduces as from Alcuin to Higebald bishop of Lindisfarne, although his extract does not enable us to identify the document with any of the epistles now extant. The fragment he gives us expresses the writer's desire that a person (not named) may return to him, and by this person Leland thinks it likely that Candidus is meant. On the assumption that it is he, Candidus is made out to have been originally an alumnus of Lindisfarne under Higebald; to have been sent by him to France to finish his studies under Alcuin; and in due time to have returned home. If he ever went back as desired, Leland cannot say. Bale reproduces this little story; Pits embellishes it with an addition that the destruction of the Lindisfarne library by the Danes in A.D. 793 was what occasioned Candidus to migrate to the continent; Dempster states that he was a Scot; that he studied at Melrose likewise; that he was in Scotland when Alcuin dedicated his commentary to him; and finally that he was the author of Epistolae ad Alcuinum magistrum. Thus in the literary history of Great Britain Candidus Presbyter figures as one of the writers of the heptarchy, fitted with an illustrative biographical memoir, and all out of three words of Alcuin and a guess of Leland. (Leland, in Tanner, Bibl. Brit. 149; Balaens, Brit. Script. cent. xiii. No. 59; Pitsius, Illust. Anjl. Script. tom. i. 828, ed. 1649; Dempster, Script. Scot. ed. Bannat. Club 1829, lib. iii. No. 273.)

In one place of Alcuin (Ep. 55) Candidus occurs as "Witto," evidently a vernacular form of his name, which is also written Witso and

Wizo (vid. Epp. 101, 118, 123, notes) and by this cognomen he is usually distinguished from Candidus (17), a monk of Fulda; but the two are confounded by Pezsius, as remarked by Frobenius (Alc. Ep. 101 n.). A very short piece of half a folio page, entitled "Candidus de Imagine Dei" occurs in Frobenius's edition of Alcuin (tom. ii. 596), and the editor thinks (p. 556) the author may have been Candidus Wizo. Among Alcuin's poems there is one on Candidus penned in the affectionate strain invariably seen in the epistles (Opp. tom. ii. 457). [C. H.]

CANDIDUS (17) A monk of the abbey of Fulda, surnamed Braun, was born at the close of the 8th century, and educated at Fulda, where he embraced a monastic life under the rule of abbat Bangulph, by whom he was sent to France to complete his education under Clemens Scotus, in company with a brother monk named Modestus. On his return to Fulda he was advanced to the priesthood. He endured with patience the maladministration of abbat Ratgar, appointed 802, until his deposition in 817. Candidus was taken into the confidence of Ratgar's successor, St. Eigil, by whose successor, Raban (822), he was placed at the head of the conventual schools. It was by Raban's advice, to occupy the time which, in the want of congenial society, was hanging heavy on his hands, that he undertook his literary works. The principal of these was the Life of St. Eigil, in two books, one in prose, the other in hexameter verse, dedicated to his old companion Modestus. They narrate nearly the same facts, describing the consecration of the church of Fulda and the translation of the relics of St. Boniface, at which he was present. He also wrote the life of abbat Bagnulph, which is not known to exist. Two other works bear Candidus's name, which are attributed by Pez and others to Candidus the disciple of Alcuin, but probably erroneously. These are (1) Opusculum de Passione Domini, expository homilies on the harmony of the Gospel accounts of the Passion; (2) Responsio ad Monachum, an answer to the inquiry of a brother monk, whether Jesus Christ could behold God with His bodily eyes. This little treatise is replete with modesty, charity, and sound wisdom, deciding in the negative, but urging the cultivation of purity of heart as the only means of seeing God. Duchange attributes to Candidus Dicta de imagine Mundi, a MS. formerly at St. Germain des Prés. (Mabillon, Act. Sanct. Ord. S. Bened. v. 226; Pez, Thesaur. Anecd. i. 241; Migne, Patrol. cvi. 57.) [E. V.]

CANFRIDUS, bishop, first in the list of Glastonbury monks who were advanced to the episcopate. He died A.D. 782 (Malm. Antiq. Glouc. Gale, xv. Scriptt. 325). If we might allow an error of a year in this date, Canfridus could be identified with Eanfrid, bishop of Elmham, who vacated his see (Stubbs, Regist. 8, 168) not later than A.D. 781. This identification would then be analogous to that of Cangitha with Eangith. [CANGITHA.] [C. H.]

CANGITHA (Bonif. Ep. 30, ed. Würdtwein; Ibid. Migne, Patrol. tom. lxxxix. 726), abbess, mother of Eadburga or Bugga. [EANGYTH.] [C. H.]

CANICE, CANICUS. [CAINECH.]

CANIDES, a hermit in the time of Theodosius the Great, was son of Theodotus. As soon as he was baptized he ran away to a little grotto under a waterfall, where he lived 73 years, tasting no food but a few herbs without salt once a week. He died June 10 (Menology of Basil). [E. B. B.]

CANINIUS. Mentioned by St. Jerome as sent by him with his letter (74, ed. Vall.) from Bethlehem to Ruffinus, a presbyter, probably at Rome. [W. H. F.]

CANISTAE (Κανισται), enumerated by Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 1) in a list of short-lived heretical sects, the origin of which he ascribes to Simon Magus; the next preceding name in the list being the Eutychetæ. The name Canistæ is mentioned by no other writer; but there is every reason to believe that Theodoret derived it from a passage in Clemens Alexandrinus (Strom. vii. 17), where we find in close connection the names Caianistæ (Καϊανισται) and Eutychetæ, the latter being described as a branch of the Simonians. There is little room for doubt that Clement meant to speak of the Cainites, but Theodoret could not have so understood him, for his Canistæ are not identified with the Cainites, to whom he devotes a separate section (i. 15), under the name Καϊνοί. [G. S.]

CANNA, Welsh saint of the 6th century, from Armorica, reputed founder of Llanganna or Llangan in Glamorganshire, and of Llangan in Carmarthenshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 222). [C. H.]

CANNATUS, ST., is commemorated on the same day with St. Antoninus, and was like him bishop of Marseilles. He was born at Aix, and became a hermit, having retired to the desert, where he spent his time in study and contemplation. He was afterwards elected bishop of Marseilles, and is supposed to have died there in the 5th century. The exact date is unknown (Acta SS. Boll. Oct. vii. 25). [H. W. Y.]

CANNERA. [CAINNER.]

CANOC (CONOC). Abbat and confessor. He is also called Mocho noc, the syllable Mo being added, as Colgan says of such cases, "honoris et singularis observantiae causa." His life is given by Colgan (Acta SS. 311 sq. at Feb. 11, but according to others his feast is celebrated on Feb. 13, where Mart. Doneg. has Conan, and on Nov. 18, where the same Martyrology has Mocho noc). He was born at Brecknock in Wales, but was the son of Breacan, an Irish prince, who had married Marcella, daughter of Theodorice, prince of Gartmathrin, and settled probably on the property which came to him through her and is now called Brecon and Brecknock. Canoc is given as the eldest of as many as twenty-four children born to Breacan, by the same Marcella or another, Dina or Digna, and all said to be saints. He flourished about A.D. 492, and founded monasteries both in Ireland and Wales, his chief foundation having been Gallen in King's County. But much doubt is entertained regarding the details of the story. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 279, 424 sq.; Colgan, Tr. Thuan. 153, 167; Ware, Ir. Ant. Dubl. 1705, p. 84.) [J. G.]

CANTIANILLA, CANTIANUS, and CANTIUS, martyrs at Aquileia, in the beginning of the Diocletian persecution, May 31 (Acta SS. May, vii. 420). [E. B. B.]

CANTIGERN. [KENTIGERN.]

CAOIDE. [CAETI.]

CAOL. [CAEL (2).]

CAOMHAN. [CAEMHAN (3).]

CAORNAN. [CAERNAN.]

CAPAX, bishop at the 2nd council of Rome A.D. 344 (Labbe, Conc. i. 1545). [E. B. B.]

CAPELLA (1), CAECILIUS, mentioned by Tertullian as one among other instances of governors who in their last moments had painful memories of the persecutions they had instituted. All that is said by Tertullian is:—"Caccilius Capella in illo exitu Byzantino 'Christiani gaudente' eclamavit." (Tert. ad Scap. 3). [C. H.]

CAPELLA (2), MARTIANUS, an author of the 5th century. See Dict. Gr. and Rom. Biog. [E. B. B.]

CAPITANI, martyrs commemorated early in November in the calendar of Carthage. [E. B. B.]

CAPITULA TRIA. [MONOPHYSITES; JUSTINIAN I.]

CAPITO (1), 25th bishop of Jerusalem. His death is placed by Eusebius, in the Chronicon, in the consulship of Maternus and Bradua, A.D. 185. His accession is not dated either in the Chronicon or the History (v. 12). But Epiphanius places the death of Caius II. the 8th year of Verus, A.D. 168. Julianus II. came between (Art de Vérifier les Dates, i. 222). [E. B. B.]

(2) Donatist bishop, joined in presenting a request against CAECILIAN, in A.D. 313, claiming that the question at issue should be tried in Gaul, which had been free from the temptation that had caused the dispute; was present accordingly at Treves, April 28, A.D. 315 (Mém. vi. 24, 55, 56).

(3) Bishop in Sicily, present at the council of Nice (Athanas. ed. Paris, 1627, vol. i. p. 291; Tillem. vi. 644; De Broglie, ii. 19).

(4) Father of the presbyter Athanasius, named, perhaps, to distinguish his son from the great bishop whose persecutions he shared (Tillem. viii. 105), in the letter of the Council of Sardica. (Athanasius, i. 759, compare p. 791.)

(5) African bishop at the Council of Sardica A.D. 347 (Conc. Labbe, ii. 679).

(6, 7) In the Menology of Basil, on Dec. 22, we read of a Capite sent as bishop to Cherso, in the reign of Theodosius the Great, on the death of Aetherius. He tried to demolish the temple of their virgin idol, and to build a church in the name of Peter. He prepared furnaces for his work, and they told him, that if he would step into the furnace and come out safe, they would not only all believe him, but even cast their children into the fire. He did so, and they believed. "After many works he departed in peace." On comparing the entry on July 8, we see that Cherso means the Crimea, and that we have here a renewed and successful attempt to evangelise a region, to which, perhaps because it abounded with Jews, Hermo, bishop of Jerusalem, had sent missionaries, among them an earlier Capito, in the time of the Diocletian persecution, who were all martyred, even after they had gained the protection of the victorious Constantine. [E. B. B.]

CAPITO (8) A robber who became a hermit, and lived by the labours of his hands in a cave four miles from Antinopolis in Egypt. When Palladius saw him, between A.D. 410 and 420, he had lived there 50 years without ever going to the city or even to the Nile, saying that he durst not yet mix with the throne, as the enemy was busy against him still. (Hist. Laus. c. 99, 100; Tillem. xi. 520.)

CAPITOLINA, martyr of Cappadocia, confessed that her home was Jerusalem on high, her fathers the teachers of the Christians, among them, bishop Firmilian. She was cast into prison. Her servant Eroteis heard of it, came to her and kissed her mistress's chains. (From this incident the story of Eroteis coming safe out of the fire may have arisen.) Capitolina is said to have been beheaded on the 27th, Eroteis on the 28th, of October. The menologies put their martyrdom under Diocletian; but the MS. Acts seen by Tillemont (v. 168 648) under Licinius. This Licinius must of course be Valerian, and this would agree with the date of Firmilian (A.D. 230-270). The same acts make Zeliceinthus governor of Cappadocia at the time. He is on the eve of an expedition, probably that against Persia. [E. B. B.]

CAPITOLINUS, vicar of Thrace under Julian, put St. Aemilian to death (Tillem. vii. 354; De Broglie, iv. 183).

(2) Martyr in Nicomedia with bishop Quintilian. March 8 (Acta SS. Mar. i. 756).

(3) Martyr in Antioch with Zenobius, Emerita, Italica, Jovian, and Julian. Aug. 24 (Ibid Aug. iv. 767).

(4) Martyr at Rome with Eulalia. Dec. 11 (Mart. Hieron. D'Achery). [E. B. B.]

CAPRASIVS (1) Martyr at Agen, in Aquitaine, in the time of Diocletian, had been beloved by all in the town, where a healing fountain, produced by him in the cave where he lay hid, was shewn. His courage under his tortures made two converts, Primus and Felician, and they were all beheaded together along with St. FAITH, whose torture Caprasius had witnessed from his cave, Oct. 20 (Tillem. iv. 543). Ruinaut (p. lxx.) shews that Maximian probably sometimes invaded the province of Constantius. There is no good authority for making Caprasius bishop of the place. [E. B. B.]

(2) ST., presbyter at Lérins (l'Isle de St. Honorat). This saint is sometimes called abbat of the monastery at Lérins, but it is very doubtful whether he ever took charge of that religious house. He received a good education, but had a great desire to become a hermit; so he distributed his goods to the poor and went with St. Honoratus and his brother St. Venantius in quest of a place where they might carry out the rule of life which they had planned for themselves. It was their intention to seek some place where the Latin language was not spoken. Before they started, under the direction of Ca-prasius, Honoratus and his brother Venantius received the tonsure, and they then first went into Greece and the Peloponnesus. But Venantius unfortunately died through fatigue and sickness, and Honoratus then determined to go into Gaul with Caprasius. The place of their destination was the isle of Lérins, which is described as a frightful desert, where nothing was to be seen but serpents and other venomous creatures. There Honoratus built a monastery, into which he received many monks, who came from the neighbouring countries to work out their salvation. It was under the discipline of Caprasius and Honoratus, who are said to have made it the home of saints. Hilarius describes their new monastery as being distinguished for chastity, faith, wisdom, justice, truth. They also built in the island a church, of which Honoratus became the minister. Caprasius died circa 430, and is commemorated on the 1st of June. His relics were left at Lérins. Hilarius describes him as "of angelic conversation." Eucherius calls him "a man of venerable gravity, equal to the ancient fathers." Some writers call him a Benedictine, but that is an error, as he lived, according to the most trustworthy accounts, about a hundred years before St. Benedict.

(Acta Sanctorum, Jun. i. p. 77; Hilar. Arelat. de Vita S. Honorati, cap. ii. Patrol. Lat. i. p. 1255. Eucherius Lugd. de Laud. Eremi, 42, Patrol. Lat. i. p. 711; Sidonius Apoll. Carm. § 384, Patrol. Lat. lviii. p. 721; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs sacrés et ecclésiastiques, tom. viii. p. 439.)

CAPRASIVS (3) A martyr, of whom nothing is known except that he is commemorated on the 25th May, in the Lucensian Calendar, as martyred at Castrum Gola. There is another doubtful Caprasius mentioned by some authors as Prior of Carmel. He is supposed to be the same person as St. Caprasius (1). (AA. SS. May, vol. vi. p. 4; October, vol. vii. p. 3; October, vol. viii. (ad diem 20), p. 813.) [D. R. J.]

CAPREOLVS, bishop of Carthage, is known to history in connexion with the council of Ephesus, A.D. 431. The whole of Africa, at that time, was being ravaged by the Vandals, under Genseric—a state of things which made it impossible to convene the bishops of Africa, in order to send a regular deputation to represent the church of Carthage at the council, as all the roads were impassable for fear of the Vandals. The bishop, however, in his zeal for the catholic doctrine, then called in question by Nestorius, despatched an elaborate letter in its defence, by the hand of his deacon Besula, to be laid before the council. This letter, which is extant, both in Greek and Latin, together with that from Celestine, 'Arehbishop of Rome,' and another from St. Cyril, was entered upon the acts of the council, as from "another most revered metropolitan," the bishop of Carthage.

There is also extant another letter by Capreolus on this controversy, written in answer to inquiries which had been addressed to him from Spain, by 'Vitalis and Constantius, sinners,' whom he answers as sons. This letter is entitled Epistola de unâ Christi Veri Dei et Hominis Personâ contra recens damnatam hæresin Nestorii. They had abjured the heresy without, apparently, having heard of the heresiarch, or of the council that condemned him. Both letters are preserved in the Bibliotheca Patrum of Galland, vol. ix. p. 490, and in Migne, vol. liii. p. 843.

There is also a fragment of the letter which he addressed to Theodosius, who convoked the council. This is quoted by Ferrandus in his letter to Pelagius and Anatolius, c. 6. Patr. Migne, lviii. 925.

The Sermo de Tempore Barbarico, on the Vandal invasion of Africa, usually attributed to St. Augustine, and the other sermons in which Augustine describes the Vandal ravages, are considered by Tillemont (xvi. 502) to have been written rather by Capreolus (Hardouin, i. 1419-22; Fleury, xxv. 41; Tillem. xii. 559, xiii. 901, xiv. 376, 399, xvi. 495, 502, 789). [D. B.]

Tillemont supposes him to have succeeded to the see of Carthage shortly before the death of Augustine, as the letter convoking the council seems to have been addressed to him and to Augustine (xii. 559). Another object of his letter to Ephesus was to implore the council not to reopen the question of the Pelagian heresy. When his letter was read, Cyril and all the bishops exclaimed, "That is what we all say; that is what we all wish," and they ordered it to be inserted in the acts of the council (Vinc. Lerin. c. 31; Labbe, Conc. iii. 529). He is probably the 'priest' in Africa in the time of Aspar, mentioned in the Book of Promises, ascribed to Prosper (i. 4, c. 6).

The Spaniards who write to Capreolus, and address him as God's servant and their lord, speak of his fame as already world-wide. The basis of this fame is the principle he laid down in his epistle to the council, that old questions once settled should not be reopened. He speaks of "retaining that perpetual stability which has made statutes concerning the system of the Catholic faith (quæ de Catholice fidei ratione statuerit)." The builder's feet must be on the rock. At the same time he expects new questions constantly to arise, new sayings to be approved as right. The authority by agreement with which they are to be corroborated, is the judgment of the Fathers, both old and new; he does not there name Scripture. He has confidence in the abiding presence of the Spirit. The Spaniards who write to him are able themselves abundantly to refute from Scripture the heresy that troubled them, but are not content with this unless they can be assured by a living authority as to what the right Catholic faith may hold. For this Capreolus (c. 13) almost reproves them: his own authority is worth little or nothing; let them turn to the Scriptures and the Fathers. He seems to be mistaken in supposing that the heresy that troubled them in Spain was really Nestorianism. The doctrine that the Word of God had left the Man Jesus when he hung on the cross (hominem purum dicunt pependisse in cruce comprehensum: aiunt, Recessit Deus ab eo) reminds one rather of the earlier Gnostics. It was only in this particular that the Spaniards had been at all overborne by these heretics; they answered, "God never departed from the man whom He assumed, unless when He said on the cross, 'Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani.'" It is in recording this answer of theirs that they cry most humbly for pardon and guidance and prayers on their behalf. It is with this accordingly that Capreolus's answer is almost entirely taken up. His answer to the Nestorian doctrine (c. 2) is borrowed from the celebrated discourse of PROCLUS, at least in two important particulars; and the interpretation of ἀπάτωρ, ἀμήτωρ; and the argument that if God and Man were not one in Christ, we should have a quaternity, not a trinity (v. Neale, Alexandria, i. 240).

It is instructive to note the importance that he attaches to the descent of the God-man into Hades. Chaps. 5-12 are taken up with answering the new error. He quotes Ps. xvi. 10; John x. 18; 1 Cor. ii. 7, 8; 2 Cor. v. 18, 19; Heb. i. 2, 3; Col. ii. 15; Heb. x. 28-30; John xx. 17. He does not quote John xvi. 32, but he says (c. 13) that it would be endless to adduce all scripture testimonies. His answer to the argument from Ps. xxii. 1 is drawn from the latter half of the verse (as it is in the LXX and Vulgate, which are not improbably right), "Far from my health are the words of my failings," and based on the mystery of the union of the two natures, "that human condition should know itself" (c. 5).

Baronius and Sirmondus would read Tonantius for Constantius as the name of one of the inquirers (Galland, ix. 493). Capreolus seems to have sent them a report of all the proceedings of the council, which was then at an end (c. 1).

The Vandals under Genseric overspread all Africa except Carthage, Cirta and Hippo, which they did not succeed in taking. The sermons De Tempore Barbarico (Augustine, t. vi. 690), De Cultura Agri Domini, sive de quarta feria (Ib. 686), and the 298th Sermon in the appendix, (the 111th on the Season in the old edition) are not by Augustine. The first two seem to have been preached in this order in the course of one spring, the first shortly after the feast of Perpetua, March 7, in a town that was yet unconquered, where games were still celebrated (Temp. Barb. i. t. vi. p. 700). The last was on the Thursday after Easter, in a town that had just been besieged, and was still suffering from pestilence. When Carthage was taken in 439, the bishop was Quodvultdeus, and Capreolus was already dead. The Arian persecution did not begin till 437, and had begun when the sermon De Tempore Barbarico was preached. It is therefore more probably by Quodvultdeus than by Capreolus. The third sermon may have been by Augustine's successor at Hippo, when Genseric had raised the siege of that town in 431. But see Tillemont, xvi. 495-504.

The death of Capreolus is generally supposed to have been about A.D. 435. His burial was commemorated in the calendar of Carthage between July 21 and 30; the note of the day is lost. [E. B. B.]

CARACALLA, the nickname of M. Aurelius Severus Antoninus Bassianus, son of Lucius Septimius Severus, born April 4, A.D. 188, declared Caesar A.D. 196, three years after his father's accession; succeeded to the empire in conjunction with his brother Geta, Feb. A.D. 211, sole emperor after slaying his brother in his mother's arms A.D. 212, in Gaul A.D. 213, in Germany and on the Danube A.D. 214, at Antioch and Alexandria A.D. 215, marched against Parthia A.D. 216, killed on the way from Edessa to Carrhae, April 8, A.D. 217. His mother, according to contemporary authorities, was Julia, a Syrian woman, whom Severus had married because of certain prophecies. Spartianus, in the time of Constantine, assures us that Julia was his stepmother, and that his mother was Severus's first wife Marcia. This would make the story of his life somewhat less horrible, but it compels the historian at the cost of some inconsistency to refer his birth to A.D. 174, or earlier. For the garment from which his name is derived see DICR. CHRIS. ANT. Rawlinson prefers the form Caracallus.*

The principal authorities are Tertullian, addressing Scapula, the governor of Africa, in A.D. 211; the sober, contemporary, and apparently impartial, narrative of Herodian (bks. vii. viii.); the abridgment, by the very late compiler Xiphilinus, of the 77th book of the contemporary historian Dion Cassius, with which the compiler seems to have incorporated fragments of other works of a like early date; the narrative written for Constantine by Lampridius Spartianus in the Historia Augusti; laws, coins, inscriptions (see Clinton), and especially a record in the Digest, bk. 1, tit. 5, l. 17, from the 22nd book of Ulpian.

Dion charges him with inheriting all the worst features of the races from which he drew his origin; on his father's side, the braggart levity of the Gaul and the truculence of the African; on his mother's, the tricksiness of the Syrian. Tertullian (ad Scap. c. 4) calls him Antoninus, and informs us that "his father Severus had a regard for Christians; for he even sent for Proculus, a Christian, who was surnamed Torpadion, the manager of affairs to Evodia, who had once cured him by means of oil, and kept him in his palace till his death; and Antoninus, too, knew him well, and was brought up on Christian milk. And, moreover, Severus knew most illustrious men and most illustrious women to be of this sect, and not only did not hurt, but honoured ('exornavit' or, more probably, 'exoneravit,' exonerated) them by the witness he bore them, and withstood the raging populace." Tertullian must have been on his guard in the facts he alleged about the inner life of the palace in addressing the governor of a province. It has been inferred that the young prince was not only brought up amid Christian influences but had a Christian wet-nurse.

We can easily conceive how injurious it must have been for the child to find the Christians in the palace screened and the matter hushed up, while yet he was taken to see shows of wild beasts where Christians were thrown to them to devour. Spartianus tells us that he was a most charming child, quick at learning, engaging with his prattle, and of a very tender heart. "If he saw condemned criminals thrown to the beasts, he cried, or looked away, which more than won the hearts of the people. At seven years of age, when he heard that a boy that was his playmate had been severely beaten for Jewish superstition, it was a long while before he would look at his own father or the boy's father again, or at the people who had him flogged. By his own intercession he restored their ancient rights to the people of Antioch and Byzantium, who had helped Niger against his father. It was for his cruelty that he took an aversion to Plantianus. But all this was only while he was a boy (sed hæc puer.) The Jewish superstition here mentioned has been interpreted generally, and with great probability, to mean Christianity. The Plantianus here mentioned was, as we learn from Herodian, a vile tyrant, who was all-powerful with Severus, and whose daughter Caracalla was compelled to marry, much against his will, in the hope that the marriage might reform him from certain low tastes, such as won him the favour of the city populace.

The whole subject of the lives of the Roman emperors in their bearing on the fortunes of the church calls for careful investigation. Late and meagre epitomes, like Pharaoh's lean kine, have, for the most part, swallowed up the original authorities. In such brief abstracts, it is chiefly the gossip of the time that is preserved. And at best, the heathen historians rather delight in startling paradox, than attempt to trace the sad history of the ruin of a human soul. Besides, as far and as long as they can, they persistently ignore the existence of Christianity.

Spartianus tells us that when Caracalla emerged from boyhood, before his accession, he was so changed, so stern, that no one would have known him; whereas his brother Geta, on the other hand, who had been an unpleasing child, was very much improved as he grew up. His narrative, and the abridgment of Dion, afford no clue to the enmity that sprang up between the brothers; and when we find large parties swaying this way and that, we might be inclined to surmise that deeper principles were involved on either hand than mere fraternal jealousy. Caracalla's early life was such as to teach him heart-hardening dissimulation; Tertullian, while the brothers yet ruled jointly, urges at once the uncertainty of human life, and the probability that Caracalla would favour the Christians; and it is the fact that his victory coincided with a general and prolonged cessation of a long and cruel persecution.

But Herodian's plain story is to the effect that the enmity of the brothers began with backing different racers or game cocks in their childhood, and was perpetually fomented by clever flatterers, and drawn into the current of the fierce strife of colours, in which no political or religious opinions were involved, but the personal predilection for one or other of the leading charioteers. When we ask what the difference of tastes was that so widely separated the brothers, we learn that Caracalla was the rough and hardy soldier, while Geta affected rather the muses and the palaestra, Hellenic culture of body and mind.

Dion Cassius, as abridged by Xiphilius, informs us that Caracalla had tried to get rid of Geta during their father's life; that there was some difficulty about the sacrifices that the senate decreed they should perform in common for the concord of the empire; that at the saturnalia

Caracalla made an attempt on his brother's life; that thenceforward they each surrounded themselves with an armed retinue, and that it was only by treachery that Caracalla was enabled to slay his brother, inviting him to an interview in the chambers of the empress dowager, and there laying an ambush against him. That very night he hastened to the camp and told the soldiers, "Now, I can do you good; I am one of you; all my treasures are yours." His next act was to recall all the criminals banished on any charge to the islands, and to put to death, Xiphilius tells us, 20,000 men and women in the palace and the camp as partisans of Geta. Dio made a list of the names of the murdered persons, as they were at that time very well-known people. But when a rabble of soldiers had rifled the house of Caracalla's foster-father Cilo, and dragged the old man himself, in shirt and slippers, from the bath where they found him, up to the palace doors, Caracalla was very angry with them (which was all set down as pretence), and came out and threw his own cloak round Cilo, and said, "Who touches him, touches me," and had the soldiers executed. He refused to be deified or likened to the gods (Dio, 77, vol. ii. pp. 403-406, ed. Becker). We cannot tell whether he had any higher motives than a mean malice and uneasy envy in his murder of his brother, and whether the mother, for whose sake he claimed to have done the deed, and whom he would not allow to utter, or even to listen to a complaint, ever found it in her heart to forgive him. The incredible charge of incest was afterwards brought against them! But there is little doubt as to the results of the deed. He did not become a Christian, and, on the other hand, we are told that the ancient gods of the state were the last to whom he had recourse. He patronised Philostratus, who wrote for his mother and for him the life of Apollonius of Tyana. Thus he fostered one of the chief counterfeits of Christianity. He identified in his worship Serapis and Apollo, as Hadrian tells the Alexandrians identified Serapis and Christ. He gathered round him all who professed to look into the secrets of the future, and he paid his worship to the spirits of the dead. But they could not rid his ears of his brother's dying cry, μητηρ μητηρ, τεκοῦσα τεκοῦσα, βοήθει, σφάσσωμαι. He continued to court the city populace, and enriched Rome with his magnificent baths, which even in ruins are the most superb among monuments of refined luxury. But his fits of savagery must have made it hard for him to continue a favourite of the populace. Henceforth he depended mainly on his army for his support, and on excitement for his ease of mind. Both necessities involved expense. Whatever impetus he gave to the corruption of the capital, he himself contentedly shared the roughest privations of the soldiers. But that alone was not enough to secure their affection. In the first day of his crime he had lavished the wealth that his father had been eighteen years in acquiring. New sources of revenue were needed.

It is the method that Caracalla adopted to raise a revenue that gives him his main claim to a place in the catalogue of men whose lives affected the Christian church. His act, as Gibbon has shewn, marked an era in the decline of the empire. But more than that, it affected very greatly the position of Christians in all future persecutions. It is this indeed mainly that enables us to pronounce with certainty that the act was his, and belonged to no earlier date. Moreover, whatever slur may be cast upon his motives, the act itself reveals, if not a largeness of conception, an audacity of innovation, which makes it a distinct step, we might almost say, in the growth of the self-consciousness of humanity. "All who are in the Roman world," says Ulpian, "have been made citizens of Rome by an institution of the Emperor Antoninus." "A most grateful and humane deed!" exclaims Augustine (De Civ. Dei, v. 17, vol. vii. 161), and immediately subjoins the proviso that made the boon so equivocal. At a stroke the Roman world was pauperised. Every citizen resident in the capital was entitled to receive every month, at a cheap rate—the indigent quite gratuitously—a certain amount of corn or bread. This was one of the chief drains upon the revenue, and one of the main causes of extortion in the provinces. But Augustus laid a tax on citizens from which aliens were exempt, a tax which made the franchise in many cases a burden to be declined rather than a boon to be coveted, a duty of five per cent. on all bequests. Nerva and Trajan, however, exempted the passage of moderate inheritances from parent to child, or vice versa (Plin. Paneg. 37, 38). Caracalla, by raising the provincials to the franchise, did not free them from the tribute they owed before, but imposed this additional burden, which he doubled in amount, and which involved the odious intrusion of the taxgatherer, in seasons of domestic bereavement. The act seems to synchronise with a congiarium or largess to the populace in A.D. 214. Theuceforward Caracalla's laws, wherever promulgated, seem to be dated at Rome. Oppressive as were the effects of the act, it seems yet to have been welcomed. It was but fair, thought Augustine, that rustics who had lands should give food to citizens who had none, so long as it was granted as a boon and not extorted as a right.

But besides its effects as a financial measure, Caracalla's act broke down the barriers of society; annulled, as far as any imperial institution could, the proud old sovereign commonwealth, the queen of nations, whose servants and ministers the emperors had ever professed to be; opened the command of armies to unlettered barbarians; removed the bars to the influx of Greek and Syrian and Egyptian corruption into Rome; reduced the subjects to a level, above which only the emperor, the minion of the army, towered supreme.

What the effect was on the status of Christians will occur to any one who has read the Acts of the Apostles, and seen how again and again Paul's Roman citizenship stood him in good stead. The same appears in the story of the martyrs in Gaul under M. Aurelius: the Roman citizens are reserved till the emperor's will be known. It must not indeed be supposed that a boon so widely diffused could retain the same value. But we hear no more of Christians being crucified, unless they were slaves, or first reduced to slavery. They were no longer as sheep appointed for the slaughter. Unutterably horrible as the tortures devised against them were, they were no longer commonly thrown to the beasts as a show. They suffered by the sword at last, and all their tortures were such as might by equal right befall any citizen of Rome who transgressed the mandate of the emperor. [DICT. CHRIST. ANT. 'Persecution'; 'Torture.'] Thus martyrdom, instead of the obstinacy of an abject alien superstition, became the bold and cheerful resistance of free citizens to the arbitrary will of one, who, when he began to torture, became a barbarous tyrant.

Of the remaining history of Caracalla we need say but little. In Germany he affected German dress and manners, and surrounded himself with a German bodyguard. But in Macedon he was seized with a passionate admiration of Alexander the Great. He visited Alexandria, where he was warmly welcomed; but by a treacherous massacre he avenged the bitter saying about himself and his mother that had been rife in that city. Treachery, revenge, and hatred of the sight of human enjoyment seemed to have become his nature. Again, with a boldness of conception equal to that displayed in the enfranchisement of his own subjects, he demanded the daughter of the Parthian king in marriage, that the two great empires might be united into one. Artabanus demurred, but at length yielded. Then the marriage festivities were scattered by another cruel and treacherous massacre. Artabanus escaped, but his subjects, amid their singing and their dancing, were butchered like sheep. This event had probably not a little to do with the Persian revolt and the sudden fall of Parthia. Another outrage soon followed, equally wanton. He scattered to the winds the bones of the dead of Persia that were preserved in a great necropolis at Arbelæ. He then spent the winter at Edessa in chariot-racing. Meanwhile he consulted the magicians of Rome to know who should put him to death, and suffered their answer, with other business letters, to pass into the hands of the very man, Macrinus, whom they had named. For his own safety, Macrinus thought it necessary to put the task they assigned him into execution, and as Caracalla was on his way to a temple of the moon-god he was surprised and murdered. (Rawlinson's Sixth Monarchy, c. xxi.; Gibbon, c. vi.; Tillemont, Hist. Emp. iii. 88.) [E. B. B.]

CARADOC (Brut y Tywys), CARATAUC (Annal. Camb.), king of Gwynedd or Guenedota, slain by the Saxons, A.D. 798 (M. H. B. pp. 834, 843). [C. H.]

CARAN, bishop and confessor; commemorated Dec. 23. The St. Caran who, according to the Breviary of Aberdeen, was a bishop and confessor, honoured at Premecht or Premunay, Aberdeenshire, and at Fetteresso, Kincardineshire, must not be confounded with any of the seventeen Ciarans of the Irish calendar. He was a saint belonging to the east of Scotland, and may have been the Corinnu or Corindus who, according to the Annals of Tighernach, died among the Picts, in A.D. 669, Itharnan or Starnan dying in the same year among the same people. (Brev. Abe d. pars hyem. f. xxiii.; View Dioc. Aberd. 550; Gp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 297.) [J. G.]

CARANTOCUS, CARANNOG. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 209; Montal. Monks of the West, iii. 80.) [CAIRNECH (3).] [C. H.]

of Chartres writes a hymn, punning on the name and the word "carus." The hexameters appended in the Patrology are of course quite a separate poem. Fulbert says that he was born of noble parents at Rome. Usuard, who calls him Charaunus, and commemorates him May 28, says that he was beheaded at Chartres. His legend in the Breviarium Carnotense makes him a deacon and evangelist of that place, murdered by an ambush on his way thence to evangelise Paris, in A.D. 98, under Domitian. This is mere romance (Patrol. cxli. 349; Acta SS. May, vi. 740). [E. B. B.]

CARBEAS. [PAULICIANS.]

CARCADIUS, bishop of Maxula, in the province of Africa, at the synod of Carthage. Feb. 1, A.D. 484, banished to Corsica (Conc. Labbe, iv. 1142). [E. B. B.]

CARCAMENOS (Καρκαμενός), one of the twelve "maternal" angels in the system of Justinus (Hippol. Ref. v. 26). [G. S.]

CARCHEDONIUS, of Subsana, priest or bishop, rebuked and excused by Augustine, Epp. 62 (241), 63 (240). [E. B. B.]

CARDAMAS, slave of Paulinus, given to buffoonery and drinking, and sent to Amandus. There he became reformed, and was made an ecclesiastic. He came to Paulinus one Lent with letters from Amandus and Delphinus, and was content to share the very frugal table of the saint all Lent, but after Easter he objected, and was sent back. He was an old man, and complained that his wife was too weak to do his housework for him. Paulinus begs that he may have a little page given him (Paul. Epp. 17, 18, 24, 25; Tillem. xiv. 81, 82). [E. B. B.]

CARDEN. The churches of Kilmalie, now Golspie, and of Loth, in Sutherlandshire, were dedicated to one known as St. Carden, and the annual fair was St. Carden's, but the person thus honoured seems to have been of only local note (Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 649, 681, 731, 733). There are many Cardenwells throughout Scotland, but whether named from an ancient saint, or from the famous Italian physician and reputed magician, Cardan, in the 16th century, is matter of dispute. [J. G.]

CARELLUS, martyr with Primulus at Caesarea in Cappadocia. May 29 (Mart. Hieron.).

CARELLUS. [CAIRELL.]

CARENTIUS or CORENTINUS (1), bishop of Cornouaille, Brittany. Commemorated on May 1. (Acta Sanctorum, Maius, vol. i. p. 5.)

(2) ST., bishop and confessor, mentioned in the Actaria to Usuard, in Patrol. Lat. cxxiii. May 18. It is uncertain whether or not he is the same person with St. Corentinus, bishop of Cornouaille in Brittany. He is commemorated on May 18. (Acta Sanctorum, May, vol. iv. p. 136). [D. R. J.]

CARENTOCUS. [CAIRNECH (3).]

CARIATTO. [CHARIATHO.]

CARIBERT. [CHARIBERT.]

CARILEFUS, ST. (Calais or Calès). This saint was born in the territory of Auvergne of noble parents, and entered a monastery at Miscy, then under St. Maximianus. He did not remain here long, but went into retirement with St. Avitus to Le Mans. Afterwards he obtained from king Childibert some land, on which he built the monastery of St. Calais du Désert near the river Anisle. His acts must be fixed between 517 and 542. His remains were translated in 1171 and 1653 (Acta SS. Boll. Jul. i. 85 sq. Baring-Gould, Lives of Saints, July, p. 12). [H. W. Y.]

CARINUS, LUCIUS. [ACTS OF APOSTLES, p. 28. LEUCIUS.]

CARINUS. [NUMERIANUS; SEBASTIANUS.]

CARIO, an Egyptian in the 4th century, who left his wife and two children to retire to a hermitage at Scetê. His story, in which his little son Zacharias prominently figures, may be seen in Cotelier. (Ecol. Gr. Mon. i. 444, 516; Tillem. Mem. x. 76). [E. B. B.]

CARISSIMUS, bishop of Gisipa in Africa, banished by Hunneric A.D. 484 (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1142). [E. B. B.]

CARITAN of Druimlara — Mar. 7. He is placed by the Martyrologies on this day, and Colgan (Acti SS. 510) gives an account of his life by identifying him with St. Cruthnechan. But, as Dr. Reeves says (Adumnan, 191 n.), "the connexion of the two names extends no further than their initials." [See CRUTHNECHAN and CURITAN.] Little seems to be known of this Caritan or Carithan. [J. G.]

CARITAS. Charity with her virgin sisters, Faith and Hope, and their mother Wisdom, seem to have been the names of real martyrs. The names were very natural ones for Christians to give to their children. On the Aurelian Way, in the church of St. Pancras, lay Sophia with her three daughters: Sapientia, with her daughters Fides, Spes, and Caritas, as William of Malmesbury calls them; but the Latin names nowhere else occur in this order, the Greek names when given in full always do. Sophia, Pistis, Elpis, Agape, are said to have been a mother and daughters who suffered in September, and whose relics were transferred to the church of St. Silvester. On the other hand, Sapientia, Spes, Fides, Caritas, are said by Ado to have suffered August 1, and were buried on the Appian Way, in the crypt of St. Caecilia. In that crypt has been found the inscription, PISTE SPEI SORORI DULCISSIMAE FECIT. In the same place, if we rightly understand De Rossi, was found AGAPE QVE VXIT ANNIS VIGINTI ET SEX IN PACE — Agape, who lived twenty-six years in peace. There is no statement of relationship in the notices of the tombs on the Appian Way. It appears probable that Ado has confounded the widely celebrated Martyrs who are said to have suffered in September under Adrian, with the occupants of some Christian tombs in a crypt where there were many celebrations early in August. The Menology gives the ages of Faith, Hope, and Love, as 12, 10, and 9. (De Rossi, Rom. Sott. i. 180-183, ii. 171 ff., pl. lv. 10; Bede, Mart. July 1, Bede, Mart. Auct. June 23; Usuard, August 1; M-nol. Basil. Sept. 16.) [E. B. B.]

CARITOSUS, bishop at the councils of Sinuessa, A.D. 303, and Rome A.D. 324 (Labbe, C. n. c. i. 939, 1545). [E. B. B.]

CARLOVINGIAN BOOKS. [CAROLINI LIBRI.]

CARNAS, the Cappharodite, was a soldier in Libya, early in the 5th century, who stole a horse from SYNESIUS, bishop of Cyrene, and then wanted to buy it of him for a small sum, and refused to give it back, if the bishop would not sell it. (Syn. Epp. 6, 14, 42; Tillem. xii. 548.)

CAROLINI LIBRI, or Carolingian books, a treatise in four books drawn up by order of Charlemagne, condemning the image-worship as ordered to be restored by the seventh oecumenical council, the second of Nicaea, held there in June 787. The decrees of this council were forwarded by Tarasius patriarch of Constantinople to pope Hadrian I. There had been two ecclesiastics present at the council on the part of the pope, and its decrees were accepted and the council itself recognised as oecumenical by the Roman church. A Latin translation of the decrees was made (so bad, says Anastasius, that the sense could hardly be made out, Mansi, xii. 981, C.) and forwarded by the pope to Charlemagne. Charles caused them to be read before him and his councillors, found fault with much therein, noted down what he objected to, and sent abbat Angilbert to Rome with his objections for correction. (See preamble to Syn. Paris, anno 825, ap. Mansi, xiv. 422, or Bouquet Recueil, &c., vi. 338.) To this "Capitulare adversus Synodum" Hadrian replied (Mansi, xiii. 759 ff.). Charles had already, in accordance with Hadrian's request, sent on the decrees to England. There, too, deliberation was held upon them. Alcuin wrote an epistle summing up the Scripture authorities on the subject, which epistle he brought over to Francia to king Charles (Councils and Ecclesiastical Documents, &c. by Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 469, note). In 794, at a synod at Frankfort, the decrees of the Nicene council were rejected, and the council itself pronounced not oecumenical, notwithstanding the presence of two ecclesiastics from the apostolic see (Ann. Laurissenses, sub anno). In 825 the synod of Paris again condemned image-worship (Mansi, xiv. 417 ff.). In the latter half of the 9th century Hincmar of Rheims states that a volume of no small size concerning the rejection of this synod of the Greeks had been sent to Rome by Charles, by the hands of certain bishops. This volume Hincmar, when a young man, had himself read in the palace, and he proceeds to quote therefrom a passage which occurs in the Libri Carolini [iv. 28]. (Hincm. Rem. adv. Hincm. Laud. cap. 20; Opp. ed. Sirmondi, ii. 45.) Thus we have the following facts: (i.) Charles, shortly after receipt of his objections and sent them by Angilbert the abbat in the form of the "Capitulare adversus Synodum" to Hadrian. No document bearing this name survives. (ii.) Alcuin summed up in an epistle (not extant) the Scripture evidences on the question, which he brought over with him to Charles; and shortly afterwards Charles himself commanded the synod of Frankfort, which condemned the Nicene council, to take Alcuin into consultation as a man "learned in the doctrines of the church." (iii.) The reference and quotation of Hincmar. From these three facts we have the following hypotheses: (i.) The "Capitulare adversus Synodum" and the Libri Carolini are identical. Against this it may be urged that the Libri Carolini which we now have could not be adequately described as a "Capitulare," and the latter, on the testimony of Hadrian himself, was sent to Rome by the hands of abbat Angilbert, the former by those of certain bishops. (ii.) The Libri Carolini are an expansion of the Capitulare drawn up by Charles's order after the synod of Frankfort (so Hefele). (iii.) The Libri Carolini constitute the original document drawn up when Charles first received the Nicene decrees from Hadrian, and the "Capitulare" was a condensation sent by the king to Rome (so Floss). (iv.) The Libri Carolini are written by Alcuin, and either identical with the epistle which he brought over with him from England, or an expansion of it drawn up by him after the Frankfort synod. This view is of course mere conjecture, resting on the similarity of argument of the Libri Carolini to that of the epistle of Alcuin, according to Simeon of Durham (Councils, &c., l. c.), and to that of some passages in Alcuin's commentary on St. John's gospel (see Hefele, Concilien-geschichte, iii. 654). As regards style, Frobenius, the editor of Alcuin in the last century pronounced against the Libri Carolini. Jaffé and Dümmler, his most recent editors, are inclined to accept them as his work (Monum. Alcuin. p. 220, note).

The history of the book itself is also curious, and its genuineness as we have it has been greatly disputed. Down to the beginning of the 16th century no trace is to be found of the work alluded to and quoted from by Hincmar. Bernhard of Luxemburg, in his Catal. heretic. inscript., published in 1522, alludes to a work of Charles's, in four books, against heretics, which he says is preserved in the Vatican library; and Steuchus, the Vatican librarian (died 1550), speaks of a book of Charles's concerning images, written in Lombardic characters, as then in the papal library. He quotes therefrom certain passages which are to be found in the present Libri Carolini (see Floss, pp. 7 and 10). In 1549 appeared the "Opus illustrissimi et excellentissimi seu spectabilis viri Caroli Magni nutu Dei regis Francorum contra synodum quae in partibus Graeciae pro adorandis imaginibus stolidae sive arroganter gesta est. Item Quae nunc primum in lucem restituuntur. Anno Salutis MDXLIX." Neither place nor editor's name was given. The nom de plume, however, of "Eli philii" was ingeniously and correctly identified with Tilius or Du Tillet, bishop of Meaux. This is the present Libri Carolini containing the quotations both of Hincmar and of Steuchus. The editor says he prints from a codex "in templo quodam majore et augustissimo ac totius Galliae antiquissimo repertum," and proceeds to adduce Steuchus as evidence of the existence of another exemplar in the Vatican. He then somewhat suspiciously adds that "the caligraphy is ancient, and no man can reasonably attribute the work to the present century." Du Tillet himself was several times suspected of heresy, and had to defend himself in 1566 and 1567 by writing against Calvin. The book was placed on the first index of Trent in 1564, and has remained thereon ever since. In 1570 Du Tillet died. Subsequent editions are all reprints of the original of 1549. The best, according to Floss and others, is that published at Hanover in 1731, with an introduction by Heumann. It is entitled "Augusti Concilii Nicaeni ii. censura,

h. e. Caroli Magni de impio imaginum cultu libri iv." The book was generally condemned as a forgery by Catholic divines, by Baronius, Bellarmine, &c. Subsequently opinion began to lean in favour of its genuineness, e. g. by Sirmondus, Dom Ceillier, Dupin, Pagi, &c. Writers since the time of Heumann have generally adopted this view, e. g. Walch, Schröckh, Bouterwek, Hefele, &c. Until the middle of last century no one seems to have searched for the Vatican MS. Frobenius, the editor of Aleuin, in 1759 wrote to and received answer from cardinal Passioneus, the librarian, that no MS. containing the Libri Carolini was to be found in the Vatican (Floss, p. 17). As regards Du Tillet's MS., Cassander, in a letter to Molinaeus in 1560 (quoted by Floss, p. 11), says that he saw it at Du Tillet's, and affirms it to be the work of Aleuin. Nothing further was known of it until in Pertz's Archiv der Gesellschaft für ältere Deutsche Geschichtskunde, viii. 361, published in 1843, a codex bearing the same title as Du Tillet's work was noted as existing in the library of the Arsenal at Paris, and attributed to the 10th century. Floss, professor of Catholic theology at Bonn, examined it in 1859, and at first believed it to be genuine. Afterwards he says that he determined it to be an elaborate imitation of the style of the 10th century by a copyist of the 16th. The examination of Floss was cursory, and until some more thorough investigation is made it cannot be said that the question of the genuineness of these writings is decided. So Baxmann, Die Politik der Päpste, p. 297-9, and Leist (Die Literarische Bewegung des Bilderstreits, Magdeburg, 1871, pp. 22, 23, and notes), who is the latest writer upon the subject.

As regards the contents of the Libri Carolini, and the theological position which they take up, the author is careful to assert himself a good catholic [iii. 1] and an adherent of the Roman church. As the apostles are above other teachers, so is Peter above the apostles. The opinion of Gregory the Great (Epp. vii. 54 sub fin. 111, and ix. 9) is the basis taken, viz. "that images may be retained as ornaments or means of instruction, but are not to be worshipped," and to this the Western world had generally adhered. The following summary of the doctrines contained is given by Hefele (Conciliengeschichte, iii. 663, 4), who adds two elaborate tables of the comparative passages in the Libri Carolini and the decrees of the Nicene council, and of those in the Libri Carolini and the letter of Hadrian (ib. pp. 665-8, 672. 3). 1. The two oriental synods, the iconoclastic of 754 and that of Nicaea restoring image-worship, are both "infames" and "ineptissimae," and both transgress the limits of the truth. Against the former we must hold to the belief that images are no idols, against the latter that they are not to be adored. 2. Adoration and worship are due only to God, to the Creator, and not to the creature. 3. Saints are only to be venerated (venerandi), and we must pay them nothing more than the veneration which is their due (opportuna veneratio). 4. There are certain instances in which adoration is paid to men, in bending the knee before them, and so forth, but these are merely forms of courtesy and respect. Nevertheless even such adoration as this ought not to be paid to images, for they are without life and the work of men's hands. 5. Churches do well to possess them as ornaments and as memorials of past events. But the possession is a matter of expediency, not of necessity; wherefore the Nicene council ought not to threaten with anathema those who do not pay honour to images. 6. Images must not on any account be placed upon an equality with the cross of Christ or with the Holy Scriptures, holy vessels, and the bodies and clothes of saints. These latter are all venerated in the West, according to ancient tradition, but images are not and have not been so venerated. The full title of Floss's book is De suspectâ librorum Carolinorum a Joanne Tilio editorum fide commentatio, quam scripsit H. J. Floss, Bonnae, 1860. The treatise by Leist is contained in the Report of the Royal Cathedral School of Magdeburg for the year 1870-1. (Bericht über das Königl. Dom-gymnasium zu Magdeburg.) [I. T. B.]

CAROSA, daughter of the emperor Valens, Marcian, the Novatian, a military man and man of letters and piety, was grammar master to her and her sister Anastasia. Some baths in Constantinople bore their name (Sozomen. vi. 9; Tillem. vi. 538). [E. B. B.]

CAROSSA, the traditional name of Manes's mother, cursed in the anathemas which converts from Manicheism had to subscribe before they were admitted to the church, which are given us by Cotelier. 'e Regia librorum supellectile MS. 1818,' in a note to the Recognitions, Patr. Ap. i. 537. The name will be found p. 539, ἀναθεματίζω τὸν πατέρα Μάνετος, Πατέκιον, οὐα ψεύστην καὶ τοῦ ψευδοῦς πατέρα, καὶ τὴν μητέρα αὐτοῦ Κάροσσαν (see Beausobre, Hist. Manich. i. 67). [E. B. B.]

CAROSUS (1). [CATULINUS.]

(2) One of the Illyrian bishops, addressed by Leo the Great (Ep. 13, p. 677) in the consulship of Aetius and Symmachus.

(3) Eutychian abbat, whom Leo begs the Emperor Marcian to silence (Ep. 136, p. 1281), and who was accordingly turned out of his monastery (Ep. 142, p. 1297). [E. B. B.]

CARPHACASEMEOCHEIR (Καρφακασήμοχειρ), one of the heavenly powers in the system of the PERATAE. (Hippol. Ref. v. 14.) [G. S.]

CARPIANUS, the brother to whom Eusebius addressed his scheme of Canons for a harmony of the Gospels. (Eus. iv. 1275.) [E. B. B.]

CARPILIO, witness of the apostasy of MARCELLINUS A. D. 303 (Labbe, Conc. i. 939), and bishop at council of Rome A. D. 324. [E. B. B.]

CARPINIANUS or CARPULIANUS, Roman presbyter, witness against and judge of pope MARCELLINUS at Sinuessa A. D. 303 (Conc. i. 939, 941). [E. B. B.]

CARPION, a Valentinian, who was preaching in the time of Nilus (Ep. 234, p. 167, Migne). [H.]

CARPISTES. In the system of VALENTINUS one of five alternative appellations applied to the Aeon Horus (Irenaeus, i. 2). The application of so many different names to the same personage seems to be best explained by the fact that in what is apparently an older form of the Valentinian system (known to us by a fragment preserved by Epiphanius, Haer. xxxi. 6), there correspond to Horus five different Aeons, Carpistes being the name of one of them. It is intelligible that when the system was simplified by the reduction of the five Aeons to one, this one should be counted entitled to receive any one of the older appellations. Of the difficult name Carpistes, far the simplest explanation is that given by Grabe. Καρπίς is the rod with which the praetor emancipated a slave; καρπισμός is used by Clem. Al. (Strom. v. 8, p. 679) to denote the enfranchisement of a slave by touching him with the καρπίς; other references will be found in Liddell and Scott s.v. Καρπιστής then denotes an emancipator, and is completely parallel to λυτρωτής, one of the other titles of Horus. The other names in the fragment χαριστήριος, ἄφετος, μεταγωγεύς seem to be of kindred signification. If the supposition be correct that these names are derived from an older system, commentators have entered on a false route who have sought an explanation of the name Carpistes by studying the language used in a somewhat later time concerning Horus. The most accepted explanation is that of Neander. The functions attributed to Horus are stated by Irenaeus (i. 3) to be twofold, that of supporting and that of restraining or limiting, as it is by him that each Aeon is sustained in its own place, and restrained from intruding into that which does not belong to it. To the latter function, the words of the Baptist were applied (Luke iii. 17), "Whose fan is in his hand," &c. Hence Neander concludes (Genet. Entwick. p. 111) that we are to take καρπιστής as equivalent to θεριστής the reaper, in reference to the comparison of the last judgment to a harvest, in which the evil will be completely separated from the good. This explanation, with some small modifications of detail, has been most generally adopted, as for instance by Baur (Christliche Gnosis, p. 128), by Harvey (in Iren. l.c.), by Mansel (Gnostic Heresies, p. 180), by Heinrici (Valent. Gnosis, p. 179). Notwithstanding it seems to us far-fetched and much inferior to the simple explanation given by Grabe. Hippolytus (Ref. vi. 31), though he gives some of the other titles of Horus, does not give the name Carpistes. [G. S.]

CARPOCRATES (Καρποκράτης, Irenaeus; Καρποκράς, Epiphanius and Philaster; most probably deriving this form from their common source, the shorter treatise against heresies by Hippolytus), a Platonic philosopher who taught at Alexandria in the early part of the 2nd century, and who, incorporating Christian elements into his system, became the founder of a heretical sect mentioned in one of the earliest catalogues of heresies that has come down to us, the list of Hegesippus, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22). These heretics are the first of whom Irenaeus makes express mention that they called themselves Gnostics; Hippolytus first speaks of the name as assumed by the Naassenes or Ophites (Ref. v. 1). Of all the systems called Gnostic, that of Carpoocrates is the one in which the Hellenic element is the most strongly marked, and which contains the least of what we are forced to ascribe to Jewish or Oriental sources. He is described as teaching with prominence the doctrine of a single first principle: the name μοναδική γνώσις, given by Clement of Alexandria (Strom. iii. 2) to the doctrine of the school which he founded, is made by Neander to furnish the key to the whole Carpoocratic system; but possibly is only intended to contrast with the doctrine of the Valentinian teachers, who thought it necessary to provide the first Being with a consort, in order that emanations from him might be conceivable. Carpoocrates taught that from the one unknown unspeakable God different angels and powers had emanated, and that of these the lowest in the series, far below the unbegotten Father, had been the makers of the world. The privilege of the higher souls was to escape the rule of those who had made the world—nay, to be able by magical arts to exercise dominion over them, and ultimately, on leaving the world, to pass completely free from them to God who is above them. Jesus he held to be a mere man naturally born of human parents, having no prerogatives beyond the reach of others also to attain. His superiority to ordinary men consisted in this, that his soul, being steadfast and pure, remembered those things which it had seen in the revolution (τῆ περιφορᾷ) in which it had been carried round with the unbegotten God, and therefore power [or a "power"] had been sent to him from God enabling him to escape the makers of the world. Though brought up in Jewish customs, he had despised them, and therefore had received powers enabling him to destroy the passions which are given to men as a punishment. But in this there was nothing special: others might be the equals or the superiors not only of Peter or Paul, but of our Lord himself. Their souls, too, might remember the truths they had witnessed: if they despised the rulers of the world as much as Jesus did, they would be given the same privileges as he, and higher if they despised them more. Thus the Carpoocraticians gave honour, but not exclusive honour, to Christ. They had pictures of him, derived, it was said, from a likeness taken by Pilate's order; they had images of him, which they crowned and treated with other accustomed marks of respect; but in this they only put him on a level with Pythagoras, Plato, Aristotle, and other philosophers to whom they paid like honours.

In the opening statement concerning the making of the world, the doctrine ascribed to Carpoocrates is almost identical with that ascribed to Saturninus; but in the following paragraph the language is distinctly taken from the myth in Plato's Phaedrus, in which human knowledge is made to be but a recollection of what the soul had seen when carried round with the gods in their revolution, and permitted to see the eternal forms of things.

The doctrine of the duty of despising the rulers of the world received among the Carpoocraticians an interpretation which enabled them to practise immorality without scruple. Things in themselves were indifferent; nothing was in its own nature good or evil, and was only made so by human opinion. The true Gnostic might practise everything—nay, it was his duty to have experience of all. A doctrine concerning the transmigration of souls which was taught by other Gnostic sects (see CAULACAU and CAINITES), and which harmonised well with Platonic teaching, was adopted by the Carpoeratiens in the form that a soul which had had its complete experience passed at once out of the dominion of the rulers of the world, and was received up to society with the God above them: those which had not were sent back to finish in other bodies that which was lacking to them; but all ultimately would be saved. But as was also taught by the Basilidians of Irenaeus and by the Ophites, salvation belonged to the soul alone; there would be no resurrection of the body. In conformity with this theory was interpreted the text from the Sermon on the Mount, "Agree with thine adversary quickly." The "adversary" (to whom, we read in Epiphanius that they gave the name of Abolus, a corruption, doubtless, from the Diabolus of Irenaeus) was one of the world-making angels, whose office it was to conduct the soul to the principal of these angels, "the judge." If he found that there were acts which it had not performed, he delivered it to another angel, "the officer," to shut it up "in prison"—that is to say, in a body, until it had paid the last farthing.

The doctrine that we ought to imitate the freedom with which our Lord despised the rulers of the world raises the question, Did Carpoerates intend to impute immorality to Him? On this point Carpoerates was misunderstood either by Hippolytus or by his own disciples. According to the version of Hippolytus, Carpoerates taught that Jesus surpassed other men in justice and integrity (σωφροσύνη και ἀρετή και βίω δικαιοσύνης, Epiphanius), and no doubt our Lord's example might have been cited only in reference to freedom from Jewish ceremonial obligations; yet the version of Irenaeus seems more trustworthy, which does not suggest that the superiority of Jesus consisted in anything but the clearer apprehension of eternal truths which his intellect retained. Carpoerates claimed to be in possession of the true teaching of Christ spoken secretly by Him to his apostles, and communicated by them in tradition to the worthy and faithful; and the apostolic doctrine that men are to be saved by faith and love was used by him to justify an antinomian view of the complete indifference of works. In another article will be given the arguments by which EPIPHANES, the son of Carpoerates by a Cephallenian woman, maintained a licentious theory of communism in all things, women included. The Carpoeratiens and the Cainites have often been coupled together as the two most immoral of the Gnostic sects, and in practical effects their doctrines may not have been very different; but the Carpoeratian theory of the indifference of human actions fell short of the inversion of good and evil which is ascribed to the Cainites. Whereas the latter represented the God of the Jews and maker of the world as an evil being who ought to be resisted, the former only spoke of the makers of the world as inferior beings whose restrictions it is true enlightenment to despise; and the arguments of Epiphanius, derived from the equality that reigns in nature, assume that the creation is so far conformed to the will of God that from the laws which pervade it we may infer what is pleasing to the supreme power. Whether immorality were directly taught by Carpoerates himself or not, his followers became proverbial for deliberate licentiousness of life. The Christians thought it likely that the stories current among the heathen of scenes of shameless debauchery in the Christian love-feasts had a real foundation in what took place among the Carpoeratiens. Philaster, who, apparently through oversight, enumerates the Carpoeratiens twice, the second time (57) giving them the alternative names of FLORIANI and MILITES, directly asserts this. His predecessors had suggested it as probable (Clem. Alex. Strom. iii. 2; and compare Justin Martyr, Apol. 26). And so Irenaeus counts that Carpoeratian doctrines and practices had been employed by Satan as the means of discrediting the Christian name among the heathen. (See also Eusebius, H. E. iv. 7.)

In a more trifling matter a heathen belief about the Christians generally seems to have been true of the Carpoeratiens, viz. that they knew each other by secret bodily marks ("notaculo corporis," Minucius Felix, cc. 9, 31); for the Carpoeratiens are said to have marked their disciples by cauterising them in the back of the lobe of the right ear. It appears from Heracleon (Clem. Alex. p. 995, Eclog. ex Script. Proph. xxv.) that this was a baptismal ceremony, intended to represent the "baptism with fire," predicted of our Lord by the Baptist. This confirms the evidence as to the use of at least St. Matthew's Gospel by the Carpoeratiens furnished by Epiphanius (Haer. xxx. p. 138), and by the use made of the Sermon on the Mount already referred to. Celsus probably refers to this rite (Origen, v. 64) when he says that Christians gave to certain others of them the opprobrious name, ἀκοῆς καυστήρια. Origen however does not understand it so, and supposes that 1 Tim. iv. 2 is referred to. In the same place (c. 62) Celsus speaks of Marcellians derived from Marcellina, and Harpoeratiens from Salome. It is possible that Carpoeratiens are intended by the former, since Irenaeus tells that Marcellina, a teacher of that sect, came to Rome in the episcopate of Anicetus; but it is difficult to say that in the latter name we are either to read or to understand Carpoeratiens, in the absence of any evidence or likelihood that these sectaries claimed any connexion with Salome.

Mention has already been made of the cultivation of magic by the Carpoeratiens, and their pretension to equal the miraculous powers of our Lord. Hippolytus, in the fourth book of the Refutation, has given us several specimens of the kind of wonders exhibited by the magicians of his time, which are not very unlike the feats performed by professional conjurers of the present day. It was easy for Irenaeus to shew (ii. 32) how very unlike these transient wonders were to the permanent miracles of healing effected by our Lord, and which, as he claimed, continued to be exhibited in the church.

In the preceding account we have not ventured to lay too much stress on the speculations of Neander already referred to. According to him, the Carpoeratian system sees in the world's history one struggle between the principles of unity and of multiplicity. From one eternal Monad all existence has flowed, and to this it strives to return. But the finite spirits who rule over several portions of the world counteract this universal striving after unity. From them the different popular religions, and in particular the Jewish, have proceeded. Perfection is attained by those souls who, led on by reminiscences of their former condition, soar above all limitation and diversity to the contemplation of the higher unity. They despise the restrictions imposed by the mundane spirits; they regard externals as of no importance, and faith and love as the only essentials; meaning by faith, mystical brooding of the mind absorbed in the original unity. In this way they escape the dominion of the finite mundane spirits; their souls are freed from imprisonment in matter, and they obtain a state of perfect repose (corresponding to the Buddhist Nirwana) when they have completely ascended above the world of appearance.

With respect to the Carpocratians, the primary authorities are Irenaeus (i. 25, ii. 31-34), Clem. Alex. (Strom. iii. 2); Tertullian (De Anima 23, 35), who appears to have drawn his information from Irenaeus; Philaster (35) and Pseudo-Tertullian (9), who represent the earlier treatise of Hippolytus; Epiphanius (27), who weaves together the accounts of Hippolytus and of Irenaeus; and Hippolytus, who in his later treatise (vii. 20) merely copies Irenaeus, with some omissions, thereby suggesting that he was not acquainted with the work of Irenaeus when he wrote the earlier treatise. He certainly had at that time other sources of information, for he mentions three or four points not to be found in Irenaeus; e.g. he emphasises the Carpocratian doctrine of the unity of the first principle, tells of emanations from that principle of angels and powers, gives a different version of the excellence of Jesus, and says that Carpocrates denied the resurrection of the body. It is not safe to make any assertion as to the sources which Irenaeus employed, though there are two or three coincidences with Justin which make it not incredible that the latter's work on heresies may have furnished some materials. In any case, it is likely that Irenaeus added much of his own, for the pains he has taken with the confutation make it probable that in his time the sect had still some activity at Rome.

It is not safe to attempt to assign with any precision a date to Carpocrates; but there are affinities between his system and those of Saturninus and Basilides, which suggest that we are to place his appearance in the character of the founder of a sect in any sense deserving to be called Christian a little later than Basilides, from whom he may have derived his knowledge of Christianity. Eusebius is probably right in placing him under the reign of Hadrian, who died A.D. 138. It suffices barely to mention the invention of the writer known as Praedestinatus (i. 7) that the Carpocratians were condemned in Cyprus by the apostle Barnabas.

Matter, in his history of Gnosticism, gives an account of certain supposed Carpocratian inscriptions, but they have since been found to be spurious (Gieseler's Ecc. Hist. chap. ii. § 45, note 16). [G. S.]

CARPONES, presbyter of Alexandria. At first a rival preacher to Arius (Epiph. 69. 2), afterwards excommunicated along with him A.D. 319 (Alex. ap. Socr. i. 6), and his companion in exile at Nicomedia, where he signed his letter to Alexander (Epiph. 69. 8). At a later date he was deputed by Gregory of Cappadocia to pope Julius, who would not listen to his arguments (Jul. ap. Ath. Apol. i. 743). [E. B. B.]

CARPOPHORUS (1). [CALLISTUS I.]

(2) Said to have succeeded Cyprian at Carthage (Ceillier, v. 141; Optat. Hilar. i. 19).

(3) Is the name of a martyr of unknown date celebrated in Umbria and at Capua and at Milan. (Tillem. v. 128, 132, 137.) [E. B. B.]

CARPULIANUS. [CARPINIANUS.]

CARPUS (1), a bishop of the time of the apostles (see Bible Dictionary), of whom Nilus (lib. ii. Ep. 190) tells Olympius the following story: "In his time two young students forsook the Greek schools, and begged and received Christian baptism, and as soon as their schoolfellows heard it—" there the manuscript leaves us, till we find Carpus calling the young converts "most impious and most unholy. And as he spoke thus, lo a great vision of fear and consternation, Christ came down from heaven, and the flaming dragons flee, and He takes the young man with kindness and much meekness, and brings him up out of the gulf. For truly they afterwards changed, and have shewn themselves great Christians. And He blames Carpus for his melancholy and severity, nay, more, that he cursed them sternly without compassion. Knowing this, therefore, O bishop," continues Nilus, "do not curse." A fuller version of the story is given in the 6th chapter of the 8th epistle, ascribed to Dionysius the Areopagite. It there appears that there was only one young convert, who apostatised while the glad days of his welcome into the church were yet being celebrated (ἔτι τῶν λαρίων ἡμερῶν αὐτῶ τελομένῶν), and that the other of the two young men was his seducer. The bishop does not curse them face to face, but is troubled in his sleep and midnight orisons, and prays for a thunderbolt to strike them dead. Then follows the vision in which heaven and hell are opened, and Carpus is rather pleased in looking down, and his sympathies are with the gnawing dragons. But at last he looks up and sees Jesus descending from His throne on the ridge of heaven and the angels with Him, and rescuing the men and saying, "Strike me now that thy hand is stretched out, for I am ready to suffer yet, for men that are being saved. But see if it be well for thee to choose rather to dwell in the gulf with the serpents than with God and good angels that love mankind." Carpus is here described as bishop of Crete and host of Dionysius. It is probable that the Carpus, at whose house Paul left his cloak (2 Tim. iv. 13) is intended, and that for Crete we should read Bereta or Berytus, a city in Thrace, the diocese assigned to him by the Pseudo-Dorotheus. K and B are often confounded, and no Berytus is known in Crete. It is also here recorded of him that he would never celebrate the Eucharist unless encouraged by a favourable vision. (Tillem. xiv. 195; Patr. Gr. t. lxxix. p. 218 (299); t. iii. p. 604 (1099).) [E. B. B.]

CARPUS (2) Martyr at Pergamus (Eus. iv. 16). The Byzantine Calendar distinguishes him from the Carpus of Troas, mentioned 2 Tim. iv. 13 (v. Dict. of the Bible), who is there commemorated on May 26, as one of the seventy, and commemorates him Oct. 13, with the following legend. "The holy martyrs Carpus and Papyrus were in the time of king Decius. And St. Carpus was bishop of Thyatira and Papyrus deacon. They then, being taken by the ruler of Asia and questioned, confessed the name of the Lord Christ before all. And being constrained to sacrifice and not persuaded, they were bound on horses and walked before the ruler, being dragged to Sardis, and there they were hung on wooden frames and cut with razors. And Agathodorus, who was slave to the saints, and followed them, was tortured and perfected. And as Carpus was hung up, he smiled; and when the ruler said, 'Why did you laugh, Carpus?' he answered: 'I saw the glory of God, and was glad.' And being taken down from the stocks they were cast into the fire. And Agathonica, sister of Papyrus, being present, entered the furnace rejoicing of her own accord. And both yielded their souls to the Lord." (Mencol. Basil.)

The above seems to be extracted from the book that Eusebius saw and copied. For his error as to the date, see under PIONIUS and PAPIAS. He makes the martyrdom take place at Pergamus. Thither, according to a sermon attributed by Allatius to Metaphrastes (Simeon Metaphrastes, ed. Migne, ii. 106), the martyrs were transferred on foot in chains after the death of Agathodorus. This is confirmed by the Mart. Hieron. (D'Achery, Spic. t. iv.), which has on March 12 simply: "In Asia, Carpi [Petronii] episcopi, Firmi, Pauli, Agatoni," on April 12, "In Asia, Pergamo natalis SS. Carpi Episcopi Pauli [Isaac] Agathonis," and on April 13, "Pergamo Asiae, Polycarpie (= Pauli, Carpi = Papyli Carpi) episcopi Pauli diaconi." A month's imprisonment may have intervened. April 13 is the day of commemoration in Metaphrastes and in Ado, who follows Rufinus in writing Papyrus for Papyrus. Again, if Metaphrastes be right in saying that Valerian had been sent by Decius into Asia, this must have been in A.D. 251 (Tillemont, iii. 711), and the persecution must have been at an end before October. The commemoration in the Greek church is probably the anniversary of the dedication of a church to these saints, said to have been built by Helena near her own palace at Constantinople, and in the form of the Holy Sepulchre (ib. p. 348). A trace of the earlier date appears in the commemoration of the Pergamene Antipas, Apr. 11. Metaphrastes also multiplies the tortures, and omits the smile of Carpus. He makes him an old man, whose white hairs are pitied by Valerian. Papyrus appears as working a miracle of healing, and claiming on the strength of it to be a healer, whence both saints are said, in another form of the legend (Arcudius, Anthologia, Oct. 13), to have been physicians by profession.

c Another Paul and Carpus are made out of Polycarp on Aug. 9.

CARSADAN, the name given to one of the three kings. [CONFLICT OF ADAM, sub fin.]

[G. S.]

CARTERIA, Martyrs of, in Africa, commemorated Feb. 2 in the Carthaginian calendar. They may therefore be either Victor, Marinus, Honoratus, Hilary, Urban, and Perpetua; or else Fortunatus, Felician, Firmus, Candidus, Castula, and Secundula, both which sets are marked that day in the Mart. Hieron. of D'Achery.

[E. B. B.]

CARTERIA, a wealthy lady at Antioch, a friend and correspondent of Chrysostom, to whom her ill health and repeated sicknesses caused great distress. She was also an intimate friend of Chrysostom's noble correspondents Marcianus and Marcellinus. Carteria sent presents of money and medicines to Chrysostom at Cucusus. The money was returned as not being needed, but the medicines were kept and gratefully acknowledged. She was very anxious to have visited Chrysostom in his place of exile, but was prevented by her frequent illnesses, and endeavoured to make up for her inability by inducing Libanius, who was probably a man of rank at Antioch, to travel thither, for which attention Chrysostom expresses much gratitude. At one time a journey to some distant place, at another her own sickness, produced an interruption in the correspondence which caused Chrysostom much regret (Chrysost. Epist. 18, 34, 44, 227, 232).

CARTERIUS (1). [PAMPHILUS.]

(2) Martyr at Sebaste in Lesser Armenia under Licinius and duke Marcellus. If the title be rightly attached to the legend, he was of the company of Atticus, Eudoxius, and Agapius, who had taken counsel with the whole army to abide in the faith of Christ. They were tortured and imprisoned, then brought out and beaten, and Carterius was told, 'You alone have made all the people revolt from submission to the king.' He answered, 'I did not counsel them to make insurrection against the king, but to draw near to the immortal king.' Styrciacus, Tobias, and Nicopolitanus came next, and were condemned to be cudgelled and finally burnt, with many others, Nov. 2. (Men. Bas.*) The Men. Sirleti (according to Gorres) makes the whole number 10, which is not many, if the conspiracy had spread throughout the army. There seems to be no reason for doubting this account (see SELASTE, MARTYRS OF), though it is unknown to the old Latin martyrologies.

(3) Signed the epistle of the Council of Alexandria to Antioch in A.D. 362 (Tillem. viii. 212). He only says, "I, Carterius, pray your welfare." Tillemont supposes him to be the bishop whose exile was mourned by the church of Antiaradus, as Athanasius tells in his apology for his flight (Ath. i. 703).

[E. B. B.]

(4) Father of PHILOSTORGIUS.

(5) The joint provost with Diodorus, afterwards bishop of Tarsus, of a monastery in or near Antioch, under whom Chrysostom and his companions studied the holy Scriptures and practised asceticism (Socr. H. E. vi. 3). He may also be the same that is commemorated by Gregory Nazianzen, in his poem To Hellenius, on the Monks, as given by God to another, yet so that he might claim him by right of friendship as his own (p. 1005). Again, there is a Carterius on whom, when he was gathered to his spiritual father Bassus, Gregory writes epitaphs, and longs to be with him, and speaks of him as the guide of his own youth (Greg. Naz. Ept. cxi. cxv. cxvi. cxviii.). He was buried in the land of the Ἐσολοί (cxviii.). Does this stand for ψωλοί? and if so, does it mean Palestine or Egypt? The Carterius whom he names in his poem Ad Hellenium he commends along with Cleodnius, Nicomedes, Asterius and his two brothers, Philadelphus, Reginus, Leontius, and Heliodorus, to the protection of Hellenius. Of these, Nicomedes is lamented along with Carterius (Epit. cxvii. cxii.-cxiv.); Cleodnius is a presbyter of Iconium (p. 93), who asks a short rule of faith of Gregory, and (p. 204) subscribes his will; Asterius is possibly the same as the assessor of the prefect of Cappadocia (pp. 124-127, 131). The two mentions of Carterius in Gregory seem then to refer to the same person, who was apparently in Cappadocia. Gregory's poem to Hellenius is referred to A.D. 372 by Ceillier (v. 275). Chrysostom was with Carterius up to A.D. 380 (Alzog, Patrologie, p. 304). Tillemont (ix. 370) says that there was an abbey of St. Carterius near Emesa in Phoenicia in the middle of the 6th century. [E. B. B.]

CARTERIUS (6) Governor of Caesarea in Cappadocia, A.D. 404. Chrysostom having halted at Caesarea on his way to his place of exile at Cucusus, was there attacked by a mob of fanatic monks, the tools of the bishop Pharetrius, his concealed enemy, from whose violence Carterius used his utmost efforts to shield him. His endeavours proving ineffectual, he made a vain appeal to Pharetrius to call off the monks and allow Chrysostom to enjoy the rest his enfeebled health required a few days longer. On his arrival at Cucusus Chrysostom sent him a warm letter of thanks for his services, and begged that he might hear from him (Chrysost. Epist. 14, 236). [E. V.]

(7) Presbyter of Constantinople, brought Anatolius's letter to Leo the Great, and carried back the answer (Leo, Ep. 80, p. 1039), April, A.D. 451. [E. B. B.]

CARTHACH, CARTHAGIUS. There were two saints so named, who, having been in the relation of master and pupil, are usually distinguished as Carthach Senior and Carthach Junior, the latter being also Mochuda.

(1) Commemorated Mar. 5. St. Carthach the elder is entered in the Mart. Tallocht as "Carthach mac Aengusa Droma Ferdain," and in Mart. Doneg. as bishop, alumnus of Ciaran of Saighir. Colgan (Acta SS. pp. 473-6) gives a memoir from the comparatively little that is known. He was of royal descent in Munster, being son or more probably grandson of Aengus, king of Cashel, who was converted by St. Patrick. He is reported to have been a pupil of St. Ciaran of Saighir (March 5), but as the latter belongs really to the 6th century [see CIARAN (4) of Saighir] it is impossible that he could have been a monk under him, if even born, before Aengus's death in A.D. 489. On account of irregular desire he was sent by St. Ciaran upon a penitential pilgrimage, when he spent seven years abroad, visiting Gaul and Rome. On his return he was heartily welcomed by St. Ciaran, and proceeded to teach, and founded churches and monasteries, St. Ciaran choosing him, it is said, to be his successor. The scene of his labours was Kerry, where he was bishop; he had a church called Druim-Fertain, in Carberry, another on Inis-Uachtair, in Loch Sileann, now Sheelin, and a third, Cill-Carthach, in Tir-Boghaine (Banagh Barony) in Tirconnel, co. Donegal. In Kerry, on the banks of the Mang, he trained his pupil and namesake St. Carthage the younger, or Mochuda, and his humility was such that he always put his pupil forward in preference to himself, so that to this day he is usually designated "institutor St. Mochudae," to whom also he dedicated himself and his church. The year of neither birth nor death is known, but he flourished about A.D. 540, and probably did not die before A.D. 580. His two chief designations are "alumnus S. Kierani Sagirensis," and "institutor S. Carthacii junioris seu Mochudae" (see Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 98 sq.; Kelly, Cul. Ir. SS. 83). The Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. tom. i. pp. 389-399) have a combined account of St. Kieran and St. Carthach.

CARTHACH (2) Commemorated May 14. St. Carthach the younger, or Mochuda, is one of the most noted saints in the beginning of the 7th century. Two lives are given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. at May 14, tom. iii.), the second life being the most historical. There is also a Life of St. Carthage in the so-called Book of Kilkenny, in Primate Marsh's Library, Dublin. He was a native of Kerry, and if a brother of St. Cuanna (February 4), his mother was Meda, or Finnmeda, daughter of Fingen, son of Fintan, so that St. Carthach is often called son of Fingen, while really maternal grandson. The name of his father is unknown, as St. Cuanna seems only to have been uterine brother, and Midarn or Miodarn was the father of another Cuanna [see CUANNA (1) and (2)]. His first chief foundation, where he formed his community of twelve disciples, whose names are all recorded (Colgan, Acta SS. 303; Bolland. Acta SS. Maii, tom. iii. 382 b) was the monastery of Rathain, not Rathyne in the barony of Fertullagh, West Meath, as supposed by some, but the present Rahen, a townland in the barony of Ballycowan, in King's County. There for forty years he ruled his community of monks, and scholars flocked to him from all parts of Ireland and Britain, so that he is said to have had 867 under him, all providing for themselves and the poor by the labour of their hands. He had been ordained priest by the elder St. Carthage perhaps about A.D. 580, and at Rahen, which was probably founded A.D. 591, he was consecrated bishop. For his monks he drew up a Rule, which, written in Irish character, Ussher seems to have seen in an ancient MS. along with the Rules of SS. Columbkille, Comgall of Bangor, and Ailbe of Emly. But notwithstanding his sanctity and zeal, he was driven from Rahen by Blathmac, son of Aedh Slane, king of the country. His expulsion from Rahen "in diebus paschae" is usually set down at A.D. 630; the Four Masters give 631, and the other Irish annals place it later. After wandering about for some time and working miracles, he was at last presented with land for a monastery, by Metris or Moelochtride, prince of the Deisi and son-in-law of Faibhe Flann; this was the origin of the present church and town of Lismore. But the late Dr. O'Donovan thinks it evident, from entries in the Irish annals, that an ecclesiastical establishment must have existed at Lismore before St. Carthage's expulsion from Rahen, and that he could only have remodelled the monastery and exercised his episcopate within or from it. St. Carthage had only been a short time at Lismore, when he died on May 14, A.D. 637, and was buried in the monastery. (Bollandists, Acta SS. Maii, tom. iii. 375-388; Colgan, Acta SS. 249 sq.; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 350 sq.; Ussher, *de Brit. Eccl. CASDOE, martyr in Persia, daughter of king Sapor, celebrated by the Greeks Sept. 29 according to Tillemont (vii. 663), but the story is not in the Menology of Basil, and Sozomen knows nothing of it. [E. B. B.]

CASINA, taken before Julian, probably the uncle of the emperor of that name, at Ancyra, with her husband Melasippus. Their son Antony, aged 13, was cast into prison; they were hung up and torn and scorched. Then her breasts were cut off, and her husband's legs below the knees. Their boy was brought in, and when he saw them hanging and their bleeding members on the ground, he kissed the same, and anointed himself with the blood. So they, as they hung, departed to the Lord (Menol. Basil., Nov. 7). Then the boy spat in the apostate's face, and was himself martyred. [E. B. B.]

CASSAN (CAISSIN, CASSIDANUS, CASSIDUS). Colgan says Cassan was a common name among the saints of Ireland; he mentions four, who are also given in Mart. Doneg. and Tallaght, but whom he cannot distinguish with any historical accuracy. These are Cassan the son of Neman, March 1; Cassan of Imdhual, of whom he gives a memoir at March 28; Cassan of Domnach Peduir (or Domnach mor Peduir, Mart. Tull.), June 4; and Cassan of Cluain-ratha, June 20. Of the last we have merely the name and feast. At Dec. 3, there is a Cassan, where Dr. Reeves (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 325) cites an authority for identifying him with the martyr Cassian in Mauritania, commemorated in the Roman Martyrology.

(1) There is entered in the Annals of Four Masters, "A.D. 695, Caisin, scribe of Lusca, died." He was son of Athracht, of the race of Laeghaire, son of Niall, and the monastery where he was scribe or chronicler was Lusk or Lush, now a parish in the barony of E. Balrothery, co.

Dublin. (Colgan, Acta SS. 781, c. 5; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 89.)

CASSAN (2) Son of Neman—Mar. 1. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 61) calls him Caisin of the Dal Buain, who is of the race of Eochaidh, son of Muiredh, of the posterity of Heremon. He flourished about A.D. 530, and was a contemporary of St. Finnian of Clouard. (Colgan, Acta SS. 394, c. 15, 741, c. 3, 780, c. 5.)

(3) Of Iomdual and Domnach-mor in Magh-Echnach—March 28. Of this saint Colgan gives a memoir, though he is not quite sure of his identity, as there are so many Cassans. About the middle of the 5th century, when St. Patrick began to preach in Ireland, St. Cassan lived in Meath. He is said to have gone on pilgrimage to Rome and on his return became "Abbas, episcopus, et scholae publicae rector." St. Patrick afterwards gave him the church of Domnach-mor in Magh-Echnach and also a holy patena; at this ancient church of Donaghmore, in the barony of Lower Navan, his relics were preserved and held in the highest veneration for ages after his death. Colgan says he flourished about A.D. 456, but Ceranus or Ciaran of Saighir, a fellow traveller to Rome, is usually placed in the following century. [CIARAN (4).] (Colgan, Acta SS. 779 sq. and Tr. Thaum. 86, c. 93, 130, c. 9, 136, c. 52, 266, col. 2; Petrie, Round Towers, 336-39, 411; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 89.)

(4) Of Domnach-Peduir (Colgan), or Domnach-mor-Petair (Mart. Tull.)—June 4. This Cassan of Peter's church is probably son of Maenach, and brother of St. Fachtna (Aug. 14) of Ross, of the seed of Lugaith, surnamed Maecon, king of Ireland [FACHTNA]. He may also be Cassidus or Cassidanus, "institutor" of St. Senan at Inisicathery. He was born in the region of Kierraike Chuirke (probably a part of Kerry), and dwelt in the monastery of Irras, where he gave the monastic robe and tonsure to St. Senan; to St. Cassidus's monastery, the scene of his early training, and the resting-place of his master, St. Senan came, when his own death was at hand, and died on his way home. (Colgan, Acta SS. 170, c. 5, 516 (given as 606), c. 9, 537, c. 42, 780-81; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 447, ii. 90, 92.) [J. G.]

CASSIANUS (1) The second Gentile bishop of Jerusalem (Eusebius, H. E. v. 12).

(2) JULIUS, a heretical teacher who lived towards the end of the second century, chiefly known to us by references to his writings made on two occasions by Clemens Alexandrinus. In the first passage (Strom. i. 21, copied by Eusebius, Praep. Ev. x. 12) Clement engages in a chronological inquiry in order to shew the greatly superior antiquity of Moses to the founders of Grecian philosophy, and he acknowledges himself indebted to the previous investigations of the same question made by Tatian in his work addressed to the Greeks, and by Cassian (whose name is here spelt with a single s in the MS. of Clement, but not in those of Eusebius) in the first book of his Eregetica. Vallarsi (ii. 865) alters without comment the Cassianus of previous editors into Casianus, in Jerome's Catalogue 33, a place where Jerome is not using Clement directly, but is copying the notice in Eusebius

(H.E. vi. 13). Jerome adds that he had not himself met the chronological work in question. In the second passage (Strom. iii. 13, et seq.) Cassian is also named in connexion with Tatian. Clement is, in this section, refuting the doctrines of those Gnostics, who, in their view of the essential evil of matter, condemned matrimony and the procreation of children; and having considered some arguments urged by Tatian, he proceeds to say that similar had been used by Julius Cassianus whom he describes as the originator of Docetism (ὁ τῆς δοκῆσεως ἕξάρχων), a statement which must be received with some modification [DOCETÆ]. He quotes some passages from a treatise by Cassian on Contenance (περὶ ἐγκρατείας, ἢ περὶ εὐνοουσίας), in which he wholly condemned sexual intercourse, and referred its origin to instigations of our first parents by the serpent, alleging in proof 2 Cor. xi. 3. Cassian quoted Isaiah lvi. 3, Matt. xix. 12, and probably several other passages which are discussed by Clement without express mention that they had been used by Cassian. Cassian also uses certain alleged sayings of our Lord, cited likewise in the so-called second epistle of the Roman Clement to the Corinthians, cap. xii., as well as in the Excerpta Theodoti, lxvii. p. 985. Lightfoot notices (Clement, l.c.) that Cassian, by the omission of a clause, makes the Encratite aspect of the passage much stronger than it appears in the citation of the Pseudo-Clement. Clemens Alexandrinus makes no complaint of unfairness in the quotation; but while he remarks that the sayings in question are not found in the four Gospels which had been handed down, but only in the Gospel according to the Egyptians, he gives a different explanation of them, it must be owned far less natural than that of Cassian.

Another specimen of Cassian's arguments in this treatise is preserved in Jerome's Commentary on Gal. vi. 8. Jerome there answers an Encratite argument founded on this text, viz. that he who is united to a woman soweth to the flesh, and therefore shall of the flesh reap corruption. This argument is introduced with words which, according to the common reading, run, "Tatianus qui putativam Christi carnem introducens, omnem conjunctionem masculi ad foeniam immundam arbitratur, tali adversum nos sub occasione presentis testimonii usus est argumento." There is little doubt that we are to read instead of Tatianus, Cassianus. The Benedictine editor who retains the old reading notes that Cassianus is the reading of two of the oldest manuscripts, while Vallarsi admits Cassianus into his text stating it to be the reading of every manuscript he had seen.

The Docetism of Cassian was closely connected with his Encratism, for it was an obvious answer of the orthodox to his doctrine on Contenance, that if the birth of children were essentially evil, then our Lord's own birth was evil, and His mother an object of blame. This was met by a denial of the reality of our Lord's body. Cassian also taught that man had not been originally created with a body like ours, but that these fleshly bodies were the "coats of skin" in which the Lord clothed our first parents after the Fall. This notion, probably derived from Valentinus (Irenaeus, l. v. p. 27), was one which had considerable currency. References to those who entertained or who controverted it will be found in Huet's Origeniana, ii. Qu. 12, viii., and Beausobre, Manichæisme, ii. 135).

Theodoret (Hæc. Fab. i. 8) enumerates among the followers of Valentinus one Cossian, by whom, no doubt, Julius Cassianus is intended; for many greater inaccuracies in the names are to be found in the present text of Theodoret, and Theodoret would have found authority in Clement for classing Cassian with Valentinus.

The coincidences between Tatian and Cassianus seem too close to be accidental, but we have not data to determine their relative priority. If Cassian were really the founder of the sect called Docetæ, he must have been some time antecedent to Serapion (Eusebius, H. E. vi. 12). His country may be conjectured to have been Egypt [DOCETÆ; ENCRATITES]. [G. S.]

CASSIANUS (3), an exceptor or clerk who threw down the tablets and refused to record the sentence of Aurelianus Agricolaus against Marcellus at Tangier (A.D. 298?). Marcellus broke into a smile of gladness, Agricolaus into a passion of rage. Cassianus was imprisoned, and on his examination, repeated Marcellus's answers almost verbatim, and was martyred Dec. 3^d (Mart. Hieron., &c.). His acts are given by Ruinart as a contemporary record, p. 315. He is mentioned by Prudentius (περὶ στεφάνων, iv. 44). (Tillem. v. 6; Ruin. 311.)

(4) Deacon of Rome (Tillem. v. 30, 103; De Rossi, Rom. Sott. i. 203, 204), sent by Pope Melchiodes to receive back the confiscated catacombs at the close of the persecution, and identified by the Donatists (not at their conference with Augustine, but afterwards) with a Cassianus who had been a traditor; an identification which Augustine (Post Col. ad Don. 13, t. ix. p. 662) indignantly repudiates. But it must be admitted that the identity of a second name, besides that of Strato, in the list of deacons employed at the recovery of peace, and the list of betrayers of books in the persecution, considering that it would be upon the deacons that the demand for the books would first press, and that the number of deacons was limited to seven, considerably strengthens the case of the Donatists. The deacons were sent by Melchiodes with letters from the emperor Maxentius and the prefect of the guard, to receive back from the prefect of the city the places that had been taken from the Christians in the time of persecution. It is observable that Augustine does not here seem inclined to pass any other judgment than the Donatists do on the employment of a traditor, if it were the fact; it is the fact that he denies.

(5) One of the Donatist bishops who petitioned Julian (A.D. 362) to be recalled from exile and restored to the possession of their basilicas. They spoke of justice as the only plea that had any weight with the apostate. He wrote back that "this too at the supplication of Pontius, Rogatianus and Cassianus, and the other bishops and clergy is added to crown the grant, that those things be abolished, which without a rescript have been done amiss in their regard, and all things recalled to their former status." The prayers of the church to the Lord for the unity of Christ are more ancient, exclaims Augustine, than the prayers of these men to Julian for the party of Donatus (contra litteras Piti-liani, c. 97, vol. ix. 334).

CASSIANUS (6), bishop of Autun. The date we assign to him will vary according as we attach more weight to the ancient Life of him, which professes to be based on a contemporary record (Acta SS. Aug. 5, vol. ii. p. 64), as Ruinart prefers to do, or to a casual statement by Gregory of Tours, who was shewn his tomb (Glor. Conf. 74, 75), as is done by Tillemont, and the Bollandists. The life tells us that he was born of noble parents in Alexandria, and brought up by a bishop Zonis; that he made his house a Christian hospital in the time of Julian, liberated his slaves, and built a church to St. Lawrence at Orta in Egypt, at which place he was made bishop against his will in the time of Jovian, A.D. 363. After his old master had been martyred in the next persecution (A.D. 373?), he vowed a missionary pilgrimage, sailed about for six months, then was carried to Marseilles, and proceeded to Autun, where he sat and prayed by the shrine of St. Symphorian, and the bishop Simplicius heard of it, and came out to greet him with hymn and canticle. He helped in the conversion of the pagans of that place, and would have proceeded to Britain, but Simplicius detained him. Simplicius dying three years later, left the see vacant for a year, during which Cassian celebrated at his grave daily, and then was unanimously appointed his successor. He held the see for twenty years.

The chief difficulty in this account (apart from the fact that bishop Zonis and the town of Orta in Egypt are quite unknown) is that Simplicius is represented in the Acts of Germanus as surviving at the time of his election (A.D. 418). See the preface to the life of Simplicius, June 24, in Acta SS.

Tillemont (x. 835) supposes that the legend of the Egyptian origin of this Cassian is due to a confusion with John Cassian.

Gregory, after describing Cassian's tomb, tells that Simplicius was buried in the same, then gives the life of Reticius, and says, "Cassian, whom we mentioned above, succeeded him. After him Hegemonius took the chair, on whose death Simplicius was set over the church." We have manifestly only to transpose one sentence to bring Gregory into agreement with the acts, and make the order, Reticius, Hegemonius, Simplicius, Cassianus.

The tomb of Cassian was famous. A stain in the form of a cross appeared on it, which is said to have prompted Germanus to hold a conversation with the saint in his tomb. He asked him how he lid, and the saint answered that he was at rest. This is told in his life, and may explain the great eagerness to obtain dust scraped from the stones of his tomb, which was almost bored through in consequence, as testified by Gregory. [E. B. B.]

(7) A presbyter who took part in the council of Aquileia (Ambrose, Ep. 843). [J. Ll. D.]

(8) One of those martyred with Saturninus and Dativus.

(9) One of the eighteen MARTYRS of SARAGOSSA; being one of the four whom Prudentius calls Saturninus (Tillem. v. 229).

(10) A Christian schoolmaster, and apparently shorthand-teacher at Inola (Forum Cornelli) in Romagna, who on refusing to sacrifice was given up to the boys of his school to kill with their styles and tablets. So Prudentius was told, on the authority of ancient acts then extant, by the verger of the church where his picture was shewn (περί σφεδάνων, x.). Here Prudentius made vows for a safe voyage. His martyrdom is assigned to Aug. 11 or 13, on which latter day it has been celebrated from the 8th century onwards. There is a sermon in his honour by Peter Damiani. He is said to be buried under the altar of the cathedral at Imola, which is dedicated to him (Tillem. v. 53). A similar death is recorded of a senator under Caligula, of a martyr under Julian, and of Erigena at Oxford.

CASSIANUS (11) JOHANNES, has been called the founder of Western monachism and of the Semipelagian school. More exactly, he was the first to transplant the rules of the Eastern monks into Europe, and the most eminent of the writers who steered a course between Pelagianism and the tenets of St. Augustine. Like St. Chrysostom, St. John Damascene, and others, he is usually designated by his agnomen. His birth is dated between 350 and 360 A.D.; his birthplace is not known. Gennadius calls him "Scythia" (Fabric. Biblioth. Eccles. s. v.); but this may be merely a corruption from Scetis or Scythia, where Cassian resided for some time among the monks of Nitria. Possibly "Cassianus" points to Casius, a small town in Syria. Modern commentators are inclined to assign to him a Western origin; but the fact of his writing in Latin is by no means conclusive; for his parents, of whose piety he speaks gratefully (Coll. xxiv. 1), sent him to be educated in a monastery at Bethlehem; and there he would have frequent intercourse with pilgrims from the West. This cannot have been, as some have thought, the monastery of St. Jerome, for that was not then in existence, nor does Cassian ever refer to Jerome as his teacher. Here Cassian became intimate with Germanus, the future companion of his travels.

The fame of the Egyptian monks and hermits reached Cassian and his friend in their cells. About 390 A.D. they started, with leave of absence for seven years, to study by personal observation the more austere rules of the "renunciates," as they were called, in the Thebaid. At the end of seven years they revisited Bethlehem; and thence returned very soon to the Egyptian deserts (Coll. xvii. 31). Thus Cassian collected the materials for his future writings; he and his friend conversing usually with their hosts by means of an interpreter (Coll. xvi. 1). Among other voluntary hardships he speaks of the monks having to fetch water on their shoulders a distance of three or four miles (Coll. xxiv. 10). Evidently in his estimation, as in that of his contemporaries generally, the vocation of a solitary is holier than even that of a coenobite.

* On the other hand Gennadius, from his connexion with Marseilles, speaks with authority. Theodoret mentions the conversion of nomad Scythians on the Danube by Chrysostom (Hist. Eccl. v. 30); and in the beginning of the 5th century there must have been a large Roman element in the population on the Danube. "Patria Romanus" (in Photius) may mean, in this way, of a mixed descent, or, born within the Roman empire. Cave Hist. Literar. s. v. makes him by origin a native of the Tauric Chersonese. Honorius Augustodunensis (ii. 60, ap. Fabric. v. z.) calls Cassian "Afer," probably from his residence in Egypt.

About A.D. 403 we find Cassian and Germanus at Constantinople, perhaps attracted by the reputation of Chrysostom. By him Cassian was ordained deacon, or, as some think, appointed archdeacon; and in his treatise De Incarnatione (vii. 31) he speaks of Chrysostom with affectionate reverence. Cassian and his friend were intrusted with the care of the cathedral treasures; and, after the expulsion of Chrysostom, they were sent by his adherents on an embassy to Rome about A.D. 405 to solicit the intervention of Innocent I. No further mention is made of Germanus; nor is much known of Cassian during the next ten years. Probably he stayed on at Rome, after the death of Chrysostom, A.D. 407, until the approach of the Goths under Alaric. Possibly he met Pelagius there and thus acquired a personal interest in the Pelagian controversy.

After quitting Rome it has been inferred from a casual expression in the De Institutis (iii. 1) that Cassian visited the monks of Mesopotamia; some say, that he returned for a time to Egypt or Palestine; and by some he is identified with Cassianus Presbyter, sent by Alexander of Antioch on a mission to Rome. More probably Cassian betook himself from Rome, as the Pelagians were devastating the monasteries of Bethlehem, to Massilia (Marseilles), a city famous then, as in the time of Cicero, for the pursuits of literature. In this neighbourhood he founded two monasteries (one afterwards known as that of St. Victor^b) for men and women respectively. Tillemont says that the rule was taken from the fourth book of the De Institutis; and that many monasteries in that part of Gaul owed their existence to this foundation. As Cassian is addressed in the Epistola Castoris as "abbas," "dominus," and "pater," it is argued, but not with certainty, that he presided over his new monastery. Here he devoted himself to literary labours for many years, and died at a very great age, as far as can be ascertained, between A.D. 440-450.

The De Institutis Remuniantium, in twelve books, was written about A.D. 420 at the request of Castor, bishop of Apta Julia, in Gallia Narbonensis (Praef. Inst.). Books i.-iv. treat of the monastic rule; the others of its especial hindrances. The former were abridged by Eucherius Lugdunensis. The Collationes Patrum in Scithico Eremito Commorantium, in which Cassian records his Egyptian experiences, were evidently intended by him as a sequel and complement of his previous work; his purpose being to describe in the De Institutis the regulations and observances of monachism; in the Collationes its interior scope and spirit: in the former he writes of monks, in the latter of hermits. The Collationes were commenced for Castor, but after his death Collat. i.-x. were inscribed to Leontius, a kinsman of Castor, and Helladius, bishop in that district; xi.-xvii. to Honoratus, abbat of Lerins, and Eucherius, bishop of Lugdunum (Lyons); xviii.-xxiv. to the monks and anchorets of the Stoichades (Hyères). The Collationes have been well called a "speculum monasticum:" St. Benedict ordered them to be read daily; they were highly approved also by the founders of the Dominicans, Carthusians, and Jesuits. But the orthodoxy of the Collationes, especially of the third and thirteenth, on the subject of Grace and Freewill, was impugned by St. Augustine and Prosper of Aquitania. [See SEMIPELAGIANS.] An attempt was made by Cassiodorus and others to expurgate them. Cassian's last work, De Incarnatione Christi (cf. l. 3, v. 2), was directed against the Nestorian heresy, about A.D. 429, at the suggestion of Leo, then archdeacon and afterwards pope. Probably Cassian was selected for this controversy, as having been a disciple of Chrysostom, the illustrious predecessor of Nestorius in the see of Constantinople. (Inc. vii. 31.) The treatises De Spirituali Medicina Monachi, Theologica Confessio, and De Conflictu Virtutum ac Vitiarum are generally pronounced spurious.

Cassian is remarkable as a link between Eastern and Western Christendom, and as combining in himself the active and the contemplative life. It is difficult to overestimate his influence indirectly on the great monastic system of mediaeval Europe. His writings have always been in esteem with monastic reformers; especially at the revival of learning in the 15th century. Even his adversary Prosper calls him "insignis ac facundus." Cassian shews a thorough knowledge of the Holy Scriptures; with a good deal of quaintness often in his application of it. His style, if not so rich in poetic eloquence as that of his great opponent, is clear and forcible; and he is practical rather than profound. His good sense manifests itself in his preface to the Instituta, where he announces his intention to avoid legendary wonders and to regard his subject on its practical side. He insists continually on the paramount importance of the intention, disclaiming the idea of what is called the "opus operatum;" for instance, on almsgiving (Inst. vii. 21), fasting (Coll. i. 7), and prayer (Coll. ix. 3); and he is incessant in denouncing the especial sins of cloister-life; as pride, ambition, vainglory. The life of a monk, as he portrays it, is no formal and mechanical routine; but a daily and hourly act of self-renunciation (Coll. xxiv. 2). On the other hand, he is by no means free from that exaggerated reverence for mere asceticism, which in his day led so many to the abandonment of their social duties; and, while encouraging the highest aspirations after holiness, he allows too much scope to a selfish desire of reward. As a casuist he is for the most part sensible and judicious; as, in discriminating between voluntary and involuntary thoughts (Coll. i. 17). But he presses obedience so far as to make it unreasonable and fanatical (Inst. iv. 27, &c.), and under certain circumstances he sanctions deceit (Coll. xvii.).

On the subject of Predestination Cassian, without assenting to Pelagius, protested against what he considered the fatalistic tendency of St. Augustine. In the Collationes he merely professes to quote the words of the Egyptian "fathers;" and in the De Incarnatione he distinctly attacks Pelagianism as closely allied with the heresy of Nestorius (i. 3, vi. 14). Still, it is certain from the tenor of his writings that Cassian felt a very strong repugnance to any theory which seemed to him to involve an arbitrary limitation of the possibility of being saved. It has been well said that St. Augustine regards man in his natural state as dead, Pelagius as sound and well, Cassian as sick. [v. SEMIPELAGIANS.] Never formally condemned, and never formally canonised, Cassian occupies an ambiguous position. In the Latin church he is usually styled only 'beatus,' though dignified by the title of 'Saint' in the Greek. The local commemoration of Cassian is on July 23. The estimation in which he is generally held is well summed up by Maldonatus: "Fuit Cassianus auctor Catholicus ac bonus; nullum tamen tam pulcrum est corpus ut naevo careat."

The opinion that Cassian wrote in Greek hardly needs refutation. His own words expressly imply the contrary (Praef. Coll., and iii. 15), nor is there any Greek version of his works extant.

This first complete edition of his works was in 1559 (cf. Migne's Prolegomena). The most noteworthy editions are these: Cuychii, Antverpiae, 1578 [a very elegant edition]; Ciaconii, Romae, 1588; Lugduni, 1606; Romae, 1611; ALARDI GAZAEI, Duaci, 1616; Atrebatii, 1628 [revised by A. G., but published after his death; containing, besides valuable annotations, Prosperi de Grat.; P. Coelestini Epist.; Canones Ildi Conc. Arausic.; Prospe-i Epist. Regula S. Pachomii, &c.]; Parisiis, 1642; Francofurti, 1722. See also G. F. Wiggers, Tractatus de Cassiano, Rostochii, 1824, 4to. There is an Italian version of Cassian's works, Venezia, 1663, 4to; and a French version, without the thirteenth Coll., Paris, 1667, 8vo. [I. G. S.]

He is mentioned as the "beatissimus Cassianus qui Limerensi monasterio beatum Honoratum habuit comparem," in the catena which handed down the Cursus Scotorum from St. Mark, in a MS. of probably the 8th century, printed in Spelman (i. 176), Wilkins (Concil. iv. App. 741, 742), in Haddan and Stubbs (Concils, i. 138). [C. H.]

CASSIDANUS, CASSIDUS. [CASSAN.]

CASSIODORUS, MAGNUS-AURELIUS, senator, and chief minister to the Ostrogothic princes of Italy, was born at Scylacium (Squillace) in Bruttium, 469-70, of a noble and wealthy family, already distinguished for patriotic services; his grandfather having delivered Sicily and Bruttium from the Vandals under Genseric (Var. i. Ep. 4), and his father, who held the posts of "notarius" and "tribunus" under Valentinian III., having been employed in the embassy of Pope Leo, 451, which diverted Attila from his purpose of marching upon Rome (ibid.). With characteristic modesty the son, in commending Leo the Great on account of this embassy (Chron. 394), omits all mention of his father; but the retreat at Squillace, which he describes with enthusiastic affection (Var. xii. 15), seems to have been presented to the elder Cassiodorus by the Emperor, in acknowledgment of his services on this occasion. In the seclusion of this delicious region young Cassiodorus was brought up under circumstances highly favourable to his education, which included the study of grammar, rhetoric, dialectic, music, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, mechanics, anatomy, Greek, and the sacred Scriptures. His learning and accomplishments early attracted the notice of Odoacer, the first barbarian ruler of Italy, by whom he was made "comes privaratum," and subsequently "comes sacrarum largitionum" (Var. i. 4). After the final defeat of Odoacer by Theodoric at Ravenna, 493, Cassiodorus retired to his patrimonial estate in Bruttium, and secured the wavering allegiance of the provincials to the cause of the new ruler; for this service he was appointed by Theodoric to the official government of Lucania and Bruttium. Happy in the art of ruling to the satisfaction of the governed without neglecting the interests of his master, he was summoned, upon the conclusion of his prefecture, to Ravenna, and advanced successively to the dignities of secretary, quaestor, master of the offices, praetorian prefect, patrician, and consul. Meanwhile he enjoyed an intimacy with the prince, which, reflected as it is in his 'Varieties,' has given to that work much of the character and value of a state journal. Illiterate himself, Theodoric employed the eloquent pen of his minister in all public communications, and spent his leisure time in acquiring from him erudition of various kinds (Var. ix. 24). It would seem to have been the ambition of Cassiodorus, whose genius for diplomacy was consummate, to bring about a fusion between the Arian conquerors and the conquered Catholic population of Italy, to establish friendly relations with the eastern empire, and possibly to create at Rome a peaceful centre to which the several barbaric kingdoms which had established themselves in Gaul, Spain, and Africa might be attracted. The progress of Theodoric to the capital, where the schism between Pope Symmachus and his rival, Laurentius, was then raging, A.D. 500, was probably planned by him in view of this result (Var. xii. 18, 19; cf. Gibbon, Decl. and Fall, ch. 39); but the temper of Theodoric's declining years must have disappointed the hopes of his enlightened minister, and in 524 he wisely resolved to divest himself of his honours, and to seek shelter in his Calabrian retreat from the storm which proved fatal to his co-senators, Boethius and Symmachus. After the death of Theodoric, 525, Cassiodorus again became conspicuous as the trusted adviser of his daughter Amalasantha, widow of Eutaric, who acted as regent for her son Athalaric (Var. ix. 25). By his influence the Goths were kept in subjection to the new rule, notwithstanding the Roman proclivities of Amalasantha as displayed in the education of the young prince. The threatened danger of an invasion by Justinian was likewise averted by the ready aid of his purse and pen (Procop. B. G. i. 3). Upon the enforced acceptance by Amalasantha of Theodatus as co-regent, Cassiodorus again submitted to circumstances (Var. x. 6, 7), and wrote letters in the name of either soliciting the goodwill of the senate and the emperor (Var. x. 1, 2, 3). At this time he held the office of Praetorian Prefect, and with this title he continued to serve under Theodatus after the untimely death of Athalaric and the treacherous murder of Amalasantha. In comparing the even felicity of his career with the tragic end of Boethius, one is tempted to suspect the nobleness of a character which, no matter how infamous the ruler, could accommodate itself with such singular tact to every change of government; but Cassiodorus was no mere time-server. His writings shew him to have been animated by a truly patriotic spirit; and if he adapted himself skilfully to the varying humours of the court, it was from no interested motives, but that he might have it in his power to alleviate the inevitable misfortunes of his conquered countrymen. Thus upon the invasion of Sicily by Belisarius, in consequence of the murder of Amalasantha, he is found raising taxes for the defence of Italy in such a way as to cause the least possible distress to the provincials (Var. xii. pass.). When the sacred vessels from St. Peter's are pawned by Theodatus, to provide for the embassy of pope Agapitus to Justinian, his intercession prevails with the unscrupulous prince to restore them (Var. xii. 20). When famine presses heavily on the northern districts of Italy, he exerts himself to lighten fiscal burdens and relieve the sufferers (Var. xii. 26). Under Vitiges, who succeeded to the kingdom upon the assassination of Theodatus, he continued his administration (Var. x. 31), and found increased scope for his charitable efforts in moderating the extortion and violence consequent upon a more vigorous prosecution of the war. ☩

This was the last public ministry of Cassiodorus: upon the triumph of Belisarius and the downfall of the Ostrogoths, being now seventy years of age, he withdrew to his native province, and founded the monastery of Viviers at the foot of Mount Moscius, which he describes (Var. xii. 15). Various reasons have been assigned for this retirement, but the true motive would seem to be indicated at the close of his treatise on the soul, where, addressing Christ in a strain of pious exaltation, he exclaims, "Tibi nobilius est servire quam regna mundi capessere." For fifty years he had laboured to preserve authority from its own excesses, to soften the manners of the Goths, and to uphold the rights of the Romans; but he was weary of the superhuman task, and seems to have turned to the cloister for repose and freedom. His activity, however, was not to be satisfied with the ordinary occupations of monastic life. Hence while the summit of the mountain was set apart for the hermits of the community (Monasterium Castellense), there sprang up at its base, beneath his own immediate auspices, a society of cenobites, devoted to the pursuit of learning and science (Monasterium Vivariense). Foiled in his efforts to save the state of Italy from barbarism, he directed his remaining energies to elevating the standard of knowledge among ecclesiastics, and preparing the cloister to become the asylum of literature and the liberal arts. With this purpose he endowed the monastery of Viviers with his Roman library, containing the accumulations of half a century, which he continued to augment until his death (Div. Lit. c. 8). Not only were the monks incited by his example to the study of classical and sacred literature; he trained them likewise to the careful transcription of manuscripts, in the purchase of which large sums were continually disbursed. Bookbinding, gardening, and medicine were among the pursuits of the less intellectual members of the fraternity (Div. Lit. 28, 30, 31). Such time as he himself could spare from the composition of sacred or scientific treatises he employed in the construction of self-acting lamps, sundials, and water-clocks, for the use of the monastery. Nor was the influence of his example confined to his own age or institution. The system of which he was the founder took root and spread beyond the boundaries of Italy, so that the multiplication of manuscripts became gradually as much a recognised employment of monastic life as prayer or fasting: nor is it too much to say that on this account alone the statue of Cassiodorus deserves an honourable niche in every library. The date of his death is uncertain. He composed his treatise on orthography in his ninety-third year (De Orthogr. praeef.), and he is even reported to have completed his century (Bacon, Hist. Vit. et Mort. 96). There seems, however, to be no evidence for this, unless the words he uses in speaking of himself at the close of his commentary on Psalm ci. (centenarii numeri fecunditate proventum) be taken to indicate the exact measure of his age.

It has been asserted that Cassiodorus adopted the rule of St. Benedict; but the elaborate effort of his Benedictine editor, Garetius, to disprove the opinion of Baronius to the contrary fails to establish anything more than a remote possibility that Viviers borrowed from Monte Casino.

Of the extant writings of Cassiodorus the twelve Books of Varieties, consisting principally of letters, edicts, and rescripts, are the only work of real importance: apart, however, from the study of these pages, it is hardly possible to obtain a true knowledge of the Italy of the 6th century. The very style of the writer, possessing, as it does, a certain elegance, yet continually deviating from pure idiom and good taste, is singularly characteristic of the age which witnessed the last flicker of Roman civilisation under the Ostrogothic rule. It is as though the pen of Cicero had been dipped in barbaric ink. The general result is artificial and bizarre; but though the meaning of the writer is frequently obscured by his rhetoric, his manner is not as unpleasing as is often asserted. It will be sufficient to enumerate here the other writings of Cassiodorus, a more detailed account of which is given in Smith's 'Dictionary of Greek and Roman Biography.' (2) Historiae Ecclesiasticae Tripartitae, Libri xii., being an epitome of the ecclesiastical histories of Sozomen, Socrates, and Theodoretus, as digested and translated by Epiphanius Scholasticus. (3) Chronicum, chiefly derived from Eusebius, Hieronymus, and Prosper. (4) Computus Paschalis. (5) Expositio in Psalmos, principally borrowed from St. Augustine. (6) Expositio in Cantica Canticorum, of doubtful authenticity. (7) De Institutione Divinarum Litterarum, an interesting work as illustrating the enlightened spirit which animated the monastic life of Viviers. (8) Compleciones in Epistolis Apostolorum, in Acta, et in Apocalypsin, first brought to light by the Marquis Scipio Maffei at Florence, in 1721. (9) De Artibus ac Disciplinis Liberalium Litterarum. (10) De Oratione et de Octo Partibus Orationis, of doubtful authenticity. (11) De Orthographia. (12) De Anima. Of the lost writings of Cassiodorus the most important work would seem to have been De Rebus Gestis Gothorum, Libri xiii., of which we have the abridgement of Jornandes.

The first edition of the collected works of Cassiodorus was published at Paris, 1584, 4to, with the notes of Fornerius. An excellent edition was published by J. Garett at Rouen, 1679, 2 vols. fol., and reprinted at Venice, 1729. This edition, together with an appendix containing the commentaries discovered by Maffei, is reproduced in Migne's Patrologia, vols. lxi. lxx.

The authorities for his life are the Vita Cassiodori prefixed to Garett's edition; La Vie de Cassiodore, avec un abrégé de l'histoire des princes qu'il a servi, by Denis de Ste. Marthe, Paris, 1694, 8vo; and Leben Cassiodors, by De Buat, in the 'Transactions of the Royal Academy of Munich,' vol. i. p. 79. [E. M. Y.]

CASSIUS (1) Bishop of Tyre, who in the year 198 attended the synod held at Caesarea under the presidency of Theophilus, the bishop of that city, and Narcissus, of Jerusalem, to settle the paschal controversy. (Euseb. H. E. v. 25.) [E. V.]

(2) (St. Cassi) of Auvergne, about the time of Crocus, king of the Alemanni (probably A.D. 260), was found by Victorinus, the officer of the idol priest, in a village that was called the village of the Christians. Victorinus is said to have been so touched by his preaching and miracles that he became a Christian and a miracle-worker himself, and the two were martyred together, May 15 (Greg. Tur. Hist. Franc. i. 31, iv. 12; Acta SS. May, iii. 454; Tillem. iv. 224). The acts written by Proiectus are not extant. [E. B. B.]

(3) Numidian bishop addressed in Cyp. Ep. 70 (Syn. Carth. Bapt. Haer. i.), and speaks 22nd in Sentt. Epp. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii. as bishop of Macomades near Cirta. [E. W. B.]

(4) Jailor at Byzantium, kept ACACIUS in custody in A.D. 306, and gave evidence that he had heard from the fellow-prisoners, and seen with his own eyes, that many splendid soldiers, advocates, and physicians attended on him in his cell, but disappeared immediately the door was unlocked. He was flogged for the assertion, but persisted in it, and offered to die for it, according to Simeon METAPHRASTES. (Till. Mém. v. 389; Vita Acaçii, 17, 18; Acta SS. May 8.)

(5) Martyr at Bonn, Oct. 10, along with ST. GERVON (Usuard; Tillem. iv. 429).

(6) Bishop of Narui, said to have freed the swordbearer of Totila from a devil by signing him with the cross (Greg. Dial. iii. 6, p. 289); celebrated daily, and was told the day of his own death, June 29, by a vision of one of his priests seven years before he died (ib. iv. 56, p. 468). He is commemorated on that day. [E. B. B.]

CASTALIUS, bishop at the council of Sinuessa A.D. 303 (Labbe, Conc. i. 940). [E. B. B.]

CASTINUS of Tivoli, father of pope Simplicius (Anastas. ii. p. 362). Was this the same as the Castinus who was consul under John in 424 and banished by Placidia in 425 (v. Tillem. xiii. 1013-14)? [E. B. B.]

CASTOR (1) A correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen, whose friendship Gregory prized very highly. We have two letters of Gregory to Castor: one (Epist. 93) sent by his young friend and spiritual son Sacerdos, whose society Castor was very anxious to enjoy, whom Gregory begs he will not detain long. The second (Epist. 94) contains complaints of his own health which chains him to the spot, and threatens Castor in playful terms if he does not soon send back a lady whom he calls "their common sister," of whose services he stood greatly in need. [E. V.]

CASTOR (2) Presbyter of Treves under St. Maximinus, retired, and became a hermit at Caerden much below the town. He died Feb. 13 (A.A. SS. Feb. ii. 7-16; Tillem. vii. 250.) [E. B. B.]

(3) Confessor, and bishop of Apt in Provence. He appears to have been born at Nismes, and to have founded a monastery between the years 419-426. He is commemorated on the 21st of September (Acta SS. Boll. Sept. vi. 249).

(4) A priest of Coblentz. This saint is said to have performed many miracles, but his history is uncertain and his date is unknown (Acta SS. Boll. Feb. ii. 663). [H. W. Y.]

(5) Father of pope Felix IV.

CASTORINA, maternal aunt of St. Jerome. His letter to her (13, ed. Vall.), written when he was in the desert, shews that there had been some disagreement between them. [W. H. F.]

CASTORIUS (1), Brother of the constable Nicostratus, converted and martyred with him (see Acts of St. Sebastian, Tillem. iv. 521, 528). His feast is marked July 7, but Tillemont observes that they could not have suffered before the 17th. Claudius the jailor and his sons Felix and Felicissimus, were also converted and martyred along with them, A.D. 286. [SEBASTIAN.] But the whole story is a confusion with one of the QUATUOR CORONATI.

(2) Martyr at Nicomedia, March 16 (Mart. Hieron.).

(3) Martyr at Tarsus, March 28 (ibid.).

(4) The name of three Roman presbyters in A.D. 303, one condemned, along with Marcellinus, for apostasy, and also for betraying the granaries of the church, the other two condemning him (Labbe, Conc. i. 939-943). [E. B. B.]

(5) Brother of MAXIMIANUS (q. v.). We meet with him in the year 402. (Tillem. xiii. 288; Conc. ii. 1101.) The brothers were Donatists, and became Catholics. Maximian was chosen to the see of Vagina, but a scandal was raised against him, so, saying that he had joined the church for the sake of unity and would not cause a schism, he retired, and Castorius was urged to take his brother's place by Augustine and Alypius (Ep. 69, vol. ii. 230), whom Tillemont supposes to have been then at Vagina, where Castorius had been elected and whence he had retired. They besought him to shew the people that it was not for his own ease, but for their peace, that his brother had retired. They do not seem to have persuaded him (v. Tillem. xiii. 991).

(6) Notary and representative or nuntius of pope Gregory I. at Ravenna, against whom the people of that town laid complaints (Greg. Ep. vi. 31).

CASTORIUS (7) Bishop of Rimini, ordained reluctantly by Gregory I., at the request of the people, resigned from growing infirmity (Greg. Ep. ii. 35), and the see remained vacant for six years (Greg. Ep. viii. 19).

(8) Deacon, charged with examining into the life of the bishop of Pesaro and his presbyters (Greg. Ep. v. 28). [E. B. B.]

CASTRENSIS, ST., celebrated in South Italy as an African bishop of note, who in some barbarian persecution, both of clergy and laity (fancied by Tillemont to be under Thrasamond, i.e. between A.D. 496 and 522), was taken with eleven other bishops and put on board an old rotten ship, which carried them to Sinuessa, or Voltorno, where he died, Feb. 11 (Tillem. xvi. 607, 608). It seems more probable that the name is only the title taken from his see, and that he may be the Candidianus bishop of Castra, in Mauritania Caesariensis, who is given in a list of bishops persecuted by Hunneric (A.D. 484), with the note "per." (= perüt) after his name. (Conc. iv. 1147.) His legend is given from two MSS. in the Acta SS. Feb. ii. 523. [E. B. B.]

CASTRICCIA, a rich and fashionable matron of Constantinople, the widow of Saturninus (consul in A.D. 383), a leading member of the female cabal formed against Chrysostom at the court of the empress Eudoxia. [CHRYSOSTOM.] [E. V.]

CASTRUTIUS, a blind man of Pannonia, who about A.D. 394 undertook a voyage to see St. Jerome, but when he had reached Cissa was persuaded by his friends to give it up. Jerome writes to thank him and to console him. He begs him not to suppose his blindness to have been sent in punishment for his sin, and quotes the question of the disciples and our Lord's reply respecting the man who was born blind. He concludes by telling him the story of St. Anthony and blind Dilymus (Jerome, Ep. lxxviii., ad Castrutium, in Patrol. Lat. xxii. 651). [E. B. B.]

CASTULUS (1), Zetarius or manager of the summer and winter dining-rooms of the palace of Diocletian or Maximian, lodged in a garret in the palace, and sheltered the Christians there (Acts of St. Sebastian). He was put to the question thrice, then thrown into a pit, and then buried alive. He is now commemorated March 26, and a cemetery on the Via Lavicana is said to bear his name. Acts of him, chiefly drawn from those of Sebastian, are given by the Bollandists on that day. But in the Mart. Hieron. Castula is marked on that day in that place, and Castulus seems to be joined with other noted martyrs of that time, Euprepes, Saturninus, CHRYSANTHUS, and Maurus, Nov. 30 (v. also CARINUS). [E. B. B.]

(2) An Arian presbyter, whom Ambrose rescued out of the hands of the orthodox multitude at the time of the conflict about the basilicas at Milan (Ambrose, Ep. 20. 5). [AMBROSIOUS.] [J. Ll. D.]

(3) Martyr along with ZOTICUS in Egypt or in Africa, Jan. 12 (Mart. Hieron.).

(4) Martyr at Ancyra in Galatia, Jan. 23 (ibid.). [E. B. B.]

CASTURUS, ST. Confessor, and bishop of Vienne. Nothing certain is known of this saint. He is supposed to have lived about the 8th century (Acta SS. Boll. Oct. vi. 545). [H. W. Y.]

CASTUS (1), bishop of Sicca Venerea (Kef) in proconsular province, near Musti, on borders of Numidia (town of Arnobius), spoke 28th in order in Sentt. Epp. Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii. [E. W. B.]

CASTUS (2) and AEMILIUS, two men who lapsed, and then made renewed confession. They are mentioned by Cyprian in his book on the Lapsed, written under Decius, as having suffered some time since (Cyp. Laps. c. 13; Tillem. iii. 125). They are commemorated in the calendar of Carthage by Bede, etc., on May 22, and there is a sermon on their festival by Augustine (Serm. 285, c. 5, p. 1293), mentioned by Possidius (Index, c. 9). The sermon alludes to Cant. i. and John x., which seem to have been the lessons for the day.

(3) Bishop, imprisoned along with pope STEPHEN, A.D. 257 (Anast. I. 1390, ed. Migne; Tillem. iv. 31).

(4) Bishop at the council of Sinuessa A.D. 303, and of Rome A.D. 324 (Labbe, Conc. i. 940 1545).

(5) Bishop of Saragossa at the council of Sardica A.D. 347 (Labbe, Conc. ii. 658 d, 662 d, 678). [E. B. B.]

(6) A presbyter of Antioch, who in conjunction with Valerius, Diophantus, and Cyriacus, maintained the cause of Chrysostom and the orthodox clergy against the tyrannical intruder Porphyrius, by whom they were grievously persecuted. Chrysostom wrote to these four presbyters frequently during his exile, commending them for their firm adherence to the truth, consoling them under the trials and persecutions they had to endure for the truth's sake, giving them particulars of his own condition, excusing himself for not writing more frequently, and begging them to write to him (Epist. 22, 62, 66, 107, 130, 222). At their request Chrysostom wrote to a presbyter named Romanus, who had a high reputation for piety, who had expressed a great desire to receive a letter from him (Chrysost. Epist. 22, 23). Castus and his companions made common cause with the presbyter Constantius, and shared in his sufferings for the faith. We have a letter of Constantius to Castus written while the former was taking refuge at Cucusus, expressing his eager desire for intelligence how things were going at Antioch (Epist. 240). When Constantius returned to Antioch, Chrysostom wrote to Castus and his friends, begging them to support him to the utmost of their power, and do what they could to prevent any judicial proceedings being taken against him (Epist. t. 62). They fully responded to his appeal, and Chrysostom wrote again thanking them for the successful issue of their efforts (Epist. 65). [E. V.]

(7) Donatist bishop of Cella, at the council of Carthage A.D. 411 (Labbe, Conc. ii. 1379).

(8) Bishop of Porto in the 3rd Roman synod, A.D. 501, the 4th, A.D. 502. and the 6th, A.D. 504 (Labbe, Conc. iv. 1326, 1334, ef. 1377). [E. B. B.]

CASULANUS, addressed by Augustine in his Ep. 36 (86), was a young presbyter of some other African diocese (§§ 1, 32), who may or may not have had any personal intercourse with him, but who had written to him twice, sending him a treatise of some Roman ecclesiastic, whose name he kept back, on the subject of the Saturday fast observed by the church of Rome throughout the year, except between Easter and Whitsuntide (§ 18), but in most other places only in Passion Week (DICT. OF CHRIST. ANTIQ. 'Fasting,' i. 663).^a

The letters of Casulanus which pleased Augustine are not extant; and of the Roman treatise, which irritated him by its want both of reason and of charity, we have only such fragments as are contained in his answer.

These anonymous fragments, however, demand notice as discovering the existence of tendencies in the Roman church at the beginning of the fifth century to recoil violently from the luxury of the great city, to enforce Roman church customs, under pain of hell, upon the whole church, to ignore the real relations of the old and new covenants, and so to marshal Christianity against Judaism (an attempt pushed almost to Marcionism), as really to transform Christianity itself to a Jewish type. This may have been one cause of the welcome that Pelagianism found for a while at Rome.

The date of the epistle is debated, and must be determined by internal considerations. Augustine's readiness to confront the pope himself on equal terms, to excommunicate a Roman churchman, 'whoever he might be,' for his levity in wielding anathemas, if Casulanus had not purposely prevented it, by keeping back the writer's name, points to a time when the bishop of Hippo was already a great authority in the church at large. The Benedictines must therefore be wrong in assigning it to a period before the death of Ambrose. On the other hand, from the attitude of Augustine on the question of justification, we may infer that the controversy with Pelagianism had not yet assumed importance. Tillemont (xiii. 266) suggests that if the brother mentioned (c. 12, § 27), as credibly reported to have abstained from food for forty days together, be Simeon Stylites, he did not begin to do so till A.D. 413. This date, therefore, on the whole, seems most probable, and the Roman treatise must have been written not very long before.

Augustine first (ii.-x. 3-24) examines the Roman tract, then (xi.-xiv. 25-32) expounds his own view. We give his extracts and replies.

(1.) "When the apostles plucked and ate corn on the sabbath, the time for fasting was not yet come, and the tradition of the elders forbade their fasting." Ans. "Did it not forbid their working?" (ch. iii.). "How, if we fast only twice a week, shall we escape the damnation of the Pharisee?" Ans. "What if we pay tithes? Besides, there are five days on which we can fast, besides Saturday and Sunday." But Augustine does not meet the legalism of his antagonist directly on evangelical grounds; partly because he is answering him with repartees, according to his folly; partly, it would seem, in consequence of the view he took of justification; partly, perhaps, also from his unwillingness to admit that the Pharisee was damned; we are only told that the publican was justified rather (ch. iv.).

^a This epistle shews that ordinary fasts consisted of the omission of the luncheon, before which it was at no time customary to take anything (§ 16, ad fin.), so that on fast days nothing was taken till dinner time (§ 28, ad fin.); but the same term was applied to total abstinence from food for days together, and the Roman appears to intend the fast to stretch from Friday night to Sunday morning (§ 19).

(2.) The notion of a weekly fasting communion Augustine shews himself unable even to understand. "We ought more and more lawfully to fast, that of six days even a slight error may be washed away by the fountains of fasting, prayer, and almsgiving, that so refreshed with the Sunday banquet we may all with equal heart be able to sing, 'Thou hast satiated the empty soul'" (ch. v. § 9). The word for banquet, alugia, is said by Deucange, in voce, to mean a meal taken in silence. But Augustine (§ 11) interprets it as unreason, so that it would have been a slang term, and a horrible one indeed to apply to the holy Eucharist, which, as Augustine observes (§ 19) is not alugia, but eulogia. That such was the application of the term by the Roman was not perceived by Augustine, but appears from another paragraph, where the author interprets the "sacrifice of praise" to mean the fast that is offered with the lights and incense of the sabbath eve, and says that we shall have houses to eat and to drink in, when the celebration is complete on the Lord's-day morning (ch. viii. § 19). Thus the real object of the Saturday fast is as a preparation for the reception of the Lord in early communion on the Sunday. And this appears from the appeal to the example of the three friends who ate pulse with Daniel and afterwards "received their Lord" in the furnace (chaps. vi. vii.). The result of this preparative fast appears to be that a sensuous delight in the feast is blended with the spiritual. Augustine (§ 11) is severe on the notion that bodily food can be spoken of as satiating the soul. Yet the sacrifice seems to be regarded by the Roman as consisting not in the elements, but in hearts mortified by fasting, fired by prayer, and united to Christ by communion. "In Christ the ara yields to the altare, sword to fast, fire to prayers, beast to bread, blood to chalice" (ch. x. § 24). Augustine replies by asking, Who fasts all the six days? or what is to be done for an error on Sunday? or is a good breakfast the only security for a sinless day? or does Saturday's fast wash out the last six days' sins? for if so, Saturday is the holier day.

(3.) The Roman's notion of the primacy of the pope is another of his reasons. "The life of sheep hangs on the will of the shepherd." Augustine commends the obedience of the Roman church to their bishop, but rebukes them for condemning the whole Christian world if it did not follow them, and is cautious about accepting the legend of the fast whereby Peter overcame Simon Magus. The author attributes the primacy not to Peter but to Rome, as though Peter had converted Rome, and Rome had converted the world. (See the 2nd epistle of James to Clement.) Augustine answers that there were other apostles besides Peter, and their unity did not lie in externals (ch. viii. ix. § 20-22).

tament, appears at last in his asking, "Why do we murmur at offering the sacrifice of praise to a better Lord? (viii. 18)" (which Augustine supposes to be a copyist's blunder,^b and in his exclaiming, "Let us be Christians or Jews; we cannot serve two masters," to which Augustine replies that He to whom the Lord's day belongs is none other than the Lord of the sabbath.

Augustine's own view is that the old things have yielded only to their own fulfilment and verity (§ 24), that fasting is enjoined in the New Testament; but fasts are not prescribed, and that Paul's teaching on this head is in agreement with Christ's own (Matt. xi.). Fasting on Sunday he considers scandalous, because the Manicheans and Priscillianists insisted on it; but prolonged fasts may include Sunday (ch. xii. 27-29). He gives his view of the order of the events of Passion Week, believing the Last Supper to have been the regular passover. He neither "regards all days alike," nor considers the fourth commandment as still binding, but regards Christ as abrogating the rest, and leaving the day specially holy, not like G. Herbert, as "unhinging" the day. He distinguishes the rest of the departed, which might be typified by a fast, from "the rest that remaineth," when the redeemed body shall share in the feast, and makes the sabbath express both. Monica was troubled to know whether she might lawfully break her custom of fasting on Saturday, as the church of Tagaste did, and imitate the Milanese, who breakfasted. Augustine, then a catechumen, thought the point very unimportant, but to satisfy his mother he questioned Ambrose. The bishop answered, "How can I teach more than I do?" Augustine took this to mean that they should breakfast, but he went on, "Here I do not fast, at Rome I do." We see that Augustine retained in later years the same indifference to such matters, and the same readiness to enter into them for the sake of others, as in the eagerness of his first inquiries. Casulanus is advised, for his own part, to conform to the custom of his bishop. [E. B. B.]

CASWALLON (Camden, Britann. iii. 234, ed. Gough), British king. [CAEDWALLA (1).]

CATALDUS. [CATHALDUS.]

CATAN (CATHAN, CADAN, CEDDAN, KEDDAN), bishop and confessor; tutor of St. Blane, has his festival in the Irish calendars on Feb. 1, and in the Scotch on May 17. From Colgan's Memoir (in Acta SS. 233-4), following Archd. Newton of Dunblane, we learn that his father was Madan, son (or grandson, ibid. p. 313, n. 4) of Calbaidh, a prince of Dalrædia, and as Mart. Doneg. states, of the race of Irial, son of Conall Cearnach, who is of the Clanna-Rudhraighe. (For these, see Reeves, Ecccl. Ant. 336, 352.) He is said to have been first connected with St. Patrick in Ireland, and then to have come to Scotland and settled in Bute, where he built his cell at Kilcathan or Kilchattan, and educated his nephew St. Blane [BLANE]. But the exact dates of his life are unknown, and whatever may be made of his reported relations to St. Patrick, he could scarcely have flourished before the middle of the 6th century. Colgan thinks he flourished about A.D. 550, and died after A.D. 560, but others would place him even in the 7th century. According to the Irish tradition he was buried in Ireland, and St. Cadan's tomb is to this day shewn beside the church of Tamlaght Ard, county Londonderry, but according to the Scotch he lies at Kilchattan. His memory is honoured by many dedications in the west of Scotland. The traditions of a Scotch and an Irish Catan are possibly mixed up together. (Petrie, Round Tower s. 454 sq.; Butler, Lives of the Saints, v. 279; Brev. Aberd. pars aestiv. fol. lxxviii.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 299; Fordun, Scotichr. lib. xi. c. 21; Orig. Par. Scot. ii. pt. i. 210 sq.) There was a Catan who died abess of Kildare, A.D. 853 (Four Mast.) [J. G.]

CATAPHRONIUS (1), pontiff of Thrace in A.D. 304. See PHILIP OF HERACLEA (Tillem. v. 305).

(2) The persecutor of EULALIA is called by this name in some copies of her acts, in others Datian (Tillem. v. 322).

(3) Supposed by Tillemont (vii. 632) to have been an Apollinarist, companion of Timotheus, and, on receipt of a letter from him, to have written to others of the same sect named Pausorius, Uranius, Diodorus, and Jovius. But from the passage to which he refers (Leontius Byz. adv. Fraud. Apollin. Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. 1954), it appears rather that Cataphronius was an imaginary personage in a dialogue dedicated by Timotheus to Pausorius and the others.

(4) Praefect of Egypt in A.D. 356, established the Arian bishop George at Alexandria, and persecuted the Catholics (Tillem. viii. 157, 677; Athanas. i. 847). [E. B. B.]

CATAPHRYGIANS. [MONTANISTS.]

CATENAE. [INTERPRETATION, BIBLICAL.]

CATGABAIL, king of Guenedota, called also CATGUOMMED, i.e. "qui pugnam renuit," viz. A.D. 655 (Nennius, Hist. c. 66, in M. H. B. 76). [C. H.]

CATGUALART, son of Catguolaum, king of Guenedota. He died of an epidemic disorder, A.D. 682 (Nennius, Hist. c. 66, Annal. Camb., in M. H. B. 76, 833). [C. H.]

CATHALDUS, CATHAL. Colgan cites several of this name in Ireland, from the middle of the 8th century to the 11th; but the most famous is the bishop of Tarentum—March 8 and May 10. Of this saint Colgan (Acta SS. 544 sq.) gives two Lives, two books on the finding of his ^b It appears from § 18 that the corrector of a MS. was generally a man of far more culture than the copyist.

Book of Prophecy and on his Miracles, a copy of his Office, and an appendix of great interest and learning on his feasts, time, country, and writings. The first short life is "Ex Petro de Natalibus, lib. 4, c. 143," and the second, by Barth. Moroni, is taken from the archives of Tarentum. His father was Euchus, Euchu or Eochaidh, and his mother Achlena or Athena. Dempster would make him an Albanian Scot, but there can be no doubt as to his having been a native of Munster, though the exact locality, called Rachau and Catandum, cannot now be identified; it was probably not far from Lismore, of which he became a professor some time after the death of St. Carthach, and where scholars came to him from all quarters. There he is said to have dedicated a church to the Blessed Virgin Mary, and to have been himself consecrated bishop for the church of Rachau. Some time after, in company with twelve disciples, called also bishops, he set out on a pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre. On landing at Tarentum on his way back to Ireland, he found the city so full of wickedness that he stayed there, teaching and working many miracles, and is said to have been at length chosen bishop. His brother Donatus became bishop of Lecce. The year of St. Cathaldus's death is unknown, but the day as observed at Tarentum is March 8, while other two days are observed with more or less variety, as May 8 for his invention, and May 10 for his translation. For the burial, the finding of his body, its translation, his miracles, and the honours bestowed on him at his tomb, see Moroni's account in Colgan (Acta SS. 549 sq.). As to the period when he lived there is great divergence of opinion; we cannot put his death sooner than the end of the 7th century. Lanigan says his appointment as bishop of Rachau probably took place about A.D. 670. Several writings are attributed to him by Dempster, but without foundation; the only one that seems to have any authority is his Book of Prophecies, which was found at Tarentum, A.D. 1492, in the time of pope Innocent VIII., but it too is evidently a forgery, adapted to the history of the time. CATHAN. [CATAN.]

CATHARI. [NOVATIANS.]

CATHARINE (CATHARINA, CATHERINE, etc.), ST., virgin and martyr of Alexandria.

The legends connected with this saint are a remarkable instance of the exuberant growth of fiction in the guise of ecclesiastical history during the middle ages, and shew on how very small a basis of facts an elaborate superstructure could be erected. Tillemont writes, in the 17th century, that it would be hard to find a saint more generally revered than St. Catharine, or one of whom so little was known on credible authority, and adds that no single fact about her is certain (Mém. Eccl. vii. p. 447). In another passage he pronounces all the materials for her biography worthless (M. E. p. 761). Papebrœcius, as quoted in Baronius, echoes the words of Tillemont, and, while stating that in his own country, Belgium, no city or town is without some church or altar to her glory, adds, that the whole story of her martyrdom, etc., is very difficult and obscure (Baron. Ann. Eccl. ed. Theiner, iii. ad an. 307). Baronius himself speaks more than doubtfully of the traditional "Actus Stæ Catharinæ;" and protests against attempting, in cases of this kind, to eke out the little that can be gleaned from more ancient records by imaginary interpolations. "Melius silentium," he wisely adds, "quam mendacium veris admixtum" (ib.). The accretion of fable is indeed in this case, to say the very least, out of all proportion to the scanty fragment of real history, the few lines of Eusebius, which we find imbedded in it.

The earliest mention of St. Catharine in the Eastern Church (v. Menology of Basil) under the name of Ἡκαθαρίνα (possibly a corruption of ἡ καθάρη, diminutive of καθάρως, pure), is about the end of the 9th century (Tillemont, v. s.; Baillet, Vies des Saints, tom. viii. Nov. 25); in the 13th century it appears in the Latin Martyrologies (Baillet, ib.), the crusaders having brought back to Europe the fame of this virgin-martyr among other marvels from the East. It seems that some time in the 8th or 9th century the monks on Mount Sinai disinterred the body, as they were eager to believe, of one of those Christian martyrs whose memory they fondly cherished. Eusebius relates how a lady of Alexandria—he omits her name—was one of the victims of the cruelty of Maximinus in the commencement of the 4th century (H. E. viii. 14). It was easy enough to identify the corpse as that of the anonymous sufferer, and to invent a name for it; easy too for Greek ingenuity to embellish the bare statement of Eusebius, and to bridge over the distance between Alexandria and Mount Sinai. In the pages of Simeon Metaphrastes, a legendist of Constantinople in the 10th century, we have a lengthy recital of St. Catharine's martyrdom, with all the horrible details of her tortures, with an exact report of her dispute in public with the philosophers of the city, and of the learned oration by which she converted them, the Empress Faustina, and many of the court who were present, and how her saintly corpse was transported to Mount Sinai by the hands of angels (Martin, Vies des Saints, tom. iii. pp. 1841, et seq.). But, as the writers already quoted have remarked, the whole story is in itself plainly unhistorical, even apart from the significant fact that there is no external testimony to its authenticity. For in Eusebius the emperor's exasperation is provoked, not, as in the legend, by a refusal to abjure Christianity and to sacrifice to his gods, but by a refusal to gratify his guilty passion; and the punishment inflicted is merely exile, not torture and death. Baronius suggests that possibly Catharine may have returned from her exile, and subsequently suffered martyrdom for the faith at Alexandria; that "Dorothea," the name assigned by Ruffinus (Hist. Eccl. viii. 17) to the nameless victim in Eusebius, may perhaps have been her name before her conversion to Christianity, and that "Maxentius," as the emperor is called in the Acta, should be corrected to "Maximinus." But even Baronius, as has been already noticed, hesitates to accept the narrative as historical, while his commentator, with Tillemont and Baillet, abandons altogether the hopeless attempt to reconcile Simeon Metaphrastes with Eusebius (v. s.).

The martyrdom of St. Catharine is commemorated in the Latin and Greek calendars on November 25; the discovery ("invention") of her body on Mount Sinai on May 13 in the French Martyrology (Baillet, v. s.). In England her festival was promoted from the 2nd class (on which field labour, though no other servile work was permitted), to the 1st class of holydays in the 13th century (Conc. Oxon. A.D. 1222, c. 8. Conc. Vigorn. A.D. 1240, c. 54), and retained as a black-letter day at the Reformation. It was left untouched in Germany at the time of the retrenchment of holidays in A.D. 1540. In France it was gradually abolished as a holiday, although the office was retained in the 17th century (Baillet, v. s.). A few instances may be given of the reverence in which her name was held in Europe during the middle ages. Louis IX. of France erected in Paris a costly church in her name; and the famous Maid of Orleans claimed her special favour and tutelage (Martin, v. s.). The head of St. Catharine was alleged to be preserved in the church of her name in the Piazza of St. Peter's at Rome. She was regarded generally as the patron saint of schools, probably from the tradition of her learned controversy with the philosophers at Alexandria.

Moroni gives a brief account of a semi-monastic order, the Knights of Mount Sinai or of Jerusalem, instituted in Europe A.D. 1063 in honour of St. Catharine, under the rule of St. Basil. They bound themselves by vows to chastity, though not to celibacy ("castità conjugale"), to entertain pilgrims; and in rotation, each for two years, to guard the holy relics. Their dress was a white tunic, and embroidered on it a broken wheel, armed with spikes, in memory of the jagged wheel on which, according to the legend, the tender limbs of the saint were racked, and which was, in the first instance, miraculously shattered by divine interposition. The order became extinct after the fall of Constantinople; but in the 17th century the Basilian monks at Paris gave the badge of the order to any candidates for it who would take the vow of chastity and of obedience to the rule of St. Basil (Moroni, Dizion. Eccles. Reference to Giustiniani, Historie Chronolog. degli Ordini Equestri, p. 121; Bonami, Catologo degli Ord. Equest. p. 21).

CATHARISTAE. [MANICHAEANS, MANES.]

CATHBADH (CATHUBIUS). There are two of this name commemorated in the Irish

Martyrologies on July 1 and Sept. 16. It is said that when St. Patrick first came into the north-east of Ireland, he built several churches, and among them one in the country belonging to the descendants of Aengus, the father of Eochaidh Muinreambar: over it he placed two disciples, Cathbadius, a priest, and Dimanus, a monk. The former is perhaps the Cathubius, son of Fergus, abbat of Achadh-cinn, who, according to the Four Mast., died in the year 554, aged 150. Colgan seeks to identify Achadh-cinn with the present Aughnakeely in the barony of Kilconway, and on the confines of the ancient Dalriada and Dalaradia. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 146, c. 130, 182 n. ¹⁹⁵, 267, col. 2; Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. i. 267, n. ²², ii. 103; Archdall, Monast. Hib. 1; Reeves, Ecl. Ant. 89, 322.) [J. G.]

CATHCAN, called also Catallus and Cathal, is commemorated as bishop of Rath-derthaighe on March 20, in the Irish calendars, and at Lathrisk in the parish of Falkland, Fifeshire, there was a dedication to a St. Cattel. Colgan suggests that Cathneus, one of St. Patrick's disciples, may have had his name corrupted to Cathcan. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 130, c. 6, 173, n. ²²; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 81, 371; Retours, Fife, No. 144; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 299.) [J. G.]

CATHEL (CATHAL, CATTEL) is perhaps Cathcan of March 20, in the Irish calendars [CATHCAN]. [J. G.]

CATHERIN, CATHERNA, has dedications in Scotland and Ireland. She is probably St. Catharine the martyr of Alexandria. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 299.) [J. G.]

CATHIRIUS (1), bishop of the Cimmeric Bosphorus, was present at the Council of Nice (Tillemont, vi. 643; Labbe, Conc. ii. 54).

(2) Bishop of Aspona at the heretical council of Sardica, A.D. 347 (Labbe, Conc. ii. 711).

(3) Bishop at the council of Saragossa, A.D. 381. In this and the previous case the name is spelt Catherius; the last name with a variation, Cartherius. In Gams's Series Episcoporum the name of the bishop of Aspona is given as Cartherius. [E. B. B.]

CATHLON, king of the Britons (Annal. Tybern., O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Scriptt. ii. 191). It is apparent from this passage that Caedwalla is the person meant:—"Proelium gestum a Cathlano et Anfratho qui decollatus est, in quo Oswaldus filius Ethelfredi victor erat et Cathlon rex Britonum cecidit." [CAEDWALLA (1).] [C. H.]

CATTWG DDOETH. [CADOC.]

CATULINUS (1), or CATULLINUS, subdeacon at Circa, with Marceus, SILVANUS, and Carosus under Paul the bishop, A.D. 303. On May 19 in that year, after the church furniture had been given up, he was called upon to surrender the books, but only produced one very big volume, as the readers had the rest. When called upon to tell the readers' names, both he and Marceus refused. Though traditors they would not be traitors (proditores). They were arrested; but we do not hear of the end of his imprisonment. If this Catulinus were identical with the following, it is strange that Augustine should not allude to the fact in citing these gesta, in Crescon. iii. 29 (33), p. 513.

(2) the deacon, martyr at Carthage, with Januarius, Florentius, Pollutana, Julia, and Justa, buried in the basilica of Faustus in that city, commemorated July 15 (Kd. Karth. Mart. Hieron.; Mart. Rom., &c.) and honoured with a sermon by Augustine, according to Possidius, which is no longer extant (Tillem. v. 554).

[E. B. B.]

(3) was the sixth bishop of Embrun (Ebre-dunum). He subscribed at the council of Epaune (Epaunum, Epaonum), which was held in the year 517, when Sigismund was king of Burgundy, and Hormisdas pope. While executing the decrees of this synod in his city, he was ejected by the Arians, and took up his residence at Vienne, with Avitus the bishop. He passed many years of exile devoted to good works, and left a saintly reputation. (Gall. Christ. iii. p. 1060.) [D. R. J.]

CATULLINUS (1). [CATULINUS.]

(2) Proconsul of Africa under Constantine the Great (Godofred. Cod. Theod. t. vi. p. 354).

[E. B. B.]

CATUUAL, an abbat succeeding to Bectunus, mentioned in a charter of Cynewulf king of Wessex, A.D. 789 (Kemble, C. D. No. 104).

[C. H.]

CAUIATHAN (Καυιάθαν), one of the twelve "maternal" angels in the system of JUSTINUS (Hippol. Ref. v. 26). Harvey conjectures that we should read Caulacau, but if any correction be necessary a simpler change is Schneidewin's conjecture LEVIATHAN.

[G. S.]

CAULACAU. This name (handed down with varieties of spelling which it is needless to particularise) was a sacred word in some of the Gnostic systems, in many of which great virtue was attributed to the knowledge of the true names of the unseen powers. To give an example of which we shall presently have occasion to make use, in the Gnostic book PISTIS SOPHIA (pp. 20 et seq.) the passage of our Lord between the earth and the highest regions is described. He wears a robe of light, on which are inscribed the names of the rulers of each of the intervening regions through which he must pass. As he enters the dominion of each, when the ruler sees his own name written on our Lord's robe he is filled with terror, falls prostrate, and adores; but our Lord himself he cannot see by reason of the light which surrounds him; and so elsewhere (p. 99) our Lord is described as passing without the knowledge of any of the powers. In the same book (p. 233) it is taught that each of the souls which find admission to the kingdom of light, when it leaves the world goes to inherit a place in that region; the mystery of which it has received, being enabled by that mystery to pass without hindrance through the intervening regions. The book (p. 125) contains a revelation of some of these sacred names, but the names are only written in cypher, the explanation no doubt being a matter of traditional instruction. The teaching of Pistis Sophia may be recognised in the account which Epiphanius gives (Huer. 26) of those whom he calls Phibionites. They too taught (c. 10) that each soul when it left the world was stopped by the archons and powers who ruled the regions to which it came. If it possessed the secret of knowledge it passed safely through their dominions. If not, it was swallowed up by the great dragon, and after a time of punishment passing through its tail was sent back again to the world. The Phibionites too held the doctrine of Pistis Sophia concerning the descent of our Lord. Epiphanius tells (c. 9) that some of the worst of them taught that the disciple who had thoroughly put in practice the vilest of their lessons would be enabled to say, "I am Christ, for I have come down from above through the names of the 365 archons."

The earliest extant mention of the name Caulacau is to be found in the account which Irenaeus (i. 24) gives of the Basilidians. The passage, which is unfortunately corrupt, tells that they taught "mundus nomen esse, in quo dicitur descendisse et ascendisse Salvatorem, Caulacau esse." Two of the best MSS. read "Caulagau deum." Some have here made the obvious conjecture "mundi" for "mundus," and understand that it was to the world the name Caulacau was given. But this is forbidden by what we read in Theodoret (Huer. Fab. i. 4), who in this place borrows his account from Irenaeus, and who tells that it was to the Lord and Saviour that they gave the name Caulacau. We need not delay to theorise as to how the word "mundus" got into the text, or to examine Harvey's conjecture that it represents an adjective in the Greek original; for after what has been already said it is easy to understand the statement that Caulacau was the name in which the Saviour descended and ascended. He knew the mystery of the names of all the inferior powers, but that was his own sacred name, which none of them could penetrate. And this view is confirmed by what follows in Irenaeus. He says that the members of this sect had no scruple to escape persecution, by concealing their doctrines and denying their faith. For they taught that he who had learned these mysteries and knew all the angels and their causes became invisible and incomprehensible to all angels and powers, as Caulacau also had been. And as the Son was unknown to all, so also ought they to be known by none, but, knowing all to pass through all, themselves invisible and unknown. Their maxim was, "Do thou know all, but let none know thee."

We have less scruple in illustrating the doctrines of the Basilidians of Irenaeus by those of Pistis Sophia and of the Phibionites, because of other coincidences between these sects. Pistis Sophia and the Phibionites both hold the doctrine of 565 archons, which is one of the peculiar points of Basilidian teaching. It is fairly probable that the Phibionites used the name Caulacau, for Epiphanius tells (Haer. xxv. 3) that it was used by some of the Gnostic sects which he enumerates, and among which the Phibionites are included, though he does not specify in which of the sects it was used. The name Caulacau may have formed part of the teaching of Pistis Sophia, but if so, it naturally was one of the mysteries veiled in cypher, as has been already mentioned. But there is another point of contact between that book and the Basilidians. We find in it (p. 354) the phrase "one out of a thousand, or two out of ten thousand," by which Irenaeus says the Basilidians expressed the paucity of numbers of the true disciples.

The next earliest mention of Caulacau of which we have knowledge occurred in the earlier work of Hippolytus on heresies, which Lipsius has largely recovered (see HIPPOLYTUS) by means of the use made of it by Epiphanius, Philastrius, and Pseudo-Tertullian. In that work the name was mentioned, not under the heading of Basilidians, but under that which next followed in the treatise, the Nicolaitans. Under this heading Hippolytus, who ascribed the origin of Gnosticism to Nicolas, the deacon, described the doctrine of certain Gnostic sects, which are marked by their terminology as akin to the Ophites described by Irenaeus (i. 30). Some of these were said to have applied the name Caulacau, according to the version of Epiphanius (Haer. 25), to a certain archon, according to that of Philastrius (Haer. 33) to a man, the meaning of which expression will appear presently. Caulacau was said to be one of a number of barbarous words invented to impose by their sound upon the simple.

Some coincidence of language on this point suggests that Jerome had before him this same work of Hippolytus, when writing on this word Caulacau (in Isaia cap. 28) he tells of a use made of it by certain impure heretics who taught their disciples to do honour to this name in the gratification of fleshly lusts. We infer from all the authorities that Hippolytus had charged all the sects called Nicolaitans with teaching impurity. Among these sects Epiphanius classes the Phibionites already mentioned, and he makes concerning them a statement similar to that of Jerome. The same thing is told by Irenaeus (i. 31) of a section of Ophites. Another possible source of Jerome's information is the work of Agrippa Castor against Basilides, where also (Eusebius, H. E. iii. 7) similar remarks had been made as to the use of barbarous names.

In the later work of Hippolytus, the Refutation of all Heresies, though the origin of Gnosticism is still traced to Nicolas, there is no discussion of a sect of Nicolaitans, and the use of the word Caulacau is ascribed to the Naassenes, a word equivalent to Ophites. Philaster's word "man," already referred to, is explained by the fact on which great stress is laid in the Refutation, that the Naassenes used the word "man" in speaking of the principle of the universe, a point also mentioned in the account of these sects given by Irenaeus. This principle they held to be three-fold, and Hippolytus tells that they gave the names Caulacau, Saulasau, and Zeesar, the first to the blessed nature of the heavenly man, the Adam who is above, the second to the mortal nature below, the third to that of those who had been raised from earth to receive the heavenly birth, by which it is to be supposed their own disciples are indicated. In language which would suggest a different explanation of the "ascended and descended" of Irenaeus these last are described as the Jordan which flows upwards; for it was taught that as when the stream flows downward from the heavenly Adam to the mortal nature, there takes place a mortal birth of men; so when the stream is rolled upwards, as Jordan was by Joshua, there takes place a birth of gods (Ps. lxxxii. 6). Hippolytus, in evident ignorance of the origin of the names Caulacau and the rest, still speaks of them as high-sounding barbarous words invented to strike terror in the unexperienced; but Epiphanius (Haer. xxv. 4) correctly pointed out that they were taken from the Hebrew of Isaiah xxviii. 10, צוֹ לְצוֹ קוֹ לְקוֹ זְעִיר שָׁמַיִם, the words which are translated in our version "precept upon precept, line upon line, here a little." It is not obvious what connexion the words in Isaiah have with the Gnostic use of them, though commentators have found explanations almost with equal facility, whether the rendering of our version or of the LXX be adopted, and whether the word Caulacau be supposed to be given to a world or to a being (see Neander, Genet. Entwickl. p. 85, Harvey, Irenaeus l.c.). It seems necessary then first to ask whether the words might not have been simply taken for their sound, without regard to their meaning. This would be more likely to have occurred if the Gnostic writer had been ignorant of Hebrew, and had found the words untranslated in a version; but except the version of Aquila, concerning which we have no information, all the versions, Oriental as well as Greek, translate the words, so that we may conclude that the Gnostic used the Hebrew text. And that he had regard to the meaning of the words is proved by the inversion of the words Caulacau and Saulasau from the order in which they stood in the Hebrew; doubtless, because the first word, rendered by the LXX "hope upon hope" was that best fitted to denote the heavenly principle, and the second, rendered "affliction upon affliction," was best fitted to denote the mortal principle. The remaining name, "here a little," may, as Harvey suggests, have been considered applicable to the true Gnostics, who in the context of the passage in Irenaeus are described as one in a thousand, or two in ten thousand.

Reviewing these authorities, it may be pronounced that the Naassene writer of the Refutation was not the first to introduce the word Caulacau. He is clearly different from those described in the earlier work of Hippolytus, for instead of sanctioning the impurity attributed to them, his doctrine tends to the discouragement of all sexual intercourse. And his teaching includes so many heathen elements that it is difficult to believe that he was a born Jew, or one likely to have read the Hebrew scriptures in the original. It seems probable then, that he was a later writer who used the language which he found current in his sect, converting what had been in their case mere mythology into philosophic speculation, and that his work only became known to Hippolytus in the interval between his two treatises. It is unnecessary to discuss the priority with regard to the origination of the word between the claims of the Basilidians of Irenaeus and the Nicolaitans of Hippolytus, if the view taken in the article CAINITES be correct, as to the difficulty of drawing a very sharp line of distinction between these sects. To the points of agreement mentioned in that article between these Basilidians and the Ophites, may now be added their common use of the name Caulacau, their belief in 365 archons, their theory concerning the descent and ascent of our Lord, and (if Jerome's statement refers to Basilidians) the impure use of the names of the unseen powers. [G. S.]

CAUTINUS, bishop of Clermont about A.D. 562 (Till. H. E. iv. 473), formerly deacon at Issoire (Leiodorensis). The character of Cautinus in his episcopate is described by Gregory of Tours (who died A.D. 595), in his history of the Franks. The details may be given as illustrative of the times.

The first appearance of Cautinus after a reminiscence of his diaconate is at the death of St. Gallus, bishop of Clermont. He is at this time archdeacon. The people wished to have for their bishop Cato, a presbyter of vainglorious and turbulent character, who was exceedingly kind to the poor. The bishops who had come to bury St. Gallus were indeed only deterred by his vanity from effecting his appointment with the young king Theobald. Acting already as bishop, though not consecrated, Cato now began publicly to threaten Cautinus, with whom he always had a quarrel. Cautinus, to appease him, offered to go to the king's court, and obtain the final sanction to his election. Ridiculed, however, by the aspiring Cato, the archdeacon went by night to the king, and obtained the episcopate for himself before the appearance of the messengers of his rival. Cautinus was well received by the greater part of the clergy and people of Clermont.

There was now a schism in that see; part held with Cautinus the bishop, part with Cato the presbyter. Cautinus at last took away from his opponents all church property; restoring it only to those who became reconciled to him.

We next find Cautinus seeking to obtain for Cato the see of Tours, on the death of Gunthar the bishop. This was probably in order to get rid of a thorn in his side; for we find Cato repudiating the offer, getting up a pageant of beggars, who called on their good father not to leave them, and entering on an agreement with Chramnus son of the existing king Chlothacarius, that if he should come to the throne, Cautinus should be turned out of the see of Clermont and Cato put in his place.

The next chapter of Gregory's history is left out in certain editions. It represents Cautinus as earning the execration of all men, addicted beyond measure to wine, and generally so intoxicated that four men could scarcely carry him from table. From this habit he became epileptic. The Jews are said to have been much attached to him, as he gave long prices for works of art. He is described also as abominably avaricious, swindling land from the powerful by quarrels and scandals, from the smaller owners by violence. The story of the burying alive of Anastasius, the presbyter, if authentic, implies a lawlessness and iniquity that must be unparalleled in episcopal annals. Because Anastasius refused to give up to this tyrant the title-deeds of his lands, he is said to have been interred in a marble tomb, from which he escaped only by personal strength and perseverance, assisted by the drunkenness of the guard of soldiers, and the axe of a passing countryman. Anastasius, the story continues, escaped to king Chlothacarius with his title deeds; the bishop appeared, was convicted, and retired in confusion; and all exclaimed that neither Herod nor Nero had done the like. We may remark that had this occurred, and had all expressed such an opinion, the bishop even in those times would hardly have retained his see.

The next adventure of Cautinus is the hostility of Chramnus the king's son, who lived at Clermont or Arvernium. Seeing one day a company of men riding down upon him, "Woe is me," exclaimed the bishop, "for these be they whom Chramnus has sent to take me!" Mounting his horse and urging it with both spurs, he galloped half dead to the portico of the church of St. Julian.

The last mention of Cautinus is at the time of a pestilence which devastated Clermont, and which was probably brought on by the loose and intemperate habits of the people. Cato the presbyter, the old rival of Cautinus, did his duty, buried the people, said the sacred offices to each sufferer, and died at his post. The terrified bishop, on the contrary, fled from place to place in vain; for returning at length to his episcopal city, he died at Easter of the plague. (Migne, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. §§ 146, 147, 148, 149, 152, 153, 155, 173, 175, 490, 881, 918, Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc.) [W. M. S.]

CAVADES. [CABADES, CHOSROES.]

CAWRDAF, Welsh saint of the 6th century, king of Brecknockshire, distinguished in the Triads for his extensive influence, which was such that whenever he went to battle the whole population of the country attended his summons. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 270; E. Williams, I. I. Manuscripts, 497.) [C. H.]

CAYMAN. [CAEMIAN.]

CEADDA. The eighth bishop of Hereford. His date falls between 758 and 777; as in the latter year his successor, Aldberht, describes himself as electus, and his predecessor, Hecca, attests a charter of 758. (Kemble, Cod. Dipl. nn. 193 and 131.) During his episcopate Offa was king of Mercia; Bregwin and Jaenbert archbishops of Canterbury. [S.]

CEADDA, or CHADD, bishop, a Northumbrian by birth, and one of four brothers, of whom Cadda was one (Beda, H. E. iii. 23). Part of his early life was spent in a monastery in Ireland (ibid. iv. 5), and we also find him a monk at Lindisfarne, and one of the disciples of bishop Aidan (ibid. iii. 28; Simeon, Hist. Ecol. Dunelm. cap. iv.). He was brought up, therefore, in the tenets of the Scottish party.

In A.D. 664 bishop Cadda died at his monastery of Lastingham, of which he was the abbat, and Cadda succeeded him there by his appointment (H. E. iii. 23). In the same year the synod was held at Whitby, which resulted in the defeat of the Scottish party, and the retirement of bishop Colman from Northumbria. Wilfrid was thereupon raised to the see of York, but staying too long in France, whither he had gone for consecration, king Oswiu prevailed upon Ceadda to become bishop of York. He then sent him to archbishop Deusdedit to be consecrated. When Ceadda reached Kent the archbishop was dead, and no successor appointed. He found a consecrator, however, in Wini of Wessex, who joined with himself in the rite two British or Welsh bishops. Beda, who had no love for Ceadda's tenets, does full justice to the excellence of his life. His brother Ceeda and his preceptor Aidan were his models. After the primitive fashion he journeyed through his diocese on foot, preaching and doing good everywhere (H. E. iii. 28).

Wilfrid, on his return from France, submitted to the change which had been made in his absence, and Ceadda continued to act as bishop of York. In A.D. 669 archbishop Theodore held a general visitation of England, and detected the irregularity of Ceadda's consecration. On his reproving him for it, Ceadda, full of humility, resigned his see, an act which Theodore eventually sanctioned, although he made Ceadda's title to the episcopate good by correcting the informality of his consecration. Ceadda retired without a murmur to his old privacy and office at Lastingham. He was not to die there. In the same year Jarumau, bishop of Mercia, died, and Wulfhere, the king of that province, desired Theodore to nominate his successor. He requested Oswiu to allow Ceadda to be appointed, who was prevailed upon to accept the office. Ceadda had the charge of Mercia, the Middle-English and the Lindiswaras, or Lindsey, the seat of his large diocese being at Lichfield (Lycidfeldth). Wulfhere gave him land sufficient for fifty families, on which he might construct a monastery, at Ad Baruæ (Barrow?). Ceadda was a most exemplary bishop. He journeyed on foot after his old fashion, and it was only at Theodore's most urgent bidding that he made use of a horse. When he was at home a great part of his time was spent in prayer in the company of seven or eight friends, the old Celtic number. Beda, who seems to be singularly attached to Ceadda's memory, records every trait of his character that he could recover, especially his devout bearing during storms. One of the most beautiful pictures in his Ecclesiastical History is his description of Ceadda's decease, which took place at Lichfield on 2nd of March, 672. Ouni, the good bishop's attendant, heard angelic songs announcing the deliverance of his master. Far away in Ireland Egberht, an old companion of Ceadda, saw in a vision, as he said, the soul of Ceeda descending with a retinue of angels, and returning with that of his brother, who had been absent from him so long (Beda, H. E. iii. 28; iv. 3; Eddius, Vita S. Wulfridi, capp. xiv. xv.). Ceadda was interred at Lichfield, near St. Mary's church, by the water-side (Hickes, Dissert. Ep. 118), and when it was rebuilt his remains were translated and enshrined in the cathedral that succeeded it. Miracles are said to have been wrought at his tomb (H. E. iv. 3). He obtained a place in the Calendar, and became one of the more popular of the English saints, the 2nd of March being assigned to him. There is preserved in the library of the dean and chapter of Lichfield, by the gift of Frances Duchess of Somerset, a richly decorated copy of the Gospels, which is said to have belonged to Ceadda. There is a page of it in the works of the Palaeographical Society, No. 35. In the Journ. Arch. Inst. xxxiii. 72, etc., is a very curious account of the rediscovery of some relics of Ceadda.

There is a short life of Ceadda in the Acta SS., compiled from Beda, and another in Capgrave (Nova Legenda, pp. 58-9). See also (Fasti Eboracenses, i. 47-55; The Kites of Durham, 43; Gunton's Peterbro', 164, 337-8. A little work called Life and Legends of St. Chad, by Rev. R. H. Warner, M.A., was published in 1871. [J. K.]

It was in the society of one of the most interesting of all the characters in Bede, a young man of noble family, a fellow-Angle of Northumbria, Egbert by name, that Ceadda spent some of his early days in an Irish monastery, both of them there "praying, observing continency, and studying the holy scriptures together." "Father Egbert," as Bede affectionately calls him, never came home again, and never forgot the friend of his youth.

The original episcopate of Ceadda is closely connected with important diocesan movements in Northumbria, the restoration of York's episcopal honours, and the development of the ecclesiastical province of the north. In the year 664 the council of Whitby was rapidly followed by two vacancies at Lindisfarne, and the election of Wilfrid, who proceeded into Gaul for his consecration. While he lingered abroad, king Oswy sent Ceadda, who was then abbat of his late brother's monastery of Lastingham, into Kent to be ordained bishop of the church of York (Beda, H. E. iii. 28). In this abrupt manner is his appointment introduced, and no synodal election is recorded (cf. v. 19, 'jubente rege Oswio'). Here the bishopric of York first re-occurs in history after the departure of Paulinus in A.D. 633. The old Roman city and military centre of the north was but a provincial town to the Angles as they worked their way inland from the coast. The lofty rock of Bamborough on the sea, further north, was the Northumbrian capital, and maritime Lindisfarne, hard by it, was the head-quarters of the Northumbrian church. But the ancient greatness of York, its being the capital of Deira, the southern limb of the kingdom, and its former episcopal dignity, would naturally mark it out for spiritual honours again when a second bishopric was to be formed. In appointing Ceadda to revive that see, there appears no intention to supersede the absent Wilfrid; but we are much mistaken if it does not very clearly reveal a policy of Oswy to cut in two the vast bishopric which had hitherto been co-extensive with the kingdom. The Scottish bishops of Northumbria had up to that time been humble-minded men of apostolic simplicity; but the possible spiritual dominion of a man of Wilfrid's magnificent ideas and splendid tastes and talents was certainly something to be feared by a prudent king. It was to erect two bishoprics out of one, to limit Wilfrid to Bernicia and Lindisfarne, that Ceadda was appointed, as we believe, to govern the church in Deira from York. He is reckoned the second bishop of York, as Paulinus was the first (Stubbs, Regist. 180).

The consecration of Ceadda illustrates the position of the see of Canterbury in the church of England and the attitude of the British church to its Anglo-Saxon rival. He was sent by Oswy, with Oswy's presbyter or chaplain Eadhaed to accompany him into Kent. On their arrival the archiepiscopal chair, vacant by the death of Deusdedit, was still unoccupied; but the narrative does not hint that this circumstance proved the least difficulty, for the two presbyters turned their steps towards Wessex to find a consecrator there. In fact, the time had not then arrived for the see of Canterbury to occupy the unquestioned position of mother and mistress of English sees. Neither the mission of Gregory nor the seat of Augustine had been sufficient of themselves to create the primacy. The West Saxon bishop was Wina, and from him, with two bishops of the Britons (as Bede vaguely words it) assisting, Ceadda received his consecration. But we get light from another source as to whence these British bishops came. A letter of Aldhelm, to which attention is directed in Haddan and Stubbs (i. 124), strongly suggests the country of Dumnonia, the present Devon and Cornwall, which was included in the Wales of that period. The letter (Aldhelm, Opp. ed. Giles, 1844, in Pat. Ecc. Angl. pp. 83, 86; also in Patrol. tom. 89), written when Aldhelm was abbat of Malmesbury, about A.D. 690, is sufficiently contemporaneous for our purpose. It is addressed to Geruntius, king of the Dumnonian Britons, and though blaming them for their wilful Easter and their very wrong tonsure, is couched in cordial terms; while the Britons beyond the Severn are referred to as refusing every sort of intercourse, not only in worship, but at table. It is not probable therefore that Wina's fellow-consecrators could have come from Cambria, but without a doubt they were of the schismatic Tessareskaidekatitai party, as Aldhelm calls them.

The usual date of this consecration, A.D. 664, is that of the Saxon Chronicle; but the chronology here needs some rectifying. Ceadda was sent into Kent, while Wilfrid lingered abroad. The date of Wilfrid's consecration too is commonly stated to be A.D. 664; but Pagi (ad Baron. Annal. ed. Theiner, 1867, xi. 547) points out how the year 664 would thus be crowded to impossibility, and contends that 665 is the earliest date for Wilfrid's consecration and therefore for Ceadda's, even if there were no other reason. But another reason there is, that appears to settle the question. Ceadda is expressly said to have held his York bishopric three years (Bede, H. E. v. 19; Flor. Wig. Chron. ed. Thorpe, i. 28; cf. Edd. Vit. Wilf. cap. 15, p. 213, ed. Caxt. Soc.). His deposition by Theodore can be ascertained with very little risk of error, as that prelate first arrived at Canterbury May 27, 669 (Bede, H. E. iv. 2, init.; cf. Hardy in Malmesb. G. R. i. 21), and soon afterwards ("mox," Bede.) commenced his visitation. The deposition must therefore be placed in the summer of 669, and calculating three years back, we arrive at the summer of A.D. 666 as the date of Ceadda's ordination to the see of York (Pagi also argues for this date, ut sup. 547, 548). At this period the episcopate was nearly extinct. Of the seven bishoprics then existing in England, four, Canterbury, Rochester, East Saxons, Lindisfarne were vacant. The Mercian bishop Jaruman was of Scottish ordination; Wina of Wessex had been ordained by French bishops; and Bertgils or Boniface of Dunwich by archbishop Honorius. What objection existed in the case of Bertgils does not appear; but Bede states (H. E. iii. 28) that when Ceadda was consecrated there was no other bishop in all Britain canonically (canonice) ordained but Wina. Lingard is mistaken in saying that Wina was the only bishop then alive among the Anglo-Saxons. If, therefore, a quartodecimanian vitiated the succession, the episcopate had arrived at a precarious point. Another remark may be made in reference to Ceadda's episcopate. The bishoprics throughout England were few and large, continuous with the kingdoms, corresponding with the manner of their original introduction and the first scarcity of qualified men. Wina had been made a second bishop in Wessex not long before Ceadda received his appointment in Northumbria, and it may have been more than a bare coincidence that brought the two together. At all events, these cases betoken a movement for subdividing spiritual authority, and this would serve the double purpose of securing a more numerous succession in the country and keeping episcopal power within bounds. It was evidently from royal suggestion that it started, and it is plain that it was met with reluctance by the great prelates in possession, whose ideas indeed must have kept expanding rather than contracting from the examples of continental episcopates at that period.

Ceadda's deposition and re-consecration have given rise to another difficulty. Lingard inquires (Angl. Sax. Church, i. 131) whether the ordination by Wina was regarded as void, or as only incomplete on account of some omission. His own solution does not appear to satisfy him, as there is not only Bede's account to deal with, but that of Eddius also, who was earlier, and who was obliged to relate the circumstances in their bearing on his patron Wilfrid. Theodore, according to Bede, chid the bishop of York as not having been "rite consecraturus." If a ritual informality had been the only thing to allege against him, we should have expected the archbishop to have at once supplied the deficiency. Bede implies that this is just what was done, and that Theodore "ipse ordinationem ejus denuo catholica ratione consummavit" (iv. 2). About that time the Mercian bishopric fell vacant, and Ceadda (who was then in his monastery, as Bede remarks in passing, without accounting for it) was sent to occupy the post. But Eddius's story is this: Ceadda not only was charged with a defective consecration, but actually deposed from his office, reduced to the ranks, as Wharton expresses it, and retired to Lastingham. When the Mercian vacancy occurred, Ceadda was recalled from his monastery, and it was then that he was re-consecrated—re-consecrated in every sense; "per omnes gradus ecclesiasticos plenè eum ordinaverunt," is this language of Eddius (Vit. Wilf. c. 15) which evidently perplexes Lingard, who sees something more here than an original ceremonial defect. We believe the difficulty can be cleared up. Wilfrid must be taken into account. As soon as Ceadda had been appointed to York in 666, Wilfrid came home from his long sojourn in Gaul, but instead of entering on the duties of his bishopric at Lindisfarne, he at once shut himself up in his monastery of Ripon, meaning by that step (as we interpret it) that if he was not to have the great Northumbrian bishopric in its undivided extent in his hands, he would have nothing. In that seclusion he had been three years (Edd. cc. 14, 15) when Theodore came into the north, and this was one of the great difficulties the new archbishop had to deal with. The only solution then practicable was to make Ceadda give way. He was therefore sent into retirement, on the pretext of an invalid consecration, for a merely defective one could have been easily remedied if it had not been resolved to get rid of him. The occurrence of the Mercian vacancy gave another opening for Ceadda, for whom personally a deep respect was felt; but as he had been dismissed on the plea of his consecration having been null and void, it was now necessary to repeat it de novo as so unambiguously expressed by Eddius. Without a doubt the real cause of Ceadda's deposition was that he stood in Wilfrid's way; and when Ceadda was removed we find his able rival in high honour, administering, as Bede describes (iv. 3), the bishopric of York, and that of all the Northumbrians, likewise that of the Picts, as far as the authority of Oswy could stretch. The ancient author who places this event in its right light is Roger Wendover (F. H. ed. Coxe, i. 159), who says that Wina consecrated Ceadda, "licet contra statuta canonum, quia vivente adhuc Wilfrido non debuit alius subrogari." But, he adds, this error was afterwards corrected, and the correction, which he relates, was a re-ordination. Again he remarks: Theodore ascertained that Ceadda "non ritè ad Eboracensem archiepiscopatum promotum," and therefore deposed him. This explains the ritè, which in this story relates rather to rule and canonicity than to ceremonial.

Ceadda was the 5th bishop of the Mercians, but the first whose see was fixed at Lichfield. His predecessors had all received their consecration in the Hiberno-Scottish communion; he was the first consecrated by an archbishop of Canterbury. Ceadda was likewise the last bishop of an English see at whose consecration any bishops out of the Roman communion are recorded to have assisted (see Stubbs, Regist. 3 sq.). The active administration of Theodore soon replenished the English episcopate, which never dwindled down again. Previous Mercian episcopates had been but transient, and Ceadda's proved no exception. At his death there had been five bishops in much less than twenty years. He could not, therefore, have ranked as "apostle of the Mercians," and no other seems to have been honoured with that appellation. But it was Ceadda that localised the episcopate, and so gave birth to the first cathedral; and this it has been, with his saintly devotedness, not omitting his fellowship with the dominant communion, that has written Ceadda with the saints, and handed him down under the familiar and affectionate monosyllable. As he died on March 2, according to Bede (iv. 3), who does not give the year, and as his episcopate lasted two years and a-half (Flor. Wig. ed. Thorpe, i. 30), we obtain by calculation the beginning of Sept. 669 for the date of his re-ordination, so that his Lastingham life as a deposed bishop could not have been more than a very few weeks. All trace of his monastery Adbruae, "ad nemus" in the province of the Lindissi (Bede, iv. 3) has disappeared. Winfrid, his successor, was buried there (ibid. cap. 6). The Anglo-Saxon version writes it Aetbearwe. Smith (ad Bede, iv. 3) conjectures it to have been Barton-on-the-Humber, opposite Hull, where the river used to divide the Roman road, and where it still divides the railroad. By others (cf. Acta SS. March, i. 143) the spot is thought to be Barrow, three miles from it, where ancient earthworks and barrows still exist.

Original materials for the life of Ceadda will be found in Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 275-277.

CECROPIUS (1), bishop of Nicomedia, in Bithynia, a Semitarian, who was translated from Laodicea by Constantius in the year 351. Athanasius speaks with much severity of him, and charges him, together with Auxentius, of Milan, and Epictetus, with having secured their elevation by their calumnies and plots against the orthodox (Athanasius, contr. Arian. p. 290). In the year of his appointment to Nicomedia, he attended the synod at Sirmium, and took part in the deposition of Photinus (Athanasius, Ep. ad Solit. p. 800). Cecropius was one of the bishops who attended the consecration of the church erected by Basil at Ancyra in 358, to whom a letter was addressed by George of Laodicea, representing the danger the faith was exposed to in consequence of the recognition of Aetius and his disciples at Antioch by Eudoxius, and urging them to take bold measures for their deposition (Sozomenus, H. E. iv. 13). A deputation was accordingly sent to Constantius, who cancelled his former decision in favour of Eudoxius, and ordered that Aetius and some of his followers should be brought before Cecropius to answer to the charges brought against them (Sozomenus, H. E. iv. 24). Cecropius perished in the earthquake which devastated Nicomedia in 358, and prevented the proposed council from being held there; but not, as was commonly reported, in the church. Sozomenus tells us that he was at a distance from it when the catastrophe occurred (Soz. H. E. iv. 16). [E. V.]

CECROPIUS (2), bishop of Sebastopolis, took a leading part in the council of Chalcedon, 451. At the second session of the council, Oct. 10th, Cecropius strenuously opposed the formation of any new definition of the faith, and required that the Nicene creed and the letter of pope Leo to Flavian should be read, for the acceptance of the assembled fathers. (Labbe, Council iv. 338-340.) He was one of the deputation sent to serve the second citation on Dioscorus, and refused to accept his plea of illness as a reason for refusal to attend (ib. p. 390). At the fifth session he vehemently urged that all present should sign the definition of faith then presented, or leave the council (ib. 559). [E. V.]

CEDDA, CEDD, bishop, a native of Northumbria, and one of four brothers, all of whom were priests. In A.D. 653, Penda, the ruler of the Middle-Angles, son of Penda king of Mercia, was baptized in Northumbria, through the influence of his brother-in-law, prince Alchfrith, and took four priests home with him to convert his people, of whom Cedda was one. They had great success in their missionary work, and Penda, himself a pagan, allowed them to preach in his kingdom of Mercia. About the same time Sigberht, king of Essex, embraced Christianity at the persuasion of Oswiu, who prevailed upon Cedda to visit that kingdom, to convert it. He went, and his work prospered greatly. Cedda's good work in Essex induced Finan, bishop of Lindisfarne, whilst his friend was staying at his monastery, to consecrate him bishop of that province. This took place in A.D. 654 or thereabout, and a great impulse was at once given to the spread of Christianity in Essex. Cedda was indefatigable in his labours. On the death of Sigberht in A.D. 660, he baptized Suidhelm, who succeeded him on the throne.

Cedda, during this time, kept up his connexion with Northumbria. Aethelwold, king of Deira, became acquainted with him through his brother Caelin, who was that monarch's chaplain or priest, and begged him to accept a site for a monastery in which he himself might worship and be buried. The place selected was Laestingaeu (Lastingham), a lonely spot on the North Yorkshire moors. The way in which Cedda set it apart for sacred uses is an interesting fragment of Celtic ritual. Of this house at Lastingham Cedda was the abbat, his brother Cynibill acting as his deputy in his absence.

In A.D. 654 Cedda was present at the synod of Strenaeahalch (Whitby), acting as an interpreter between the contending parties (Bede, H. E. iii. 25). He left it a convert to Wilfrid's arguments (ibid. iii. 25).

Cedda died soon after the synod. There was a great pestilence that year, and Cedda went to Lastingham, of which he was still abbat, a place which any contagious disease would not be likely to reach. He sickened, however, and died there, having first given his monastery to his brother Ceadda. His remains were interred, in the first instance, outside the church, which was probably of wood; but when a building of stone was erected, his body was removed to the right side of the altar. In the crypt of the present church there are preserved some fragments of early crosses which are probably contemporaneous with Cedda. As soon as Cedda's decease was known in Essex a party of some thirty persons came to Lastingham wishful to live or die near the remains of their old master. All were carried off by the pestilence save one.

Almost everything that we know about Cedda is in Beda's H. E. iii. capp. xxi-iii. From him are taken the accounts given by the Bollandists, and by Capgrave, fol. 56. Cedda found a place in the Calendar, and his day is Jan. 7. [J. R.]

In calling Cedda the second bishop of London, as Florence of Worcester (Chron. ad ann. 625; Nom. Epi-cop. M. H. B. 617) and all moderns do, we should observe what the writer in the Acta SS. (Jan. i. 373) points out, that although Cedda was bishop of the East Saxons, whose capital was London, and whose territory answered to the subsequent diocese of London, there is no evidence that London was the actual seat of his bishopric. The distinction is worthy of notice, and carries us back to the circumstances of the appointment. Neither was the East Saxon king consulted about the consecration, for anything we are told, nor was the archbishop of Canterbury the consecrator; but the missionary Cedda being home on a visit went to his old monastery to consult with Finan, and the latter, finding how great his success had been, "made him bishop of the church of the East Saxons" (Bede). Here was no real interference with the royal prerogative. It was quite according to precedent that the Northumbrian bishop could bestow episcopal grade upon the missionary, but only the king's grant could make him bishop of London, and this Cedda is not called. The see of Canterbury too might seem to have been slighted; but the time had not yet come when the chair of Augustine had an acknowledged primacy in all the other kingdoms; the separate churches had not yet coalesced in one church of England. For Cedda's consecration Finan summoned two other bishops, who must have come from the British church, and the accepted date is A.D. 654 (Stubbs, Reg.) or about that (Wharton, Decan. et Episc. Lond.). His Mercian mission was therefore a very brief one (cf. Flor. Wig. Chron. ad ann. 653). When he came among the East Saxons, it was some thirty-eight years since the death of king Sebert, the retirement of Mellitus, and the failure of the first extension of the Canterbury mission. Cedda was the second apostle of the East Saxons, and the instrument of their permanent conversion (cf. Bede, H. E. iii. 22, init.).

The rise of Cedda brings into view the growth of the native Anglo-Saxon church at the end of its first half-century. The missionaries of the Roman succession had just died out with Birinus the apostle of Wessex; in the person of Cedda, an agent of the same stamp, an "apostle" of native origin was produced. With Ithamar, A.D. 644, had begun the native episcopate, which was soon to root itself through England. Cedda saw the Roman line terminate at Canterbury, and at his death the Scottish mission expired at Lindisfarne. The expansive and aggressive vigour of native Christianity shews itself in the north rather than in Kent; and the circumstance (so pointedly mentioned by Bede) of four ordained brothers in one family, Cedda, Ceadda, Caelin, Cynibill, two of them eminent bishops, appearing in less than forty years

Returning as a bishop to his mission Cedda pressed on with redoubled effect, building churches in various places, and ordaining presbyters and deacons to assist in teaching and baptizing—an indication apparently that materials for a native ministry had already begun to appear among the East Saxons. Two spots are mentioned by Bede as the centres and pivots of his ministry; but neither of them is London; the principal one being the city of Ithancester on the Pente, and the other Tilburg on the Thames. Camden shews that the Pente, or Pante, is the Essex river Froshwell or Blackwater, one of the springs of which was in his day named Pante-well, while the parish of Pantfield near Braine-tree, on the left bank, still testifies to the ancient name. On the shore of the estuary somewhere near Maldon he places the lost Roman fortress town Othona, and this by a very probable identification he makes Ithancester (Camden, Brit. ed. Gough, ii. 44, and map; see also Morant's Essex, ii. 405). Tilburg is plainly Tilbury, and more exactly West Tilbury (Cam. ii. 41). The nature of Cedda's ministry at these two places is described by Bede. There he gathered a flock of the servants of Christ, and taught them to maintain the discipline of a regular life as far as the rude people were yet capable of receiving it (Bede, H. E. iii. 22). This language suggests monasteries, and so Cressy understands (Ch. Hist. of Brittany, xv. 17), but Camden's editor does not allow that. From a remark of Camden respecting Tilbury, that "formerly it was the seat of bishop Ceada when about A.D. 630 he baptized the East Saxons," later writers place Cedda's episcopal see here, and even a second one at Ithancester (as Morant, Essex, 1768, i. 232), which has put more careful writers to the pains of rejecting the two sees, if not the monasteries likewise (Smith, ad Bed. H. E. iii. 22; Tanner, Notit. Essex, xli. ed. Nasmyth; Gough's Camden, l. c.). Siebert and the whole body of his subjects rejoiced to see the daily growth of Cedda's success. Of his personal character we have a view in Bede's narrative of the king's tragic end [SIGEBERT]. He was as pontifical in bearing as he was apostolic in devotion.

The conversion of the East Saxons under Cedda has to be considered in relation to the main church controversy of that day, which expressed itself in the apparently unimportant questions of the calculation of the Easter period and the form of monastic tonsure, questions which had never slept since the arrival of Augustine. The further addition of the church created by Cedda augmented the growing preponderance of the Scottish or anti-Roman school. The new Mercian church too, which was coming into existence contemporaneously, was an offspring of the Northumbrian Scottish mission. Kent, Wessex, and East Anglia were therefore being decidedly overbalanced when the genius of Wilfrid triumphed at the council of Streoneshalh (Whitby) in 664, and fixed the current of Anglo-Saxon Christendom.

In that assembly Cedda naturally was present, both as a bishop of ten years standing and as having a footing in the north through his monastery of Lastingham, which lay not far off. Amid the keen contentions of the synod Cedda's attitude was that of "interpres vigilantissimus utriusque partis" (Bede), a mediator between opposing extremes, and it was a prelude to his own surrender.

Lastingham monastery, besides being the foundation and the burial-place of Cedda, has the additional interest of having been the earliest of the ten established in Yorkshire during the period of the heptarchy (Burton, Monast. Eb. rac. 54). But Burton's date, A.D. 648, which is John of Tinemouth's, must be wrong, as Bede expressly states that Cedda was exercising his bishopric among the East Angles when the grant of the land was made to him (iii. 23, ad init.) The date Cressy gives, A.D. 660, must be nearer the truth (Ch. Hist. of Britt. xvi. 12). There are no traces of it left. When it began to revive at the Norman period out of its long desolation from the Danish deluge, the abbat and his new colony were invited to York, where they erected the abbey of St. Mary (Burton, 56). Of that incomplete revival, the present church of Lastingham, standing on a beck that falls into the Yorkshire Severn, is probably a relic. It is one of the most venerable and architecturally interesting ecclesiastical structures in the kingdom (Lewis, Top. Dict.). Cedda's holding possession of this monastery all through life, though a bishop, non-resident, and out of the diocese, appointing its superiors and leaving it to his brother, is all in keeping with the times, and illustrates the sort of private right which founders of those institutions enjoyed. It was from the brethren of this house that Bede derived his information about Cedda (H. E. Praef.), and there was preserved the tradition of Egebert's vision in Ireland, relating to his brother's soul [CEADDA]. The authority for the date of Cedda's death is Florence of Worcester (Chron. ad ann. 654); but it is corroborated by Bede's mention elsewhere of the destructive pestilence that prevailed over the country in that year (comp. H. E. iii. 23 with cap. 27). The East Saxons were nearly two years without a bishop after Cedda's death, and his successor was Wina, A.D. 666. All the materials that exist for Cedda's life are mentioned by Hardy (Descr. Cat. i. 260); but besides what is derived from Bede, there is only an inedited Lansdowne MS., apparently of no importance. [C. H.]

CEDMON (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad ann. 680; Higden, Polychron. Gale, xv. Scriptt. 241), poet. [CAEDMON.] [C. H.]

CEDOALDUS (Paul. Diacon. de Gest. Longob. vi. 15, in Patrol. xc. 632), king of the West Saxons. [CAEDWALLA (?).] [C. H.]

CEDOL, early Welsh saint, of uncertain date, patron of the chapel of Pentir, otherwise Llangedol, subject to Bangor in Carnarvonshire; commemorated on Nov. 1. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 306.) [C. H.]

CEDONIUS, ST., confessor, and bishop of Aix in Provence. His name occurs in the Martyrologium Gallicanum and in the Breviary of Aix, but his date and acts are quite uncertain. He is otherwise called Sidonius (Acta SS. Boll. Aug. iv. 591). [H. W. Y.]

CEDUALLA (Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 288, 352, 354); CEDUALLAN, -NUS (Kemble, C. P. Nos. 28, 29); CEDUALLA (Ethelwerd, Chron. in M. H. B. 506); CEDUALLA (Malm. G. P. ed. CEIDIO AB CAW, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron of Rhodwydd Geidio, subject to Llantrisant in Anglesey, and of Ceidio in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 227). [C. H.]

CEINWEN, Welsh saint of the 6th century, patron of Llangainwen and of Cerrig Ceinwen in Anglesey; commemorated on October 8 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 151). [C. H.]

CEITHO, Welsh saint of the 6th century, presumed founder of Llangiitho in Cardiganshire; commemorated on August 5 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 213). [C. H.]

CELADION succeeded Marcus II. as bishop of Alexandria, in the year 153. He held the see fifteen years, and was succeeded by Agrippinus, in the year 168. (Euseb. H. E. iv. 11. Id. Chron. apud Hieron. sub anno 2171.) [E. V.]

CELANTIA. A noble Roman matron, a letter to whom is included among those of St. Jerome (148, ed. Vall.), though it is probably by some other hand. The letter is full of moderate counsels as to asceticism, and blames her for taking a vow of continence without her husband's consent. [W. H. F.]

CELBES. [ACEMBES.]

CELE-CHRIST. Bishop of Cill-Cele-Christ, in Ui-Dunchadha, in Fotharta in Leinster—March 3. Cele-christ or Christicola, the 'vassal' or rather the 'companion' of Christ, was a native of Ulster, being son of Eochaidh, descended from Eoghan, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages. His brother was Comgall of Both-conais (Sept. 4) in Iniseogain, now Imishowen, in the county of Donegal. He left his native province, and going to the west of Leinster built a church (oratorium) in the district called Hy Donchadha, which was afterwards known as Cill-Cele-Christ. There, apart from the world, he wished to flee all earthly honours and devote himself to heavenly contemplation, but honour pursued him, and

"invitus ad pontificalis dignitatis apicem raptur." With some others, "cum aliquot sociorum caterva," he went on a pilgrimage to Rome. He died in 722, some time after his return. He is venerated on March 3. (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 162; Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. 82; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 63, 241 n.)

[J. G.]

CELE-CLERECH. — Bishop and martyr, commemorated July 8. He is given in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 191) as martyred along with Aedh and Tadhg, in Würzburg, in Franconia. Dr. Todd, in his note on the entry, says there can be no doubt but this bishop and his fellow-martyrs are really the same as Cilian and those who were put to death with him. [See CILIAN.] [J. G.]

CELE-PEADAIR, the "Servant of Peter," was abbat of Armagh, and the Four Masters give his obit, A.D. 757. He was a native of Uibreasail-Macha (now Clan-brassil, on the south side of Lough Neagh in the county of Armagh), and succeeded Congus, bishop at Armagh, in A.D. 750, as abbat and bishop. (Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 192; Harris's Ware's Bishops, 41; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 294, col. 1; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 361.) [J. G.]

CELER (1), proconsul of Africa in A.D. 429 (Cod. Theod. t. vi. 354, ed. Godofred), is addressed by Augustine in two epistles (56, 57, or 237, 210), which shew him to have been a Donatist. The date of the epistles demands investigation. The Benedictines put them about A.D. 400. Their chain of reasoning is as follows. The conference at Carthage in A.D. 411 is not mentioned in the letter, therefore it is beyond doubt earlier than that conference; therefore A.D. 400 is a suitable date. The first of the two letters was written on a tour of episcopal visitation, which hindered Augustine from performing his promise of reading some of his own works to Celer. He therefore sent them by a presbyter, named Optatus, who was to be at the service of Celer whenever the latter had leisure. Celer was at this time a man of high character, and had been bred a Donatist, and the books he had wished to hear seem to have included one on preparation for death. He was also anxious to know if the African Donatist church had any good reason for severing itself from the church catholic. We learn from the second letter, if we are right in supposing it to refer to the things mentioned in the first, that his desire had been signified to Augustine by his son Caecilius, who seems to have been a Catholic. In this second letter he is requested to give more diligent charge to his men, Paternus and Maurusius, to bring about catholic unity in the region of Hippo. Allusion is also made to the multitude of his occupations. We may infer that this letter was written after Honorius had begun to pass laws against the Donatists, which Celer, though as yet a Donatist himself, was officially bound to execute. It will therefore be not earlier than A.D. 405. The book Augustine had sent him had then been by him non paucis diebus, but Augustine is not sure whether he has read it. It seems that Optatus was to read some of Augustine's writings to Celer, and if he were duly grateful, he should have an interview with Augustine, or copies of that and other works of Augustine's for himself. He had received those copies some weeks or months before Augustine wrote again. The first transactions seem to belong rather to the time when the Donatists were eagerly reading Augustine's writings and proud of their great African divine (Tillem. xiii. 193), than to the time when they were embittered by legal penalties, which Augustine took care to see enforced. In the second letter there is an allusion to a matter which commentators have left unexplained. Celer had an estate at Hippo; his bailiff was Spondaeus, a friend of Augustine. This bailiff seems to have allowed the Donatists some illegal advantages, a place of meeting or the like, on the estates of Celer. Augustine expostulated with his friend, who sent back word by one Caius that he was afraid of making some of his people violent. It was reported that he had Celer's orders. Augustine begs Celer to support his own demands, and then the man will have nothing to fear. Afterwards, in A.D. 412, when Macrobius, Donatist bishop of Hippo, had forcibly, with a gang of followers, opened some of the closed basilicas, Spondaeus stopped his proceedings; but when Spondaeus had gone to Carthage, Macrobius opened basilicas and held meetings on Celer's own estates (Ep. 139 or 158). In A.D. 422, Augustine writes to pope Celestine, that Celer, of whom the young bishop Antonius had complained, both before the council of bishops that deprived him of his see and afterwards to pope Boniface, for oppressive use of authority against him, held no office, whether in Africa or elsewhere, either then or since. We may note that Augustine's form of address to the Donatist, whom he was urging not illegally to protect the adherents of his sect, is "domine dilectissime, meritoque honorabilis ac suscipiende fili."

CELER (2), mis-called CELLOR by Theophanes, an Illyrian (according to Malelas), "a learned, eloquent, wise, and brave man, full of the grace of God," magister or captain of the body-guard to Anastasius, sent by him (A.D. 503) with a fresh armament against Cabades, king of Persia; because the former armaments under Areobindus, Apphio, and Romanus on the one hand, and Patricius the Phrygian and Hypatius the emperor's nephew on the other, needed to be united under a single head. Indeed, a large part of both the former armaments had been destroyed. The advance guard of the fresh army under Patriciolus and Vitalianus his son arrived in Mesopotamia in September; Celer himself in December. He found that Cabades had been called home by an Ephthalite invasion. He had orders to remit the taxes throughout Mesopotamia. He sent the troops into winter-quarters till March; then despatched Timostratus to attack the horses and herds of the Persian army which were feeding on mountains near Nisibis, and himself collected the forces to join Patricius in the blockade of Amida. He forbade assaults on the walls. In July he made an inroad into Arzanene. He forbade his men under pain of death to spare the life of any male above the age of twelve in the villages of the enemy, or to leave a single house standing. He was compelled by the severe winter of A.D. 504-5 to purchase the departure of the Persian garrison from Amida by payment of 1000 pounds of gold. He was then commissioned to conclude peace, which was finally effected in A.D. 507. During the delay of the negotiations he sought a site for a Roman fortification on the Persian frontier. He fixed on Daras, which, according to Malelas, was on the site of the battle of Arbela. He then returned to Edessa, where he had been unpopular, and was received with great pomp. The treaty was signed there. But the fortification of Daras became a new cause of grievance, and Anastasius had to content Cabades with a new payment of money. (Procop. Bell. Pers. i. 8, 9; Theophanes, A.M. 5998; Malelas, p. 399, ed. Bonn; Ceillier, x. 583, 586.) This is the Celerus, a senator, to whom Avitus writes (Ep. 43), in A.D. 496, about a captive of king Gondobald. (Patrol. lix. 260; Ceillier, x. 562.) In A.D. 508 he was consul.

He was nearly murdered in A.D. 512 by the rabble, who were excited at the change in the Trisagion introduced by Anastasius. Marcellin. Chron. (Patrol. li. 937). [E. B. B.]

CELERINA (1). Mart. Rom. (Cyp. Ep. 39). See CELERINUS. [E. W. B.]

(2) The deaconess to whom Theodoret writes his Ep. 101. [E. B. B.]

CELERINUS (1), a confessor at Rome, tortured apparently before Decius himself, "anguis major, metator antichristi" (Cyp. Ep. 22). He writes in agony of mind to LUCIANUS (q. v.), the Carthaginian confessor, to beg a libellus for his two sisters, Numeria and Candida, the latter of whom had sacrificed, and, to avoid sacrificing, the former, called also Eteclusa, paid money ("dona numeravit," an apparent play on the name—cf. Mart. Ep. iv. 38. 8, "numeres oportet aliquid"—if Numeria is indeed a prænomen at all, which Varro says it could not be: L. L. ix. 38, ed. Spengel), when she was already ascending the Capitol (Ep. 21). They endeavoured to atone for their fall by their care of the Carthaginian refugees at Rome, whom they met at Portus, and provided for to the number of sixty-five at one time. They had been heard before the Roman presbytery (praepositi) after their lapse, and their readmission was postponed until the election of a new bishop. Cyprian, disapproving the letter of Celerinus, still praises his 'verecundia.' The date of the letter is after Easter 250. The true text (preserved in Codex T, see Hartel, pref. xlvi.) gives it in the vulgar African latin. The various coincidences can leave little doubt that he was a Carthaginian, though it is nowhere so stated. See MACARITUS for names of other Christian sufferers. The Celerinus whom Cyprian ordained in his retirement near Carthage, in Dec. 250 (Ep. 37 and 39), must be the same person; for he comes from Rome, and from the famous group of confessors, Moyses, Maximus, &c. (whose part is most important in the affairs of the lapsed and of Novatianism); is a confessor "primus ad temporis nostri proelium," "inter Christi milites antisignanus," "cum ipso infestationis principe et auctore congressus." He was warned by a vision, while wavering, to take holy orders. He belonged to a family of martyrs. His grandmother Celerina, and two uncles, Laurentinus and Ignatius, Roman soldiers, died by martyrdom, and (which is unaccountable unless the family had a previous connexion with Carthage^a) were commemorated at Carthage before his ordination. Their day in the [Carthaginian] kalendar is Feb. 3, on which he also is celebrated as deacon conf.^b Augustine preached sermon 48 in St. Celerina's church, which under Genseric was given up to the Arians. (Morc. p. 65.)

Again the Celerinus mentioned in Cornelius's letter to Fabius, bp. of Antioch (Euseb. Ecol. Hist. vi. 43, πάσας βασιάνους διενέγκας. . . κατὰ κράτος νενίκηκε τὸν ἀντικειμένον), must be the same confessor on whose unusual sufferings (stocks, starvation, wounds) Cyprian enlarges (Ep. 39). He is there said to have abandoned Novatian along with Maximus, Urban, Sidonius (i.e. in Nov. A.D. 251; compare Cyp. Ep. 49: Moyses had died beginning of Jan. 251). His presence with Cyprian, Dec. 250 (as well as the fact that he was apparently out of prison even in Apr. 250), explains his not being mentioned in the correspondence with the other confessors, while he may well have sided with them in adhering to Novatian at the election of Cornelius in March 251 (the true date), and withdrawing from him the following November. If it is observed from what a large number of scattered incidental notices this story is reconstructed, it will appear how strong a body of evidence it affords for the genuineness of the documents.

CELESTINUS I., Pope. [COELESTINUS.]

CELESTIUS. [COELESTIUS.]

CELEUSIUS, a magistrate, perhaps chief of the police, at Nazianzus, to whom Gregory Nazianzen wrote three letters, placed by Tillemont in the Lent of A.D. 382, which was passed by Gregory without uttering a word to anyone. Celeusius having complained of being received by his friend in perfect silence, Gregory retorted that he had graver complaints to make against him on account of his negligence of the Lenten fast, and for his exhibiting immoral spectacles in the theatre. A second remonstrance elicited a still severer rebuke. The third letter is much longer, and couched in a more friendly and playful spirit. (Gregor. Nazianz. Epist. i. 74, 75 (71, 72).)

CELLACH (CELLAN, KELLACH). Colgan

derives this name from Ceall or Cill, a cell, and enumerates thirty-three saints bearing the name between the years 657 and 1148, but few of them have much bearing on history, or lived before the 9th century. They are also so indistinct in their biographical outlines as to prevent any sure assignment to places or days of dedication.

CELLACH (1)—April 1. This seems to be the dedication of St. Cellach, son of Sarguse, anchorite, abbat and bishop of Armagh, in the end of the 9th century, and of Ceallach, abbot of Iona. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 93; Colgan, Acta SS. 334, n. 1, and Tr. Thaum. 500, col. 2.) Ceallach, son of Conghal, was nineteenth abbat of Hy A.D. 802-815, and during his presidency the monastery of Kells in Meath was founded, or re-organised after its original foundation by St. Columba, and was made the chief station of the Columbian order, on account of the danger and sufferings to which the community at Iona was exposed from the attacks of the Northmen. O'Clery mentions also a Ceallach, son of Conmach, who was blind, deaf, and lame. (Reeves, Adannm. 278, 388; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Scotl. i. 125; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 131, iii. 252; Four Masters, by O'Donov. i. 413; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 93.)

(2) Deacon in Glendaloch in Ui-Mail (Mart. Doneg.)—October 7. Mart. Tullaght calls him a Saxon. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 510, c. 9) says St. Kellach, son of Saran, abbat of Fothan (now Fahan, near Lough Swilly, in the barony of Inishowen and county of Donegal), was successor of Mura; died, according to the Four Masters, A.D. 657, and was venerated on October 7. These may have been placed upon the same day, but can hardly be the same person.

(3) Bishop of the Mercians. [CEOLLACH.]

CELLAH (Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 307), bishop of Mercia. [CEOLLACH.]

[C. H.]

CELLANUS, a native of Ireland, and a monk in France, in the monastery where the uncorrupted body of St. Furseus rested, which was (Bede, H. E. iii. 19; Gall. Christ. iii. 933) at Peronne. He wrote to Aldhelm begging some of his discourses, and received from him a favourable reply (Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 333, 337).

CELLOR. [CELER (2).]

(2) Said to have been 5th bishop of Toul. (Ceillier, x. 400.)

CELSINUS, a writer, probably a Platonist, from whom Augustine quotes (Contra Academ. ll. ii. (5), vol. i. 921).

CELSUS (1). Of the personal history of this, the first great polemical adversary of Christianity, we know nothing with certainty. Nor is this to be wondered at; since Origen, from whom the whole of our knowledge of Celsus is derived, was himself in the same predicament. It appears that the work of Celsus, entitled ἀληθῆς λόγος, or the True Discourse, had been placed in Origen's hands, without any hint of the history or date of its author; and hence Origen in different parts of his reply makes various conjectures, as to the value of which we are as capable of judging as he was himself. For instance, he tells us that he has "heard" that there were two Celsuses, both Epicureans; and he assumes for the most part that the Celsus against whom he writes was an Epicurean. But the ἀληθῆς λόγος is manifestly, from its whole tenor, the work of a Platonist; and hence Origen is reduced to suppose that Celsus, for the sake of making a better impression on the world, dishonestly concealed his Epicureanism—a needless and improbable hypothesis. (Origen, cont. Cels. i. 9.) Manifestly, until far better evidence to the contrary has been produced than is ever likely to be produced, we are entitled to assume that the Celsus of Origen was a genuine (and by no means an unlearned or unskilful) Platonist. And this has often been considered to prevent his identification with that Celsus to whom Lucian (who was an Epicurean) dedicated one of his works, and who wrote a treatise "against magicians." Dr. Keim, however, has shewn considerable grounds for the identification, which certainly adds a point of interest to the name of Celsus.

But far more interesting questions than any that concern Celsus personally are raised by his attack on Christianity, of which enough has been preserved by Origen in his work Contra Celsum to convey to us a very tolerable idea of its nature. In judging of it, we must be on our guard at once against disparaging it too much, or on the other hand thinking too highly of its ability. Origen indeed, who to all appearance is a very fair antagonist, speaks of it with contempt. But the estimates which even fair controversialists give of their opponents are not to be hastily assumed; and Celsus had at any rate this merit, that if he attacked others, he gave them their revenge by presenting his own views to be criticised. He was not a mere polemical assailant; he was a philosopher on his own account, and held in certain respects by no means unenlightened opinions. He had strong faith in reason. "What evil is it," he asks, "to be learned and to have cultivated the intellect with the best pursuits, to be and to appear wise? What obstacle are these things to the knowledge of God? Do not they rather lead and assist to the attainment of truth?" Nor had that similarity between the human and the animal frame, which the natural science of our own day insists upon, escaped his notice. Hence he deduces that ants "converse, have reason, notions of general truths, speech," &c. (iv. 84), and even that they have knowledge of God. It would be hard, again, to cavil at his ideas of the Divine Nature; he speaks of men "burning with the love of it" (i. 8); he is intolerant of the association of it with anything that is mortal or perishable. It would, however, be premature to conclude from these passages that Celsus was a great philosopher; for from the mere fragments of his work which are preserved, it is impossible to know certainly with what degree of energy, vigour, and originality, he put forward his positive opinions; whether they were mainly his own, or a mere reflection of those of others. And without this knowledge, any judgment of him must be uncertain. He was not free from superstition; he believed in magic, and declared that serpents and eagles were more skilled in it than men (iv. 86).

Baur says, that "in acuteness, in dialectical aptitude, in many-sided cultivation, at once philosophic and general, Celsus stands behind no opponent of Christianity." Admitting that this panegyric is not groundless, we must add, that in vital insight Celsus was deficient. As an opponent of Christianity, the chief characteristic of Celsus is a strong, narrow, intolerant common sense. To him Christianity is an "exitabilis superstitio;" he gives credence to every story against it on which he can lay his hands; he dwells with coarse jocularly on the Jewish tradition of Panthera and the Virgin Mary (i. 28, sq.); he unearths a certain Diagramma, a figure symbolising the world, and consisting of a circle called Leviathan enclosing ten other circles, which apparently was used in the rites of some sect more or less approximating to the Christians (vi. 22). He has no idea of regarding Christianity from the inside, and of inquiring into the reason of its influence; from not looking at a belief in its truth as the most distant possibility, he uses jest for argument, and interprets everything in a bad sense. Treating of the flight of Jesus into Egypt, and afterwards (as he alleges) before the betrayal, he asks, "Had God need to fly from his enemies? Does fear belong to God?"

In such instances as these, it is evident that Celsus wholly misapprehended the force of the doctrine that he was attacking. There are cases, indeed, in which he shews himself more acute. He challenges the evidence of Christianity, and asks, "Who saw the dove lighting on the head of Jesus after his baptism?" As to the resurrection, he makes the remark which has been made by Renan and others, that it was Mary Magdalene, "a fanatical woman," who was the first witness of the resurrection, according to all the accounts (ii. 55). He also remarks on the disbelief that was invariably given to such accounts as those of the resurrection of Zamolxis, Pythagoras, Orpheus, Protesilaus, Hercules, and Theseus. But the most remarkable portions of his attack are those which are directed against the general character of Christianity, and which shew the great resemblance, in some points where we should least expect it, between the religion as it existed then and as it exists now. For instance, he dwells on the numerous sects of Christians, all of whom said, "Crede, si salvus fieri velis," and asks how one is to judge between so many? Nor does Origen deny the fact of the number of these sects; but he maintains that this is a proof of the importance of that on which they debate, and further that they all set forth Jesus alone as the means of salvation (vi. 11). Celsus accuses the Christians of lawlessness, and of keeping wholly to themselves, and not caring for those outside. It is needless to observe that this diversity and contest between the laws, spiritual or ecclesiastical, which Christians have appointed to themselves, and the political institutions which govern the world, has endured to the present day. He complains vehemently of the Christians as discouraging learning, wisdom, and thought; as rejecting the authority of reason; as being the patrons of sinners, whereas to the heathen mysteries only "the holy and virtuous" were invited. He makes a great point of the opposition between the Old and New Testaments in the morality recommended by them; in respect of the earthly success which is the crowning happiness of the former, and which is so strongly reprobated by the latter. Finally he maintains that no revelation of the Supreme Being can be made; but that, if it could be made, it must be of universal and compelling efficacy; that, however, all that is possible is revelation by an angel or demon, which sort of revelation he yet does not allow to Judaism or Christianity.

The form of Celsus's work, the ἀληθὴς λόγος, is well known. He begins with a dialogue between a Jew and a Christian, in which the Jew sets forth the objections to Christianity which come from his point of view. It must not, however, be inferred from this that Celsus had any partiality for Judaism; much the reverse. He treats Moses and the Jewish scriptures with a contempt which amusingly contrasts with the uncritical reverence which he pays to the Galactophagi of Homer, the Druids, and the Getae, whom he terms "wise and ancient nations" (i. 16); and with which he accepts the stories of Linus and Musaeus, though afterwards he rejects those of Perseus and Amphion (i. 64). And in one of the most displeasing passages of his work, he compares Jews and Christians to a set of worms or frogs sitting in the mud, squabbling, and saying, "God is, and we are next to him, and it is for our sake that the whole world is made; and God will come and take us up to heaven, except those who are bad, whom he will burn with fire."

Our only ancient authority for Celsus is, as has been said, the work of Origen against him. This is a work, as a whole, of much controversial merit and philosophical breadth. Origen, indeed, like Celsus, is not free from the superstitions of his time; thus he defends the star whose appearance is told in the second chapter of St. Matthew by a reference to comets, which, he remarks, portend future events, such as wars and pestilences. But, on the whole, there are few works of the ancient Fathers which can be read with more pleasure and profit. In modern times, F. C. Baur has written an elaborate critique on Celsus in his work on Christianism and the Christian Church in the First Three Centuries, Tübingen, 1853. But the work to which reference should be made by all who wish to obtain a thorough knowledge of Celsus (in so far as this is now attainable) is Professor Theodor Keim's monograph (Celsus's Wahres Wort, Zürich, 1873). Dr. Keim gathers together, and translates, the fragments of Celsus contained in Origen; and adds disquisitions of much interest, both on Celsus himself, and on two of his contemporaries, Lucian of Samosata and Minucius Felix. Both Baur and Keim appear to the present writer to rate Celsus too highly; but the general tendency of Christian writers has naturally been to underrate him. The date of Celsus's treatise is fixed by Keim at the year 177 or 178 A.D. [J. R. M.]

CELSUS (2) Fifth bishop of Treves, who died, it is said, in 141. His body was discovered in 977, and miracles are reported to have been wrought by it, but his history is uncertain (Acta SS. Boll. Feb. iii. 393). [H. W. Y.]

(3) Bishop of Iconium, who allowed a layman named Paulinus to preach, as Demetrius is informed by Alexander (Eus. H. E. vi. 19).

(4) (Baron. A.D. 309. § 36; Acti SS. Jan. 9). A boy, otherwise called Hircitallus (a corruption of some name derived from εἰρκτός), son of the praefect Marcianus and Marcionilla, converted by St. Julian's constancy under his tortures at Antioch (or by a vision of angels), was imprisoned with him, converted his own mother, and they were martyred, together with seven other brethren, on the Feast of the Epiphany—perhaps in A.D. 309. It is just possible there may be so much truth in the Acts, which are one of the finest specimens of a monkish romance.

(5) Domitius Celsus, Vicarius of Africa (A.D. 316), to whom Constantine addressed his letter against the Donatists, promising to come to Africa himself, and hear and judge and settle the matter, by destroying one party or the other. Petronius, Annianus, and Julianus, the praefects, also write to inform him that at the bidding of the sovereign they have given a conveyance and a competence of provision to bishops Lucian, Capito, Fidentius, and Nanitius, and presbyter Mammarius, as far as the port of Arles, on their return from pleading before the court in Gaul to their homes in Africa. These letters are given in the appendix to Augustine, vol. ix. 789. The emperor's letter, and the law which he addressed to Celsus (Cod. Theod. bk. i. tit. 10, l. 1), forbidding an officer employed in distraining a house to drag a matron into the street, under heavy penalties, even death, to himself and his employer, are given by Baronius (ad annum 66, 70). He remarks that the law was a vindication of old Roman rights against the libidinous violence that had come in with the persecutions.

(6) Praefect of Syria, A.D. 362 (Baron. ad ann. 53), came to meet Julian at the gates of Cilicia and Cappadocia, was greeted by him with a kiss, and taken up into his chariot, where he sat by him till they reached Tarsus. See Ammianus Marcellinus, xxii. 9, where Valesius has the following note: "This was a disciple of Libanius, a Cilician by race, son of Hesychius. He pronounced a panegyric on Julian on his entrance into Cilicia, as Libanius says in his Funeral Oration (p. 300), and in his epistle (634) to Celsus. Libanius boasts of this disciple in his speech against the cavillers at his teaching, and said that it was he who, when he had come to Athens, was author of the decree whereby he (Libanius) was called to the chief professorial chair at Athens. Celsus came to that seat of learning by Basil's persuasion, as Libanius tells us in his epistle (143) to Basil" (Vales. Anm. p. 322). Baronius (l. c.) gives Sozomen as his authority for saying that Celsus was afterwards banished by Julian, but we have not found the statement in that historian.

CELSUS (7) Mentioned by Augustine as having compiled an epitome of the opinions of all philosophers, simply stated without vindication or refutation (Aug. c. Haer. vol. viii. 23).

(8) A messenger of Paulinus of Nola to Augustine, who writes by him his 80th (65th) epistle, in a hurry, as Celsus came late at night to tell Augustine he sailed early in the morning. The date is fixed to A.D. 405, as the return of Thrasius and Evodius was expected. Augustine had written a few days before by Fortunatianus, and sent the letter round by way of Rome. Paulinus had said, in answer to some former letter of his, that he meant to stay where he was, unless the will of God became clear that he should go. Augustine writes back to beg him to explain how, when we are left free to choose between two courses, both good, and have no direct revelation to guide us, we are to know which is God's will.

(9) Son of Pneumatius and Fidelis, kinsfolk of Paulinus of Nola, who writes a poem on his death. He had been christened, and was just beginning grammar. Paulin., poem 35, p. 666 (Patr. lxi. 676). [E. B. B.]

(10) Abbot at the council of Rouen, which gave privileges to the abbey of Fontenelles, A.D. 682 (Labbe, Conc. vi. 1241). [E. B. B.]

(11) rendered into Latin from the Greek The Dialogue of Jason and Papiscus, by Aristo of Pella. His version is not extant, but only his dedication of it to a certain bishop VIGILIUS. This is given in Migne (vi. 58). It used to be appended to the works of Cyprian. See VIGILIUS. [E. B. B.]

(12) St. Confessor of Limoges. Certain relics of this saint are preserved in St. Stephen's cathedral at Limoges, but his history and date are unknown (Acta SS. Boll. Aug. ii. 191). [H. W. Y.]

CELULUF (Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 275; Sim. Dun. transl. Stevenson, 443); CELWLFUS (Sim. Dun. in M. H. B. 659), king of Northumbria. [CEOLWULF.] [C. H.]

CELULUFUS, brother of Kenulf king of Mercia, occurs in a charter marked spurious or doubtful in Kemble (C. D. No. 192). [C. H.]

CELYNIN, Welsh saint of the 7th century, patron of Llangelynin in Merionethshire; commemorated on November 20 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302). [C. H.]

CENA, CENE (Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 246; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 435, 436), archbishop of York. [ETHELBERT.] [C. H.]

CENA, a lady who writes (A.D. 733, editorial date) to St. Boniface, assuring him of her prayers and begging his; she rarely sees him, but would gladly serve him or any of his party should they come into her province. To her place of residence the letter gives no clue (St. Bonif. Ep. 34, ed. Würdtwein; ibid. Migne, Patrol. tom. lxxxix. p. 733). [C. H.]

CENANNAN—March 26. On Inishman or the middle Isle of Arran, in Galway Bay, stands the roofless ruin of a small church, built of immense stones, and called Teampull Ceannanach. St. Cenannan or Kenaach is said to have been a king of Leinster's son, and the patron of Ballynakill, in the barony of Ballynahinch or Connemara. (Petrie, Round Towers, 188-9; Colgan, Acta SS. 715, col. 2.) [J. G.]

CENAUC (Le Neve, Fasti, i. 288), bishop of St. David's. [CYNOC.] [C. H.]

CENBURG (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1677, in H. M. B. 784), sister of Ina king of the West Saxons and of the abbess Cuthburga. [CUENBURGH.] [C. H.]

CENEGITHA, called the queen his wife by Kenulf king of Mercia, in a charter of A.D. 799, marked doubtful or spurious by Kemble (C. D. No. 177). In the genealogy of the kings of Mercia (Flor. Wig. in M. H. B. 630) the wife of Kenulf, there Coenwulf, is Aelfthryth. [C. H.]

CENEU (1). (KAYNE, KEYNA.) Reclus of Keynsham—Oct. 8. This saint, whose memory is greatly honoured on both sides of the Severn, is said to have been the third daughter of Brychan, of Brycheiniog, and thus the sister of St. Canoc (Feb. 11), and the aunt of St. Cadoc (Jan. 24), the son of Gwynllyw Filwr or Gundleus: yet it is more probable that, while retaining her relationship to the other persons here named, she was either the granddaughter of this Brychan, or the daughter of another Brychan, who lived at a later period, emigrated to Armorica, and was the father of St. Wiwwaloc (March 3). According to the legend, she was dedicated to God from her youth, forsook her own country, and, crossing the Severn, took up her abode in a wood or desert place near the Avon, where the abundance of serpents made the place uninhabitable. But having by prayer performed the miracle of changing the serpents into stones, as is still related of her in that district, she remained for many years where Keynsham now stands, and only apparently in her old age returned to Brecknock at the request of her nephew St. Cadoc; there she died in the end of the 5th or the beginning of the 6th century, but the place of her interment is unknown. Dempster would wish as usual to place "St. Keina" among the Scotch saints, but she was undoubtedly Welsh, and her name is perpetuated at St. Keyne, a parish in Cornwall, and at Keynsham in Somerset. (Vita S. Keynae Eremitae, in Capgrave, Nov. Leg. Angl. 204, and, with a very useful Commentarius Praevius, in the Bollandists' Acta SS. Oct. 8, tom. iv. 275-77; Rees, Camb. Brit. Saints, 605-7 n.; Dempster, Hist. Eccl. Gent. Scot. ii. 418; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 157; Butler, Lives of the Saints, x. 210, Oct. 8; Colgan, Acta SS. 311, ec. 3, 4.) [J. G.]

(2), son of Coel, Welsh saint of the 4th century (Rees, Welsh Saints, 102, 104). [C. H.]

(3) (KENEU), bishop of St. David's in the 6th century, founder of a church named Llangeneu, once existing in Pembrokeshire, all traces of the situation of which were obliterated by the Flemings who settled in that county (Rees, Welsh Saints, 245, 274). He was the third bishop according to one text of Giraldus Cambrensis, but according to another he is absent from the list (Girald. Camb. Opp. vi. ed. Dimock, 102). See also Hist. of St. David's, by Jones and Freeman, 249; Le Neve, Fasti, i. 288. [C. H.]

CENGILLE, -LLUS (CINGISLUS, CYNEGYS-LUS, COENGILS, KENGLILLUS, KEMGISEL), abbat of Glastonbury, A.D. 729-743, succeeding Echfrid (Mon. Angl.), whom Malmesbury calls Atfrith and Aethfrid. He is said to have received for the abbey a grant of land at Polonholt, Torrie, and Brunantun, from Ethelhard king of Wessex and his wife. In conjunction with abbat In-geld and the presbyter Wietberhtus, he addresses a proposal of mutual intercessory prayer, the first of the kind on record, to the abbat Aldhun and the abbesses Cneuburga and Coeburga, who replied in acceptance of it. His name appears in attestation of a charter of king Ethelhard, A.D. 737, marked doubtful or spurious by Kemble. (Malm. Antiq. Glast. Cale, xv. Scriptt. 313, 328; Monast. Anglic. i. 2; Kemble, C. D. No. 1002; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 343, and notes; Birch, Fasti Monast. 60.) [C. H.]

CENNFAELADH (1). Abbat of Bangor—April 8. The Cāin Adamnain states that Cennfaeladh, abbat of Bangor, was among the saints who went security for liberating the women (of Ireland) from military service, &c. (Mart. Donej. by Todd and Reeves, 99.) He was grandson of Aedh Breac, and died A.D. 704 (Four Masters Ann. Ul.).

(2) The most remarkable man of his age was Cennfaeladh "the learned," "a paragon of wisdom," "the wise," as the Irish Kalendars term him. He was son of Oilioil, son of Baetan, and said to be of Daire Lurain (now Derryloran, in Tyrone). In youth he was a soldier, and severely wounded in the battle of Magh Rath (now Moira or Moyragh, in the barony of Lower Iveagh, co. Down), in A.D. 634. He was carried off the field, and committed to the care of St. Bricin of Toom-regon [BRICIN, Sept. 5], with whom he was not only cared bodily, but instructed in all the learning taught in St. Bricin's three schools, his retentive memory treasuring up the lectures given to the pupils by St. Bricin and his professors. He afterwards went out and founded similar schools and colleges. (O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Irish, ii. 77, 92-3.) He was a poet, and his verses, of a martial character, are often quoted in the Four Masters. He also wrote a work on the synchronisms of the Irish monarchs with the Roman Emperors (Four Masters, by O'Donov. i. 161, n. 9). He died A.D. 679 (Ann. Tigh.; Ware, Ir. Writ. Dubl. 1704, p. 11). [J. G.]

CENNYCH, early Welsh saint, patron of Llangennyeh in Carmarthenshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 306). [C. H.]

CENNYDD (CENYDD), Welsh saint of the 6th century, at first a member of the college of Cattwg, and afterwards founder of a religious society at a place in Gower, Glamorganshire, where the church of Llangennydd is now situated (Rees, Welsh Saints, 257; E. Williams, Iolo Manuscripts, 497). [C. H.]

CENRED (1) (COENRED, KENRED), the father of Ina king of Wessex (A. S. C. ad ann. 688, 855; Flor. Wig. Chron. ad ann. 688; ibid. App. M. H. B. 641; ibid. Geneal. Reg. W. Sax. M. H. B. 633; Ethelw. Chron. M. H. B. 512; Hen. Hunt., II. A. M. H. B. 723). He was the son of Ceolwald the brother of Cynegils (Asser, R. G. Aelf. M. H. B. 468; Flor. Wig. Chron. ad ann. 849; Sim. Dun. G. Reg. Anjl. M. H. B. 674). [C. H.]

(2) (A. S. C. ad ann. 702, trr. M. H. B., Thorpe; ibid. ad ann. 704, trr. Ingram, Thorpe; Flor. Wig. Geneal. Reg. Merc. M. H. B. 630; Hen. Hunt. Hist. in M. H. B. 723, 725, 727, 735), king of Mercia. [COENRED.] [C. H.]

(3) (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad ann. 716; A. S. C. trr. Ingram, Thorpe; Hen. Hunt. Hist. in M. H. B. 724, 734), king of Northumbria. [COENRED.] [C. H.]

CENSORINUS. [CHRYSE.] (Κενσορίνος. Sic in the Acts referred to.) [G. S.]

CENSORIUS, count, sent by Aetius to restore peace in Spain, at the request of Idacius, A.D. 432 (Idac. Chron. 41, 8; Patrol. li. 880). [E. B. B.]

CENSURIUS, St. Confessor, and bishop of Auxerre. It is a disputed point when this saint ruled that see, but, according to Gams (Series Episcoporum, p. 501), it was from A.D. 472-502. His history is not certain (Acta SS. Boll. Jun. ii. 277). [H. W. Y.]

CENTURIUS, a Donatist layman, who brought to the church at Hippo a book written against Augustine by the Donatists, consisting of a compilation of Scripture testimonies to the nullity of baptism by unworthy ministers (e.g. Prov. v. 15-17). Augustine wrote a short answer, mentioned Retract. ii. 19, Possid. Ind. 3, not now extant. [E. B. B.]

CENTWINE (KENTWINE), king of the West Saxons, 676-685. He was a son of Cynegils and brother of Coinwalch. On the death of Escwin he succeeded in making himself master of part of Wessex, but his reign occurs during that period which Bede describes as a ten years' interregnum, during which the ealdormen of the nation took the kingdom and held it divided amongst them (H. E. iv. 12). The events recorded of Kentwine's reign are that in 682 he drove the Britons to the sea (A. S. C. 682; Lappenberg, ed. Thorpe, i. 256), and that for a short time he entertained Wilfrid during his exile. His wife was a sister of Eormenburga, the wife of Egfrith of Northumbria, and owing to her hostility Wilfrid was driven out of Wessex into Sussex (Edd. V. Wilfridi, c. 39). Among the poems ascribed to Alcuin is one "Ad templum Bugge," in which Entwine, king of the West Saxons, the father of Bugge, is described as a victorious king who had won three great battles, and afterwards retired into a monastery, where he died. This seems to be Kentwine, as his successor is named Ceadwalla (Ale. Opp. ii. 519). Kentwine is mentioned in a spurious charter of Baldred to Aldhelm, dated in 688 (Kemble, C. D. No. 28). [S.]

The reign of Centwine offers some material for the ecclesiastical history of Wessex. The episcopal see of the nation, which ever since the baptism of Cynegils in A.D. 635 had been established at Dorchester, north of the Thames, was now, as far as can be ascertained, removed to Winchester, the capital. The date A.D. 679 assigned by Rudborne for this event, with which he couples the transference of the bones of Birinus to the new cathedral, is discussed by Haddan and Stubbs (Councils, iii. 127), who hold that the exact point of time is uncertain. Wessex, with the exception of one brief interval, A.D. 662-666, when a second bishop, Wina, sat at Winchester, had been hitherto an undivided diocese, and so it continued, Hedda being the sole bishop all Centwine's time. The archbishop of Canterbury during the reign was Theodore, whose administration, so important for the rest of England, had no special contact with Wessex. There is a decree attributed to him, but on no sufficient grounds, forbidding the Wessex bishopric to be divided in the lifetime of Hedda (Haddan and Stubbs, l. c.). The Wilfrid controversy was then engrossing general attention, and it was more or less affecting other kingdoms besides Northumbria, but Wessex was scarcely touched by it (cf. Edd. Vit. Wilf. c. 39). Of missionary operations within the bounds of the kingdom we vaguely get a sight. Abingdon monastery was founded by Centwine's nephew Heane, but the assigned date, A.D. 675, places it just beyond the reign; the abbey, however, of Redbridge, near Southampton, circ. 680, seems to fall better within it. No other institutions of this nature are known to have originated in Wessex during this reign (Birch, Fasti Monast. 5-7). It was only at this period that the South Saxons accepted Christianity, through the preaching of Wilfrid; and thus the long gap between Canterbury and Winchester was filled up, as well as Anglo-Saxon Christendom completed at last. Centwine was buried at Winchester cathedral (Annal. Eccles. Wint. in Wharton, Angl. Sac. i. 288), and was succeeded by Caedwalla. His name is otherwise spelt CENWINE, CENWINE, CHENWINE, KENTWINE.

CEODE. [CAETL.]

CEOLBURG, CEOLBURGA, CEOLBURH (CEOLBURGA), abbess of Beorclea or

Berkeley. From a charter issued in a synod at Acle, A.D. 804, relating to the disposal of her son Ethelric's property, we gather that she had married into a family of considerable landed property, which Ethelric desired should go ultimately to the monasteries of Worcester, Gloucester, and Deerhurst; that her husband Ethelmund was buried at Deerhurst, where also Ethelric wished to lie. Her name is attached to a charter of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 793, marked spurious or doubtful by Kemble. From her being mentioned in the Saxon Chronicle and Florence, where her death is placed in A.D. 805, "i.e. probably 807" (Had. and St.), she must have been a person of some note. (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 805; Kemble, C. D. Nos. 163, 186; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 548-9; Birch, Fasti Monast. 56.) [C. H.]

CEOLF (Ethelw. Chron. in M. H. B. 507), king of Northumbria. [CEOLWULF.] [C. H.]

CEOLFRID, CEOLFRITH, abbat of Jarrow and Wearmouth. He was born about A.D. 642, and began his monastic life about the age of 18 in the monastery of Gilling, co. York (in-Gaetlingum), of which his brother Cynfrith was some time the abbat. After residing there for several years, in consequence of a pestilence (probably that of A.D. 664), Tunberht, the abbat of that place, and many of his brethren, deserted Gilling, and took up their residence at Ripon, at Wilfrid's invitation. Ceolfrid migrated with the rest, and when he was 27 Wilfrid ordained him priest. Immediately after his ordination, he visited Kent to gain a further acquaintance with monastic life. After this he profited by the instruction of Botulf, a Lincolnshire abbat, and returned to Ripon with a justly deserved reputation for discipline and learning. Among the domestic cares of the house, Ceolfrid had the charge of the bakehouse. About A.D. 674 he was induced by Benedict Biscop to go to him at Wearmouth to assist in ruling his fraternity and in building the monastery, of which he made Ceolfrid prior. The strictness of his rule made him enemies, and he went back to Ripon to seek for peace, but Benedict prevailed upon him to return. After the house of Wearmouth was built, Benedict and Ceolfrid went to Rome. One of the results of their journey was the bringing back with them John, abbat of St. Martiu's at Tours, who instructed the inmates of the various monasteries in the north in the art of singing as practised at Rome (Beda, H. E. iv. 18). In 682 a gift of land from king Egfrith to Benedict enabled him to found the monastery of St. Paul at Jarrow, which is distant a few miles from Wearmouth, but on a different river. Of this new house Ceolfrid and Eosterwin were made joint abbats; but the chief labour of building the church and moderating the brotherhood seems to have fallen on Ceolfrid.

The dedication stone of Jarrow is still preserved in the church, upon which Ceolfrid is mentioned as the sole abbat (Surtees's Durham, ii. 67; Hübner, Inscr. Brit. Chri-t. 71). After a time Benedict made Ceolfrid abbat of Wearmouth as well as of Jarrow, wishing to unify the teaching and discipline, and to have one house in two places. Ceolfrid made an excellent ruler, and was a pattern to all the northern monasteries. He was the means of enriching his houses with gifts of various kinds, and procured for them from pope Sergius a grant of privileges such as Agatho had previously made. The most interesting incident, perhaps, in Ceolfrid's life is the mission that was sent to him by Naiton, or Nectan, king of the Picts, asking for architects who could erect for him a church of stone after the Roman fashion, and desiring accurate information on the old debatable subjects of the observance of Easter, the tonsure, etc. Bede gives at length Ceolfrid's reply (H. E. v. 21), from which we learn that it was probably through Ceolfrid's influence that Adamnan and the monks of Hii (Iona) had given up their old Celtic practice in the matter of the tonsure. The architects were sent, and the instructions of Ceolfrid carried out (cf. Dr. Stuart's Pref. to the Sculptured Stones of Scotland, ii. 13). The Roman court had no surer agent in the north of England for bringing about uniformity in discipline and creed than Ceolfrid.

The date of Naiton's letter is supposed to be 710. Six years afterwards Ceolfrid gave up his abbacies with the intention of ending his days at Rome. The brethren commended him to the pope, and Ceolfrid started on his journey. He died on the way, at Langres, in France, on Sept. 25, 716, and was buried there in the church of the Twin Martyrs. His remains are said to have been brought to England, and to have been carried from the north to Glastonbury by king Edmund (Malmesbury, de Gestis Pontiff. 198). Ceolfrid found a place in the Calendar on Sept. 25.

His life has been twice written. First by an anonymous author, contemporary with Ceolfrid. This is printed by Mr. Stevenson, with his edition of Bede, Opp. Minora, 318-334, from MS. Harl. 3020. Secondly by Bede himself, in his Lives of the Five First Abbots of Wearmouth and Jarrow. Bede was under Ceolfrid's charge at Jarrow (Symeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. i. cap. viii.), and it was at Ceolfrid's desire that he was ordained priest by bishop John in 691 (H. E. v. 24). (See also Acta SS. Ord. S. Ben. ed. 1733, saec. III. i. 292-4; Bolland. Acta SS. sub Sept. vii. 123.)

[J. R.]
The rule of Ceolfrid had its successive stages, and occurs therefore with various dates. He was "abbot" of St. Peter's at Wearmouth "from the commencement of that house," but only as "adjutor" of the founder (Bed. ed. Smith, Hist. Abbat. 295), and the house was built A.D. 674 (ib.), i.e. it was completed in that year. Huatberct's letter of June 716 accordingly states that Ceolfrid had then governed above forty years, "jure abbatis" (ib. 301); but when he adds the "monasteries" he is incorrect, as the younger house had not been built so long. The founding of St. Paul's at Jarrow was, under Benedict Biscop, the special work of Ceolfrid, who "fundavit, perfecit, rexit" seven years, after which he ruled both the houses for twenty-eight years, one of these being the last of the life of Benedict (ib. 299), who died Jan. 12, 690. If the "one year" and the "seven years" were to be measured with absolute precision, Ceolfrid's independent abbacy of both houses would have commenced at the beginning of A.D. 689, and St. Paul's been founded in Jan. 682; but January was not a good month for beginning to build in the north of England. The summer or autumn of 681 was more likely, and this figure suits better also in other respects. In another computation Bede makes him at his death to have been abbat "35 years, or rather 43 from the time St. Peter's began to be built" (ib. 302), and this statement takes us back to about the summer of A.D. 673 for the foundation of St. Peter's. Ceolfrid's being in the position of abbat so early as that indicates that the fraternity was formed before its abode was built, and doubtless the members were their own builders. His position among them is clearly shown when he is said to have been to Benedict "comes individuus, cooperator, et doctor regularis et monasticæ institutionis" (ib.). On Thursday, June 4, 716 (ib. 301), he resigned and quitted the monastery, at the age of 74, having been a presbyter 47 years (ib. 302). He was abbot therefore, reckoning all the stages, in the reigns of Ecgfrid, Aldfrid, and Osred, kings of Northumbria; he was under the first five bishops of Hexham—Eata, Trumbert, John of Beverley, Wilfrid, Acca; and he witnessed all the troubles of the Wilfrid controversies.

The Life of this abbat, coming from the pen of Bede, his own contemporary in his own abbey, affords the most authentic material we possess for a picture of an English monastery during the Heptarchy. The twin houses were about six miles apart, and each had ready communication with the sea: St. Peter's, on the north shore of the Wear, at its mouth; St. Paul's at Jarrow, three miles up the Tyne. If the latter occupied the site of the modern ruins, it stood on an elevation curving round a capacious haven, now called the Slake, in which the largest fleets of that early period were moored in security (Hutchinson, County of Durham, 1787, ii. 470). As both establishments lay between the two rivers, there was easy passage from one to the other. Bede's biblical labours and numerous writings are alone sufficient to assure us that the brethren must have had access to a valuable library. One of its art treasures, called by Bede 'Cosmographorum Codex,' purchased at Rome by Benedict Biscop, was superb enough to tempt a king, the study-loving Aldfrid of Northumbria, who considered "land of 8 families" not an extravagant price to give the monastery in exchange for it (ib. 300). Of the whole Latin Bible there are four copies specially mentioned, one of them being in what was then termed the old version (cf. Dict. of Bible, art. 'Vulgate'), which was another fruit of Benedict's journeys to Rome, and three in the new version, which were the addition of Ceolfrid, who on his departure took one with him as a present to Rome and left the other two to Wearmouth and Jarrow respectively. In other ways also Ceolfrid was a liberal benefactor to the home where so much of his life was spent. He added to the buildings "plura oratoria," and provided for the altar and the church vessels and vestments of every kind.

The foundation of Benedict Biscop was sure to be in intimate relations with Rome; the neighbourhood of a port facilitated pilgrimages thither, and these appear to have been not infrequent. A deputation of monks went out to pope Sergius and procured a privilegium like that obtained from Agatho by Biscop; a full synod of King Aldfrid and the bishops confirmed it; and so the way was preparing for that severance of the monastery from the diocese in favour of a distant master which in after years fixed the whole system of ultramontaniam in the church of England. Here, at the mention of pilgrimages, we linger for a moment, and the name of Ceolfrid authorises our doing so. The close of his abbacy marks the period when that stream of intercourse with the Roman city, so emphatically noticed by Bede and Boniface, had begun to flow in its strength. The royal names of Caedwalla, Coenred, Olla, Ina, illustrate the movement; but Bede, who witnessed it all, writes that "de gente Anglorum" all were outdoing one another, noble and ignoble, laymen and clerics, men and women (H. E. v. 7, nn.). It was indeed an interesting juncture in Anglo-Saxon history. One century had elapsed since the mission of Augustine, and the Christian civilisation of the Teutonic tribes in England was perhaps at its summit. Another century was yet to elapse before the Danes would wreck it all. It was just while this climax lasted that the flocking of the Anglo-Saxons to Rome occurred. The attitude in which they felt themselves towards the ancient mistress of the world must have been of a special character. They had never been subject to her, and had no memories to resent. They were among those who had succeeded to her empire, but they had not helped to break it down. In every part of Britain they found themselves in association with its departed greatness, the material fruits of which survived with only three centuries of antiquity upon them; they dwelt beside the old ramparts of deserted towns; they marched along the marvellous roads now named from their own divinities, and viewed the great barrier wall of the north, more wonderful still. The Roman empire was still current in the East, helping them to realise what it all meant. The once sovereign city survived in Italy, and was now fast gathering a new dominion of willing adherents, among whom the Anglo-Saxon kingdoms were not the least important. The great schism among themselves had been obliterated, and the sense of unity under one mother was fresh. All that was artistic and scenic in worship had been recently propagated among them, and the model of it was Roman. But Rome had as yet made no domineering demands, and shewed no insolence of assumption; for which indeed her own period had not then arrived. There was therefore just then more to attract and less to alienate than at any period of the relations of the Anglo-Saxon race with Rome. Roman supremacy existed without a doubt; but it was a supremacy in rank, honour, and influence; one very different from that which subsequent history caused to be associated with the word.

On the 4th of June, 716, abbat Ceolfrid yielded himself to this tide, and in Bede's eye-witness account of the day we see the father and the flock of those times. We see likewise a piety not unsophisticated, and the forms of it such as suited the cloister more perhaps than the popular taste; forms which had probably been diffused by the founder of Jarrow and his friend Wilfrid the more easily, because the Christianity of England was at that period worked almost entirely from monastic centres. In the church of St. Mary and the church of St. Peter there was early mass, when "all present communicated." This over, the farewell services began. The whole brotherhood assembled in the church of St. Peter, and after the lighting of incense and the offering of prayer at the altar, the abbat holding the thurible pronounced the peace from the steps. As the congregation retired, the voice of weeping mingled with the litanies which they chanted. At the oratory of St. Lawrence over against the dormitory they re-assembled for the last time, and there the venerable man pronounced his farewell address, exhorting them to mutual love and the correction of faults in the spirit of the gospel, offering his pardon, craving theirs, and finally asking for their intercessions. They then proceed down to the river; there they exchange the kiss of peace; they kneel, and he offers prayer; a numerous suite accompanies him into the vessel which is to ferry them over, the deacons of the church attending with lighted tapers and the golden cross. They reach the opposite shore; he "adores the cross," mounts his horse, and six hundred brethren in the twin monastery have parted from their father. With so much heart evidently on both sides, why does the old man leave? Sacred memories of earlier days, when he was the companion of Benedict and the sharer of his enthusiasm, were fascinating his soul: "ad suae tamen diu desideratae quietis gaudia sancta pervenit; dum ea quae juvenem se adiiisse, vidisse, atque adorasse semper recordans exultabat." The sensuous religion of the day could not have been more pithily expressed than by those three words, "adiisse, vidisse, atque adorasse," and with this the pious Bede himself is in full sympathy. The pilgrimages of the 8th century, founded in piety of that complexion, could not exclude the scandals which Boniface deplored.

On Wednesday, June 7, Ceolfrid is still waiting for the vessel to begin her voyage, when a deputation from Wearmouth comes out announcing the election of Hwaetbert in his room, and bringing a letter from their abbat feelingly commending him to the pope. Ceolfrid confirms the election, and they return. Of the route he pursued we see but little. He appears to have been a full day upon the sea, and on land we must suppose that he travelled from one monastery to another, making a long stay at each, since in three months he had not accomplished half his pilgrimage. But whether moving or resting, he journeyed like a man going to his grave: the canonical hours of prayer were observed, and twice a day besides the psalter was chanted to him in regular course. He became too unwell to ride, and was carried in a horse litter; but even then daily mass was sung, and he made the offering "salutaris hostiae" to God, until within three days of his death. On Friday, Sept. 25, at about the third hour of the day, he reached Langres, and there at the tenth hour he died. On the day following he was buried "honorificè." It was a tearful funeral; and at its close the "more than 80 Angli," his fellow-pilgrims, returned home, except a few whom an inextinguishable affection still bound to his tomb in the strange town.

Ceolfrid was commemorated on Sept. 25 in the English calendar. The manuscript materials for his life may be seen in Hardy (Desc. Cat. i. 412-414). [C. H.]

CEOLHELM, one of four presbyters of the diocese of Dunwich, attesting an act of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803. (Kemble, C. D. No. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 547.)

[C. H.]

CEOLLA. [CELLACH.]

CEOLLACH, the second bishop of the Mercian church. He was a Scot by nation; appointed bishop by Oswy, whilst that king was still supreme in Mercia, before the end of the year 658; and, like his predecessor Diuma, was consecrated by Finan. His episcopate was very short; immediately, as it would seem, on the evacuation of Mercia by Oswy, he retired to Iona (Bed. H. E. iii. 21-24) in or about 659 (Anj. Sac. i. 425).

[S.]

In the Scotch Kalendars he appears as Colachus, Colathus, Ceolla, and Colace. (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 237, 299, 302; Retours, Aberdeen, No. 453.)

[J. G.]

CEOLMUND (1), the single abbat of the diocese of Selsey attesting an act of the council of Clovesho, Oct. 12, 803. Nothing is known of the monasteries within that diocese at this period. (Kemble, C. D. No. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 547, 548 n.; Birch, Fasti Monast. 57.)

[C. H.]

(2), the eleventh bishop of Hereford; he attests Mercian charters from 788 to 793 (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 621; Kemble, C. D. Nos. 153, 156, &c.).

[S.]

CEOLNODUS, abbat of St. Peter's, Chertsey, received a grant from Offa king of Mercia, issued in a synodal meeting at Acleah or Acle, i.e. Ockley in Surrey (Hadd. and St.), A.D. 787. (Kemble, C. D. No. 151; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 463, and note as to the genuineness of the charter; Birch, Fasti Monast. 57.)

[C. H.]

CEOLRED, king of the Mercians, 709-716. He was the son of the great Ethelred by his wife Osthrytha, the daughter of Oswy, and succeeded, in 709, on the resignation of his cousin Coenred. He fought a battle against Ini and the West Saxons at Wodnes-beorn in 715, but with doubtful result. It was on his way to visit Ceolred that Wilfrid died in 709 (Edd. V. Wilfr. c. 61). His reign is mentioned by St. Boniface as the period at which the privileges of the churches began to be attacked in England (ed. Jaffé, Ep. 59). He died at a banquet in 716, possessed, according to Boniface, by an evil spirit (ibid.). Boniface relates the story of a vision in which his soul was contested between angels and devils (ibid. Ep. 10). He was buried at Lichfield (A. S. C. 716). There is a spurious grant of Ceolred to Evesham, in Kemble (Cod. Dipl. No. 62). His widow, Werburga, is said to have died in 782 (A. S. C. 782).

[S.]

A previous great battle at Wodnes-beorn (A. S. C. ad an. 591) and the name Mons Wodeni (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 592) point to some strong position. Such Camden (ed. Gough, i. 87, 95) finds for it at Wanborough near Swindon, in north-east Wilts (on Ina's territory), and speaks of its old importance, Roman coins, and Saxon camp.

Two monasteries in the west, Tewkesbury and Deerhurst, if not a third at Bredon, all clustering together by the Severn, and Peckirk in Northamptonshire, are considered to have been founded in this reign (Birch, Fasti Monast. 7). No definite events besides in Mercia occur under Ceolred for the church historian (cf. Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, 284-300). The four sees of the kingdom remained as they were. Lichfield, in the centre, was still occupied by Hedda; on the western border there was Egwin at Worcester and Torthere at Hereford. At the opposite extremity of Mercia either Eadbert or Kenbert was bishop of Lindsey. The archbishop of Canterbury during this reign was Brihtwald. Ceolred was succeeded by Ethelbald. The variations of his name are CEOLRET, CELRED, CELRETH, CHELREDUS. No wife or children are attributed to him in Florence's Genealogy of the Mercian Kings (M. H. B. 630).

CEOLRET (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1640), king of Mercia. [CEOLRED.]

[C. H.]

CEOLUE, bishop, attests an undated charter of Coinwalch king of Wessex, marked spurious or doubtful by Kemble (C. D. No. 985); possibly intended for Ceollach.

CEOLULF, -FUS (Flor. Wig. Chron. in M. H. B. 541, 542, 544); CEOLUULF, -FUS, -PHUS (Flor. Wig. Chron. Append. in M. H. B. 639; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 657; Bede, H. E. Praefat. and v. 23, 24, edd. Smith, Stevenson, M. H. B., Moberly); CEOLWLF, -FUS (Flor. Wig. Chron. ed. Thorpe, i. 51, 54, 57, ed. M. H. B. 632; Hen. Hunt. Hist. in M. H. B. 726-734; Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1727, in M. H. B. 785; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 663), king of Northumbria. [CEOLWULF (1).]

[C. H.]

CEOLULFUS, CEOLUULFUS (Kemble, C. D. Nos. 120, 122, 123, 134, 137, 138, 139*, 140, 143, 145*, 152, 155, 156, 157, 159*, 161*, 162*, 164, 165, 167, nearly all charters of Offa king of Mercia, between A.D. 772 and 794 or 6, those marked * being considered spurious or doubtful; Sim. Dun. G. R. A. in M. H. B. 669; Flor. Wig. Chron. Append. M. H. B. 625), bishop of the Lindisfari. [CEOLWULF (2).]

[C. H.]

CEOLULFUS, sacerdos, attests a charter of Offa king of Mercia, A.D. 777. (Kemble, C. D. No. 131.)

[C. H.]

CEOLWULF (1), king of Northumbria from A.D. 729 to 737. He is chiefly known from the circumstance of Beda dedicating to him his Ecclesiastical History. "The most glorious Ceolwulf," the great writer calls him, an epithet due to the king's religious character rather than to any aptitude that he possessed for ruling (Hodgson, Hist. of Northumberland, i. pt. i. 99). In 734 Ceolwulf was the means of his cousin Eggerht being raised to the see of York, and of his seeking and receiving the long absent pallium (Simeon, Hist. Ecol. Dunelm. ii. cap. xviii.). In a well-known letter which Beda wrote to the new prelate he spoke in hopeful terms of the help which Ceolwulf would give him, and urged him to secure by his leave the appointment of the number of suffragans laid down of old by pope Gregory. Ceolwulf's reign was of a very chequered character. Beda closes his history in 731, describing the prosperity of the Northumbrian kingdom (H. E. v. 23). In the same year there seems to have been an insurrection, in which bishop Acca was banished, and Ceolwulf seized and forcibly tonsured, as if to mock his ecclesiastical tastes (Nor. Annates, apud Bedam, ed. Smith, p. 223; Simeon, De Gestis, p. 11, puts this a year later). In 737 (Simeon, p. 13) Ceolwulf gave up his kingdom and became a monk at Lindisfarne, to which monastery he was a rich benefactor (Hist. de S. Cuthberto, apud Simeonis Opp. i. 141; Simeon, Hist. Eccl. Dunelm. ii. cap. xvi.). One of the results of his munificence was that the monks were henceforward able to drink ale instead of milk. Ceolwulf died at Lindisfarne in 764. After a time his body was removed by bishop Egred to the church of Norham, and at a still later period his skull was taken to Durham, where it had a conspicuous place among the saintly relics, of which St. Cuthbert was the centre (ibid.; Simeon, de Gestis, p. 21). [J. R.]

Ceolwulf was the son of Cutha, the son of Cuthwine, and the seventh in descent from Ida (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 731; Hen. Hunt. in M. H. B. 727). Lappenberg makes him the son of Cuthwin. An earlier Ceolwulf of the West Saxons was the son of another Cutha (A. S. C. ad an. 597). It may here be remarked that the failure of the attempt to incapacitate Ceolwulf for the crown by a forcible act of tonsure shews that the superstition on this point, so strong in the Eastern empire, could not be relied on in Northumbria. Nor did it prevail in Kent in the days of Eadbert Præn.

On the death of his brother Coenred, a former king, Ceolwulf was set aside in favour of Osric; and since he afterwards appears as a man of literary tastes and acquisitions, we may conclude that he either spent the period of Osric's reign in the retirement of a monastery, or that he otherwise devoted himself to study. The fact of his cousin Egbert being a monastic student favours the idea; and as Bede visited Egbert in his retreat for the purpose of learned intercourse (Bede, Epist. ad Ecgb. ad init.), he may have become acquainted with Ceolwulf under similar circumstances. Osric before his death designated him ("decrevisset," Bede, H. E. v. 23) or adopted him (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 80) as his successor, a sufficient indication that Ceolwulf had not attempted to disturb the peace of his supplanter. The date of his accession is A.D. 731 in the Saxon Chronicle, which is the year given by Bede's Continuator for his forcible tonsure. Simeon's date is A.D. 729 (Sim. Dun. Hist. Eccl. Dun. c. xiii.).

Malmesbury observes that Ceolwulf had acquired a skill in letters by the close application of an active and studious mind; and he adduces as a proof of his literary merit that at a period when Britain particularly abounded in learned men Bede should have singled him out from all the Angli for the criticising of his history (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 80). It has been said that Bede undertook the composition of this work at Ceolwulf's request. But there appears no sufficient proof of this. What passed between them is clear from Bede's dedicatory Preface: "At your desire, O king, I most willingly send this Ecclesiastical History of the Anglian nation, which I lately published, as formerly to be read, so now to be copied and perused more fully at your leisure." Before its publication Ceolwulf revised the work; when it was published, he was allowed to make a copy of it for his own use. Here we get a hint as to how such learned works were "published" in those days, and we imagine Bede's manuscript going the round of courts and monasteries for the copies to be taken by those who desired to have them. From the compliments of this Preface we learn of the king's earnest attention to Holy Scripture; the deep interest with which he acquaints himself with the words and deeds of illustrious ancients, those of the Anglian nation especially; his anxiety to bring his subjects acquainted with them; the privilege of the people committed by God's providence to his rule. Here too is disclosed Bede's own ethical purpose in the production of his famous history, the attentive perusal of which amply confirms what he states. It was to revive the ancient piety in priests, bishops, monasteries, as well as people, in a degenerating age, and not simply to diffuse historical and antiquarian information. The great teacher's death in A.D. 735 was an event sufficient to mark this reign. It was but two years afterwards, A.D. 737 (Sim. Dun., A. S. C., Bed. Cont.), that Ceolwulf abdicated and "received St. Peter's tonsure" (A. S. C.). Bede's Continuator makes a point of recording that the king took this step of his own free will; while Henry of Huntingdon, dilating on the occurrence, tells us how it arose from Ceolwulf's intimacy with Bede and his constant meditation on those examples of royal abdication recorded in his work. Six previous instances are adduced by Huntingdon, Ceolwulf completing "the hebdomad of perfect kings:" Sigebert of East Anglia, Caedwalla of Wessex, Sebbi of the East Saxons, Ethelred of Mercia, Coenred of Mercia, Ina of Wessex. He forgets Offa of East Anglia. Four of these also went to Rome after abdicating—Caedwalla, Coenred, Offa, and Ina. The eight instances occurred within almost exactly a century, and reckoning from the second, which followed the first by half a century, we have seven royal abdications through motives of religion, though not all of them for monastic seclusion, within the space of another half-century. Among the retiring kings were some by no means inactive, unwarlike, or unsuccessful men, and the resignation of Ceolwulf's successor Eadbert, who also entered a monastery, was a national loss. It was a singular feature in the social condition of Northumbria that Ceolwulf's abdication was no isolated and individual eccentricity. For some reason there was at that time a general flocking towards the monasteries, and that from quarters where we should least look for monks. Simeon of Durham writes that when peace and tranquillity succeeded to the early misfortunes of the reign, many of the Northumbrians, nobles as well as private persons, laid aside their arms, accepted tonsure, and made their choice of a monastic life (Sim. Dun. Hist. Eccl. Dun. cap. xiii.). But it is not to be forgotten that the monastic life in England during the Heptarchy was not the close restraint of the Benedictine discipline. It was a much freer seclusion, and in fact Bede's own pen discloses abuses that were springing up in this respect (Bede, Ep. ad Ecgb. ed. Smith, p. 309; ed. Moberly, p. 399). Simeon and Bede may here be accepted as incidentally illustrating one another, and in a manner by no means pleasing to think of. The Epistle to Egbert, which was written after the Preface to Ceolwulf, was the dying testimony, "tanquam Baedae cygnea cantio," as Smith expresses it, of the pious historian of Jarrow, and discloses the general state of religion in Northumbria which the Historia Ecclesiastica was meant to improve, and before which Ceolwulf retired.

Adverting to Northumbrian ecclesiastical affairs during this short reign, we notice first that the kingdom remained divided into four sees, Lindisfarne, York, Hexham, Withern (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 731): the first was occupied by Ethelwold; the second by Wilfrid II. and Egbert; the third by Acca; the fourth by Pecthelm and Frithwald (Stubbs, Regist.). The restoration of the see of Galloway at Withern belongs to an uncertain date prior to A.D. 731 (Hadd. and Stubbs, iii. 310). The archbishops of Canterbury were Brihtwald, Tatwine, Nothelm, Cuthbert (Stubbs, Registrum). Beyond the important event of the reception of the pallium from Rome, which occurred now for the first time since the days of Paulinus and Edwin (Sim. Dun. H. E. D. c. xviii.; see also Bede, Ep. ad Egb.; Hadd. and Stubbs, iii. 312, 313), constituting the diocese of Northumbria a separate ecclesiastical province, no illustrative public measure is related. A monastic foundation is recorded, that of Elmete in the county of York (Birch, Fasti Monast. 7), as probably belonging to this reign.

Passing now with Ceolwulf from the palace to the monastery, from the rock of Bamborough to the island of Lindisfarne, we find him not going empty-handed. He "gave to St. Cuthbert his royal treasures and lands, that is to say, Bregesne and Werceworde, with their appurtenances, together with the church which he had built there, and four other vills also, Wudecestre, Hwittingham, Eadulfingham, and Eagwulfingham." Of these, Werceworde is now Warkworth; Bregesne is doubtful, but thought to be Brainshaugh in the parish of Warkworth, which is on the Coquet and near the sea. Wudecestre or Woodchester seems lost (Raine, North Durham, p. 68); the other three (two of them containing a portion of the donor's name) are easily recognised in Whittingham, Edlingham, and Eglingham; all of which, like Warkworth, are in the neighbourhood of Alnwick, and preserve in their modern ecclesiastical relations a memory of the distant past; for they are still in the patronage either of the see or of the chapter of Durham, the successor of Lindisfarne. Warkworth also is in episcopal patronage, that of the bishop of Carlisle. On the boundaries of the entire grant, see Leland (Collect. i. 370); Hutchinson (Northumb. 1776, ii. 139); Raine (North Durh. p. 68).

Of the monastic life of Ceolwulf we have no details. He was not abbat, since Lindisfarne was the seat of a bishop, who was himself the abbat. During the ex-king's residence the see was occupied for a short time by Ethelwold, but chiefly by Cynewulf. Ceolwulf outlived his successor's reign, and saw the recommencement of civil disturbances, for which the religious condition of the province quite prepares us. The Gens Anglorum in the north, when it produced its Church History, had reached its meridian. The saintliest pen of the age, supported by a sympathising king, had done what it could to mend the evils of which it testified. But a revival was not to be, and Ceolwulf's death marks the beginning of that national decline which must ever attend the fall of religion and morals. For above a century the powerful throne established by Edwin, Oswald, and Oswy had given promise of its occupants one day ruling a united Britain, but a career of final disorder and weakness was now beginning (cf. Sim. Dun. G. R. ad an. 758 sq.; H. E. D. c. 19 sq.), and the historical interest of the Heptarchy passes mainly into the other two great states, Mercia and Wessex. Ceolwulf died A.D. 760, according to the A. S. C. and Florence of Worcester. Simeon gives A.D. 764, describing the winter of that year such as had never been known for severity, destructiveness, and duration (G. R. ad an. 764, M. H. B. 663). The lasting winter of Northumbria's discontent had set in. The varieties of this king's name are CEOLULPHUS, CEOLULF, CEOLULF, CEOLWLF, CEOLF, CHELWULFUS. No wife or issue are assigned to him. [C. II.]

CEOLWULF (2) The seventh bishop of the Lindisfari, at Sidaacester. According to Simeon of Durham he was consecrated in 767, at the same time with Archbishop Ethelbert of York, on the 24th of April (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 663). His name appears miswritten "Edeulfus Lindensis Faronensis episcopus" among the attestations of the legatine synod of 787 (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 460), and is very frequently attached to Mercian charters from 767 to 796. The Anglo-Saxon Chronicle mentions his departure from the land (M. H. B. 338) and death (ib. 339) in the year of Offa's death, 796; see also Sim. Dun. ibid. 669. [S.]

CEONWALH (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, vol. i. 41), king of the West Saxons. [COINWALCH.] [C. H.]

CEORRA, deacon, attests a charter of Denbert bishop of Worcester, about A.D. 802. (Kemble, C. D. No. 181.) [C. H.]

CEOWLF (Gaimar, Estorie, v. 1913, M. H. B. 786), king of the West Saxons. [CYNEWULF.] [C. H.]

CEPHAS (Gal. ii. 11) was distinguished from Peter, and said to be one of the seventy disciples, by Clement of Alexandria in the fifth book of his Hypotyposes, as recorded by Eusebius (H. E. i. 12). Hence he appears in the list of the seventy ascribed to Dorotheus, and is specified as bishop of Cannia, but is omitted in the Latin version. In the Menology of Basil he is commemorated along with Sosthenes, Apollos, Tychicus, Epaphroditus, Caesar, and Onesiphorus, on Dec. 9, but nothing is said of him in the Synaxarium there given. Dr. Lightfoot refers to Jerome (t. vii. p. 408), Chrysostom (t. iii. p. 374) and Gregory the Great on Ezekiel (l. 2, hom. 6) as combating this supposition. The Armenian calendar commemorates Apollos and Cephas as disciples of Paul, Sept. 25 (Assemani, Bibl. Orient. iii. 648). Dr. Lightfoot also refers to the constitutions of the Egyptian church as representing him as one of the Twelve distinct from Peter (Galatians, p. 128). [E. B. B.]

CEPONIUS, a Gallician bishop, to whom, in A.D. 447, the bishop of Astorga sent his refutation of the Priscillianists, and who was ordered by pope Leo to assemble a council against them (Leo, Ep. 15, p. 711; Patrol. liv. 692, 693).

[E. B. B.]

CERA. [CIAR.]

CERASIANUS, bishop at the council of Sinuessa, A.D. 303 (Conc. i. 940). [E. B. B.]

CERATIUS, St. (or CERACIUS), of Simorra, bishop, said to have been born of a princely Burgundian family, and to have been a pupil of St. Ambrose, bishop of Milan. But in an ancient inscription in the church of Eause he is called a disciple of Saturninus Tolosanus episc. He is called St. Ceratius of Simorra, because his remains were translated to, and preserved in, the Benedictine monastery of St. Mary in Simorra. There is some doubt as to the precise diocese over which he ruled. By some writers he is called bishop of Eause, or Euse (Elusa), in Gascony, while others say that he was bishop of Grenoble. According to the biography given of him in the Bollandists, his title was "Episcopus Gratianopolitanus," or bishop of the ancient French district called "le Graisivaudan," comprising the basin of the Isère. Haureau (Gall. Christ. xvi. p. 221) mentions a Ceratus as 6th bishop of Gratianopolis.

He is said to have had a long dispute with one of the sect of the Saducaei, to whom he expounded the doctrine of the Holy Trinity, and whom he converted. On that account there arose against him a bitter persecution, which ended in driving him from his bishopric. He then fled with his two deacons, Gervasius and Protasius, to an obscure place in Gascony, called Saintes, where he won for himself great renown as a saint.

St. Ceratius is commemorated on the 6th June (AA. SS. Boll. Jun. i. 708). [D. R. J.]

CERAUNIA, wife of Namatius, to whom in the 6th century Riccius, bishop of Limoges, writes (Ep. 4, lib. ii.), to console her and her husband on the death of their daughter, and again (Ep. 14, ib.), when sending her a painter in his employ, for whose services she had asked. She seems at this time to have lost her husband also, and to have taken charge of some children (Patrol. lviii. 83, 94, 97). [E. B. B.]

CERAUNIUS, St. Bishop of Paris. This saint appears to have been bishop of Paris from 614 to 625, and it is said that he was present at the fifth council of Paris in 615 (Acta SS. Boll. Sept. vii. 485). [H. W. Y.]

CERAUNUS. [CARAUNUS.]

CERBAN (CORBANUS, CUIRBIN), bishop of Feart-Cearbain, at Teamhair, is given by Colgan (Acta SS. 473, c. 4) as one of St. Ciaran of Saighir's disciples, and is identified "dubio procul" with St. Corbanus, the friend of St. Mochteus (March 24), who is venerated as Cuirbin the Devout on July 20. Colgan calls him presbyter Corbanus, and says a church was dedicated to him in Galway, and named after him Kill-Corban. Feart-Cearbain, "The Grave of Cerban," was the name of a church, now entirely defaced, situated to the north-east of Tara Hill. He died A.D. 504 or shortly before, according to the Irish Annals. (Petrie, Hist. and Antiq. of Tara Hill, 290; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 419 sq.; Four Masters, by O'Donovan, 161 n.) [J. G.]

CERBONIUS, bishop of Populonium (Gregor. Magn. Dial. iii. 11). Divers miracles regarding him are there related. Gams (Series Episc. p. 755) assigns his appointment to the year 546 A.D. [E. B. B.]

CERCYLINUS, fabulous king of Corcyra, in the 1st century, under a Roman governor, Carpianus (Acts of Jason and Sosipator, Men. Basil. Apr. 27). [E. B. B.]

CERDIC, presbyter, attests a charter of Cynewulf king of the West Saxons, A.D. 759 (Kemble, C. D. No. 104). [C. H.]

CERDICE, king of the Britons, by whom Hereric and Breguid, the parents of Hilda, were exiled (Bede, H. E. iv. 23). It has been suggested (note on this passage, M. H. B. 236) that he may be the Certic king of Elmet, in Yorkshire, expelled by Edwin of Northumbria, who then occupied his dominions (Nennius, Hist., M. H. B. 76). The circumstance that Hilda belonged to the family of Edwin (M. H. B. 234 n.) countenances this suggestion. That the name of Cerdic was not uncommon in Elmet seems probable from an earlier Cerdicelmet, who also occurs in Nennius (M. H. B. 65). An identification with Ceretic of the Ann. Camb. who died A.D. 616, is also suggested in M. H. B. 236 n. The note of Mr. Moberly on the passage in Bede in his edition of this author, 1869, may be consulted. See also COROTICUS. [C. H.]

CERDO (1) (Κέρδων), a Gnostic teacher of the first half of the 2nd century, principally known as the predecessor of MARCION. Epiphanius (Haer. 41) and Philaster (Haer. 44) assert him to have been a native of Syria, and Irenaeus (i. 27 and iii. 4) states that he came to Rome in the episcopate of Hyginus. This episcopate lasted four years, and Lipsius (Chronologie der römischen Bischöfe) places its termination A.D. 139-141. Having in regard the investigations of M. Waddington concerning the year of Polycarp's martyrdom, we prefer the earlier date, if not a still earlier one, and are disposed to put Cerdo's arrival at Rome as early as A.D. 135. Eusebius in his Chronicle (Schöne, i. 168) places it under the last year of Hadrian, A.D. 137; Jerome substitutes a date three years later. So, likewise, Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 24) places the Roman activity of Cerdo under the reign of Antoninus.

According to the account of Irenaeus, Cerdo had not the intention of founding a sect apart from the church. He describes him as more than once coming to the church and making public confession, and so going on, now teaching his doctrine in secret, now again making public confession, now convicted in respect of his evil teaching, and removed from the communion of the brethren (ἀπιστάμενος τῆς τῶν ἀδελφῶν συνοδίας). Some understand this to mean that Cerdo voluntarily withdrew himself from communion, but we prefer to understand the word passively, with the old translator of Irenaeus, "abstentus est a religiosorum hominum conventu." It seems to have been an inaccuracy of Epiphanius that he gives a heading to a sect of Cerdonians. Preceding writers speak only of Cerdo, but not of Cerdonians; and it is probable that his followers were early merged in the school of Marcion, who is said to have joined him self to Cerdo soon after his arrival in Rome.

It does not appear that Cerdo left any writings, nor is there evidence that those who report to us his doctrine had any knowledge of it independent of the form it took in the teaching of his Marcionite successors. Consequently it is not possible now to determine with any certainty how much of the teaching of Marcion had been anticipated by Cerdo, or to say what points of disagreement there were between the teaching of the two. Hippolytus, in his Refutation (x. 19), makes no attempt to discriminate the doctrines of Cerdo and Marcion. Tertullian, in his work against Marcion, mentions Cerdo four times, but each time only as Marcion's predecessor. The account given by Irenaeus of the doctrine of Cerdo is that he taught that the God preached by the law and the prophets was not the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ; for that the former was known, the latter unknown; the former was just, the latter good. The account given by Pseudo-Tertullian (Haer. 16) may be regarded as representing that given in the earlier treatise of Hippolytus, which was also made use of by Philaster and Epiphanius. It runs that Cerdo introduced two first principles (ἀρχαί) and two gods, the one good, the other evil, the latter of whom was the creator of the world. Here we are to note the important difference that to the good god is opposed in the account of Irenaeus a just one; in that of Hippolytus, an evil one. In the later work of Hippolytus already cited, Cerdo is said to have taught three principles of the universe, ἀγαθόν, δίκαιον, ἔλην. Ps.-Tertullian goes on to say that Cerdo rejected the law and the prophets, and renounced the Creator, teaching that Christ was the son of the higher good deity, and that he came not in the substance of flesh but in appearance only, and had not really died or really been born of a virgin. He adds that Cerdo only acknowledged a resurrection of the soul, denying that of the body. Ps.-Tertullian adds, but without support from the other authorities, that Cerdo received only the Gospel of St. Luke, and that in a mutilated form; that he rejected some of Paul's epistles and some portions of others, and completely rejected the Acts and the Apocalypse. There is every appearance that Ps.-Tertullian here transferred to Cerdo what in his authority was stated of Marcion. For a discussion of his other doctrines we refer to the article on MARCION.

In the place already cited from the first book of Irenaeus, in which he speaks of the coming of Cerdo to Rome, all the MSS. agree in describing Hyginus as the ninth bishop from the apostles; and this reading is confirmed by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 11), by Cyprian (Ep. 74, ad Pompeium), and by Epiphanius. On the other hand, in the passage from the third book, though Eusebius here too reads "ninth," the MS. evidence is decisive that Irenaeus here describes Hyginus as the eighth bishop, and this agrees with the list of Roman bishops given in the preceding chapter, and with the description of Anicetus as the tenth bishop a couple of chapters further on. Lipsius hence infers that Irenaeus drew his account of Cerdo from two sources, in which Hyginus was differently described; but this inference is very precarious. In the interval between the composition of his first and third books, Irenaeus may have been led to alter his way of counting by the investigations concerning the succession of the Roman bishops which he had in the meantime either made himself or adopted from Hegesippus. As for the numeration "ninth," we do not venture to pronounce whether it indicates a list in which Peter was counted first bishop, or one in which Cletus and Anacletus were reckoned as distinct. [G. S.]

CERDO (2) Succeeded Abilius as bishop of Alexandria, in the year 98. He held the see eleven years, and was succeeded by Primus, in the year 109. (Euseb. H. E. iii. 21, iv. 1. Id. Chron. Armen. apud Hieron. sub anno 2113.) According to the legendary "Acts of St. Mark," Cerdo was one of the presbyters St. Mark ordained (Bolland. AA. SS. Apr. 25). [E. V.]

(3) A Manichean who taught his doctrines in the reign of Tacitus, according to Jo. Malalás (Chron. xii. p. 399). Hody (ad oc.) conjectures that it may possibly refer to Manes himself. [E. B. C.]

CEREALIS (1), a vicarius sent by Adrian to arrest the two brothers Getulus and Amantius, tribunes, Christians at Tivoli. He was converted by them, baptized by Sixtus I., arrested with them by one Licinius, and beheaded, June 10, circ. 124 (Tillemont, ii. 242; AA. SS. June 10, ii. 264).

(2) A soldier converted by his prisoner, pope CORNELIUS, and beheaded along with him; as also his wife Sabina, whom the pope had cured of palsy (Tillem. iii. 744, from Ado.).

(3) Consul at Rome (A.D. 358), praefect A.D. 353, sought the hand of St. Marcella in marriage, but she would not consent. (Hieron. Ep. lxxv. ed. Migne, or 127, ed. Vall. ad Principianum Viginem, cf. Godofred, ad Cod. Theod. lib. ix. tit. 25, l. 1, p. 196.)

(4) Commended by Paulinus of Nola to Rufinus (Ep. 47, p. 275; Patr. lxi. 389-98). [E. B. B.]

(5) AFER, bishop of Castellum in Numidia, the author of a libellus contra Maximinum Arianum. His own episcopal city and the neighbouring towns having been devastated in the religious war carried on by Hunneric and his nephew Gundamund against the Catholics, Cerealis took refuge in Carthage, c. 485, where he was confronted by Maximus, the Arian prelate of the Arimontanitae (or Ammonitae), who reproached him with the calamities which had fallen on those of the orthodox faith, as a proof of the displeasure of God. Being challenged by Maximus to prove the points at issue between the Arians and the orthodox from Scripture alone, he accepted the challenge on twenty assigned heads, each of which he demonstrated in favour of the Catholics by two or three quotations from the Bible. Maximus deferred his reply from day to day until he allowed judgment to go against him by default. (Gennadius, c. 96; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 460; Migne, Patrolog. lviii. 755-768; Tillemont, xvi. 516). [E. V.]

CEREALIS, or CERYALIS, one of the judges of PHOTINUS (Epiph. Haer. 71, p. 829). [G. S.]

CEREDIG, of Cardigan, Irish saint, son of Cunedda Wledig. [CORONICUS.]

CERENICUS, St., deacon of Civitas Sagi-orum (Séze), in the province of Lugdunensis Secunda, under the metropolitan of Rouen. Cerenicus or Serenicus and Srenedus were two brave men of illustrious families, sprung from the city of Spoletum (Spoleto, Spoleti), the capital of the province from which the name is derived, situate on the Maroggia, to the north of Rome. Cerenicus gave early signs of ability, and was entrusted by his parents to tutors, under whom he made extraordinary progress, and became saturated with apostolic doctrine.

When he grew up he was not content with the teaching of his former masters, but he and his friend Srenedus studied the Scriptures and the orthodox Fathers for themselves. The two friends are compared to bees collecting honey from various flowers.

Their next step was to carry out literally the injunction to forsake father, mother, and home, contained in St. Matt. x. 37, xix. 29, and with that view they went to Rome, where they were ordained deacons. In the Life of St. Seneredus it is stated that after a moderate time the pope ordained them both cardinals of the church, but this is supposed by the Bollandists to be a mistake, as the name of cardinal, if it then existed, only rose to a dignity after A.D. 1000.

At Rome Cerenicus had a vision, in which an angel appeared to him, urging him to carry out to perfection the resolution which he had made to leave father and mother: "It is not here that the Lord wishes you any longer to stay, but He indicates another place. For since for the love of Him you have given up your dear relations, you must not remain near them, but go farther west, where, having forgotten them, you may be able to give your mind up more freely to divine contemplation. Wherefore arise; you must, as a brave athlete, pursue victory to the end. The rewards are promised not indeed to him who begins, but to him who perseveres to the end."

Cerenicus communicated this order to his friend, and they immediately obeyed it by quitting Rome and crossing the Alps. After much difficulty they arrived in Gaul, travelled through many cities, and visited many shrines, fully persuaded that the farther they went from home the nearer they approached heaven. For a time they lived at Mayence, "a very fertile country, conspicuous for long-lived persons;" but Cerenicus, feeling that this pleasant land was not his destination, bade farewell to his companion, and set out alone, in quest of a place more favourable to contemplation, austerity, and solitude. His destination appears to have been Hiesmes in Normandy, where he adopted a little boy named Flavardus, who became his disciple.

Cerenicus lived to an old age, and was buried in the church of St. Martin, which he had founded, and which was afterwards called after his own name.

At that time Clotaire reigned over Gaul, and his wife Balthildis piously raised a sepulchre over the remains of Cerenicus. It is said that there was a cathedral formerly at Hiesmes, and that the see was afterwards translated to Séze.

Cerenicus founded the monastery of Cenoma-num (Le Mans), and had 140 disciples. When this monastery was pillaged by Charles Martel and his soldiers, they were attacked, routed, and many of them killed by the bees of the monastery.

Several churches were dedicated to Cerenicus, and Odericus Vitalis mentions a Castrum Sancti Serenici as a stronghold in the days of the Dukes of Normandy.

He lived towards the end of the 7th century, and is commemorated on the 7th May (AA. SS.
Boll. May, ii. pp. 162-166; Du Saussay, Martyrolog. Gallic., Paris, 1637; Johannes Bondonnetus, Hist. Episcop. Cenomanor.; Ordericus Vitalis, Hist. Eccl. iii. p. 464). [D. R. J.]

CERETIC (1) of Cardigan, son of Cunedda
Wledig, Irish saint. [COROTICUS.]

(2) Died A.D. 616, Ann. Camb. in M. H. B. 832.
[CERDICE.] [C. H.]

CERETIUS, a bishop who writes to Augustine, sending him two books which had been recommended to him by one Argyrius. Augustine found them to be Priscillianist writings, and to include an apocryphal hymn said to have been sung by Christ and His disciples before they went out to the Mount of Olives (Aug. Ep. 237 (253), ii. 1034).

(2) The above may be the same as the bishop who in A.D. 441 signs the canons of the council of Orange, and who writes, in conjunction with Salonius and Veranus, to pope Leo, begging him to correct their copy of his letter to Flavian, and making any additions that occurred to him, and thanking him for the ability with which he provided for the prevention, as well as the cure, of heresy (Conc. iii. 1434, 1452). [E. B. B.]

CERICUS (Acta SS. June, iii. 17), infant martyr. [CYRICUS.] [C. H.]

CERINTHUS. Among the traditional opponents of the teaching of St. John is Cerinthus.
Tradition associates with his name facts which, if exaggerated, are yet sufficient to establish his existence, and opinions historically consonant with the stirring thoughts of the age in which he is placed. It will probably always remain an open question whether the fundamentally Ebionite sympathies of this man inclined him to accept Jewish rather than Gnostic additions. Modern scholarship has therefore preferred to view his doctrine as a fusing together and incorporating in a single system tenets collected from Jewish, Oriental, and Christian sources; but the nature of that doctrine is sufficiently clear, and its opposition to the instruction of St. John as decided as that of the Nicolaitan.

Cerinthus was of Egyptian origin, and in religion, whether by proselytism or birth it is impossible to tell, a Jew. He received his education in the Judæo-Philonic school of Alexandria. On leaving Egypt he visited Jerusalem, Caesarea, and Antioch. Tradition has not left his visits to these cities unnoticed. Thus, he is "one of the circumcision" who contended with St. Peter, rebuking him for his breach of the law in eating with Cornelius and uncircumcised men (Acts xi. 2): he is one of the unauthorised self-appointed propagandists who went out from Jerusalem "troubling with words" the Gentile brethren in Antioch (Acts xv. 1, 23-4): he and his fellow-thinkers are the authors of the disturbance raised in Jerusalem against St. Paul, for his alleged introduction of the polluting presence of Trophimus the Ephesian into the sacred precincts of the Temple (Acts xxi. 27):

he and his fellow-workers are the ψευδοπρόστολοι (2 Cor. xi. 13), the παρείσακτοι ψευδοδιδάσκαλοι (Gal. ii. 4), so hateful to St. Paul and his brother-missionaries. Again, according to tradition, his antagonism to St. Paul is undisguised: he scornfully rebukes the Apostle for preaching—"If ye be circumcised, Christ shall profit you nothing. Christ is become of no effect unto you, whosoever of you are justified by the law; ye are fallen from grace" (Gal. v. 2-4): he vilifies martyrdom, and honours the traitor Judas: he rejects the Acts of the Apostles and all the Gospels except that of St. Matthew. Even that Gospel does not entirely satisfy him, and he will only accept it in a form mutilated like that of the 'Gospel to the Hebrews': he excludes the history of the miraculous conception of Christ, but admits the opening genealogy of the Gospel because it confirms his Christological views: he quotes from it the Master's words, "It is enough for the disciple that he be as his Master," &c. (Matt. x. 25), as an argument in behalf of circumcision and of the observance of the law against the obnoxious "freedom" of the Pauline school.

From Palestine Cerinthus passed into Asia and there developed τῆς αὐτοῦ ἀπωλείας βάρβαρον (Epiph. xxviii. 2). Galatia, according to the same authority, was selected as his head-quarters; and from thence he went out circulating his errors. On one of his journeys he arrived at Ephesus, and met St. John in the public baths. The Apostle, hearing who was there, fled from the place as if for life, crying to those about him: "Let us flee, lest the bath fall in while Cerinthus, the enemy of the truth, is there." History and tradition are alike silent about the close of his life (Irenaeus, the 'Philosophumena,' Theodoret, Epiphanius, Philastrius, Eusebius).

The value of these traditions is confessedly not great; that for instance of the meeting with St. John in the bath is worthless, it being told of "Eblion" as well as of Cerinthus: but a stratum of fact probably underlies them, and they are at least indications of the feeling with which the early "Churchmen" regarded him. Epiphanius, in whose work the majority are preserved, derived the principal portion of his statements partly from Irenaeus, and partly, as Lipsius has shewn with high probability, from the now lost earlier work of Hippolytus on heresies.

To turn from the man to his doctrines. These may be conveniently collected under the heads of his conception of the Creation, his Christology, and his Eschatology. His opinions upon two of these points, as preserved in existing works, support the view now usually current that Cerinthus rather than Simon Magus is to be regarded as the predecessor of Judæo-Christian Gnosticism.

Unlike Simon Magus and Menander, Cerinthus did not claim for himself a sacred and mystic power. Caius the Presbyter can only assert against him that he pretended to angelic revelations (Eusebius, Theodoret). But his mind, like theirs, brooded over the co-existence of good and evil, spirit and matter; and his scheme seems intended to free the "unknown God" and the Christ from the bare imputation of infection through contact with nature and man. Trained as he was in the philosophy of Philo, the Gnosis of Cerinthus did not of necessity compel him to start from opposition—in the sense of malignity—of evil to good, matter to spirit. He recognised opposition in the sense of difference between the one active perfect principle of life—God, and that lower imperfect passive existence which was dependent upon God; but this opposition fell far short of malignity. He therefore conceived the material world to have been formed not by "the First God," but by angelic Beings of an inferior grade of Emanation (Epiph.). More precisely still he described the main agent as a certain Power (δύναμις) separate and distinct from the "Principality" (ἡ ὑπὲρ τὰ ὅλα αὐθεντία, v. Suicer, Theos. s. v. αὐθ.) and ignorant of τὸν ὑπὲρ πάντα θεόν. He refused in the spirit of a true Jew to consider the "God of the Jews" identical with that author of the material world who was alleged by Gnostic teachers to be inferior and evil. He preferred to identify him with the Angel who delivered the Law (Epiph. and Philastr.). Neander and Ewald have pointed out the legitimate deduction of these tenets from the teaching of Philo. The conception is evidently that of an age when hereditary and instinctive reverence for the Law served as a check upon the system-maker. Cerinthus is a long way from the bolder and more hostile schools of later Gnosticism.

The Christology is of an Ebionite cast and replete with traits of the same transition character. It must not be assumed that it is but a form of the common Gnostic dualism, the double-personality afterwards elaborated by Basilides and Valentinus. Epiphanius, who is the chief source of information, is, to many, a mere uncritical compiler, sometimes following Hippolytus, sometimes Irenaeus. Now it is Christ who is born of Mary and Joseph (Epiph. xxviii. 1), now it is Jesus who is born like other men, born of Joseph and Mary; He differs from others only in being more righteous, more prudent, and more wise; it is not till after Baptism when Jesus has reached manhood, that Christ, "that is to say, the Holy Spirit in the form of a dove," descends upon Jesus from above (ἤνωθεν ἐκ τοῦ ἁνω Θεοῦ ἀπὸ τῆς ὑπὲρ τὰ ὅλα αὐθεντίας, Iren.), revealing to Him and through Him to those after Him the "unknown Father." If, as Lipsius thinks (p. 119), Irenaeus has here been influenced by the later Gnostic systems, and has altered the original doctrine of Cerinthus, as given in Hippolytus, that doctrine would seem to be that he considered "Jesus" and "Christ" titles given indifferently to that One Personality Which was blessed by the descent of the Holy Spirit, the Power on high (ἡ ἤνωθεν δύναμις). This Power enables Jesus to perform miracles, but forsakes Him at His suffering, "flying heavenwards." Again: it is Jesus, according to one passage of Epiphanius, Who dies and rises again, the Christ being spiritual and remaining impassible; according to a second, it is Christ Who dies, but is not yet risen, nor shall He do so till the general Resurrection. The same confusion suggests the same explanation, and adds another paragraph to the history of "variation" in doctrine. That passage, however, which allows that the human body of Jesus had been raised from the dead separates its author completely from Gnostic successors.

The Chiliastic eschatology of Cerinthus is very clearly stated by Theodoret, Caius, Dionysius (Euseb.), and Augustine, but is not alluded to by Irenaeus. His silence need perhaps cause no surprise: Irenaeus was himself a Chiliasm of the spiritual school, and in his notes upon Cerinthus he is only careful to mention what was peculiar to this system. The conception of Cerinthus was highly coloured. In his "dream" and "phantasy" the Lord shall have an earthly kingdom in which the elect are to enjoy pleasures, feasts, marriages, and sacrifices. The capital of this kingdom is Jerusalem and its duration 1000 years: at the end of that period shall ensue the restoration of all things. Cerinthus derived this notion from Jewish sources: neither Christianity nor philosophy could dispossess him of his convictions as a Jew. His notions of eschatology are radically Jewish: they may have originated, but they do not contain, the Valentinian notion of a spiritual marriage between the souls of the elect and the Angels of the Pleroma.

One or two peculiar features of his teaching still remain to be noticed. He held that if a man died unbaptized another was to be baptized in his stead and in his name, that at the day of resurrection he might not suffer punishment and be made subject to the ἐξουσία κοσμοπόιοι (cf. 1 Cor. xv. 29). He had learned at Alexandria to distinguish between the different degrees of inspiration, and attributed to different Angels the dictation severally of the words of Moses and of the Prophets; in this agreeing with Saturninus and the Ophites. He insisted upon a partial observance of the "divine" Law, such as circumcision and the ordinances of the Sabbath; resembling, in this severance of the genuine from the spurious elements of the Law, the school which produced the 'Clementina' and the 'Book of Baruch.' He did not even scruple (acc. to Epiph.) to call him who gave the Law "not good," though the epithet may have been intended to express a charge of ethical narrowness rather than an identification of the Lawgiver with the πρωτόπρος of Marcion.

Epiphanius admits that the majority of these opinions rest upon report and oral communication: they have consequently little claim to critical value. It was no uncommon practice to attach to some prominent man views which were not really his, but which, existing in sects Judaistic or Gnostic, were equally opposed to the opinions of the chronicler. This fact, coupled with the evident confusion of the statements recorded, must always make it difficult to assign to Cerinthus any certain place in the history of heresy. He can only be regarded generally as a link connecting Judaism and Gnosticism. It is possible that the traditional relations of Cerinthus to St. John have done more to rescue his name from oblivion than his opinions. Allusion has been already made to the meeting at the baths: in the course of time popular belief asserted that St. John had written his Gospel specially against the errors of Cerinthus, a belief curiously travestied by the counter-assertion that not St. John but Cerinthus himself was the author not only of the Gospel but of the Apocalypse. It is not difficult to account on subjective grounds for this latter assertion. The Chiliasm of Cerinthus was an exaggeration of language current in the earliest ages of the Church; and, of all the volumes of the sacred Canon, no work reproduced that language so ingenuously as the Apocalypse. The conclusion was easy: Cerinthus was in reality the author, he had but ascribed the Apocalypse to the Apostle to obtain credit and currency for his forgery. The "Alogi" argued upon similar grounds against the fourth Gospel. It did not agree with the Synoptists, and though it disagreed in every possible way with the alleged doctrines of Cerinthus, yet the false-hearted author of the Apocalypse was certainly the writer of the Gospel.

The followers of Cerinthus, known by the name of Merinthians as well as Cerinthians, do not appear to have struggled through a very long existence. If any are identical with the Ebionites mentioned by Justin (Dial. c. Tryph. 48), some of his followers gradually diverged from their master in a retrograde direction (Dorner, p. 320); but the majority were engulfed in sects of greater note. One last allusion to them is found in the ecclesiastical rule applied to them by Genadius Massiliensis: "Ex istis si qui ad nos venerint, non requirendum ab eis atrum baptizati sint an non, sed hoc tantum, si credant ecclesiae fidem, et baptizentur ecclesiastico baptisate" (De Eccles. Dogmatibus, 22; Oehler, i. 348).

The literature upon Cerinthus is summed up in the following primary and secondary authorities: Irenaeus adv. Haer. i. cp. xxv. (Lat.) (i. 253, ii. 725, 867, ed. Stieren), cp. xxi. (Gk.) CERNACH, CERNATH. [CAIRNECH (1).]

CERO, monk of St. Gall. [KERO.]

CERTIC (Nennius, Hist., M. H. B. 76), king of Elmet. [CERDICE.]

[C. H.]

CETHECH, bishop of Cill-garadh—June 16. He is usually known as St. Patrick's bishop. His father belonged to Meath, and his mother was of the race of Oilidus or Tirellil: he was born at Domnagh Sarige, near Duleek, and when St. Patrick was going westward through Roscommon, he gave the church of Cill-garadh to St. Cethech, who was afterwards buried there at the end of the 5th century: he had many churches under his charge. Benignus is said to have been a brother, but with little probability. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 135, 136, 176, 267; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. i. 244–6, 258; Reeves, Ecccl. Ant. 137.) [J. G.]

CETHEGUS, patricius of Sicily, informed by Pelagius I. (Patrol. lxxix. 414) of the ordination of a bishop of Catania, and of a married bishop, with much delay and many cautions, as no other could be found, for Syracuse. [E. B. B.]

CETHUBERIS, CETUMBRIA, ETHEMBRIA. A virgin whom Joceline, in his Life of St. Patrick (c. 79) calls Cethuberis, and afterwards (in c. 188). Ethembria, and whose name assumes a great multiplicity of forms, as Cectamaria, Cectumbria, and perhaps Eadhmail, &c., is said to have been the first who received the veil of virginity in Ireland from St. Patrick at her monastery of Druim Duchain, near Clogher. She is supposed by some to be the "una benedicta Scotta," alluded to in St. Patrick's Confession, and by others to be St. Cinna (Feb. 1). (Colgan, Acta SS. 235, c. 4, and Tr. Thaum. 83, c. 79, 107, c. 188, 112, n. 82; Todd, St. Patrick, 381; Lanigan, Ecccl. Hist. Tr. i. 266.) [J. G.]

CEWYDD AB CAW, Welsh saint of the 6th century, founder of Aberedw and Diserth in Radnorshire, and of Llangewydd, an extinct church near Bridgend in Glamorganshire. (Rees, Welsh Saints, 230.) [C. H.]

CHAD of Wessex. [CEADDA.]

CHAD (A. S. C. ad an. 664, tr. Ingram); CHADDE (MS. Life attributed to Robert of Gloucester, Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 277), bishop of Lichfield. [CEADDA.] [C. H.]

CHADOENUS, ST., bishop of Le Mans. He is also called Caduindus, Clodoenus, Harduinus, Hadwinus, Chadoin, Hardoin. He was 12th or 13th bishop of Le Mans, about the year 623. He was present at the council of Rheims, A.D. 625. His will and a charter given by him to the monastery of Anisolum are to be found in vol. lxxx. of the Patrol. Lat. p. 567.

Mention is also made of him in the council of Cabillon, A.D. 644, where abbat Chagnoald represented him. (Gallia Christiana, xiv. p. 349; Le Coigne, Annal. Ecccl. Franc. vol. iii. ad ann. 644 and 653.) He died in 653, and is commemorated on August 20, the day of his death. [D. R. J.]

CHAENULFUS. A letter of his exists addressed to Desiderius, bishop of Cahors from A.D. 629–654. (Migne, Patrol. Lat. tom. lxxvii. p. 262; Ceillier, xi. 734.) [W. M. S.]

CHAEREMON (1) (Χαρήμων), aged bishop of Nilus, fled from the Decian persecution to the Arabian mountains with his wife, and could never be heard of more (Dionys. Alex. ad Fabium; Euseb. vi. 42). [E. B. B.]

CHAEREMON (2), Deacon of Alexandria. Faustus, Eusebius, and he were the only three left alive by the plague, and accompanied DIONYSIUS, when he came before Aemilian, in the time of Valerian. He is commemorated along with him, Oct. 4, in the Menology of Basil, and represented as surviving backwards till the time of Decius, when he was beaten to death. The rest of the legend seems to belong rather to Eusebius (Eus. H. E. vii. 11). [E. B. B.]

(3) ST., recluse, probably lived in the 4th or 5th century, or in both, as he died at the age of 100 years, the greater part of which he spent in seclusion in the wilderness of Mount Scete in Libya. The memory of this saint is chiefly confined to the Greeks, who commend him as a pattern of patient labour.

There is a short chapter on him in Palladius (Hist. Lausiaca, cap. xcii. § 765, Patrol. Lat. lxxiii. p. 1185. The Bollandists cite Petrus de Natalibus (xi. cap. 57), who calls the recluse Theron, and says he was so bent with age and prayer that he crawled on the ground like an infant. They also cite Monumenta Ecclesiae Graecae (ed. Cotelierus), tom. i. p. 707, among Apophthegmata Patrum, to the effect that the cell of Chaeremon was forty miles from a church and twelve miles from any water.

Commemorated on the 16th August (AA. SS. Boll. Aug. iii. p. 291). [D. R. J.]

CHAGNOALDUS, ST., sixth bishop of Laon. Called also Chainoaldus, Chanoaldus, Agnoaldus, Cainaldus, Rainaldus, Hagnoaldus, and Chagnulfus. The same saint appears to be referred to in an ancient MS., under the name of Eudoaldus alias Lugdnensis Oudoaldus, as bishop of Lyons, for no St. Eudoaldus or Oudoaldus occurs amongst the bishops of that diocese, although Chagnoaldus does. This remark is extracted from AA. SS., but Chagnoaldus was Episcopus Landunensis, not Lugdnensis, i. e. of Landun or Laon, not of Lyons. (Jacobus Severtius, Chronologia Historica Archiep. Lugdun. num. 39, and 1, 2, and 3; Jonas and Bede agree in this opinion.) The explanation is that Landunum was often called Lugdunum by the ancients, as may be seen in Adriani Valesii Notitia Galliarum. He is commemorated on the 6th September, but in several calendars different days are assigned to him, e. g. in the ancient MS. calendar of the Benedictine Saints the 31st Jan., in another the 8th Feb. Gabriel Bucelinus in the Menologium Benedictinum commemorates him twice, first on the 23rd Aug., and then on the 6th Sept. In the Benedictine Martyrology his death is commemorated on the 23rd August, and no mention is made of the 6th Sept. In the Index Sanctorum he is put down for 23rd Aug. and 6th Sept. In the Martyrologium Gallicanum 6th Sept.

His father, who was called Hagnericus, Chagnericus, or Agnericus, was a very powerful count of Burgundy, and, according to Mabillon, his ancestors were Burgundofarones, i. e. barons of Burgundy (Sec. 2, Benedict. p. 438). His mother's name was Leodegundis, "pari nobilitate," and much commended for her piety and wisdom. He had two brothers, Faro or Burgundofaro, bishop of Meaux, and Walbertus, and one sister, St. Fara, with whom he entered the monastery of Luxeuil, and made great progress in his studies. What dignity St. Walbertus or Waldebertus held is uncertain. Some writers make him successor to St. Eustasius, as abbat of Luxovium (Jonas, p. 625), when Eustasius died in 665, but the Bollandists think he was bishop of Meaux. In the monastery of Luxeuil Chagnoaldus had, as his preceptors, two eminent ecclesiastics, St. Eustasius and St. Columbanus. Not much is known of him while under these saints, except where he is mentioned here and there in the lives of the abbats, from which he appears to have been distinguished for his sanctity from his earliest years. Mabillon says that in those days the abbats were accustomed to have one of the monks to serve them (Mabill. tom. i. annal. ad annum 610), and it appears that Chagnoaldus was not only a disciple but also servant to Columbanus, and that it was part of his duty to be always present with the abbat, even when he retired into the desert. On these occasions he was witness to the virtues of his master, and learned to attract the birds and wild beasts. His fellow servants were a little boy, Domvalis, and also Eustasius himself.

In 610 Columbanus was sent into exile by Theodoric, king of Burgundy, instigated by his wife Brunichildis. Chagnoaldus then, probably, remained at Luxeuil, as according to the royal edicts, no one, unless he happened to be a Briton or a Scot (qui Scotus aut Britannus non esset), was allowed to follow the abbat to his place of exile. After the banishment of Columbanus, the monks of Luxeuil were strictly confined to their monastery, until, through the intercession of St. Agilus, Theodoric and Brunichildis revoked the order. As soon however as the royal edict forbidding the monks to leave the monastery had been repealed, Chagnoaldus, in company with Eustasius, followed his master into exile.

About this time Columbanus visited Chagne-ricus, the father of Chagnoaldus, by whom he was kindly received. It was during this visit that he blessed the whole family, and received the profession of Burgundofara or St. Fara, the sister of Chagnoaldus. Hence Columbanus, and with him Chagnoaldus, went to Brigantia (Briganza), where they remained till A.D. 612, when Theodoric, king of Austrasia, was killed by his brother Theodoric, king of Burgundy, by order of Brunichildis.

In 613 Columbanus went to Italy, and Chagnoaldus to Luxeuil, where Eustasius occupied the place of the abbat. Here Fara had established a sisterhood under the rule of Columbanus, who had sent Eustasius from Italy to be their director, and the latter ordered Chagnoaldus and his brother Waldebertus to undertake the building of the new monastery, over which their sister was to preside. This monastery was called Farae monasterium, and afterwards Faremoutier (Bourg de Brie, Seine-et-Marne), of the order of Benedictines, and when Eustasius went on his mission to Clotharius, Chagnoaldus was placed in charge of the monastery. [FARA, ST.] Chagnoaldus was made bishop of Laon, probably in A.D. 619, while Theodericus was bishop of Lyons. (Gall. Car. tom. iv. col. 39.)

The first mention of him as bishop is in the synod of Rheims, at which, according to Flodoardus, he was present. But this synod was held about A.D. 625 (Le Coite, Ann. l.) He was still living in 631; for on the 22nd November of that year, he subscribed the charter of cession made by St. Eligius in favour of the Benedictine monastery of Solignac (Solemiacensis), of which St. Remaclus was then head.

He died the year after signing this charter, as Le Coite gathers from a letter of bishop Paulus of Verdun, to St. Desiderius bishop of Cahors, in which the death of Chagnoaldus is announced.

The charter above referred to was signed x. Kal. Dec. anno x. regni Dagoberti, while the will of St. Burgundofara was made in the 5th year of the reign of Dagobertus, 26th October, 632. That will mentions "Chagnulfus" as a consenting party, and Mabillon thinks that Chagnulfus = Chagnoaldus (Mabill. tom. i. annal. ad annum 614, num. 10). If this be true, Le Coite is not right in fixing the death of the saint on 6 Sept. 632. Mabillon thinks he died in August (tom. i. annal. ad annum 632, num. 29). The Bollandists appear to consider the date doubtful, but think it probable, after examining the best authorities, that Chagnoaldus died in 632, certainly between 631 and 638. He is supposed to have died of apoplexy, and was buried in the Benedictine monastery of St. Vincent, not far from his own episcopal city, and in that monastery, which was in ancient times the mausoleum of the bishops of Laon, the relics of the saint were preserved (AA. SS. Boll. Sept. ii. pp. 689-692, and Gallia Christiana, ix. 510). [D. R. J.]

CHAIL, Coptic bishop. [COPTIC CHURCH.]

CHALCEDONIUS, abbat (probably the first) of Viviers, one of the twin monasteries established by Cassiodorus (A.D. circa 469-563), who was chancellor and prime minister of Theodoric, king of Italy, and afterwards himself abbat of Viviers. The two monasteries were within one cloister; Viviers was for cenobites, Castel for anchorets. In his Institution addressed to the two abbats, Cassiodorus styles them both men of great sanctity. Viviers had gardens watered by several streams, abundance of fish from the sea and the little river Pellene, mills, and baths for the sick. (Cassiodorus, de Instit. cap. xxxii., Patrol. Lat. lxx. p. 1147, § 556; Ceillier, xi. 234, 235.) [W. M. S.]

CHALCIDIA, a Christian lady, residing probably at Antioch, to whom Chrysostom addressed several letters during his exile, expressing a very warm and long-standing attachment and the most affectionate solicitude for her health, which was very feeble, and for the troubles brought upon her by her fidelity to his cause. These letters are sometimes addressed to Chalcidia separately, sometimes conjointly with Asyncritia, with whom she was united by the closest ties of friendship if not of relationship. From the deep concern manifested by these ladies in the persecutions suffered by Constantius at the hands of Porphyrius of Antioch, the conjecture has been hazarded by Tilemont that they may have been very nearly related to him, perhaps his mother and sister. Chalcidia and Asyncritia were desirous of visiting Chrysostom at Cucusus, but were deterred by the severity of the winter, and by the danger of falling into the hands of the Isaurian marauders (Chrysost. Epist. 242). Chrysostom wrote to Chalcidia from Arabissus in the spring of 406, consoling her under some very severe trial, which surpassed those in which her life from its commencement had been spent (ib. 105). It is probable that the trial referred to was the persecution of Constantius and his friends by Porphyry. Chrysostom's warm affection for Chalcidia breathes in every line of his letters, which always contain the request that she will write often, and send news of her health and circumstances (Chrysost. Epist. 29, 39, 60, 76, 98, 105, 242). [E. V.]

CHALCIDIUS, a translator of, and author of a commentary on the Timæus of Plato, printed at the end of Hippolytus, in the Spicilegium Patrum Tertii Saeculi, by J. A. Fabricius, Hamburg, 1718. His commentary was undertaken at the instigation of one Hosius. If this was the great Hosius, bishop of Cordova, we may approximately fix his date, c. 330. But this identification is doubtful. The faith of Chalcidius is also very uncertain; but he is usually classed among Christian writers, although there is no allusion to his religion in his commentary. (Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 199.) [E. V.]

CHALDAEAN CHRISTIANS. [NESORIANS.]

CHAM or HAM, son of Noah; prophecies attributed to him were used by the Valentinians, and by Pherecydes (Clem. Alex. Strom. vi. 6 fin.). [E. B. B.]

CHAMMAK is a name which is frequently found in the designation of churches in the west of Scotland, indicating the existence of a local saint of that name, or more probably Coman. (Orig. Par. Scot. ii. 29 sq.; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 299.) [J. G.]

CHANEMUNDUS, ST., Chaquemundus, Chaumond, Chaumont or Hannemond. [DALFINUS, St., bishop of Lyon.] [D. R. J.]

CHAPTERS, THE THREE. [MONOPHYTES. JUSTINIAN I.]

CHARACHAR, a cat-faced archon presiding over the second division of the place of punishment. [PISITIS SOPHIA, p. 320.] [G. S.]

CHARALAMPES or CHARILAMPES, (1) Bishop of Magnesia, stripped of his priestly attire and flayed alive. The prefect Lucian tried to tear him with his own hands, and his hands were cut off then and there (through his eagerness and the awkwardness of his men, we may suppose), and we are told that the saint prayed and made him whole. The licitor Porphyrius, and Adametus, and three women who saw it, thereupon believed, but the ungrateful prefect had them all beheaded. The story has evidently grown a little. The circumstances seem to belong to the persecution of Diocletian, but it is referred to that of Severus, A.D. 198 (Men. Basil.), Feb. 10. [E. B. B.]

CHARALAMPES (2) Martyr at Nicomedia, with Eusebius, Romanus, Mentius, and Christina, and many others probably, in the persecution of Diocletian, May 30 (Men. Basil.). [E. B. B.]

CHARARIC, ST. A king (probably of the Morini; Malebranche, ii. 38) dethroned by Clovis and ordained priest, his son being at the same time ordained deacon. Clovis was enraged because in the struggle between him and Siagrius Chararic had remained neutral. It would appear that they were ordained against their will; for during a conversation between father and son, the young prince, in order to console him, said: "These hairs which have been cut off (referring to the tonsure) are only the leaves and branches of a green tree, which will sprout again in time, and I only hope that he who has brought us to this condition may soon perish." Clovis, to whom these words were reported, immediately sent and had the two princes beheaded. (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. II. cap. 41, § 98, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. p. 253; Ceillier, tom. xi. p. 395.) [D. R. J.]

CHARAUNUS. [CARAUNUS.]

CHARENTINUS, 8th bishop of Cologne, called also CHARETERNUS. He succeeded Domitian, and was followed by Ebregeisilus. The date assigned to him is 570, and he is commemorated by Fortunatus in an elegiac poem, which praises his virtues, his kindness to all, his watchfulness, his splendid character, his zeal in restoring and beautifying churches, the serene tranquillity of his mind, the sweetness of his conversation, the refreshing brightness of his face. (Gall. Chr. iii. pp. 624, 625; Venantius Fortunatus, Miscell. cap. xix., Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. p. 140.) [D. R. J.]

CHARIATHO (1), one of the bishops addressed (A.D. 452) by Leo of Bourges, Victorius of Le Mans, and Eustochius of Tours, in a letter ordaining that, as the emperors have given the bishops the power of judging civil cases, ecclesiastics shall appeal to them, and never to lay judges, under pain of excommunication. The teaching of the letter was adopted in a council held at Angers next year in which Chariatho took part. (Tillem. xvi. 394; Labbe, Conc. iii. 1420, iv. 1020.) [E. B. B.]

(2) The name occurs in the Mart. Hieron. as belonging to a martyr in Syria with Martin and Peter, March 5, and to a martyr at Rome, with Stercorius, Clement, Julian, Emeritus, &c., July 25. [E. B. B.]

CHARIBERT (CARIBERT), the second of the four sons of Clotaire I. amongst whom their father's kingdom was divided in 561. Caribert's capital was Paris, and his kingdom embraced Aquitaine, Provence, Touraine, Beauce, together with the territory of Valois and Brie (Greg. iv. 22; Bonnell, Anfänge d. Karol. Hauses. pp. 206-11), according to the usual principle in these partitions that each son should obtain a share in the old Frankish land, and a share in the lands conquered by the Franks. In 567 Caribert died, according to Gregory (De Mirac. St. Martini), quoted by Löbell, Gregor von Tours. p. 232) as a judgment for seizing some land belonging to the church of Tours. His kingdom was divided among his surviving brothers. Caribert was the father of Bertha, who married Ethelbert, king of Kent, and assisted Augustine in his missionary work (Greg. iv. 26). On the chronology see Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte, i. s. a. 567. n. 1. [T. R. B.]

CHARICLES, a priest in the 5th century, rebuked by St. Nilus of Sinai (Ep. iii. 243) for imposing hard penances on a humble penitent named Faustinus, and refusing him absolution till they were performed. Nilus points out that this conduct tends to Novatianism, and reminds him of David and Nathan, of the woman that was a sinner, of the penitent robber (Ceillier, viii. 222). [E. B. B.]

CHARIMIR, ST., bishop of Verdun, succeeded St. Airic in the bishopric in 588. He was referendarius to king Childebert II. In his Gloria Confessorum, Gregory of Tours gives a story of bishop Charimir. The tomb of St. Médard, bishop of Noyon, was celebrated for curing the tooth-ache. Labouring under this malady, Charimir heard of the marvel. He hastened to the church, but found it locked. Trusting that the virtue of the holy man was not confined to the interior, he took a splinter from the door, touched his tooth, and was healed. (Greg. Turon. de Gloria Confess. cap. xcv.; Patrol. Lat. lxxi. p. 899, § 977; Ceillier, xi. p. 373.) [D. R. J.]

CHARIS, in the system of VALENTINUS an alternative name with ENNOEA and SIGE, for the consort of the primary Aeon BYTHOS (Iren. i. 4). The name expresses that aspect of the absolute Greatness in which it is regarded not as a solitary monad, but as imparting from its perfection to beings of which it is the ultimate source; and this is the explanation given in the Valentinian fragment preserved by Epiphanius (Haer. xxxi. 6), διὰ τὸ ἐπικεχωρηγηκέναι αὐτὴν θησαυρίσματα τοῦ Μεγέθους τοῖς ἐκ τοῦ Μεγέθους. The use of the word CHARIS enabled Ptolemaeus (quoted by Irenaeus, i. 8) to find in John i. 14 the first tetrad of Aeons, viz., Pater, Monogenes, Charis, Aletheia. The suspicion arises that it was with a view to such an identification that names to be found in the prologue of St. John's Gospel were added as alternative appellations to the original names of the Aeons. But this is a point on which we have no data to pronounce. CHARIS has an important place in the system of MARCUS (Irenaeus, i. 13). The name CHARIS appears also in the system of the BARBELITAE (Irenaeus, i. 29), but as denoting a later emanation than in the Valentinian system. The word has possibly also a technical meaning in the Ophite prayers preserved by Origen (Contra Celsum, vi. 31), all of which end with the invocation ἡ χάρις συνέσω μοι, ναὶ πάτερ, συνέσω. [G. S.]

CHARISIUS (1) Presbyter, and oeconomus of the church of Philadelphia, who presented himself at the sixth session of the council of Ephesus, July 22, 431, and laid before the assembled prelates an accusation against two presbyters, named Antonius and Jacobus, who had visited Lydia with commendatory letters from Anastasius and Photius, presbyters of Nestorius's party, and had received into their communion some simple-minded clergy and laymen of Philadelphia, who had formerly adhered to the Quartodeciman rule, but convinced of their error, had been desirous to unite themselves to the Catholic church. Charisius complained that these emissaries of Nestorius had induced these Lydians to sign a creed, of which Theodore of Mopsuestia was the author, containing articles of a decidedly heretical character, and had excommunicated him because he refused to accept it. In confirmation of his statement Charisius laid the creed before the council, together with a list of those who had signed it, and their anathemas of their former errors. He also gave in a confession of his own faith, in perfect harmony with that of Nicaea. The council condemned the creed produced, as full of Nestorian impiety, carefully abstaining, however, from naming Theodore as its author, and denounced deposition and anathematisation on all who should accept it. (Labbe, Concil. iii. 673-694; Cyril, Epist. 54, p. 200; Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 417.) [E. V.]

CHARISIUS (2) Bishop of Azotus, one of the subscribers to the Semiarian Council of Seleucia (Epiphanius, Haer. 73, p. 874). [G. S.]

CHARISTERIUS. In the Valentinian fragment preserved by Epiphanius (Haer. xxxi. 6) this name is given to one of five Aeons without consorts [or rather "Prunici," for in this fragment the name Aeon is given to none but the first principle] whose generation takes place at a late point in the series of emanations. To these five there corresponds in the Valentinian system expounded by Irenaeus (i. 3) a single Aeon HORUS, for whom, however, are given five other alternative appellations, three of these being identical, or nearly so, with three of the names in the fragment. [G. S.]

CHARITANA or CHARITINA, female slave of one Claudius or Claudian, was reported to Count Domitius in the Diocletian persecution to be a Christian woman, so he wrote to her master to send her for examination. Her master was grieved, and put on sackcloth, and bewailed her; but she consoled him, saying, "Be not grieved, my lord, for I give my relics for my sins and thine." And he said, "Remember me before the heavenly king." Then she was sent to the count, and confessed herself a Christian, and was cruelly beaten, her head shaved, and boiling pitch poured on it. They tied her up with a stone hung about her, and threw her into the sea. But the stone slipped the fastenings; "she received the water as a baptism," was carried to land, slipped her bonds, and could not resist presenting herself again to the count. "And when he saw her he was astonished, and commanded that there should be a wheel, and the saint should be bound there, and under the wheel should be put coals of fire. And this was done, and the saint was punished. Then her teeth were pulled out," and her fingers and toes cut off, "and out of the meek anguish and the unbearable labour she gave up her spirit to God." The story is told in the Menology of Basil, Oct. 5, and Jan. 15. The picture on the first day represents her being cast into the water, and in the legend there is no mention of the wheel. The picture on the second day represents the cutting off her toes, which is only mentioned in the letterpress on the first. The suggestion may arise whether this is the story of St. Catharine and her wheel. Catharine seems much better Greek than Charitina, but we cannot pronounce that Charitina is an impossible form. Charitina occurs in the acts of Justin, perhaps because Charito has just preceded. Ruinart conjectures that Catharine is the same lady of whom Eusebius tells (8, c. 14), in relating the persecution A.D. 306-312, "And the women, no less than the men, endued with manful vigour by the teaching of the divine words, some of them underwent the same struggles as the men, and bare away the like prizes; and others, when haled for defilement, yielded their lives up to death sooner than their bodies to that ruin. At any rate, alone of the women with whom the tyrant played the adulterer, a Christian lady, most eminent and brilliant of those in Alexandria, overcame the impassioned and unchastened soul of Maximin by a most manful resistance; one who was glorious otherwise for wealth, and birth, and education, but who put all in the second rank in comparison with modesty; with whom he pleaded hard, and though she was ready to die, he could not find in his heart to slay her, as his lust prevailed over his wrath; but he punished her with banishment, and robbed her of all her substance." Eusebius does not name this lady; Rufinus supposes her to be Dorothea. We may here have the origin of the transference of St. Catharine to Mount Sinai, if that was her place of exile. Eusebius says distinctly that the lady was a Christian. The Menology tells a story of Aicaterina that might suit a Manichean equally well, except for the mention of baptism at the close, and makes no mention of the lust of Maximin; and is at variance with Eusebius in saying that the lady was beheaded. If the two ladies be the same, the account in Eusebius is preferable where they differ, but the details supplied in the Menology, some of them well agree with the eager, philosophical, and ritual revival of paganism under Maximin.

If two real persons of widely different, but equally noble and characteristic type, had thus been blended into one St. Catharine, it would help to account for the great hold that saint has had upon the popular imagination. The story of St. Agnes is a tale of the good shepherd rescuing his lamb, but the human interest of it is in her maidenly loveliness; whereas both the above histories are relations of the moral grandeur of womanhood, as it is in Christ, and borrow as little as possible of their interest from accidental circumstances. [E. B. B.]

CHARITINA and CHARITO. In the Acts of Justin Martyr we are told that they confessed Christ, and were scourged and beheaded. [E. B. B.]

CHARITY, derived usually from the Latin "caritas," whose Greek equivalent is ἀγάπη throughout its conjugates; which the Latin has, in most cases, to supply from "diligere." Yet it has been questioned whether the Latin equivalent for "charity" should not, as the English word still suggests, be written "charitas," and derived from the Greek word χάρις. For charity, considered in its Christian acceptation, and from the Latin point of view, is no natural habit or affection at all, but a theological virtue, forming a triplet with faith and hope, and, like them, wrought in the heart by the action of the Holy Ghost in answer to prayer (Dict. of Ant. art. "Charisma"), and then made permanent by co-operation on the part of man. Charity, thus understood, would have the love of God and of our neighbour for its joint aim, and might be defined to be the habit of mind disposing to the fulfilment of both duties in truth. Yet no less a person than the master of the Sentences, Peter Lombard, fell into the error of confounding the infused virtue with the Holy Ghost, its giver (Corn. a Lap. in Rom. v. 5). Indeed there are several passages in the epistles of St. Paul where interpreters are not agreed as to which is meant (Estius, ib.). Probably the first work which treats of it dogmatically is the 'Enchiridion' of St. Augustine. The tract or sermon of Zeno, bishop of Verona, may be somewhat earlier (Op. Tract. ii.), but all after St. Augustine trod in his steps. "Faith," says the bishop of Hippo (c. 8), "may exist, but cannot profit without love; hope cannot exist without love, nor love without faith and hope." So far he is merely repeating Origen, who remarks (In Rom. lib. iv. § 6), "Puto quod prima salutis initia, et ipsa fundamenta fides est: profectus verò et augmenta aedificii spes est: perfectio autem et culmen totius operis caritas; et ideò 'major omnium,' dicitur 'charitas.'" But here we may need to be reminded of the distinction which St. Augustine draws elsewhere (De Doct. Christian. iii. 10), "Charitatem voco motum animi ad fruentum Deo propter Ipsum, et se et proximo propter Deum. Cupiditatem autem motum animi ad fruentum se et proximo, et quolibet corpore, non propter Deum" . . . "He that has love in Christ," says St. Clement of Rome, "should keep the commands of Christ. Who can declare the bond that the love of God is? who can portray the greatness of its beauty, or express the height to which it soars? Love knits us to God; love covers a multitude of sins; love bears all things, supports all things. There is nothing sordid or overweening either in love. Love knows of neither schism nor strife; love brings all things into unanimity. All the elect of God were made perfect in love, nor is anything acceptable to God without love. The Lord assumed us in love. Through the love which He bore us, Christ our Lord, by the will of God, gave His blood for us. His flesh for our flesh; His soul for our souls" (Fp. i. 49). "They love all men, and are persecuted by all," says the author of the epistle to Diognetus of His earliest followers (c. 5).

Neither the Latin "charitas," nor the English "charity," can mislead any. But when we employ their every-day synonyms, "love" requires as much limitation to be rightly construed as "amor." For as St. Augustine says at the close of his dogmatic work: "Regnat carnalis cupiditas, ubi non est Dei caritas. Sed cum in altissimis ignorantiae tenebris, nullà resistente ratione, secundum carnem vivitur, hæc sunt prima hominis. Deinde cum per legem cognitio fuerit facta peccati, si nondum divinus adjuva Spiritus, secundum legem volens vivere vincitur et sciens peccat, peccatoque subditus servit—"

'A quo enim quis devictus est, huic et servus addictus est,' id agente scientiâ mandati, ut peccatum operetur in homine omnem concupiscentiam, cumulo prævaricationis adjecto, atque ita quod scriptum est impleatur. 'Lex subintravit ut abundaret delictum.' Hæc sunt secunda hominis. Si autem respererit Deus, ut ad implenda quæ mandat Ipse adjuvare credatur, et agi homo cooperit Dei Spiritu, concupiscit adversus carnem fortiore robore charitatis: ut quamvis adhuc sit quod homini repugnet ex homine, nondum totâ infirmitate sanata, ex fide tamen justus vivat, justæque vivat, in quantum non cedit malæ concupiscentiæ, vincente delectatione justitiæ. Hæc sunt tertia bonæ spei hominis: in quibus si piâ quisque perseverantiâ quisque proficiat, postrema pax restat, quæ post hanc vitam in requie spiritûs, deinde in resurrectione etiam carnis implebitur. . . . Omnia igitur præcepta divina referuntur ad charitatem, de quâ dicit Apostolus: 'Finis autem præcepti est charitas de corde puro, et conscientiâ bonâ, et fide non fictâ.' Omnis itaque præcepti finis est charitas: id est, ad charitatem refertur omne præceptum. Quod verò ita fit, vel timore poenæ, vel aliquâ intentione carnali, ut non referatur ad illam charitatem, quam diffundit Spiritus Sanctus in cordibus nostris, nondum fit quemadmodum fieri oportet, quamvis fieri videatur. Charitas quippe ista Dei est et proximi: et utique, 'in his duobus præceptis tota lex pendet et Prophetæ'. . . . (c. 118-21). Hæc enim regula dilectionis," as he says elsewhere, "divinitus constituta est: 'Diligens proximum tuum sicut te ipsum; Deum verò ex toto corde, et ex totâ animâ, et ex totâ mente'. . . . ut omnes cogitationes tuas, et omnem vitam, et omnem intellectum in illum conferas, a Quo habes ea ipsa quæ confers. Cùm autem ait, 'toto corde, totâ animâ, totâ mente,' nullam vitæ nostræ partem reliquit quæ vacare debeat, et quasi locum dare, ut aliâ re velit frui; sed quidquid aliud diligendum venerit in animum, illuc rapiatur, quò totus dilectionis impetus currit. Quisquis ergò rectè proximum diligit, hoc cum eo agere debet, ut etiam ipse toto corde, totâ animâ, totâ mente diligit Deum. Sic enim eum diligens tanquam se ipsum, totam dilectionem sui et illius refert in illam dilectionem Dei, quæ nullam a se rivulum duci extrâ patitur, cujus derivatione minuatur' (De Doct. Christian. i. 22). "Neque enim verâ dilectione diligeremus invicem," he continues on St. John (Tract. lxxvii. 1), "nisi diligentes Deum. Diligit enim unusquisque proximum tanquam se ipsum, si diligit Deum: nam si non diligit Deum, non diligit se ipsum." Finally, where this is, as Origen pertinently remarks, "ubi erit peccati locus?" (In Rom. lib. v. 10). There is a magnificent peroration of this teaching in a letter of St. Augustine to Volusianus, which it would spoil to translate: "Quæ disputationes," he says, "quæ literarum quorumlibet philosophorum, quæ leges quarumlibet civitatum, duobus præceptis, ex quibus Christus dicit totam legem Prophetasque pendere, ullo modo sint comparandæ: 'Diligens Dominum Deum,' etc. Hic Physica, quoniam omnes omnium naturarum causæ in Deo Creatore sunt. Hic Ethica, quoniam vita bona et honesta non aliunde formatur, quacum ea quæ diligenda sunt, quemadmodum diligenda sunt, diliguntur: hoc est, Deus et proximus. Hic Logica, quoniam veritas lumenque animæ rationalis, nonnisi Deus est. Hic etiam laudabilis reipublicæ salus: neque enim conditur et custoditur optimè civitas, nisi fundamento et vinculo fidei, firmæque concordiæ, cùm bonum commune diligitur, quod summum ac verissimum Deus est: atque in illo invicem sincerissimè se diligunt homines, cùm propter illum se diligunt: Cui, quo animo diligant, occultare non possunt." (Ep. cxxxvii. c. 5.) And there is yet another point of view in which we may regard it with St. Leo, who says: "Diligatur Deus, diligitur et proximus: ita ut formam diligendi proximi ab eâ quâ nos Deus diligit dilectione sumamus, Qui etiam malis bonus est, et benignitatis suæ donis non solum cultores suos confovet, sed etiam negatores. Amentur propinqui, amentur extranei: et quod debetur amicis supererogetur inimicis. Quamvis enim quorumdam malignitas nullâ humanitate mitescat, non sunt tamen infructuosa opera pietatis, nec unquam perdit benevolentia quod præstat ingrato." (Serm. xx. al. xix. f. 3.) This is as excellent as it is exclusively Christian, and in strict harmony with the words of our Lord (St. Matt. v. 43-8), on which those three beautiful homilies of St. Chrysostom, 'De Davide et Saule,' that drew so many tears from his hearers, were virtually preached (Op. iv. 748 et seq. ed. Mont.). Charity like this "never faileth," as the apostle says in his celebrated description of it (1 Cor. xii. 8). "He had shewn," says Theodoret, "that gifts would cease, and that charity would alone remain. But he shews further how it excels even those glorious qualities which belong to the mind. For faith itself is superfluous in a future life, where everything is made apparent. Hope, too, is superfluous, according to the maxim: 'What a man seeth, why doth he yet hope for?' But charity waxes stronger than ever in that blessed place, where all passions are stilled, and all bodies clothed with immortality, and souls no longer choose this at one time, and that at another" (in loc.). CHARITY, martyr. [CARITAS.]

CHARLEMAGNE. [CHARLES THE GREAT.]

CHARLES, called the GREAT (French, Charlemagne), son of Pippin, king of the Franks, was born about the year 742 or 743. The place of his birth is unknown. (See Abel, pp. 8-14. Many brochures have been written on the subject both of the time and place of his birth; e.g. two by Polain, Quand est n?, and Où est né Charlemagne, Brussels, 1856.) Of his youth little is known, except that he and his brother, Carloman, were anointed (in reges) by pope Stephen in 754, when he crossed the Alps to seek for help against the Lombards (Ann. Laur.). In 768 Pippin died. Charles and Carloman were raised to the throne and the kingdom of Pippin divided between them. Peace was with difficulty maintained between the two brothers, but, fortunately for the Frankish realm, in 771 Carloman died, and Charles became sole king of the Franks.

The subject will be divided thus: I. The authorities for the reign of Charles. II. The literature of the subject. III. The personal life and character of Charles. IV. Charles as king and emperor. V. His laws and institutions. VI. Modern conceptions of Charles.

1. The authorities for the history of Charles are of four classes. (i.) Annales. At the head of this list stand the Annales Laurissenses Majores, the official chronicle of the court, according to the conjecture of Ranke (see below). It is the work probably of two authors, and contemporary from 788 to 813. Next come the Annales Einhardi, written after 829, probably not by Einhard himself; in great measure a réchauffé of the Annales Laurissenses with the addition of good special tradition. The Annales Petaviani, Laureshamenses, Mosellani, and others, are of local rather than of general value. All the above chronicles are to be found in the first volume of Pertz, Scriptores Rer. Germ. (ii.) Biographies. That of Einhard is a sketch of what Charles was, rather than a real biography. As its purpose is to give a picture, it does not relate the facts either completely or minutely, but still the picture it gives is a true one, and though written after Charles's death it ranks as a contemporary authority. That by the Poeta Saxo, though compiled at the end of the 9th century, makes use of good material not now extant. The Monk of St. Gall wrote his life about the same time. Already in his narrative legend has begun to grow around the name of Charles. The large number of anecdotes related, though of slight authenticity as facts, are valuable as illustrations of manners. These three biographies are to be found both in Pertz (l. c.) and in Jaffé's Monumenta Carolina. (iii.) The Capitularies and Laws of Charles, contained in the first vol. of the Leyes of Pertz and in the collection of Baluzius. (iv.) The Letters of Charles, of Einhard, of Alcuin, and of the popes to Charles and his two predecessors, the last-named forming the Codex Carolinus, are to be found in Jaffé. For an account of the lesser authorities and generally see Abel, pp. 1-7, and Wattenbach Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter, i. ch. 2.

II. Literature of the Subject.—Besides the histories of Gibbon, Hallam, Martin, Luden, &c., which treat of Charles and his reign as part of a larger subject, the following are some of the best works of reference. First and foremost is Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, vols. 3 and 4, exhaustive on all matters of legislation and internal history. Similar in scope, but less detailed, is Lehuérou, Histoire des Institutions Carolingiennes. Then there are the Geschichte der Deutschen Kaiserzeit (vol. i.) by Giesebrecht; and Döllinger, Kaiserthum Karls des Grossen in the Münchener Hist. Jahrbuch for 1865. The best life and narrative (but unfortunately reaching no further than 788), is Abel, Jahrbücher des Fränkischen Reichs unter Karl d. Grossen, 1866. The other biographies of Bredow, Dippoldt, Hegewisch, Capefigue, Gaillard, &c., are either out of date or of little intrinsic value. Many lesser works, such as Warnkönig and Gérard, Histoire des Carolingiens, Sporschil, Karl der Grosse, sein Reich und sein Haus, &c., contain little or nothing that is not better and more fully treated of by Waitz.

III. Personal Life and Character of Charles.—According to Einhard Charles was a man of more than ordinary stature, with large eyes and nose, fair hair, and cheerful expression. Though his neck was thick and short and he was inclined to obesity, yet his presence was dignified. Like the rest of his countrymen he was fond of all field sports and exercises. He enjoyed robust health till within four years of his death (Vita, § 22). In his habits he was simple, wearing the ordinary Frankish dress, except on state occasions. The Roman costume he was only twice prevailed upon to wear, once by pope Adrian, the second time by pope Leo, on both occasions at Rome. In eating and drinking he was most temperate. During meals he invariably caused something to be read or recited, some tale of his ancestors' deeds or an extract from St. Augustine's works, especially from the De Civitate Dei. Whilst dressing he frequently gave audiences, without detracting from the royal dignity. Not only was he eloquent in his own language, but he could express himself with equal fluency and precision in Latin. Greek he understood, but did not speak. Though he attempted he was never successful in learning to write. He was a warm and constant friend, and according to the ideas of his age, merciful towards his enemies. He was at once a firm believer in the Christian faith and careful in the performance of his religious duties, and a large aims-giver to the faithful poor, not only in his own land but in heathen countries. He built and restored churches throughout his dominions, the most important being the church at Aix-la-Chapelle. He paid particular veneration to the bishop of Rome and the church of St. Peter, that so it might not only be safe against all foes, but might excel all other churches in wealth and magnificence (ib. 23-27). In family life he took particular delight. He was a dutiful son, an affectionate husband, and an indulgent father; though according to our notions his morals were not very strict. His first wife, a Lombard princess, whom he married at his mother's request, was repudiated in a year's time. Hildgard the Suabian was his second wife, and by her he had three sons, Charles, Lewis, and Pippin, and three daughters. By his third wife, the East-Frankish Fastrada, he had two daughters. Liudgard his fourth wife, of Alemannian descent, bore him no children. He is also related to have had several concubines (ib. 18). Upon the education of his children, both sons and daughters, he bestowed much care. The latter he kept at his palace all his lifetime, and refused to allow them to marry or leave him (ib. 19)—not without pernicious consequences according to Einhard (§ 19). The suggestions of Gibbon are without foundation.

The court of Charles has become famous both in history and in legend. There were two elements in the court, one political and military, the other ecclesiastical and learned. The former consisted chiefly of the officers of state, the Aporisarius, &c., and the body guard or 'satellites.' The latter consisted of all the learned men whom Charles could induce to stop there for a longer or a shorter time. He delighted in cultivated society and in literary pursuits. Thus he took measures to correct the Latin text of the Scriptures by comparing it with the Syriac and other versions; he propounded questions on biblical criticism and on grammatical subjects to Alcuin and others. He attempted to write a grammar of his native tongue, but in that he got little encouragement from his ecclesiastical friends. They formed together a kind of literary guild, and the letters of Alcuin reveal the easy terms of friendship on which they stood to one another. As such they assumed to themselves literary names. Charles was king David or king Solomon, Alcuin Flaccus, Einhard Besaleel or Calliopius. Closely connected with this side of Charles's character is the establishment of the palace school, the only place within the kingdom at which the higher branches of learning were taught. The establishment of this school was primarily Charles's own work, and in its development he took the highest interest. Nor was he less careful for elementary education. In 787 on his return from Rome he brought with him into Francia masters in the arts of grammar and arithmetic, and gave commands for the expansion everywhere of the literary studies (Ann. Laur. addit., quoted by Jaffé, M. C. p. 343, note), and in the following year he urges the abbot of Fulda to look after the schools in that city (Ep. Car. 3 Jaffé; cf. Epp. 25, 26, 42). Again, in 802, in a general capitulary the principle is laid down that "every one shall send his son to learn letters, and the child shall remain at school with all diligence until he become well instructed in learning" (Pertz, Leges, i. 107). In this respect also legend has grown round the name of Charles; as Alfred is the legendary founder of the University of Oxford, so is Charles the legendary founder of the University of Paris. Charles encouraged art as well as literature. The palaces of Nimwegen and Ingelheim have disappeared. The church at Aix, built after the model of San Vitale at Ravenna, and adorned with the marbles of that city, remains a monument of his taste and magnificence. Another distinguishing trait in his character is his carefulness for posterity in all his work. Thus the Constitutions and other state papers were all preserved in several copies in different places for consultation, notably in the archives of the palace (Einh. Ann. 813, cf. Wattenbach). In 791 he caused all the letters which had been directed by the apostolic see to his father, his grandfather, and himself to be collected and transcribed for the benefit of his successors. This collection is the Codex Carolinus. Further, it has been conjectured, originally by Ranke (Abhand. d. Berliner Akademie, 1854, p. 434), and the conjecture has since been accepted and elaborated by Pertz (Script. i, introd.), Giesebrecht (Münch. Hist. Jahrb. 1864), Waitz and others, that an official chronicle was kept by Charles's command, of which we have the remains in the Ann. Laurisenses and Ann. Einhardi (see especially Giesebrecht l. c. and Wattenbach, pp. 142 ff.). The ceremony and costume of the court on gala occasions were similar to those of Constantinople, in all such matters the model for Western Europe. An amusing anecdote is told by the monk of St. Gall of the means which Charles took to impress the ambassadors from Constantinople with a due regard for the riches and dignity of his empire (ii. 9). Compare also ii. 11 and 12 for similar tales of the reception of the Mahometan envoys. On the subject of Charles's court see generally Waitz, vol. iii. ch. 5, pp. 410-52, and Karl's des Grossen Privat- und Hof-leben, by F. Lorentz, in Raumer's Hist. Taschenbuch, 1832. Of the legends connected with Charles from Turpin downwards two classes may be distinguished; (i.) those which treat of historical subjects, e.g., the wars with the Saracens in Spain or the Saxons in the north; (ii.) those which transport into the times of Charles historical facts of a later epoch, especially those which attribute to him a crusade, and those which introduce ideas of feudal independence belonging to a subsequent age. So Potvin, Nos premiers Siècles Littéraires, Bruxelles, 1870. The most complete work on the legendary Charles is the Histoire Poétique de Charlemagne, par Gaston; Paris, 1865.

IV. Without writing a political history of the reign of Charles, which space forbids, it will suffice to mark his general policy and the character and importance of the different external enemies with whom he had to contend. Charles is an important personage in the world's history and in the history of civilisation in Western Europe, not only as the first of the new line of Roman emperors in the West, but as securing Europe and Christendom by his conquest of the Avars and the Saxons against the future recurrence of heathen invasion and devastation. The south-western frontiers of civilisation had been made secure against the Saracens by his grandfather, Charles Martel. Nevertheless it was necessary for Charles, with a view to more serious work upon the north-east, to prevent the risk of being harassed in the rear by lesser enemies, such as the Bretons and the Basques. With the exception of the famous attack on the rear-guard at Roncesvalles this was done without mishap, and the Spanish and the British (i.e. Breton) marches were put in an effective state of defence. The Eastern frontier, as Einhard (Vita, § 7) says, was much more difficult to define or defend. There was no marked boundary of mountain or of forest. The most powerful tribe in this quarter was the Saxons, a Teutonic race still maintaining their old free institutions of village communities. The war against them was not only a war against barbarism, for the Saxons had shewn no tendency to develop a civilisation of their own or to adopt that of the West, it was also one of Christian against heathen, of monarchy and centralisation against what, for lack of a better name, must be called popular and local self-government—of the Teuton Romanised against the original pure Teuton. Into the long details of these wars it is unnecessary to enter. From 772 to 804 an expedition against the Saxons is noticed almost yearly in the chronicles. Hostages were given, truces and treaties made and broken. Charles waged this as most of his other wars principally by means of lieutenants. He himself, according to his biographer (Einh. V. § 8), was only twice engaged in pitched battle with the Saxons. Eventually the contest became a war of extermination. Four thousand prisoners who had surrendered were massacred on a single occasion. The winter of 797-8 confirmed the supremacy of the Franks. Charles established his own quarters on the Weser and distributed his army throughout the country. In spring he laid waste with fire and sword the whole territory between the Weser and the Elbe (Ann. Laur.). Even when subdued he took measures, like the old Persian kings, to prevent future revolt by removing 10,000 families and settlements of the Saxons and distributing them in new quarters in Gaul and Germany (Einh. V. § 7).

Beyond the Saxons were the Slavonic tribes. Against them too predatory incursions were undertaken, against the Wiltzians, the Sorabi, and the Bohemians. It was apparently part of Charles's policy to make alliances with one of these tribes against the other, so that whilst no regular opposition was made to their internecine contests, a pretext for interference was ever ready at hand. On the south-east, after removing the seditious Tassilo from his chieftainship of the Bavarians and appointing a royal prefect in his stead, Charles had to meet another foe, the Avars or Huns, only less formidable than the Saxons. They too were heathens, they too were pressing westward. Eight years the war in Pannonia lasted, though on one occasion only did Charles appear in person at the head of his forces. It too was a war of extermination. The devastation of Pannonia and the destruction of the Avar power were complete. Conversion followed upon conquest. Bishoprics were established, churches were built. To the bishops and priests who entered on the work Charles gave full powers political as well as ecclesiastical. The conquered heathen paid not tribute, but tithes.

There had ever been a close political connexion between the Roman pontiffs and the Arnolfingian house. Deserted by his imperial master at Constantinople and ever exposed to the ruthless attacks of the Lombards, the bishop of Rome had sought protection from the rising Frankish power beyond the Alps. Charles Martel, occupied by the weightier matter of repulsing the Saracens, was never able to accede to the request. Pippin, his son, had both leisure and inclination more actively to interfere. The Lombards were defeated, and the pope was rescued from immediate danger. Pippin's reward was the confirmation by the head of Christendom of his assumption of the kingly title. He thus became the first European king "anointed of the Lord," and "reigning by the grace of God." The defeat of the Lombards was only temporary, and in the second year of his sole reign in 773 Charles received a request for help from pope Hadrian. That winter Desiderius, the Lombard king, was shut up in Pavia, in the spring of 774 he and the city surrendered, and the "end of the war was the subjugation of Italy" ("finis hujus belli fuit subacta Italia," Einh. V. 6). Some years afterwards the prince of Beneventum was brought to terms (cf. Waitz, iii. 307, 8), and, with the exception of the small possessions still pertaining to the Greek empire in the south, all Italy was apparently subject to Charles. There had, however, been a moment when the alliance between the papacy and the Frankish monarchy seemed upon the point of being dissolved, when Charles in the first year of his reign was persuaded by his mother to marry a Lombard princess, the sister of Desiderius. Inclination and interest quickly dissolved this union, and Charles rendered certain his adhesion to the traditional policy of his race by ratifying or renewing his father's gifts of his Italian conquests to the pope. What the exact purport of this donation was we cannot tell, nor its limits. The original documents have perished, nor is there any contemporary authority to vouch for the details. The fact of the donation, however, cannot be called in question (v. Sugenheim, Geschichte der Entstehung und Ausbildung des Kirchenstaates, Leipzig, 1854, p. 23, note; also De Donatione a Car. Mag. sedi Apostolicæ anno 774 oblata, by Th. D. Meck, Munich, 1861). The gift rested only on the right of conquest, for the title of Patricius Romanorum, bestowed as it was by an usurped claim of the papacy, conveyed with it rank not power. It is in like manner hard to determine the nature of the authority in the gift-lands purported to be conveyed. In theory, to judge from his letters, pope Hadrian considered himself as much an absolute sovereign within these lands as Charles himself was in his own Transalpine kingdom (Cod. Carol. 85, ap. Jaffé). One point however is certain, viz., that the donation was a donation of the Greek Exarchate, and not of Lombard Italy (Anast. Lib. Pont. is sufficient authority for this, cp. Sugenheim, p. 27, note). Henceforward Charles always styles himself "rex Francorum et Longobardorum et Patricius Romanorum." His authority too in Northern Italy, the immediate territory of the Lombard kings, was as complete and direct as in the Frankish land (v. Ann. Laur. 776, 779, 781, 786).

During the next few years Charles was engaged with his Saxon and Spanish enemies, but at the first prospect of peace he determined to revisit Rome. His son Pippin accompanied him, and at the Easter festival, 781, was anointed "king for Italy" (rex in Italianum) by the pope. Again for six years Charles was occupied beyond the Alps, and on his next visit in 787 he spent but a few days with Hadrian, proceeding southward to defend the patrimony of St. Peter and the peace of Italy against the Lombard duke of Beneventum. For the next thirteen years Charles remained to the north of the Alps. The Saxons and the Avars were thoroughly brought into subjection. In 796 Hadrian died, and Leo III. was elected in his stead. The new pope, foreseeing how soon he might require the strong arm of Frankish help, immediately despatched to Charles, as tokens of submission, the keys and standard of the city and the keys of the sepulchre of St. Peter. A few years afterwards (799) a terrible riot broke out in Rome. The pope was assaulted and almost killed. He fled for help to Charles. Charles received him at Paderborn and promised assistance. In the month of August (800), at the national Frankish assembly at Mainz, the king gave notice of his intended journey, and forthwith started. At Nomentum he was met by the pope and escorted with every honour to Rome (Nov. 800). Seven days after his arrival in the city, Charles held an assembly and made known for what causes he had come, and from that day applied himself to their settlement (Ann. Laur.). The chief and the only one mentioned by the chronicle is the investigation of the charges brought against pope Leo, and the violence done to him. No witness could be found to prove the charges, nor is their nature known; nevertheless the pope in St. Peter's publicly and solemnly read a declaration of his own innocence. He particularly deprecated, however, that his declaration of his should be taken for a precedent, and it was probably only under the suasion or compulsion of Charles that he went through the ceremony at all.

Charles celebrated the festival of Christmas, 800, in St. Peter's, and whilst kneeling in prayer before the altar, the pope placed a crown upon his head, all the people of the Romans shouting out, "To Charles, Augustus, crowned by God, great and pacific emperor of the Romans, life and victory." Forthwith, after the custom of the princes of old, he was adored by the pontiff, and thenceforth dropping the name of patrician was styled emperor and Augustus. Such is the brief account of this great event in the Annales Einhardi. [For the other narratives, see Waitz, iii. 174, note.] In the Vita (§ 28) Charles is said to have frequently declared that had he known what was to take place he would not have entered St. Peter's on that day. From this we are bound to infer that at any rate the moment at which the coronation actually took place was not selected by the emperor himself. That the coronation was not simply an unpremeditated action of the pope is undoubted. On the other hand, too much weight must not be given to unsupported statements such as that of the Italian chronicler, John the Deacon (Muratori, R. I. S., ii. 312), when he asserts that Leo had promised at Paderborn to confer the imperial crown on Charles if he would defend the pope against his enemies. It is very improbable that any such contract existed. The idea had apparently occurred to Alcuin, and had at least been suggested by him to Charles (see Waitz, iii. 171, note 2). The author of the Annales Laureshamenses (Pertz, vol. i.) attributes the resolution primarily to "Leo, the holy fathers assembled, and the rest of the Christian people." Hence, if not originally conceived, the idea was at least brought into prominence by ecclesiastical influence.

Historically the coronation of Charles, and the revival of the empire in the West, may be looked at in three relations: (i.) to the old empire at Constantinople; (ii.) to Roman and Teutonic civilisation; (iii.) to the papal and ecclesiastical power.

i. Legally the coronation, at least on the pope's part, was an act of rebellion against the Eastern emperor. Charles appears also to have looked on it as such, and perhaps it was in order to put himself technically on the right side of the law that he proposed to marry Irene, and so reunite the two realms (Theophanes, quoted by Bryce, Holy Roman Empire, ch. v.). However it was by no means the first occasion on which the pope had broken his allegiance to the emperor at Constantinople. The nomination of Pippin and Charles to the dignity of the patriciate affected to confer on the part of the pope what was a purely imperial dignity. Still more overt acts of rebellion were the sending of the keys of the city to the Frankish kings, and the acceptance from them of the temporal sovereignty over the Greek possessions in Italy. Most men in the West however took a rational and commonsense view of the coronation. The Greek emperor, they said, had deserted Rome and Italy, the nation of the Romans and the Roman tongue; Charles possessed Rome, the seat of the Caesars, as well as Gaul, Italy, and Germany, wherefore it seemed just that he should have the name as well as the reality of the imperial power (Mon. Sangall. i. 26). So Anskar formulates what was afterwards recognised as the legal mode of looking at the coronation: "The imperial power," he says, "which from the time of Constantine had rested with the Greeks at Constantinople, was now transferred by the election of the Roman people to the dominion of the Franks" (Vita Willehadi 5, quoted by Waitz, iii. 184, note). In western lists of the emperors, therefore, Charles follows immediately on Constantine VI. Irene's usurpation and the notoriety of her crimes were taken advantage of as an afterthought by those who wished to give the new Teutonic emperors a colourable title.

ii. Charles himself meant, and his contemporaries took him to mean, by his coronation the setting up again of a Roman emperor at Rome. Though recollection went back rather to Constantine and Theodosius than to Julius and Augustus, still the new emperor was emphatically Romanorum imperator. Henceforth he is Romanum regens imperium. He was adored by the pope "more antiquorum principum" (Ann. Laur.). The old emperors are his "antecessores." The first thing Charles does after his coronation is to summon to his presence those who had attempted to depose the pope, and judging them by "Roman law," he condemned them to death as guilty of treason (majestatis rei, Ann. Einhardi). In like manner, on his return to the Frankish kingdom, he compelled all his subjects to take a new oath to him as "Caesar," as they had formerly done to him as king (Capit. Aquisg. 802, cap. 2). The imperial titles are thoroughly Roman. In full Charles's title is "serenissimus Augustus a Deo coronatus, magnus et pacificus imperator, Romanum gubernans imperium, qui et per misericordiam Dei rex Francorum et Longobardorum" (Capit. ap. Waitz, iii. 206, n.). Nevertheless it was little more than the titles and dignities of ancient Rome, and not her institutions, that Charles attempted to revive. The Frankish kingdom was overshadowed in dignity by the empire, but it was only in name that it was absorbed in it. The Teutonic element was the essence of the Carolingian empire. The emperors were Teutons, the Frankish nation was Teutonic, and as yet, even in the West, not much Romanised. The centre of the empire was far north of the Alps, and in the central part of the Frankish territory, on the left bank of the Rhine in the valleys of the Meuse and the Moselle. Above all, the Teutonic institutions of the kingdom remained the Teutonic institutions of the empire. The great assemblies of the nation still met together in the open air and gave their assent to the measures proposed for the common good. The different nationalities of the Saxons, the Burgundians, the Lombards, &c., still retained and were judged by their own codes.

iii. Just as his wars with the Saxons and the Avars were to Charles as much missionary enterprises as political conquests, so as emperor he always assumed the position of champion of Christendom. To Offa, king of Mercia, he had styled himself "defensor sanctae Dei ecclesiae" (Ep. Car. 7), and to pope Leo he writes (v. Waitz, iii. 163, n.), "It is our privilege, according to the favour vouchsafed to us by the divine mercy, to defend by arms in all places the holy church of Christ from the incursions of pagans and unbelievers without, and within to fortify it by the recognition of the Catholic faith." The empire is, as it were, an ordinance of God for the community of Christians, and the emperor is the God-appointed protector of Christianity against all foes (Giesebrecht, i. 115).

The foundations of the empire were therefore as much religious as political, and the conception of it by Charles himself and the maxims of government which he adopted were drawn much more from the theocracy of the Old Testament than from the despotism of the Roman empire. It was with him, as it became still more strongly in profession with his "Holy Roman" successors, God's kingdom upon earth. Though practically the unity of the empire rested on that of the Frankish nation, and of the imperial laws and administration and on the individuality of the emperor, theoretically it was based on the unity of Christendom, on the unity of belief and of moral law within the Catholic church. In Charles's empire there is, therefore, an absolute identification of church and state. He appoints bishops as he appoints counts; the great councils of the nation are as much ecclesiastical as they are civil assemblies. Charles's relation to the papacy was evidently assumed by him to have undergone a change when he became emperor. It had ever been at the pope's own request that the Frankish kings had intervened in Italian affairs. Leo discovered that even at the risk of some temporary political subjection it would be desirable to have the Frankish king as a really efficient and permanent protector against dangers near home. It thus seems probable that the idea first suggested itself to the papal mind of conferring the imperial dignity upon Charles. To him as emperor the pope was but the bishop of the capital city of his empire, and as he designated or appointed the bishops of lesser sees, so no doubt, although no vacancy occurred during the remainder of his lifetime, he claimed the right of filling the most important ecclesiastical office in his realm. Thus the first actions of Stephen I. and Paschal IV., Leo's successors, when tumultuously elected by the Roman clergy and people, were to compel the Romans to swear allegiance to the empire, and to despatch envoys to the emperor Lewis, to deprecate his displeasure at having assumed the pontifical office without awaiting the imperial confirmation. Shortly after Charles's death the weakness of his successors enabled the growing papal power more and more to assert the principle of ecclesiastical independence. In this respect the imperial idea under Charles differs from that of the Othos and Frederics (v. Lancizolle, Die Bedeutung der Römisch-Deutschen Kaiserwürde, Berlin, 1856, p. 14). So also the notion of the emperors as lords of the world with all sovereigns as their under-kings, &c., was of later growth than Carolingian times. Charles laid claim to little power which he could not if necessary enforce. As "defender of Holy Church" he considered that all Christians had a right to appeal to him for help and assistance, and it was in this regard that he was bewailed after death as "pater orbis."

Charles, after spending the winter of 800-1 in settling the affairs ecclesiastical, civil, and domestic of Rome and Italy, left for the north after Easter. The remaining fourteen years of his life were passed in Transalpine countries, and though he traversed his kingdom less frequently, he was none the less active in promulgating laws for the better government of his subjects. The Saxons were thoroughly subdued, and their settlement ecclesiastical and civil completed. The empire began, however, to suffer from two new foes, both maritime, the Normans on the coasts of Gaul and Germany, the Saracens on the shores of the Mediterranean. Charles's energy was equal to meeting these new enemies. He ordered fleets to be constructed, and one of the last journeys that he took was to Boulogne to inspect the naval force and the construction of a lighthouse at that harbour (Ann. Einh. 811). During the last ten years of his life Charles was generally resident at Aix-la-Chapelle. There he received frequent embassies from various potentates, from the Christian kings of Galicia, from the Caliph, and from the Eastern emperor. It was not till 812 that the last-mentioned prince was induced to acknowledge his Western brother's imperial title (imperatorem et basileum appellantes, Ann. Einh.). At the assembly of 806 Charles had made provision by will for the division of his kingdom into three parts, and had exacted an oath of acceptance thereto from the Frankish chiefs present; and in 813 he summoned Lewis from the sub-kingdom of Aquitaine to Aix, and himself placed a crown on his son's head, whom he thus made his colleague in the imperial dignity (coronam illi imposuit et imperialis nominis sibi consortem fecit, Ann. Einh.). Not long afterwards Charles sickened, and, on the 28th of January 814, died. He was buried where he died, at Aix, in the church which he had there built. The story of the opening of his tomb by Otho III. in the year 1000 is well known. The marble chair in which the dead emperor was seated is still preserved in the gallery of the cathedral. It was not till the time of, and at the instance of, Frederic Barbarossa that Charles was enrolled amongst the saints. The "Office of the Blessed Charles," if not still recited, can still be read by the curious in the works of Charles. (Migne, Patr. Lat. tom. 98, p. 1565.)

V. Of the laws and institutions of the kingdom and empire of Charles it will be unnecessary to speak in detail. A thorough and masterly treatment of the whole subject is to be found in Waitz. Compare also the monograph by Von Wyss, Karl der Grosse als Gesetzgeber, Zürich, 1869.

The great period of Charles's legislative activity was after his imperial coronation, just as his warlike activity had been principally previous to that event. It was during these fourteen years, 800-814, that most of his capitularies were published. Although many ordinances might be found which were to apply only to certain sections of the empire, to Italy or Saxony, the empire was none the less a unity of which Italy and Saxony were integral parts. This unity of the empire was formulated not only in the laws which were designed to be valid throughout the realm, but in the system of administration, which was the same in Gaul, Italy and Germany. Thus on all the frontiers "marches" were established for protection against barbarous foes. The counts, or prefects, of the marches were the most powerful officers in the empire. They alone united under their power more than one countship (Mon. Sangall. i. 13).

The countship, the successor of the old Teutonic village community, and generally co-extensive with it, was the administrative unit (Waitz, iii. 319, ff.). The dangers of this system, especially the tendency in the countship to become hereditary and independent—a tendency which had ere this shewn itself under Merovingian rule—Charles was not blind to, and did his best to ward off from himself and his descendants. The count's office was nominally for life, but could be and was taken away in cases of misconduct. Charles's endeavour always was to make the counts be, and be considered to be, state officials, and not quasi-independent territorial princes. As a bond to keep all together, and to see by personal inspection to the due administration of justice in all parts of his vast dominions, Charles instituted the "Missi," or rather developed an institution which already existed in the Frankish kingdom. The "Missi" were generally nominated at the great assemblies, and the empire was divided into different districts (legationes or missatica). Though often appointed for special service, the ordinary duties of the "Missi" were to look after the due administration of justice, the interests of the crown and its property, the maintenance of public peace, and of the liberties and privileges of the clergy (Waitz, iii. 371, sqq.). To the office both laymen and ecclesiastics were eligible, according to the principle of the fusion of things ecclesiastical and civil throughout the realm. In ecclesiastical administration Charles at once insisted on obedience within the church, e.g. of suffragans to metropolitans, &c. and on the subjection of ecclesiastical as of all other authority to the kingly and imperial. The appointment of bishops he kept in his own hands, and he generally exercised it well. Amusing stories on the subject are given by the monk of St. Gall (i. 4, 5, 6). Instances of popular election occur, but generally if not solely in Italy. Three years after his father's death Lewis surrendered the right of election to the clergy and people, but at first probably the surrender was rather nominal than actual. Charles fixed the metropolitan seats at Mainz, Cologne, and Treves. The pallium was conferred on the metropolitans by the pope, but only with the assent of the emperor. Bishops and counts were alike summoned in the same terms to the great national assemblies. These assemblies, in origin coeval with that of the Teutonic race itself, were held generally in the open air, and the participation of those present was still limited to the assenting shout. Time and place varied, but the former was always during the summer months, the latter was fixed at each assembly for the next occasion. The assemblies were at once military, being sometimes held by the army on its march and in foreign lands; legislative, because it was through them that the capitularies were generally promulgated; and ecclesiastical, because they took cognizance of matters touching religious doctrine and discipline. It was ordinarily before them that foreign ambassadors were received in the name of the nation, and envoys despatched to foreign princes. There was as a subsidiary assembly of the king's chief counsellors (and Charles was always eager to gather the chief men of his kingdom around him), to meet sudden emergencies and to consult on matters to be submitted to the great assemblies of the nation (see gen. Waitz, iii. pp. 460–520).

VI. Charles has become not only the centre of a legendary cycle, but a watchword in modern politics. Caesar and Charlemagne were the imperial models of Napoleon Bonaparte. (Numerous pamphlets on the subject survive in the British Museum and other collections.) Charles had before the birth of a rational school of historical inquiry been long appropriated as a Frenchman. This fallacy is only to be equalled by that which speaks of him without qualification as a Belgian or a German. In the modern sense of the terms he is neither a roi de France, a roi des Belges, nor a Deutsche Kaiser. In this respect the distinction between Teuton and German ("Germanen" and "Deutschen" in modern German) must ever be borne in mind. The Franks were essentially a Teutonic race, and it was in the comparatively stable Teutonic kingdom which they established that the foundations of modern European civilisation were laid. The conquered inhabitants of the western part of the Frankish kingdom still possessed a vigorous Roman civilisation, and the conquerors in that part became rapidly Romanised. To the east of the Rhine, on the other hand, the semi-Romanised Teutonism of the Franks began to react on the pure Teutonism of the Saxons. But this pure Saxon Teutonism, though conquered in the field, retained the vigour of its laws and institutions. The Franks, therefore, exposed to two different influences, each more vigorous than any indigenous civilisation which they themselves possessed, succumbed to both. And thus arose modern France on the one side, modern Germany on the other, with a debateable land between. The coronation of Charles may rightly, therefore, be taken to symbolise the recognition by Romanism of the victory of Teutonism, and the devolution to the victorious Teuton by Rome of her dignity as mistress of the world. That this imperial dignity descended eventually to the kings of the eastern and more Teutonic division of the Frankish kingdom was due to a series of political accidents.

Lastly, there is very considerable discrepancy in the way in which modern historians have estimated the permanent value to civilisation of Charles's empire and institutions, as also of the real share which Charles himself had in the laws and institutions which go by his name, and how far they were original in idea, or a development of the polity of his Frankish predecessors. Waitz has devoted an Excursus to the subject (Anmerkung 2 on chap. 3, vol. iii. pp. 286–9). It will be sufficient to indicate the two extremes: "There is not," says Lezardière, "one of the rights of liberty that is not recognised and protected by the conduct or by the laws of this sublime prince." On the other hand, Potvin speaks thus: "Charles cast the liberties of the Frankish nation a second time into the gulf of Roman decadence; . . . such a despotism is unworthy of the respect of free Belgium" (Les premiers Siècles, &c., pp. 27, 30). [T. R. B.]

CHARLES MARTEL, Charles surnamed the Hammer (on the sobriquet and its late origin, and on the name Charles, see Breysig, Jahrbücher des Fränkischen Reichs, 71–41, Die Zeit Karl Martells, Leipzig, 1869, p. 8, n. 3, and ref.), son of Pippin the Elder and Alpaida (Gesta R. F. 49; Fred.

Cont. 103), was born about the year 688 (Breysig, 7 n. 5). The place of his birth is unknown. The above work by Breysig, and that by Cauer, de Karolo Martello, Berlin, 1846, are the best monographs upon the subject. The value of the various authorities is estimated by G. Richter. (Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, 1873, i. s. a. 715 n. 1; cf. also Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen, Berlin, 1873, esp. book i. §§ 9-11, and book ii. §§ 1 and 3.) Of Charles's youth nothing is known except that he was remarkable for his physical strength and vigour. He married when about sixteen; his wife's name has been conjectured to have been Chrotrud (Breysig), her origin is unknown. On the death of the two elder sons of Pippin by Plectrudis, Drogo in 708 and Grimoald in 714, Charles became the eldest male representative of the family of the mayor of the palace. His father, however, did not recognise him as such, and Plectrudis, on Pippin's death in 715, became regent for the young king Dagobert III., and for her grandson Theodald as mayor (Breysig, 9, 10). The Neustrian nobles, indignant that a child like Theodald should be made mayor of the palace, set up Raganfred, one of their own number, in his place, got possession of the king Dagobert, and hard pressed Plectrudis in Cologne. Charles meanwhile escaped from the prison into which Plectrudis had thrown him (Gesta Reg. Fr. 51), and proceeded to form a party of his own in Austrasia. Dagobert died in 715, and Chilperic II. was set up by the Neustrian party in his stead. For the first time for twenty-five years there was a Merovingian king of full years, and a mayor (Raganfred) outside the family of the Pippins. In the campaign of the year 716 Charles was at first unsuccessful, being defeated by Ratbod, the heathen chief of the Frisians and ally of the Neustrians; but he effected a surprise of the victorious Neustrian army on its homeward march at Amblève (Gesta, 53); and in the spring of 717 he gained a bloody and decisive victory over Raganfred and the Neustrians at Vincy (Fred. Cont. 106). His position in Austrasia was thus for the present secured. On his return to Austrasia he deposed the bishop of Rheims, Rigobert, who had not given him the assistance he expected during the campaign, and appointed one of his own party, Milo, bishop of Trier, to the see. Charles, recognising the great political power of the bishops, never lost sight of his own political interests in the episcopal appointments that he made. In like manner, at a later date, 732, he shewed himself a stern repressor of attempts at independence on the part of the higher clergy by his deposition and banishment of Eucherius, bishop of Orleans (Vita S. Eucherii, Bouquet, iii. 656). In the autumn of the same year, 717, Charles was further successful in obtaining possession of Cologne, which Plectrudis had hitherto held. Having thus become the recognised chief of the eastern Franks, he set up a king of his own in opposition to Chilperic, Clotaire IV. During 718, matters being quiet in Neustria, Charles seized the opportunity to secure his eastern frontier by an attack upon the Saxons (Ann. Amadri et P. tav., s. a. 718); and it was fortunate that he did so, for the Neustrians had prepared a combined invasion for the next year. Eudo, semi-independent duke of Aquitaine, was to attack Charles from the south-west, the Neustrians on the west; Charles however anticipated their design, threw himself first upon Eudo, and drove him back, then wheeling to the north, attacked and defeated the Neustrians at Soissons. Raganfred and Eudo fled. Charles entered Paris and established for the rest of his life his authority over the whole Frankish realm. At this time Clotaire opportunely died, and Charles recognised Chilperic, whose mayor he became.

Christianity in Gaul was exposed to danger on three sides, the Saracens on the south, the Saxons on the east, and the Frisians on the north; and Charles Martel was no less a bulwark of Christendom than his great namesake and successor. In the year 719 Ratbod, chief of the Frisians, died, and his successor Aldgild, whether converted himself or not, seems to have favoured the extension of the Christian faith. Three years later the conversion of the Frisians had progressed so far that Wilbrord, "the apostle of the Frisians," was set up and recognised by Charles as bishop of Utrecht. In the same year Wynfrith or Boniface obtained from pope Gregory II. his mission for the conversion of the heathen east of the Rhine. Boniface demanded and obtained the support and protection of Charles upon his missionary enterprise (cf. Jaffé, Mon. Moguntina, 84 ff. n. 24, 159 n. 55; Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, iii. 27, v. BONIFACIUS). Heathendom was by no means subjugated in Frisia, nor was the conversion of the Frisians accomplished without the sword. For during 733 and 744 Charles was engaged in ravaging the country, forcibly suppressing heathen worship, and utterly breaking down the independence of the Frisian nation (Fred. Cont. 109). The Saxons in like manner were a source of continual danger to the Frankish kingdom, and the policy pursued by Charles Martel was that which was completed by Charlemagne, namely, frequent predatory expeditions in which the whole country was laid waste far and wide. Such expeditions took place in the years 718, 720, and 738. The third foe of Gallie Christendom, the Saracens, crossed the Pyrenees for the first time in 720, capturing Narbonne: the following year they laid siege to Toulouse, but were defeated under its walls by Eudo of Aquitaine. It was not till 732 that the great Mahometan invasion took place under Abderaman. Aquitaine was overrun. Eudo fled to Charles. The forces of the Mahometans and the Franks met between Tours and Poitiers in October 732. The victory of Charles was complete. Abderaman was killed, and the Saracens driven back into Spain. (On the importance of this battle see Waitz, iii. 23 n. 2.) This campaign however, by no means closed Charles's war with the Saracens, for the Burgundians shortly afterwards in their faction quarrels did no scruple to call in infidel aid. Arles in 735, and Arignon in 737, were betrayed to the Saracens but afterwards recovered by Charles. In the latter year Charles appears to have inflicted considerable defeat on them on the river Berr in Septimania, though he was unable to recover Narbonne (Fred. Cont. 109).

In the year 720 Chilperic had died, and his son, Theodorie IV. was placed upon the throne, whose name Charles continued as mayor to wield royal power. After Theodorie's death in 732

Charles appears to have ruled directly, without setting up another puppet king (v. Richter, s. a. notes and ref.). Aquitaine on the one side and Bavaria on the other appear to have acknowledged the supremacy of Charles's power, but in internal affairs to have been practically independent (cf. Breysig, 75, 77).

In 739 pope Gregory III. besought Charles's help against the Lombards, sending him the keys of the sepulchre of St. Peter as a token that to him its protection was entrusted. Gregory seems to have had the further intention of withdrawing his allegiance from the Eastern emperor, and offering it to Charles with the title of consul (eo pacto patrato ut a partibus imperatoris recederet et Romanum consulatum. . . . Carolo sanciret. Fred. Cont. 110, and cf. Chron. Moiss. ap. Pertz, Mon. i. p. 292). Charles neither gave active assistance, nor accepted the proffered allegiance, but appears to have endeavoured to mediate between the pope and the Lombards. (On this whole transaction and on the title of Patricius borne by Charles, see Richter, i. 200, notes and ref., and Veltmann, de Karoli Martelli patriciatu, Münster, 1863.)

On the 21st October, 741, Charles died at Kiersy. Shortly before his death "he divided his kingdoms between his sons" (filiis suis regna dividit, Fred. Cont. 110), Carloman obtaining Austrasia, Alamannia, Thuringia; Pippin, Neustria, Burgundy, and Provence; Bavaria and Aquitaine, as already stated, remained under nominal subjection, but in practical independence. The expression of the chronicler above quoted shews how the mayor of the palace had really come to be looked upon as king, and how what were still nominally realms of the Merovingian princes were treated as hereditary possessions of their own by the Carolingian mayors. CHARMAIG—Commemorated March 16 (cir. A.D. 640). In the west of Scotland a saint of this name is found in the church-dedications. He is identified with St. Abban, Mac Ua Corbmaic, of Magh-Ar-naidhe in Ui-Ceinnsealaigh, in Leinster, who is mentioned in St. Aengus's Litany. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 77; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 299 sq.) [J. G.]

CHARMOSYNUS. A presbyter, agent with the presbyter Theognostus and the deacon Leontius, for Cyril of Alexandria, at Constantinople, A.D. 433, on the subject of restoring peace with the Orientals. He was present also at the council of Chalcedon, A.D. 451, as a presbyter and oeconomus of the Alexandrian church, with Euthalius, an archdeacon, and other Alexandrian churchmen. To them was signified the sentence against Dioscorus. (St. Cyril. Alex. Epist. xxxvii., ol. xl., Patrol. Græc. lxxvii. p. 167; Ceillier, viii. 295; Concil. iv. 462; Ceillier, x. 689.) [W. M. S.]

CHARTENIUS, ST., is supposed to have been bishop of Marseille. He took part with Avitus bishop of Vienne at a conference of Catholic and Arian bishops, held at Lyon about 499, when king Gundebund was present. He is spoken of by Avitus in a letter referring to the council at which they had both been present; and it is certain that there was present at the conference at Lyon a bishop whose name has the same termination as that of St. Chartenius, but nothing more is known of him (Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs sacrés, x. 569; Avit. Vien. Epist. xxviii., Patrol. Lat. lix. p. 244).

[D. R. J.]

CHARTERIUS, the ninth bishop of Périgueux (Petrogoricum), in the latter half of the 6th century. In the year 581, a quarrel having arisen between Guntchramnus and Childebert, Chilperic seized upon the occasion to extend the boundaries of his kingdom, sent Desiderius with an army into Aquitaine and took possession of that province, more especially Périgueux. This was the cause of great trouble to Charterius in the year 582, and is thus referred to by Gregory of Tours:—"King Chilperic, having invaded his brother's territories, made new counts. . . . In those days two men were apprehended by Nonnichius, a count of the city of Limosin, as they were bearing letters (written) in the name of Charterius, bishop of the city of Périgueux, which contained many injurious statements against king Chilperic. Among other things it was stated in the form of a complaint by the bishop, that he (the bishop) had descended from paradise to hell (se a paradiso ad inferos descendisse), that is because he had from being under the sovereignty of Guntchramnus been made subject to Chilperic. These letters, together with the men upon whom they were found, were sent by the aforesaid count under a strong guard to the king, who quietly sent for the bishop in order to discuss the matter with him and ascertain whether the allegations made against him were true or not.

"When the bishop arrived, the king had the two men brought face to face with him, and asked the bishop if the letters had been directed by him. The bishop denied that they had been directed by him. But the men were asked from whom they received them. They say from the deacon Frontonius. The bishop is questioned about the deacon, and replies that he is his principal enemy, and that there could be no doubt that he was the author of this wickedness, as he had so often plotted against the bishop. The deacon is brought up without delay, and being interrogated by the king, he says, 'I dictated this letter by order of the bishop, who often complained as if he had been deposed from the bishopric.' The king moved with compassion forgave them both, mercifully interceding with the bishop in behalf of the deacon and asking for his prayers. Thus was he sent back with honour to his city."

The whole of this chapter is rejected as spurious by Le Cointe for two reasons. 1. Because it is wanting in the Corbeian Codex, in the Colbertine, and in that of Metz. 2. Because it does not accord with the known character of king Chilperic, who being severe in inflicting punishment, ought either to have condemned the bishop of high treason, or the deacon Frontonius for calumny. But these two arguments have been confuted by Ruinart. 1. Because eight MSS. codices of Gaul and Italy contain that chapter, as well as all the common editions of Gregory. 2. That Chilperic was not so cruel as he is represented; that if he was cruel it was because in this respect he followed the wishes of his wife more than his own. Adrianus Valesius says that Chilpericus, when not under the influence of his furious spouse, was easy of approach, gentle and patient of injury. Fortunatus praises his lenity.

In the year 585 Gondovaldus, who called himself the son of Clotarius and claimed the kingdom, visited Angoulême. Having received the oaths of the soldiers, he proceeded to Périgueux and left the bishop (Charterius) seriously offended because he had not been received by him. In the same year Charterius was present at the second synod of Mâcon (Matisconensis). (Gregor. Turon. Hist. lib. vii. cap. 22 and 19, lib. vii. cap. 26; Gall. Christ. ii. pp. 1453, 1454.) [D. R. CHELIDONIUS and HAEMATERIUS, brothers, soldiers, martyred at the Gascon town of Calagurris (Calahorra, in Castile). The date of their martyrdom is wholly uncertain. They are honoured with a hymn by Prudentius, περὶ στερῶν 4 (1), which is quoted by Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. 93). The poet laments (vv. 73 ff.) that the official record of the trial and execution had been purposely destroyed by the persecutors. In this lack of genuine acta a marvellous legend gained currency, that the ring of one saint and the handkerchief (orarium) of the other had been seen flying up to heaven when they were beheaded. This legend is accepted by Prudentius (vv. 81 ff.) and Gregory. Other acts, which add little or nothing to our knowledge, are given by the Bollandists (AA. SS. March, i. 229 ff.) The day of the martyrdom of the saints is fixed to March 3 by Gregory. For the origin of the legend we can only conjecture that the pagans were as anxious to make away with all relics of the saints as with the records of their martyrdom, and that the faithful consoled themselves by fanciful explanations of natural aerial phenomena in the clouds. In his hymn to Hippolytus (v. 237), Prudentius couples their festival with those of Cyprian and Eulalia. The names appear in the so-called Martyrology of Jerome in the following forms: March 3, "Depositio reliquorum Emeritae, Cellidoni . . . item Emeriti . . . item Ecaeledoni." And on Sept. 29 we find, "et alibi Januarii, Sosii, Ampuni, Celedoni, Justini." (D'Achery, Spicilegium, t. iv.)

CHILDEBERT I., one of the four sons of Clovis, among whom their father's kingdom was divided in 511. Childebert's capital was Paris, and his share embraced the territory between the Seine, Loire, and the sea, including part of Armorica (Bonnell, Anfänge d. Karolingischen Häuser, pp. 200-201). On the death of Clodomir and the murder of his sons [CHLODOMERIS] Childebert acquired Orléans, and the surrounding territory. (Bonnell, p. 202.) During the absence of Theodoric in his war against the Thuringians, Childebert attempted to make himself master of the Auvergne, on an invitation from certain disaffected subjects of Theodoric in that country. For the probable causes of this disaffection, see Fauriel, Histoire de la Gaule Méridionale, ii. 111 ff. Theodoric returned, and Childebert retired. (Greg. Tur. iii. 9-10.) Childebert then (531) proceeded to attack the Visigoths in Narbonne. He rescued his sister Clotilda; Amalaric was killed, and Childebert came home with much treasure. (Greg. iii. 10.) In the following year 532, Childebert, with his brother Clotaire attacked the Burgundians, laid siege to Autun and conquered the country. Theodoric refused to join in this expedition, but dying the next year his son Theodebert, whom Childebert and Clotaire had previously tried to depose, shared at any rate in the division of the conquered territory. (Greg. iii. 11, 23.) See G. Richter

Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, sub anno 532, notes and ref. In the war between the Eastern empire and the Ostrogoths in Italy, it appears that at first (535) an alliance was concluded between Justinian and the Frankish kings by which a sum of money was to be paid to the Franks, and they were to be allowed to make themselves masters of Provence. In the following year, on the other hand, a secret alliance was made with Vitiges against Justinian. At all events Childebert appears to have become the actual possessor of Provence. (See Bonnell, p. 204; Richter, s. a. and notes.) In 542 Childebert and Clotaire undertook a joint expedition against Theudes, the Visigothic king in Spain. They took Pampluna, besieged Saragossa, and laid waste the lands on both sides of the Ebro; but were eventually compelled to retreat. (Greg. iii. 29; Richter, op. cit.) Pope Vigilius appears to have instructed his vicar in Gaul, the archbishop of Arles, to endeavour to maintain friendly relations between Childebert and Justinian, in the years 545 and 546 (Jaffé, Regesta, Nos. 593 and 596), and later, in 550, to induce Childebert to write to the Ostrogoths and their king in Rome to abstain from doing anything to the prejudice of the church. (Jaffé, No. 605; Baxmann, Politik der Päpste, p. 3. Cf. also for Childebert's relations with Pope Pelagius, Jaffé, 622, 627-30; Bouquet, iv. p. 71-74; Baxmann, p. 35.) In 557, during Clotaire's absence on a campaign against the Saxons, Childebert was induced to help Chramis, Clotaire's son, in a rising against his father. The rising was, however, unsuccessful, and on Clotaire's return Childebert retired. The following year, 558, Childebert died at Paris, and Clotaire became king of the united Frankish realm. (Greg. iv. 16-20.) [T. R. B.]

CHILDEBERT II., son of Sigebert I. and Brunehilde, was only five years old at the time of his father's murder in 575. He was proclaimed king by the Austrasian nobles at Reims (Greg. v. 1) or Metz (Hist. Epit. 72). In 577 Childebert was adopted as heir and successor to Guntram his uncle, king of Orleans and Burgundy (Greg. v. 18). During the civil wars of this time the Austrasian nobles induced Childebert to change from the side of Guntram to that of Chilperic, and vice versa as suited their own advantage. It was during Childebert's minority that the Frankish nobility at last seriously began to encroach upon the royal authority (cf. Löbell, Greg. von Tours, 190 sqq.). In 585 Childebert apparently went with a Frankish force against the Lombards in Italy, in accordance with a treaty previously concluded with the Eastern emperor, by which Maurice gave a sum of money on condition that the Franks should expel the Lombards from Italy (Greg. vi. 42). The Frankish chiefs quarrelled amongst themselves and the expedition was without result. Compare a letter from Pope Gregory II. (Jaffé, Regesta, No. 684), in which he bids the orthodox kings of the Franks, who are to be by the divine grace the neighbours and protectors of Rome and Italy, to separate themselves from all friendship and connexion with the Lombards (cf. also Bouquet, iv. 82-91; Baxmann, Politik der Päpste, 39). In 538 another expedition was made against the Lombards, but the Franks were severely beaten (tanta fuit strages de Francorum exercitu, ut olim similis non recolatur, Greg. ix. 25). In the following year a treaty was made, but in 590 Childebert again invaded Northern Italy, taking a number of fortresses, and penetrating as far as Verona, but eventually having to retire on account of famine and disease (Greg. x. 3; Paul. Diac. iii. 30). Peace was concluded in the following year (Paul. D. iv. 1). In 587, after the repression of a conspiracy of the chiefs against Brunehilde and Childebert, a treaty was concluded at Andelot between Guntram and Childebert and Brunehilde. The territorial limits of the two kingdoms were fixed, Childebert obtaining certain territories between the Marne and the Oise; also Touraine, Poitou, and part of Aquitaine (Greg. ix. 10, 11; Bonnell, Anfänge d. Karol. Hauses, 217); Childebert was declared Guntram's heir. In 593 Guntram died and Childebert became king of Austrasia, Burgundy, and of all the Frankish land south of the Loire. He made an unsuccessful attempt against his cousin Clotaire's kingdom. In the East he subdued the Warni in Northern Suabia (Fredegar, 15), and appointed Tassilo duke of the Bavarians (Paul. Diac. iv. 7). In 596 Childebert died, not without suspicion of poison. Gregory, who was a contemporary, speaks of him as "vir sapiens atque utilis, ut de multorum annorum aevo vix ita cautus homo reperiri possit ac streuuus" (viii. 4). We find the beginning of relations with Pope Gregory the Great during Childebert's reign. The pope writes to his vicar, the archbishop of Arles, to induce Childebert to do away with simony (Jaffé, Regesta, Nos. 1004-6), also he commends Augustine and his missionary monks to Brunehilde's protection on their way to England (Jaffé, 1073; cf. Baxmann, Politik der Päpste, 84; Ruckert, Culturgeschichte, ii. 477 sqq.; Fehr, Staat und Kirche im fränkischen Reiche bis auf Carl dem Grossen, 301-4).

CHILDEBERT III. was raised to the throne of the Franks in 695, on the death of his brother Clovis III. He reigned under Grimoald, son of Pippin, as mayor of the palace, sixteen years, dying in 711. He was buried at Choisy, and succeeded by Dagobert III. (Fredegar, Cont. 101, 104). For his benefactions to monasteries see documents, ap. Brequigny, vol. ii.) [T. R. B.]

CHILDERIC I. (CHILDERICH), king of the Salian Franks, and father of Clovis, according to the Gesta Reg. Franc. 9, reigned from 458 to 481. There is little to record of his life. The story of his banishment and subsequent restoration, as related by Gregory of Tours (ii. 12), is probably legendary. See Junghans, pp. 11 sq. (Die Geschichte der Fränkischen Könige Childerich und Chlodovech, kritisch untersucht, von Wilhelm Junghans, Göttingen, 1857), and on the other side Löbell, Gregor von Tours, Excursus. Childeric appears to have been in close connexion with the Roman power in Gaul, and to have fought as Egidius's ally against the Visigoths in 463. Cf. Junghans, p. 18; Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, ii. 48. Though a heathen, Childeric had friendly relations with the Catholic church. He had the greatest reverence for St. Geneviève, and reprieved some prisoners at her instance

(Vita S. Genovefæ, ap. Bouquet, iii. 370). Compare also Greg. Tur. ii. 23, and Junghans, p. 17. Ruckert (Culturgeschichte des Deutschen Volkes in der Zeit des Uebergangs aus dem Heidenthum in das Christenthum) has a chapter on the relations of the Frankish kings to Christianity before the conversion of Clovis. Childeric's capital was Tournai, and there, in 1653, his tomb was discovered and opened. See J. J. Chifflet, Anastasis Childerici I., Antwerp, 1655, and Cochet, Le Tombeau de Childéric I^{er}, restitué à l'aide de l'Archéologie, Paris, 1859. Also see generally Annalen der Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, von Dr. Gustav Richter, vol. i. 1873. [T. R. B.]

CHILDERIC II. (CHILDERICH), son of Clovis II., was chosen king of the Eastern or Austrasian Franks in 660 (Vita S. Balthildis, 5). His mayor of the palace was Wulfoald. In 670, on the death of Clotaire III., the Neustrian king, Ebroin, his mayor, endeavoured to place Theodoric (afterwards Theodoric III.) upon that throne. The Neustrian chiefs however rose, deposed both Ebroin and Theodoric, and made Childeric king of the united realm. Bishop Leodegar was the leader in this movement against Ebroin, and he directed the affairs of the Western kingdom until 673, when he was overthrown and banished to the monastery of Luxeuil. Wulfoald's rule soon became equally distasteful, and at the end of the same year Wulfoald was banished, and Childeric with his wife murdered in the Forest of Bondy (Gesta Fr. 45; Fredegar, Cont. 94, 95). Childeric was buried in the church of St. Germain des Prés at Paris. He appears as a benefactor to various monasteries. See the documents in Bréquigny's Collection, Pardessus' edition; see also generally G. Richter's Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, vol. i. sub annis. [T. R. B.]

CHILDERIC III. (CHILDERICH), the last Frankish king of the Merovingian family, supposed to have been the son of Chilperic II., though his actual parentage is uncertain, was placed upon the throne by Carloman and Pippin, mayors of the palace, sons of Charles Martel, in 743, after an interregnum of six years since the death of Theodoric IV. in 737. (For the chronology see Richter's Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, sub anno 743 n.) Childeric is reputed to have been of weak intellect: anyhow the power was entirely in the hands of the mayor of the palace, and in 751 Pippin, with the assent of pope Zacharias, deposed Childeric, cut off the long hair, the token of royalty, and shut him up in a monastery, himself assuming the royal title (cf. Ann. Laur. sub an. 749, "Et Zacharias papa mandavit Pippino, ut melius esset illum regem vocari, qui potestatem haberet quam illum qui sine regali potestate manebat; ut non conturbaretur ordo, per auctoritatem apostolicam jussit Pippinum regem fieri"). On the question of the 'rois fainéants,' see Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, iii. 47 n. 3; and Warnkönig et Gérard, Histoire des Carolingiens, i. 137. [T. R. B.]

CHILIANUS, Hiberno-Scottish martyr in Franconia. (Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 340.) [CILIAN.] [C. H.]

CHILIASTS, from the Greek word for 1000, whom the Latins for the same reason called "Millenarians." As St. Augustine says, in speaking of the followers of Cerinthus—the heretic against whose errors St. John is said to have published his gospel—"Mille annos post resurrectionem in terreno regno Christi secundum carnales ventris et libidinis voluptates futuros fabulantur: unde etiam Chiliaste sunt appellati" (Hæc. viii.). Of course they held other errors besides this: and even as regards this, it was for characterising it as a reign of sensual enjoyments that they were called heretics. This, however, Cerinthus, who was a Jew by birth, inherited probably from tradition—"Mille annorum Judaiacam δευτέραων," as St. Jerome calls it (De Vir. Illust. c. 18)—rather than invented, and then, having been educated at Alexandria, developed from the Pythagorean and Platonic schools (Heyne ad Aen. vi. 743-51, Excurs. xiii.). Later, he seems to have propagated his opinions in Asia Minor (Euseb. E. H. iv. 14); but they survived him in Egypt, for it is Dionysius of Alexandria who tells us that the views entertained by him on the millennium were current there still; and that a bishop named Nepos, amongst others, had espoused them: but that he had at length succeeded in getting them disavowed. Dionysius adds, apropos to this subject, that some of his own predecessors had, in consequence, gone so far as to maintain that instead of the Apocalypse being by St. John, it was but a work published by Cerinthus in his name. This, however, was an opinion in which he owns he could not concur himself (ib. vii. 24).

We now come to those who maintained a millennium, but without these errors. Eusebius himself, in speaking of Papias bishop of Hierapolis, a hearer of St. John and fellow-disciple with St. Polycarp, charges him with teaching several things more mythic than true; and among them that after the resurrection a period of 1000 years would ensue, during which the kingdom of Christ would be established upon earth bodily; misinterpreting, in the opinion of Eusebius, what he had learnt from the apostles, and misleading others, of whom St. Irenæus was one (ib. c. 39). St. Irenæus, however, it must be allowed, was less likely to have been misinformed on what the apostles taught than Eusebius; and the Apocalypse being admitted to be the work of St. John, whatever we find in it is no longer a Jewish tradition but a Christian verity. Since then, in ch. xx. of that book, the period of 1000 years is identified no less than six times with the duration of the reign of Christ and his saints, and with that alone, it is quite clear that in whatever sense this was intended, a millennium would be taught with truth. It is another thing whether that sense has been ascertained as yet; and it must be admitted anyhow that no view of the millennium has been propounded hitherto which has obtained general credence, or rather which has not been opposed. St. Justin Martyr, in deposing to his own entire belief in it, and to its being held by others, admits frankly that there were many good Christians who denied it (Dial. c. Tryph. § 80-82). His idea was that the 1000 years would be spent in Jerusalem rebuilt, adorned, and enlarged, in the way described by Ezekiel and the other prophets, Isaiah lxxv. 17 sqq. particularly. St. Irenæus, if the Latin version of the last five chapters of his fifth and last book against heresies was all translated from what he wrote, is still more full and explicit in interpreting prophecy to the effect that it is a literal reign upon earth which is there contemplated; and such, he adds, was not merely the view entertained by Papias, but presbyters who had been acquainted personally with St. John, remembered to have heard him say it was what our Lord had taught of those times Himself (ib. xxxiii. 3, 4). St. Jerome, nevertheless, in crediting Tertullian, (De spe fid. &c. Marc. iii. 24), Victorinus (in Apocal.), Lactantius (Div. Inst. vii. 24-26), Apollinarius, and Severus, with similar opinions, calls them Jewish fables in one place (in Ezek. c. xxxvi.): in another, indeed, he admits he cannot condemn them, though unable to accept them, as having been held by so many churchmen and martyrs (in Jerem. c. xix.). The only complete commentary on the Revelation in patristic literature, that of Primasius bishop of Utica, who must have known all that St. Jerome and others had said of them, makes no allusion to them whatever. On the other hand, St. Augustine, the great oracle of the African church, owns to having held them himself at one time (De Civ. xx. 7). Then, in giving his reasons for subsequently dissenting from them, he sketched the outlines of another theory, which although he left unfinished, anybody may fill up for himself with ease. Thus he saw clearly that the binding of Satan and the reigning of Christ covered the same period, commencing with the foundation of the Christian church—hence called so commonly “the kingdom of heaven”—by its divine Founder, and lasting to the end of time—“Regnat itaque ecclesia cum Christo nunc primum in vivis et in mortuis . . . sed ideo nutritum tantum animis commemoravit, quia ipsi precipue regnant post mortem, qui usque ad mortem pro veritate certaverunt . . . Neque enim piorum animae mortuorum separantur ab ecclesia, quae etiam nunc est regnum Christi. Alioquin nec ad altare Dei fieret eorum memoria in communicatione corporis Christi . . . cur enim fiunt ista, nisi quia fideles, etiam defuncti, membra ejus sunt?” (ib. 9, § 3). And thus the period of 1000 years is their sabbath, or rest in heaven—the seventh day that “has no evening”—and is coincident with the 2000 years foreshadowed by “the morning and evening” of the sixth day, and predetermined to be spent on earth by the church-militant. Wherever reigning on earth is contemplated in the Apocalypse, it is a future thing, nor is it said to be with Christ, nor is any limit to its duration suggested; wherever reigning 1000 years is contemplated, it is what is then going on, and said to be with Christ, but without any mention of earth: a resurrection which is, however, before the general resurrection, and in which only souls reign. Both Primasius and Bede saw plainly whither his suggestions tended, but paused on the threshold. Even the learned editor of the Oxford translation of Tertullian (note D. p. 120) has apparently failed to appreciate them while contributing a mass of information on the subject in general. [E. S. CHILLIANUS SCOTUS (Fordun, Scotichr. ib. iii. c. 44, ed. Skene, vol. i. 129). [CILIAN.]

duties of a monastic life by a letter attributed in one copy to NILUS, but generally included in the works of BASIL the Great (Ep. 42). Ceillier (iv. 435-437) points out that this and the four succeeding letters must, as far as the criterion of style can decide, stand or fall together, and that the 5th is cited entire as Basil's by Metaphrastes, though it has been rejected by critics, because it speaks of the saint's visit to Jerusalem, by no means an improbable event, but one of which we have no other evidence. The advice given to Chilo is to the effect that he should deprive himself of pleasures one by one, patiently and quietly; avoid ostentation; pray for people, instead of going to pray over them; spend his time in reading the New Testament chiefly, since many have done themselves harm by the perusal of the Old; avoid profusion in hospitality; dread money, and if people try to intrust him with a stock for charitable purposes, bid them do their charities themselves; not let the desire of attending church services entice him from his retreat.

CHILON (2) A church servant, who is severely rebuked by Nilus (Ep. ii. 158, p. 195) for his inability to keep a secret. [E. B. B.]

CHILPERIC I. (CHILPERICH), the youngest of the four sons of Clotaire I., amongst whom their father's kingdom was divided in 561 (Greg. Tur. iv. 3). Chilperic, thinking himself unfairly dealt with, seized Paris, and attempted to increase his share by conquest. His brothers drove him out of Paris, and on a division being made Chilperic obtained the original kingdom of Clotaire I. with Soissons as capital, including also Cambrai, Tournai, Rouen, &c., together with the greater part of Armorica. On the death of Charibert in 567 Chilperic obtained as his share a third part of Paris, which thus became a kind of federal capital (Greg. vi. 27, vii. 6), together with some possessions in Aquitaine. See Bonnell, Anjûnse d. Karol. Hauses, pp. 214, 215. During Sigebert's absence on a campaign against the Avars, Chilperic invaded his kingdom and took Rheims. Sigebert returning victorious expelled Chilperic and made himself master of Chilperic's capital of Soissons (Greg. iv. 23). About this same time Chilperic married Galsuintha, the elder sister of Brunehilde, daughter of the Visigothic king Athanagild. He very speedily, however, caused her to be murdered, and married his former concubine Fredegund (Greg. iv. 28). Compare for this marriage, and for the domestic relations generally of the Merovingian kings, Löbell, Gregor von Tours, pp. 23 sqq. In 573 a second civil war broke out between Childebert and Sigebert, and for two years Gaul was devastated. Its miserable state and that of the church are forcibly depicted by Gregory (iv. 48), “fuit illo in tempore pejor in ecclesia gemitus, quam tempore persecutionis Diocletiani.” In 575 Sigebert, having carried everything before him and shut up Chilperic in Tournai, was treacherously murdered at the instance of Fredegund, leaving a child [CHILDEBERT II.] of five years old to succeed him (Greg. iv. 52). The rest of the reign of Chilperic was one of almost uninterrupted civil war against his nephew Childebert and against Guntram his eldest brother, whose capital was at Orleans, and who ruled over Burgundy. There was treachery on all sides, and disaffection within Chilperic's own family of his son Merovechus, who had married Brunehilde (Greg. v. 1). In 584, in the midst of his wars, Chilperic was murdered at Chelles, leaving as his successor an infant son Clotaire II. (Greg. vi. 46).

Chilperic is the most conspicuous instance of the unrestrained character of the Merovingian kingship; cf. Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, ii. 150-3. His despotic nature shewed itself in every field. His taxation was oppressive (Greg. v. 29), and when it caused an émeute the rising was put down with the greatest severity, blinding being one of his punishments. When prompted by passion he was utterly uncontrolled; nevertheless, he was seldom wanting in acuteness, and for the attainment of his ends he was often content to bide his time (Greg. v. 44, 50; vi. 36; vi. 22). He invented four new letters, and insisted on their being adopted in the instruction of youth. He wrote two books of poems, which Gregory scoffs at, but Fortunatus praises. He had rationalistic views upon the doctrine of the Trinity, which he characteristically wished to force upon the church (Greg. v. 45; Rückert, Culturgeschichte, ii. 145, n. 5); whilst at the same time he was superstitious (Greg. v. 14, vi. 27-41) and an intolerant persecutor of the Jews (Greg. vi. 5-17). As regards his relations to the church, Gregory, who calls him the "Nero and Herod" of his age, adds that churches were the special objects of his hate, bishops the most frequent butts for his jokes; "Lo," he would say, "our purse is empty, our wealth is transferred to the church, none but bishops really reign, our dignity is gone, gone to the bishops" (vi. 46). On this passage and on Chilperic's relation to Gregory himself, v. Löbell, Gregor von Tours, pp. 278 sqq., also pp. 30-33, and pp. 160 sqq. for his character generally. At pp. 175 sq. the same author, quoting Greg. v. 35, endeavours to shew, as against Guizot, Sismondi, Waitz, &c., that, notwithstanding all their oppression, the throne of the Merovingian kings was firmly rooted in the hearts of the people. [T. R. B.]

CHILPERIC II. (CHILPERICH), son of Childeric II., on his father's murder in 673, was confined in a monastery and afterwards ordained priest under the name of Daniel (Gest. Reg. Fr. 52). On the death of Dagobert III., in 715, the Neustrian Franks raised Chilperic to the throne. Ragenfred, mayor of the palace, and the Neustrian nobles waged civil war in Chilperic's name against Charles Martel and the Austrasians [CHARLES MARTEL]. On the defeat of the Neustrians, in 719, and the death of Clotaire IV., Charles, as mayor of the whole kingdom, recognised Chilperic as king. In the following year (720) Chilperic died and was buried at Noyon (Gest. i. 53). [T. R. B.]

CHIMASIUS (Χειμάσιος), one of the contentious monks chidden by Nilus in the 5th century (Ep. ii. 77). [E. B. B.]

CHINEBERTUS (Hen. Hunt. Hist. Angl. M. H. B. 726), bishop of the Lindisfari. [CYNEBERT.] [C. H.]

CHINEGISLUS (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, vol. i. p. 45), king of the West Saxons. [CYNEGILS.] [C. H.]

CHIONIA, martyred by fire at Thessalonica under Count Sisinnius in the reign of Diocletian commemorated on April 1, with her sister Agape, who shared her martyrdom. They were sisters of Irene, another martyr of the same city. (Bed Mart. April 1 and 5). [C. H.]

CHLODOBERT. [CLODOBERT.]

CHLODOMER [CLODOMIR.]

CHLODOWIG. [CLOVIS.]

CHLODULPHUS, ST., confessor, bishop of Metz. One of the thirty saints enumerated in the ancient catalogues and martyrologies of the church of Metz (Meurissius episc. Madaurensis et hujus ecclesie Suffraganeus in Prefatione ad Historiam episcoporum ecclesie Metensis). This saint belonged to an illustrious family, through which the usurper Pippin traced his origin to the old kings of France. His father, St. Arnulphus, was the son of Arnoaldus, duke of Austrasia, and known as Boggisus. His great-grandfather was Auspertus, brother to St. Aigulfus, bishop of Metz, who is said to have been the son of Clothilde, the daughter of King Clovis. St. Arnulphus, after having been mayor of the palace to king Theodericus, took holy orders late in life, although he was married and had two sons. He was very soon made bishop of Metz, and his wife Doda then took the veil, and remained in the nunnery of Treves to the day of her death. He gave most of his property to the church, the rest to his sons Chlodulphus and Auchises. The latter generously gave up all his share to his father for the benefit of the poor, and was rewarded by being made, as his father had been before him, major-domus to the king, to which office his son and grandson succeeded after him. Pippinus being their descendant.

Chlodulphus, the other son, and the subject of this article, took holy orders, but was never a monk or a hermit. He succeeded his father in the bishopric of Metz. He is said to have been an excellent and renowned prelate, skilled alike in church and state. He lived in the 7th century, and is commemorated on the 8th of June (A.A. SS. June, ii. pp. 127-132). [D. R. J.]

CHLOTHARIUS or CHLOTACHARIUS. [CLOTAIRE.]

CHONBAL, one of the five chiefs of the 365 archons, presiding over the sphere of the planet Jupiter. [PISTIS SOPHIA, p. 362.]

CHONNUS, CHON, identified with Cædwalla king of the Britons in the following passage of the Annals of Tigernach (O'Conor, Ier. Lib. Scriptt. ii. 191), the marginal date being A.D. 631:—"Prolinm inter Edwinum filium Aelli regem Saxonum qui supra totam Britanniam regnavit, in quo victus est a Chonno (Hoano) rege Britonum et Penda Saxone." Another MS. reading is Chon. [CÆDWALLA (1).] [C. H.]

CHORENTINUS, another spelling of Corentinus, bishop of Quimper, q. v. In Usuard (Mart. ad Mai. 1, Auctaria; Patrol. tom. 124, p. 13), he is called bishop of Aquila in Lesser Britain. This Aquila must be the Aquilonia of Gall. Christ. xiv. 871, by which Quimper was sometimes called in the 11th century. His day in Usuard and in Beale (Mart. Auct.) is May 1. [C. H.]

CHOREUTAE. [EUCHITES.]

CHORZAR, regarded by the PERATAE as the true name of the power called Poseidon by the Greeks. (Hippol. Ref. v. 14.) [G. S.]

CHOSROES (Χοσροης), Khusrud (خوسرو) on coins,* Kesra (كسرى) in Arabic, Khusr

(خسرو) in modern Persian, Khosrov in Armenian, Kasré in Georgian, Huçrava in Zend; a name said to be applied in the Zendavesta, as well as in the Shah Nameh, to the great Cyrus, and which reappears in Sanskrit as Sushrvas, the exact equivalent of the Greek εὐκλής, "famous." The Hebrew אַחַשְׁרוּשׁ or אַחַשְׁרוּשׁ, Achashrosh or Achashverosh (Ahasuerus) points to identification with the Khshayarsha of the cuneiform inscriptions, the well-known Xerxes, a name that is once given by Malelas to the great Chosroes (Mal. p. 441), though there are difficulties in the way of this. Another desperate attempt to sputter out the guttural, Phthasuar-sas, is found in Theophanes (A.M. 6016). The name is certainly not a corruption of Kurush (Cyrus), nor can Kurush be a corruption of it, but the great king of that name may have borne this surname. (See for most of the facts Sir H. Rawlinson, in the Asiatic Journal, vol. x. p. 90; xi. (1849). pp. 112, 120; Benfey, Sansk. Dict. p. 965.) It seems to be in some sense a title common to Persian kings, as descended from Cyrus. Their throne is described in the Shah Nameh by terms which Mohl translates le trône des Chosroes. It was not, however, the common royal name of any line, as Arsaces was of the Parthians, but was borne individually by several monarchs. There was a great Arsacid king of the name in the time of TRAJAN, and another who opposed the rise of the Sassanid Ardeshir and his dynasty about A.D. 230, and twice in later times we read of a Chosroes descended from this Ardeshir, but not more closely connected with the reigning line, being set on the throne of Persia in a time of anarchy, A.D. 430 and A.D. 630 [ISDEGERDES], but we are here concerned mainly with two Christian Arsacid princes in Armenia, A.D. 316-325 or 345-354, and A.D. 384-391, and with two great Sassanid monarchs, A.D. 531-579, and A.D. 591-628, who, if not themselves ever, as some say, Christians, at any rate had Christian wives, and exercised no little influence on the fortunes of the church.

For the history of the Arsacid or Parthian dynasty, which ruled the East from the beginning of the 2nd century before Christ, and of the Sassanid or revived Persian dynasty that supplanted it at the beginning of the 3rd century after Christ, see the articles ARSACES and SASSANIDAE, in the Dictionary of Classical Biography, or for a fuller treatment the volumes by Rawlinson on the Sixth and Seventh Oriental Monarchies.

For convenience, we give here the chronological and genealogical successions (1) of the later Arsacids—Chosroes I., d. A.D. 237?; Tiridates, and his sister Chosroïducht; Chosroes II., d. A.D. 354. (The exact relationship of Chosroes III. of Armenia, or at first of Persarmenia only, is uncertain.) (2) Of the later Sassanids—Isdegerdes II. d. A.D. 457; Perozes, d. A.D. 486?; Cabades I., d. A.D. 531; Chosroes I. (Nushirvan), the Great, d. A.D. 579; Hormisdas IV., d. A.D. 591; Chosroes II. (Parviz), d. A.D. 628; Cabades II. (Siroes), d. A.D. 628; Isdegerdes III., d. A.D. 652.

As illustrations of the connexion of these Sassanidae with Christianity we may just mention two facts. (1.) The name of the chief treasurer of Cabades I., the father of Chosroes I., has been found coupled with that of Christ on a Greek inscription in North Africa. (2.) We have seen an impression, from a gem in the collection of Col. Pearse, found on the confines of North India, and referred by the Rev. C. W. King to the time of Chosroes II., bearing the usual Persian fire-altar with the legend below in Greek letters ΙΕΣΥ (Jesus).

The name, moreover, being so generic, it seems desirable to preface the separate biographies with some general observations respecting the peoples, the regions, and the period of which we are to treat; and then to enumerate authorities.

But for Canon Rawlinson's work our article could hardly have been written, but we believe our own essay, however imperfect, to contain (thanks to Professor Cowell, Mr. King, and Mr. Bensly) the first English reproduction of the historical treasures of the Shah Nameh, and the first modern attempt at collation of those earliest native traditions with the foreign documents contemporary with the events.

Character of the Times.—Parthians, Medes, and Elamites are named among the Jews present at the feast of Pentecost. The Jews were indeed dispersed as much to the East as to the West, and in the apostolic age, while Jerusalem was still the earthly centre of the church, it is probable that the gospel was carried as far in this direction as in that. The probability is confirmed by the absence of any certain knowledge in the West respecting the career of the twelve, and the traditions that refer the labours of several of them to Eastern regions. That the Parthian power was in the time of Christ the one counterpoise to the Roman, is recognised by several ancient authors (see Rawlinson, Sixth Monarchy, Preface), and by Milton (Par. Reg. iii. 267 ff.). We are, however, rendered blind to the early spread of Christianity in the far East by three facts, which are closely connected, and the reasons of which we are as far as possible here to investigate, namely, that it did not become the religion of the reigning dynasty, that it did not finally abolish the ancient national religion, and that it succumbed at last, more completely than in modern Turkey, to the onslaught of Islam.

The Parthians were a nomad, perhaps a Tartar race, who passed along with the other subjects of Persia beneath the sceptre of Alexander, but were the first to shake off the Greek yoke, and at length succeeded in carving out for themselves an empire between the Greek kingdoms of Syria and Bactria, when the one was weakened by the Maccabean revolt, and the other enfeebled by straining too much after conquests in North India. They were barbarians who had received some tincture both of Greek and of Persian civilisation. They allowed independence to the Greek cities in their empire, their kings delighted in the title Phil-Hellene, and the deities as well as the language of the legends on their coins are Greek. But they were not thoroughly Hellenised. On the other hand, Mithridates, the real founder of the empire, bears a Persian name, and restored the feudal system of Persia, and they permitted Magianism among their subjects. The Persian tradition was thus fostered and kept alive, while yet the real Persians felt that they were under a foreign yoke, and subject to an intellectually inferior race. About the beginning of the 2nd century after Christ a return from Greek towards Persian tendencies among the Parthians, seems to be indicated by the disuse of Greek on the coins of the inferior branches, nominally subject to, but really independent of, the Arsacid dynasty, and by the assumption of the name Chosroes by an Arsaces.

|| The Medes and Persians were Aryan races, and the Persians seem in many respects to have preserved with unusual freshness the frank simplicity of the primitive Aryan manners and worship. See the Cyropaëlia of Xenophon and Herodotus (i. 31-40). Their education comprised three points, to ride, to draw the bow, to speak the truth. The old Aryan worship seems to have been of the kind portrayed by Shakespeare in the sons of Cymbeline—

"Hail heaven!

Hail heaven!

Now for our mountain sport."

A ready tolerance for diversities of religious belief in others, and an adherence, as a point of honour, to hereditary forms, seem alike characteristic of Aryan races.

But the splendid vigour of the Persians had little real strength, and their purity was easily tarnished. Of all nations, says Herodotus, they most easily adopt foreign manners.

This may be partly due to the admixture of a Semitic with the Aryan element. Susa was in Elam, and Elam was a son of Shem. There is a large Semitic element in the Pehlvi language, spoken under the Sassanidae. Both the ancient and the revived Persian dynasties seem to have combined the adventurous spirit of the Aryans with the magnificent repose of a stately luxury like that of Solomon or of Croesus, while the Hamitic tendencies towards the development of a complex commercial and mechanical civilisation as in Egypt, Phœnicia, and Babylon, seem to have been wanting.

In religion, the comparative purity of the Zoroastrian creed seems to have been due, not so much to a firm persistence in the primitive tradition as to a reaction and reform at a certain definite epoch. The Devas, the gods of the Hindoos, and Indra among them, are the devils of the Persians. Something of Semitic vehemence and iconoclasm breaks through the usual Aryan tolerance in the Persians. It appears notably in the campaign of Cambyses. The revolt of the Sassanidae was a reaction against Parthian idolatry, a vindication of the purity of Zoroastrianism. The first rise of Zoroastrianism has been supposed nearly contemporary with the victory of Abraham over Chedorlaomer. But modern scholars, while refusing to pronounce upon its exact epoch, have no doubt that it is subsequent to the 12th century B.C. Alone of national religions, not historically traceable to Abraham, it makes some approach towards monotheism. But it stopped far short of it, as is clearly pointed out by Isaiah (xlv. 7).

The chivalry of ancient Persia relieved the world from the tyranny of Babylon, and we shall see reason to suppose that a hardly less important office was performed for Gothic Christendom by the chivalry of the Sassanidae. But to the Babylonian monarch in his vision the power that was to succeed him appeared inferior both in substance and form to his own. The Persian empire never had for centre and metropolis a single vast city of royal splendour and ancient learning. Ctesiphon could not, any more than Susa, Ecbatana or Persepolis, rival the renown of ancient Babylon, or of the Bagdad of the caliphs. The empire was the empire of a nation, not of a city. It was the freer, but also the weaker. And to the Hebrew captive seer the two did but appear as different wild beasts struggling together, and the forms under which Persia was shadowed forth to him, the bear and the ram, seem to betoken a certain clumsiness and immobility in the nature of their rule. In their religion, the belief in the co-eternity of Ahriman (Angromainyus) blighted the hopes of the good, and encouraged the machinations of men like Haman. And this was not the only belief that obscured their trust in the power of Ormuzd. His throne had rivals among his subordinates as well as in his great antagonist. MITHRA and Serosh appear originally to have corresponded to the Apollo and the Hermes of the Greeks, Hermes in his nobler capacities, but the worship of Mithra was early debased with Babylonian orgies, that induced Herodotus to confound him with the Hamitic Urania. Moreover the four elements, especially fire, were regarded as divine; and the kings of Neo-Persia were deified, as much as the Roman Caesars. In their domestic life, the institution of polygamy; in their polity, an absolute and capricious despotism of the king over the nobles, a barbarous cruelty of torture, a sacerdotal caste, a court such as results when feudalism sinks into absolutism, and a permanent barrier prohibiting the very wealthiest of the common people from attaining to distinction or obtaining a liberal education—all concur to stamp their civilisation as less capable of healthy developments. Their rule would have been stifling. But they were unable to impress their institutions on conquered races. They pulled down mightily; they failed to organise, to impregnate with their ideas, to implant their customs.

Many social observances were connected with the Persian religion, which made it impossible to force it on subject races. In particular, their reverence for all four elements forbade their either burning or burying their dead. They exposed them, as the Parsees do to this day, to be devoured by the fowls of the air. This fact has been of no small importance in nerving the resistance, and prolonging the existence of the Armenian church.

The Armenian mountaineers, who were of Aryan race, preserved a certain national, though rarely a political, independence between the two great powers of which their country was ever and again the battle-ground. Armenia was the last refuge of the Arsacids when they were driven out by the Sassanids. And when forced to flee even thence to take shelter with Rome, they retained some hold on the popular affections, till they were restored by Roman influence. Nor was this loyal fidelity altogether shaken by the conversion of these princes to Christianity, an event which, though not at all a political move, could not be without political results. Had it not been for Persia, they would perhaps never have succeeded in carrying their subjects with them. There had long been a flourishing church at Edessa, but Orhoene was distinct from Armenia. From Armenia came the Paulicians, and so in due succession the Albigenes of the West. [CONSTANTINUS SILVANUS; PAULICIANS.]

From their geographical position the Arsacid and Sassanid dynasties afforded not only a counterpoise to the Roman power, and a harbour for refugees, but a protection against barbarian inroads from the East. The pretext for the wars of Cavades and Chosroes was found in the refusal of the Romans to take their due share in defending the civilised world from the Turks. When the wars began, the Syrian provinces lay very much at the mercy of the Persian invader. It was partly in order to resist this great civilised Eastern power more effectually, that the seat of empire was transferred from Rome to Byzantium; and the ever-recurring distraction of this danger in the rear made it impossible either to present a firm front to the Teutonic invaders, or to recover ground from them permanently, when they were at last divided and enfeebled, and thus prevented Western Christendom from becoming irretrievably Byzantine. If Persia kept off the Turks, she fostered the inroads of the Saracens, and prepared the way for Islam (v. Kingsley, The Roman and the Teuton, pp. 333-338).

Mohl remarks how much more space is occupied in the Persian annals by wars with the East than by wars with Rome. Persia faces Rome with arrogance, but Tartary with alarm, if not with abject terror. The royal residences were on the Western frontier. The war with Rome was a regular war on a fortified frontier; the incursions of the Turks came unforeseen, menaced a far wider range of country, and woke an ancient hatred of race between Iran and Turan that is as living to-day as 3000 years ago. (Le Livre des Rois, vol. vi. preface.)

But it was not only by military operations that Persia influenced Europe. It did so also by doctrine and by example.

The Aryan race of Persia forms a link between the Greeks and the Hindus. It must have been through Persia, if at all, that Christian influences permeated to the Punjab, and it was through Persia, chiefly, that Buddhist influences found their way into Christendom [MANI]. Nor were more purely Persian forms of doctrine without their importance at Rome [MITHRA].

What the effect upon Persia may have been of intercourse with the nomad hordes of Central Asia, and even with China, it is more difficult to say. The ferment of religious opinions seems to present some analogy to the state of things in modern Russia, and we shall treat of the rise of a communistic sect suppressed by the great Chosroes more than 1200 years before the French Revolution. All this affected Europe. Thus we pass from the influence of their teaching to the effect of their example. (Cf. De Broglie, L'Église et l'Empire, i. p. 20, ed. 1867.)

As the Sassanids came into power by a revolt that was at once national and religious, their rule was based on the alliance of church and state. This was quite a different principle from the union of the two in ancient Greece and Rome. But it gave them such strength that the Roman emperor was soon their prisoner. They set an example which it was impossible for the adherents of an effete religion to follow. But the model which they furnished was copied, perhaps unconsciously, by Constantine and Theodosius and Justinian; Julian in vain endeavoured to imitate it. Ardeshir's conference of Magi may almost be regarded as the precedent for the council of Nice. The religion which they published was the religion of a book. They fixed the limits of the Zendavesta, which then assumed its present form. But the priests had a holy office quite apart from the preservation and exposition of the holy books. They were the guardians of the sacred fire that was never to be let die. The wars of Chosroes were religious wars, a foreshadowing of Islam, the first warning drops of that storm.

Of minor points in which the influence of the Sassanidae has reached us, chiefly through Saracens and Crusaders, we may note—

1. The architecture, which they borrowed from the Arabs, perfected by the help of Byzantine, Indian and Chinese workmen, and returned, probably with interest, to the caliphs; and to which we owe such buildings as St. Mark's at Venice.—

2. The example they set of translating into their own vernacular the works of Greek philosophy, and the practical turn that they seem to have given to this, directing it to statecraft, or to medicine or engineering. It was by the Persian caliphs, the Abbassides, not the Omniades, that this example was followed.—

3. The fact that their armaments, like the armies of mediæval Europe, consisted of a heavy-armed cavalry, and of archery on foot. The Romans borrowed their tactics, the example being first set by Alexander Severus, and taught them to the Teutons.

But besides their direct influence on ourselves, the hindrances or facilities afforded by their rule for the occupation of the vast mission fields of Asia are a subject that should not fail to interest us. We are too apt, perhaps, to congratulate ourselves on conquests which, though really new, are in one sense, but a recovery of lost ground. Where now we have a single missionary, there was of old an embattled church. [NESTORIANS.]

It is in these regions, as far as we have been able to discover, that we have the earliest instances of the sword being drawn distinctly in the cause of Christ, of the church becoming, in a worldly sense, mi/it'ant; nor did the prediction fail of fulfilment, "They that take the sword shall perish with the sword." But it is strange that we should be indebted to a heathen tradition and a Moslem poet for the touching and noble story of Nushizad, the Christian son of Chosroes. Yet there are advantages for us in this mode of transmission; the speeches attributed to the actors in this affair have a value apart from the question of their authenticity. They represent the conceptions of Christian character entertained at an early date in the East by men not Christians. We learn that one obstacle to the advance of Christianity in Persia was a national, patrician pride, and that the Gospel had power to transmute this into a lofty self-respect, tempered with genuine humility. There was no such obstacle to the spread of the doctrine of Mahomet: he did not preach Christ crucified. Thus, almost at the cradle of Islam, we are brought face to face with the question of the effect produced on uncivilised or half-civilised races by contact with a corrupt civilisation, especially when the races are heathen, and the civilisation is nominally Christian.

The Christian chroniclers of this period force upon us the conviction that the devastations of the Eastern Church were the inevitable result of its corruptions. The very air seemed heavy with judgment. Auroras, meteoric dust-showers, burning droughts, excessive rains, intense frosts, famines, pestilences, cattle-plagues, earthquakes, may denote a period of unusual activity in the solar orb. But frivolity, avarice, vice, superstition, sectarian fury in Christians, were the occasions of the adversities of the church. Conversion to Christianity is adoption into a family, and what could be expected when the chief advantages that the family seemed to offer were superior luxuries? Christian belief requires effort; an indolent dread of Ahri-man might easily give place to the more comfortable acquiescence in the omnipotence of Allah. But Islam, thus haughty, and yet thus submissive, however it may devastate, does not threaten the demolition of society by upheaval from beneath. Creeds that arise in contact with a debased Christianity may develop yet more anarchic forces and appeal more directly to the lowest passions; like the strange communistic religion that sprang up in the days of the Sassanidae, gained a royal pro-se-lyte, and was propagated in the West. A glance at modern Russia may illustrate the importance of the history of the power which of old intervened between Europe and the hordes of Asia. As we study it, we seem to behold and hear an angel flying through the midst of heaven, saying with a loud voice, "Woe, woe, woe to the inhabitants of the earth, by reason of the other voices of the trumpet, which are yet to sound!"

Authorities accessible for the history of this period are divisible into various classes.

A. The native Persian, and these of several kinds.

(a.) The inscriptions and the legends on coins and gems, the only contemporary native authorities. The ancient Pehlvi language and character, in which they are engraved, was first deciphered by Baron De Sacy, after the time of Gibbon, from a bilingual inscription at Roustam (Mémoires sur la Perse, 1793), and both the language (which is intermediate between the Zend and the Parsee), and the alphabet (which is Semitic), still present many difficulties. The coins are treated by Longpérier (Mémoires des Sassanides, Paris, 1844), and in sundry papers by Thomas in the Asiatic Journal. The coinage chiefly supplies us with means of ascertaining the separate identity of kings whom historians confuse, and with some information as to the lengths of the several reigns.

(b.) Shah Nameh, or the Book of Kings, an epic poem in Persian, by a Moslem poet named Abul K'azim Firdusi, in the 10th century of our era, inaccessible to Gibbon, and not used by Rawlinson, but published in a very costly form, with a French translation and prefaces, as far as the reign of Hormuzd, who came between the two Khosrus, by the late M. Mohl, is said by that scholar to be probably based during the period that concerns us, on the royal Pehlvi chronicles, commenced by order of Chosroes the First himself. For earlier times it is nearly useless. It throws no light on the story of our Arsacid princes. The heading to each reign states the number of years it lasted, though the statement is sometimes quite at variance with the representations in the body of the poem. The inaugural speech of every king is given, and of many of the kings we are told no more. But for those of which we are to treat it is a most valuable authority, especially for its living pictures of character.

(c.) Tabari, an Arab born in Persia in the 9th century, wrote a chronicle based on the ancient Persian records and Arabic legends, which was rendered into Persian in the 10th century by the Vizier of a Sassanide prince, and has been translated from the Persian into French by Zotenberg, Paris, 1869. It is quite unhistorical.

(d.) Hanza of Ispahan was another Persian Arab chronicler of the 9th century, published with a Latin version by Gottwaldt, Leipzig, 1844. He cites earlier authorities.

(e.) Of later Persian histories, the most important, perhaps, is the prose epitome by Mirkhond, a Persian Mussulman of the close of the 15th century of our era, based partly on the Shah Nameh and Tabari, partly on other native authorities, inaccessible to Gibbon, but published in French by De Sacy in the work above named.

(f.) The Dabistan is an account of all the religions of the world by a Parsee in India in the 17th century who was acquainted with many old Persian books. It was translated into English by Shea and Troyer, Paris, 1843.

B. Armenian literature has had an almost unbroken continuance of life from the period of which we write to the present day. For the two Armenian Khosrus, our authority is Moses of Chorene, whose chronicle, beginning with the earliest times, by his own confession, becomes historical first at the point where for our present purpose we most need him, the introduction of Christianity to Armenia in the beginning of the 4th century. It is continued down to his own epoch, A.D. 441, so that he fails us when we come to treat of the great Chosroes. His work was translated by Whiston, 1736, and read by Gibbon. There are no extant Armenian historians contemporary with the great Chosroes or his grandson, but Lazarus Pharbetsi has carried the story of the religious war down to A.D. 485. A portion of his history was rendered into French by M. Kabaragy Gatabed, Paris, 1843, and the whole of this and other Armenian authorities of the 5th century is given in French by Langlois, Collection des Historiens de l'Arménie. Modern abstracts of the Armenian authorities are Mémoires sur l'Arménie, by St. Martin, Paris, 1818, notes and additions by the same author to Lebeau's Bas Empire, and a paper by Patkanien, in Russ., of which a French version is given in the Journal Asiatique for 1866. The proximity of Armenia to Persia and the continuity of the Armenian national life give great value even to the later histories in that language. Sepeos in the 7th century is very near our period.

C. The Byzantine empire supplies a series of contemporary authorities, lay and clerical, Syriac or Greek.

(a.) Joshua the Stylite wrote a Syriac chronicle of Eastern affairs from A.D. 495 to A.D. 505, given in Latin by Assemani (B. O. t. i. c. 26), and published with a French version by M. Paulin Martin, Leipzig, 1876.

(b.) Theodoros the Reader (Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxvi. 166) brings the history down to A.D. 518.

(c.) There are valuable incidental notices in John the Lydian's book on Magistracies.

(d.) Procopius, secretary to Belisarius, chronicled the wars of Justinian. He is of course somewhat the partisan.

(e.) His story is continued and sometimes corrected from the Persian annals, or supplemented with fresh incidents by Agathias the Scholastic.

(f.) John Malelas, a Syrian ecclesiastic of the time of Justinian, wrote in Greek.

(g.) Zacharias, bishop of Melitene. fl. A.D. 536 (Migne, Patr. Gr. lxxxv. 1150; cf. Assem. B. O. ii. 55.)

(h.) JOHN, native of Amida, bishop of Ephesus, chief of the Monophysites at Constantinople, wrote in Syriac a church history of the events of his own old age under Justin, Tiberius and Maurice. It has been rendered into English by Payne Smith, Oxford, 1860 (v. Assem. B. O. ii. 85).

(i.) Menander wrote under Maurice (A.D. 582-602) on the Embassies from and to the Barbarians. Only fragments are extant.

(k.) Theophylact of Simocatta wrote under Heraclius the history of the reign of Maurice.

(l.) EVAGRIUS brought his Church History down from A.D. 431 to A.D. 594.^b

The later Byzantines are of use as they preserve some independent traditions, and as they attempt far more systematically than Malelas, to give us regular chronological annals. Theophanes, at the beginning of the 9th century, is the best. Our references are always to the Bonn Corpus Historiæ Byzantiæ.

D. (a.) Eutychius, patriarch of Alexandria in the 10th century, has given in his Arabic annals, published with a Latin version at Oxford, 1655, several notices of the Persian kings, viz. Cobades I. vol. ii. pp. 127, 176; Chosroes I. pp. 179, 188; Chosroes II. pp. 200-236, 252; Cobades II. p. 232, 256; Chosroes III. p. 255. He is valuable, not only as the events affected Egypt, but as under Moslem rule he evidently met with Persian traditions, similar and contemporary with those embodied by Firdusi. At the same time he is quite ignorant of Persian.

(b.) Gregorius Bar-Hebraeus Abulpharagius, of Jewish descent, physician, bishop of Aleppo and Jacobite primate in the 13th century, wrote an Arabic History of the Dynasties, published with a Latin version by Pococke, Oxford, 1665. Gibbon (chs. 18, 32, 40, 42, 46) has used Moses of Chorene, the Byzantines, Eutychius, and Abulpharagius.

E. Georgia or Iberia only emerged from the mythical to the historical condition at the close of our period, two or three centuries later than Armenia. Their Georgian annals are published by Brosset, and fragments from them given by Langlois, Numismatique Géorgienne.

F. We have not found any Eastern martyr acts of so late a date as our period in Assemani (Mart. Or. et Occid.). We must refer to Lequien (Oriens Christianus) for the bishops, and to Assemani (Bibliotheca Orientalis) for the ecclesiastical writers. His first volume contains the orthodox, his second the Monophysites, his third and fourth the Nestorians.

CHOSROES I. OF ARMENIA, was brother of the Vologeses and Artabanus, whose dissensions delighted Caracalla (Patk. p. 144, from Zenob-Glak, 4th century). He was the most formidable antagonist of Ardeshir. He persecuted the Christians, and, like Pharaoh, compelled them to labour on the public works. Many were martyred (Milman, Hist. Christ. ii. 319, from Chamich, Hist. Armen. i. 153). At last Ardeshir found an Arsacid, named Anak, to assassinate him. The whole families of both Anak and Chosroes were slain, except the youngest son of Anak, who became Gregory the apostle of Armenia, and Tiridates, the youngest son, and Chosrudacht, the daughter, of Chosroes. Ardeshir remained master of Armenia, and destroyed the idols of the Parthians (Patkan. 135, 144; Milman, ib. 320).

CHOSRUDACHT, or Chosroiducht, had great influence in persuading her brother to become a Christian. Her story shall be told under GREGORY the ILLUMINATOR, and TIRIDATES.

CHOSROES II. OF ARMENIA (A.D. 345-354?), son of Tiridates and of Aschenia daughter of Ascharades, "did not equal his parents in stature" (Mos. Chor. ii. 80); for they were both of colossal proportions, and he was surnamed the Little. When Tiridates had been poisoned for his attempt to force Christianity on his subjects, Chosroes sought refuge in the Roman empire. But Bacurius, one of the leaders of the rebels, entered on an unpopular Persian alliance; and therefore the other nobles joined with the patriarch Verthan, son of Gregory, in applying to Constantius to set Chosroes on the throne (ib. iii. 4, 5). Thus Chosroes received his crown from the grandson of his grandfather's murderer. Such was the effect of Christianity in making men of one mind in the house of Arsaces. And thus it was hatred of Persia that made the Armenians espouse the cause and accept the new creed of the Arsacids, and form the first distinctly national church. The emperor sent an officer named Antiochus, and Chosroes was enthroned. He was a puny weakling prince, whom the Romans did not venture to expose on the battlefield; and after the Greek army had retired he made peace with Persia, and paid a tribute to that power as well as to the court of Constantinople. Moses would have us believe that he was wholly given to pleasure and not to business, but still he lets it appear that his pleasures were manly sports, and that he had plenty to occupy him in which he did not acquit himself altogether amiss. St. Martin gives a different account, and makes Chosroes himself perform what Moses attributes to his generals (Mém. sur l'Arm. i. 307), but gives no authorities. A pestilence induced him to transfer the seat of government from Artaxata to Dovin, a healthier site on a hill near the river Eleutherus, where he planted a park (Mos. Chor. iii. 6, 8). Manazirus, the general of his southern army, which included a Cilician force, slew Bacurius, routed his Persian allies, invaded Assyria, and carried off captives from Nisibis, and among them eight deacons of Bishop James. The bishop followed to expostulate, and when expostulations failed, cursed him. The curse, if we are to believe Moses, did not fail. Manazirius died the death of Herod; his province was blighted with drought; his sovereign was wroth and released the captives; his son became a noted penitent (. 7). Sapor, whose policy it was to set the Arsacids against each other, stirred the Arsacid king of the Massagetae to invade Armenia, but the latter was routed by Bazarat, and by Vahan, a Christian satrap, who slew a gigantic champion (Mos. Chor. iii. 9; St. Martin, l. c.; Patkan. p. 139). Therefore Chosroes ceased remitting tribute to Persia, and sent it all to the emperor, along with a request for a Greek army. But he died before the fresh war began, after a reign of nine years. (Mos. Chor. iii. 10.)

^b M. Paulin Martin also refers to Eustathius of Epiphania, d. A.D. 502 (Müller, Fragmenta Historicorum Græcorum, iv. 132).

St. Martin has not explained why he assigns this reign to the years 316-325 (Mém. i. 413). Moses of Chorene (iii. 8) distinctly fixes the accession of Chosroes to the 8th year of Costandus (Constantius), A.D. 345, so that his death would be in A.D. 354, and Patkanien evidently sees no reason against following him (p. 140); while Gibbon points out two clear reasons in favour of doing so (ch. 18, note 58), the agreement between his narrative and the allusions in Julian's speech upon Constantius (pp. 20, 21); and the occurrence of the name of Antiochus in an inferior office a few years before (Godofred. Cod. Theod. t. vi. p. 350). We may add that just before the date assigned to the petition to the emperor, Sapor was instituting a bitter, religious persecution (Patk. 154, from the life of St. Schmavon). Rawlinson has simply followed St. Martin. They have thus much in their favour that reigns, which together make up 60 years, have to be compressed into 30 otherwise.

CHOSROES III., of Armenia, was a Christian prince set over Persarmenia, when it was ceded by a treaty concluded in the name of the infant emperor Arcadius, A.D. 384, while his father Theodosius was busy in the West. The Persian king who appointed him was Sapor, and his reason was that Arsaces, the brother of Chosroes, in retiring from those regions as agreed, had carried all the satraps and almost all the population with him. For this reason Sapor appointed Chosroes, and invited the satraps back (Mos. Chor. iii. 42). All returned, except half a dozen or so of Arsaces' chief friends, and moreover four of his own satraps deserted to Chosroes. These were the knight Isaac, his brother's daughter's husband, and, as soon as they could follow, Surenas Vahanus, and Ascharales, who brought the treasures of Arsaces with them. Hence there was war between Arsaces and Chosroes. The Romans and Persians left them to fight it out. Arsaces was beaten, fled to a church, and there died of fever, A.D. 386 (ib. 43-46). Then the Romans appointed no successor to his throne, but made the strongest of the satraps, Gazavon, son of Spandaret, who had protected his master's flight, chief ruler, and sent a resident or "count" of their own to be set over him, instead of a king. This displeased Gazavon and the satraps, who, with the exception of Samuel the Mamiconian, sent in their allegiance to Chosroes. He accepted it, promised to protect them from Greek procurators, then sent envoys to Arcadius, requesting the office of count for himself. The request was granted. Chosroes proceeded to appoint Isaac, sixth in descent from Gregory, to the hereditary episcopate vacant by the death of Aspurares or Asburas his kinsman. Sapor thought he should have been consulted, and made it a pretext of war. Chosroes applied to Constantinople for help, but applied in vain. Sapor sent his son Ardeshir into Armenia. Chosroes yielded himself up, and his brother, Bahram Shapur, was appointed king of Armenia. In the next chapter (51) Moses' history seems to be much confused. A dead warrior bishop seems to take his way into Persia, to beg that his son-in-law may succeed him. Probably he took the precaution before his own decease. The letter of Ardeshir making the grant recognised both the murder of Chosroes I. and the cure of his son as merits of the house of Anak. Then Ardeshir died, and Bahram Kirmanshah succeeded to the Persian throne, released Chosroes from his dungeon, and kept him a prisoner at large in the fortress called Oblivion. On the death of Bahram Shapur, which happened after twenty-one years, Isaac went to the court of Isdegerd, to beg that Chosroes might be set on the throne again. Isdegerd was at that time well inclined towards the Christians, and the request was granted, but Chosroes died within the year, probably A.D. 411 (Mos. Chor. iii. 55).

Here again there are more serious chronological difficulties. If we accept the account of Moses, we must suppose the reign of Sapor I. prolonged till A.D. 384, nay 386, and even 389. But on almost all other grounds he is supposed to have died in 380. And again, the reigns that intervene between the death of Sapor and accession of Isdegerd should make up 31 years instead of 21. If Ardeshir were regent for Sapor III. the mistake would easily arise. Procopius (Aed. Just. iii. 1, p. 245) gives a different tale (cf. Bell. Pers. ii. 3); so does Gibbon (ch. 32 fin.).

The Roman part of Armenia remained a Roman country. Theodosius the second built Theodosiopolis near the sources of the Euphrates to strengthen it (Mos. Chor. iii. 59).

CHOSROES I., of Persia (A.D. 531-579), better known in the East as NUSHIRVAN or ANUSHIRVAN. Under this head we have also to treat of the history of his father Cabades, and of the sect of Masdek.

Birth and Name.—He died at the age of 74 (Shah Namch), and therefore was born in A.D. 505. This agrees with the description of him at his accession. "Because of his goodness, his justice, his dignity, his learning, and his piety, they named him Nushirvan ('Sweet soul') for his face was young and his power was new" (ib. p. 157).

It does not however agree with the story of his birth related in that poem. His father Cabades was over 80 years of age when he died in A.D. 531, and must therefore have been considerably over 50 when he begat Chosroes in 505, and himself have been born not later than 450. He is indeed spoken of as an old man in A.D. 502, by Joannes Lydus (De Magistr. iii. 53, p. 245).

Now the story of the birth of Chosroes told in the Shah Nameh, is as follows:—His grandfather Pirouz (Perozes, פִּרוּז), in an expedition against the Heitalians or Epthalites or White Huns, a people to the east, fell into a pitfall and perished, with his army and the princes. Cabades alone was taken alive. Balasch, youngest son of Perozes, who had been left on the throne, was too young to attempt anything, but Suferai, of Shiraz, governor of Cabul, marched against the Huns, and made them give up their prisoners. Balasch embraced his brother, but did not yield the throne (pp. 95, 121). Suferai really governed. After four years he told Balasch that he was unfit to reign, and Balasch accordingly made way for Cabades, who was then 16 years of age and transferred the court from Istakhar to Ctesiphon (pp. 121–125). Suferai was omnipotent. But in four or five years, when Cabades came of age, it was represented to him that he was only king in name. He therefore sent for Shapur, the commander-in-chief, who advised him to write an angry letter to Suferai, who was at Shiraz. Shapur marched upon the place: Suferai surrendered and was put to death (pp. 127–133). All Iran was angry, and rose and made Djamasp, younger brother of Cabades, king, and gave Cabades in charge to Rezmih, son of the murdered Suferai, who forgave him, released him, and escaped with him to the Huns. On his way, Cabades asked the daughter of his host, the Dihkam, in marriage. He left her in her father's house. The king of the Huns upbraided Cabades for his breach of faith and disloyalty to him, and told him he was served right; but gave him an army, on the promise of the cession of a province.

For terror of the troops of China and of Rome, the people induced Djamasp, a child of ten, to submit himself to his brother. The child was freely pardoned. Then the daughter of Dihkam met Cabades and presented him with a son. This was Chosroes. Rezmih became as omnipotent as his father Suferai had been before him.

"Things passed so," says Firdusi, "till Kesra grew and became a valiant and haughty young man; then Kobad entrusted to the sages this fresh and fruitful branch. He ordered all the affairs of Iran and Turan, and raised the crown of his power to the sky. Then he led his army into the land of Rome, and fashioned it with his hand like a ball of wax. He made it a desert of brambles, and two cities sought his protection. The name of the one was Hindia, and of the other Farikin. He taught them the Zendavesta, and gave them the true faith" (Shah Nameh, vi. 141). Farikin is Martyropolis.

We might try to remove the difficulty by supposing that it was not Chosroes but some other son, with whom Cabades was presented on this occasion by the lady of his amour; as shortly before the birth of Chosroes, Cabades was certainly engaged, not in ridding himself of his ministers, or fleeing for his life, but in leading his armies against Syria. We can hardly say we are confirmed in making this change in the story by the authority of Euty chius, for he calls the prince, who was born of this lady, Babudacht,^c and -dacht means daughter. But, however we might separate the birth of Chosroes from the events above narrated, it is manifest that if Cabades was 16 at his accession and over 80 at his death, he reigned more than sixty-four years. Authorities vary between 68 years for his reign and about 40; but the testimony of Agathias, who had the Persian annals translated to him by Sergius, is decisive in favour of the shorter period. Firdusi has erred in making Balasch son of Perozes, whereas he was brother, and, in saying that he abdicated when he was really removed by death, has thrown the accession of Cabades back far too early (perhaps by confusion with an earlier regency of Suferai); he has postponed the mention of the war with Rome and of the rise of Masdekism some twenty years, and so has given a false account of the submissiveness of Cabades to his ministers, and obscured the true grounds of it. The political adventures depended on the relations of the religious sects. (Agath. iv. 27, 28, 30.)

Christianity and Zoroastrianism in Armenia were in the thick of a struggle for life and death, at the very time when Chosroes' father was born. In A.D. 450, which was about the time of the birth of Cabades, Yezdigerd II. was on the throne of Persia. We are able to fix the year of his reign, for a treaty with Rome, which Lazarus assigns to his second year, is fixed by other considerations to A.D. 441. Thus we obtain an era for the comparison of Oriental and Byzantine history. In A.D. 450 we find the nobles of Armenia summoned to a great council, to consider the invitation, addressed to them by the Persian viceroy, to renounce Christianity and embrace Zoroastrianism. As the document that throws most light on the creed of Chosroes, and the state of the church in his realms, we give this proclamation here.

"Mihr-Nerseh to the great commanders and princes of great Armenia: health. Ye shall know that every man that dwelleth under heaven and followeth not the religion of the Masdeyesnans is blind, deaf and deceived by the fiery serpent of the devils. When heaven and earth were not yet, the great God Zervan made a prayer for 1000 years, and said: 'Perhaps a son will be born to me called Ormuzd, who will make heaven and earth.' He then conceived two children in his womb, one for praying, and the other for saying, Perhaps. When he knew that they were both in his womb, he said, 'He who shall first come forth, to him will I give the empire.' He who had been conceived in unbelief, broke his womb, and came forth. Zervan said to him, 'Who art thou?' He answered, 'Thy son Ormuzd.' 'My son is gleaming with light, and spreads a good smell,' answered Zervan, 'while thou art dark and friend of evil.' And as he wept very bitterly his father gave him the empire for 1000 years, and named him Ahriman. Then he engendered another son, whom he called Ormuzd, and he took away the empire from Ahriman and gave it to this other, saying 'To-day I address to thee my prayer, address thine to me.' Then Ormuzd created heaven and earth, but Ahriman created evil. The creatures were thus shared between them: the angels come of Ormuzd, and the devils of Ahriman: all the good things that come from the heavens and from here below proceed equally from Ormuzd; and all the evils that diffuse themselves there and here are alike from Ahriman. All the good in heaven, 'tis Ormuzd that made it; all the evil has been produced by Ahriman. All the hates, the misfortunes that come, the disastrous wars, are the effects of the bad side, but on the other hand happy things, empire, glory, light, health of body, beauty of face, truth of word, length of life, take their being from the good principle and all that is so, is from him. But evil is mingled in all. All the people that say that God created death and that good and evil come of Him are in error; as the Christians, to wit, who say that God, angry because his servant had eaten a fig, made death, and chastised man with this punishment. Then is God capable of anger, and though He be not man, He hath something in common with man; besides that though He be God He is likened to men; also one may rightly say that he who speaketh thus is deaf, blind, and deceived by the serpent of the devils. There has come also another error which is that of the folk who say: 'God that made heaven and earth is come and hath been born of a certain woman that was called Mary, whose husband was named Joseph,' and many are the people who have been deceived by this man. The land of the Romans which follows this gross error is in the profoundest ignorance; they are entirely deprived of religion; which causes the loss of their souls. Ye also, why have ye followed their senseless errors? Embrace the religion of your master; embrace it, for we have to give account of you before God. Believe not your chiefs, whom ye call Nazarenes, for they are great hypocrites, and they teach you by their words, while by their actions they do nothing. 'To eat meat,' 'they say, 'is no sin,' and yet they eat it not. 'To take a wife,' they say, 'is a suitable thing,' and yet they will not even look upon a woman. According to them, he who amasseth riches doth a great sin. They praise poverty much more than riches; they brag of it, and injure the rich; they insult the name of fortune, and mock at those who are covered with glory. They love filth in their apparel, and prefer vile things to things honourable. They praise death, and despise life; they disdain to beget a man, and boast of barrenness. If you listen to them, and go near women no more, the end of the world will come soon. I will not, in this writing, combat all they say; but what they have written most detestable of all whereof we have spoken is, that God has been crucified by men, has died, has been buried, and then that He has risen and ascended to the heavens. Would it not be unworthy of you to make an answer to such detestable opinions? The devils, who are wicked, cannot be taken and tormented by men, and so it would be with the God that hath made all creatures. It is shameful for us and for you to listen to things so unworthy of belief. There are only two things for you to do; either to make an answer article by article, or else to make one and come to court that we may meet face to face amid a great session of judgment" (St. Martin, Mémoires sur l'Arménie, ii. 472).

The Triumph of Christianity in Armenia.—The nobles were summoned to court and compelled, by threats of torture, to apostatise; Marcian was too insecure on his throne, and too busy with the Eutychians at home to help the patriots; the renegades, as often happens, proved the cruellest persecutors. In a year or two all resistance was subdued, except that some preferred to take refuge in Greece (where they became valiant supporters of the throne, fore-runners of the Paulicians, or some of them ancestors of emperors), or in Khurdistan or the gorges of the Caucasus. But the resistance had done its work; the attempt to stamp out the faith in the conquered country ceased. Instead of persecution; bribes, and tempting offers on the one hand, and all manner of petty annoyances on the other, were the suaves employed to induce the Armenians to renounce their faith. These methods succeeded only too well. On the death of Yesdigerd, his sons disputed the throne. After about a year, Hormuzd succumbed, and Perozes, i.e. Victor, took the kingdom. In his seventh year, after twelve years' captivity, the Armenian princes were allowed to return to their lands (A.D. 464). But the hindrances in the way of Christians continued. In A.D. 475, the patriarch Gioud (Jude?) was deposed for his over-zeal, and one Christopher put in his place. And Christopher, not long after, was hampered by the free leave extended to the Nestorians—a kind of Christians who found no favour, and had no dealings, with the hostile power of Rome—to make converts where they would. Prince Vahan (A.D. 478) thought it prudent to apostatise, and even so was compelled to leave his son at court as a hostage. At length, the revolt of Vakhthank, king of Georgia, who slew a Zoroastrian and persecuting king, was the signal for renewed revolt in Armenia. Vahan retraced his course, and atoned for apostasy by desertion and treason. Once at the head of his countrymen he fought with vigour. Whether as commander or fugitive he was a thorn in the side of the Persians. Then followed the overthrow of Perozes by the Ephthalites narrated above. Shapur, from Armenia, Zarmihr (Rezmihir), from Georgia, were at once recalled. Vahan was left master of Armenia; Varghash (Balash, Blasius, Vologeses) was made king of Persia. Shapur and Zarmihr represented the necessity of pacifying Armenia. One Nikhor was appointed to the task. He entered into negotiations with Vahan. Terms of agreement were drawn up and settled, and only waited the ratification of the king. These terms were as follows:—1. Free exercise of Christianity without annoyance. 2. Destruction of all the fire-altars in Armenia. 3. No government offices to be given to perverts to Zoroastrianism. 4. Justice and rewards to be administered equitably. 5. The government of Armenia to be carried on by the king in person, not by deputies. Suddenly the help of Nikhor was summoned to put down the revolt of Zareh, son of Perozes. He invited Vahan and the Armenians to prove their loyalty and worth by assisting him. Vahan consented, and despatched a body of horse. The Armenians (says their compatriot) did wonders. Zareh was defeated and put to death. Then the demands of the loyal insurgents were accorded. Vahan was well-received at court, and was welcomed in solemn procession by the aged patriarch John, with all the clergy. Then Nikhor was superseded by Andekan, and Andekan by Vahan himself. The state religionists flocked back to the churches. Such, extracted from the report of St. Martin in his additions to Lebeau (his Empire, vii. 259-315), is the account of Lazarus P'harbetsi, c. 54-87.

Shapur and Zarmir, who here appear as counselling Balash to grant peace to the church of Armenia, are represented (as we have seen) in the Snah Namah, the one as suggesting, the other as condoning the murder of Suferai, who deposed Balash. Moreover it appears from Procopius that the Hunnic rule lasted for two years, i. e. was shaken off by Balash before the close of his reign, and yet that the tribute to the Huns was paid by Cabades till he was firm on the throne, i. e. till he had rid himself of Suferai, whose death seems to be the grievance urged by the king of the Huns against Cabades. Suferai appears to have disliked the Christians, and favoured the Huns, in which last particular his son Rezmir seems to have followed him.

Our Armenian authorities stop short of the reversal of the policy of Balash that followed on the accession of Cabades and lasted till Rezmir assumed the reins of power. But we have it on the evidence of another contemporary chronicler. Joshua the Stylite (11, 12) speaks of three wars of Perozes with the Huns. In the first he was assisted by Roman gold, which he claimed according to the treaty of offensive and defensive alliance between Rome and Persia. He was at first successful and added several provinces to his empire, then was taken prisoner and was ransomed by Roman gold. He broke treaty with the Huns, and was captured a second time. The ransom was fixed at thirty mules' burden of gold; he paid down twenty, left his son ՆԻՐ (Cabades) as a hostage for the remainder; redeemed him, and renewed the war. His army perished, and as for himself, none knew what became of him. These events are referred to the reign of Zeno (A.D. 474-491). Balash, his brother, succeeded, and asked aid of Zeno in vain; for he was told that the revenues that he derived from Nisibis, which should have been restored to the Romans in A.D. 483, ought to suffice him. For lack of Roman support, Balash, who had sought to build baths, was suppressed by the Magi, and Cabades was set on the throne. His embassy to Rome found Anastasius in possession of the empire. Anastasius, finding that Cabades had been endeavouring to force a peculiarly hateful form of Zoroastrianism, which permitted promiscuous concubinage, on the Armenians, rejected his demands. The Armenians took courage, demolished the fire-temples, slew the Magi, destroyed the marzban (or marquis) and armament that were sent against them. The Qadusians (their name appears to be derived from Qavadés) and Tamurians (a race otherwise unknown) revolted. In the general confusion the subject Arabs ravaged Persia. About the time of the suppression of the Isaurian revolt (A.D. 497), an attempt to assassinate Cabades forced him to flee to the Ephthalites. Zamasphes took the kingdom. Cabades married the daughter whom his own sister had borne to the Ephthalite king. He returned with an Ephthalite army: the Qadusians and Tamurians submitted; the Arabs were attracted to his standard by hopes of war with Rome; the Armenians were brought over by promises of religious freedom. On Thursday night, August 22, A.D. 502, an aurora borealis blazed, and an earthquake overthrew Acre. On the morrow Cabades invaded the empire.

The chronology is thus made fairly clear.

Islegerdes died in his 19th year, A.D. 457; Vakhthank revolted in the 25th year of Perozes, i. e. reckoning his accession from his father's death, A.D. 482. After two campaigns followed the great overthrow of the Persians, A.D. 484. The reign of Vologeses (Balash), variously reckoned at four or six years, brings us to A.D. 489 for the accession of Cabades, A.D. 499 will be his 11th, A.D. 531 his 43rd year. It is between these two years that his extant coins range (Rawlinson, p. 378). In his 11th year he was deposed, and the four years of Zamasphes bring us to A.D. 502. The flight of Cabades to the Huns very shortly preceded his declaration of war against Rome in A.D. 502. We are told (Procop. Bell. Pers. i. 7), that it was in order to pay his debt to them that he made the claim upon the Romans (Joan. Lyd. Magistr. iii. 52, 53) for their share of the expenses of the fort erected against those Huns and Eastern foes, the refusal of which was made the ground of war. In A.D. 504, we find him again recalled to withstand an Ephthalite invasion. Either the amour of Cabades and birth of Chosroes belong to this slightly later date, or the child used to misreckon his age, as though his life began when he first knew his father.

The Masdekites.—One obstacle remains in the way of our following what Hamza calls the lesser book of lives, and giving Cabades 43 years only, instead of following the greater and giving him 68. Cabades must have been forty at his accession. At fifty he was a formidable and determined captain; how was it that at forty he was a mere puppet?

Hamza of Ispahan supplies the answer, taking up the story where the Armenians drop it. "When Cabades was freed from his captivity, and had taken the kingdom, he did not mind the death, nor the murderers of his father; the realm went to ruin because the king gave his thoughts to a future life; the Persians exulted in crimes, and Zendicism abounded. The author of that superstition was Masdek, son of Bamdadán, a mage, who gathered the credulous around him and promised them a kingdom" (Hamza, p. 83).

Tabari names this Masdek in Cabades's 12th year; Firdusi not till after his restoration, even after his war with Rome and the coming of age of Chosroes. His tale runs thus. In a time of famine, Masdek, the chief treasurer, told the king a story: "A man was serpent-bitten; another had an antidote, and would not give it him." "He is worthy of death," said the king. Masdek repeated the fable and the royal sentence to the starving people, and they broke open the granaries. The king expostulated. Masdek answered: "I did but tell them what you said, softly, softly." The king was silenced.

Both Firdusi and Tabari tell of a famine in the days of Perozes. According to Tabari, Perozes was a tyrant till his seventh year; then famine came; he repented, and for seven long years, at his own cost, sustained his people, and only one person starved, a neglect for which he was very penitent. This state charity synchronises with the return of the exiles to Armenia.

Whatever the origin of Perozes's policy, Cabades followed it further. The permanent mensuration of the land, estimation of its productiveness, and reduction of the taxes to a regular tithe, instead of an arbitrary and unlimited demand of the tax-collector, are measures attributed to Cabades and to the influence of Masdek (Shah Namah, vi. 167).

But Masdekism had a darker side. Procopius tells us that Cabades used his power tyrannically, and brought in a law that Persians should have their wives in common. Therefore they rose and deposed him, and bound him and kept him in prison. He then tells how his wife (others say sister, possibly both) made the jailor enamoured of her, thus gained admission, and smuggled the king out of his confinement. (Agathias did not find this romance in the annals.) Seoses was ready to carry him off to the Huns, where he married their king's daughter, and borrowed an army, and returned and put out the eyes of his uncle Blases, who had been made king in his stead (Procop. i. 5-7, pp. 25, 31-33). Agathias corrects this confusion of Balash and Djamasp. Procopius adds that he raised Seoses to a military rank before unknown, "Adrastadaransalan," was himself quick-witted and active, and held the reins of state tightly. Seoses is none other than Zarmihr or Rezmihir.

Eutyehius, who mentions famine at the close of the 5th century (pp. 131, 132), says that men were kept to their allegiance by fear of Soacherai, therefore stirred the king to get rid of him; that after his death Masdek made a convert of Cobad (Cabades), but afterwards, when the Masdekites were strong, they themselves confined that monarch and set up Kamasph, but were beaten by Bazarmihr, and Cobad restored (p. 176).

Both stories may be true. Cabades must have made himself intolerable to those who were not Masdekites, while, on the other hand, he can hardly have contented those who were; and we shall see Masdek decreeing very similar confinement for such as professed his faith and did not put it in practice.

Joshua the Stylite speaks of the detestable heresy of Zoroaster, which Cabades tried to force on the Armenians, as enjoining incest and promiscuous concubinage. He agrees with Procopius, Tabari, Mirkhond, and Agathias in representing the detestation of this doctrine by the Persians as the cause of their revolt; with Hamza in describing the doctrine as creating anarchy in Arabia. Hareth, son of Amr, son of Hodjr-Akilul-morar, who is said by Hamza to have been a Zendikite, was of Kendite race, and quite distinct from the Ghassanide Hareth, son of Abu Shamir, the Christian Aretas. He drove Al Mondar, the Saracen, the old vassal of Persia, from the kingdom of Hira, but had himself no settled court (Hamza, pp. 84, 85).

It was not only in the far East that the communist Masdek found followers. Two monuments were found in 1823 in the Cyrenaic country, one bearing a Greek, the other a bilingual (Greek and Phoenician) inscription. On the first is a circle enclosing a cross, with the names of Osiris and Simon the Cyrenian, and then this legend: "Thoth, Cronos, Zoroastres, Pythagoras, Epicurus, Maslakes, John, Christ and our Cyrenaic teachers, with one voice give us charge to make nothing our own, but to support the laws, and to put down lawbreaking. For this is the spring of justice, this is to live blessedly in common."

The second bears in Phoenician letters Jehovah (or Julas) over a winged, snake-drawn car, like that of the Demeter of the mysteries, with two lighted torches.

Then follows (still in Phoenician):—

Salvation: commonalty: spring of justice.

Salvation: justice: benefit of law.

Salvation: law: bond of salvation.

Gesenius gives a different version.

The Greek follows; the writing is Βουστροφρόνως, and the date below is the third year of the 88th Olympiad, B.C. 434; a lame pretence at antiquity. The legend runs: "Community of all goods and wives is the spring of divine justice, and perfect peace for the good men who are elect out of the blind crowd, whom Zarades and Pythagoras, best of hierophants, have set to live together in common"^d (St. Martin, additions to Lebeau, Bas Empire, vii. 338-342; Matter, Hist. du Gnosticisme, t. ii. pp. 288-310).

Whatever forms Masdekism took in the West, in the East it was distinctly an offshoot of Zoroastrianism. It does not seem to have made any attempt to engraft itself on Christianity. It lived on in Georgia and Persia till the time of Aurengzebe, when it was described for us in the Dabistan (Eng. transl., Paris, 1843, vol. i. 372). Masdek's book, the Desnad, and a translation of it into modern Persian were then extant. He does not seem at all to have put good and evil on a greater equality than other Persians. "The worship of the Lord is most meet as His kingdom is immense, and Ahriman has no power except in the elemental world; in the next place, the spirit of every one devoted to God ascends on high, whither Ahriman cannot come, but that of Ahriman's servants abideth in hell." "The works of light result from choice, but those of darkness from chance; the union of light and darkness is accidental, and the disengagement of light from darkness is also accidental; when light is severed from darkness the compound is dissolved, which means resurrection." "Almost all contentions have been caused by riches and women." "It is very unfair that one man's wife should be lovely, and another's ugly; justice and religion demand that they should exchange for a short time." "If a man's co-religionist prove unable to get wealth, or shew proofs of insanity, he is to be confined to the house, and measures adopted to provide him with food, clothing, and all requisites. Whoever assents not to these arrangements is a follower of Ahriman; they get contributions from him by compulsion." We learn from Mirkhond (p. 353), that Masdek was of Istakhar; that he deluded the king by a false miracle, pretending to make the sacred fire speak; that he wore a woollen robe; and that he forbade the slaughter of animals for food, a practice the lawfulness of which was always debated among the later Zoroastrians, so that there is no special reason to suppose Buddhist influence. Now Mirkhond is well acquainted with the history of Mani, and gives not the slightest hint of any connexion between Masdekism and Manicheanism. He represents Mani's doctrine as stamped out at once in Persia (p. 296) long before the time of Masdek. He mentions the permission of incest among the doctrines of Masdek, thus agreeing with Josua Stylites, but the Dabistan says nothing of this. It mentions another sect, the Akhshiyans or Materialists, who denied a future life, opposed all conventionalism, and made pleasure the chief good, and speaks of them as encouraging incest and applauding adultery, but only where the husband willingly lends his wife. The Zendavesta permits the marriage of a brother and sister (Dabistan, i. 208, 209).

Theophanes (A.M. 6016) tells us that the Manicheans had the rearing of Phthasuarsas, the third son of Cabades, whom his own daughter Sambuca had borne to him, and that they made him of their way of thinking.

The third son of Cabades (as we learn from Procopius) was Chosroes, a slightly different form of whose name some Greek has here striven in vain to represent.

We may hope, however, that Chosroes' mother was only niece, and not also daughter, of his father. That Chosroes was converted to the tenets of Masdek will be proved false. That he was trained by Masdekites is likely enough. All agree that his father, after his restoration, continued to adhere to that sect, though not to enforce it on others.

War with Rome.—When Cabades breaks in upon the Roman world, and, as John the Lydian says, "flames" (ἐφλέγμανε), we get some glimpse of his character, and begin to understand the influence of Masdek over him. In A.D. 502 he entered, "self-announced," into Roman Armenia, overran it, took Theodosiopolis, through the cowardice of Constantine the commandant, and besieged the impregnable Amida. James of Endjela, a hermit, one day's journey thence, was shot at by his Ephthalite archers. Their arms withered up, but at the request of Cabades, James prayed and healed them. Cabades bade him name for his reward any boon he chose. He asked that his hermitage, a wicker cage, might be a sanctuary for fugitives, and it was respected. Grossly insulted by the women on the walls of Amida, Cabades was taugth by his magi to see in it a good omen. The bishop of the city was lately dead. The tower next his mine being guarded by monks, he made the close of a festival (Jan. 10, A.D. 503, according to Josua, when they were weary with services and filled with meat, the time of his assault, drew his sword and drove his men up the ladders (Procop. i. 7). He entered on an elephant, put the place to the sword, slaughtered 80,000 (Patkanien, p. 179). An old priest met him, and said, "It is not kingly to slay prisoners." "Why did you choose to fight us?" asked the king. "God meant thee to take us by thy valour, not by our choice." was the answer; and it stopped the carnage. On his return to Persia, Cabades released his captives (Proc. ib.). But Edessa proved divinely impregnable. On entering one of the churches he was shewn a picture of Christ, and adored it, saying He had appeared to him and commanded him to continue the siege. [CELER (2).]

One important fact is told by Eutychius (p.

131). Cabades at this time sent a great army into Egypt, and burnt with fire all that was outside the walls of Alexandria. This may help to explain how Masdekism found its way to Cyrene.

Cabades had derived benefit from the Greco-Roman baths in an illness that came upon him in this invasion. He determined to introduce them into Persia, and succeeded in doing so. Thus a feature of the civilisation of the empire, against which the church set itself, was conveyed to the East and preserved there.

The war then begun lasted with slight intermissions till after the accession of Chosroes; indeed there was no more any lasting peace between Persia and Rome. (See also Josua Stylites, and Zach. Melit. cc. 9, 10, col. 1155-1164.)

Reception of the Christians of Persia into favour.—Theophanes tells us that in A.D. 512 Cabades cut the ankles of some of the Christians in Persia, and that they walked afterwards. Theodorus (ii. 34) says that in A.D. 516 Cabades desired to take a treasure castle named Tsuddadesar, on the confines of India. But the devils kept too good a watch around. After trying every device of the magi, and then of the Jews, he called in a bishop of the Christians, who performed divine service, and partook of the holy sacrament, and approached the place and drove out the devils, and gave it over to Cabades without trouble. Cabades, struck with this sign of power, honoured the bishop with the first seat (whereas till then Manicheans and Jews had sat above him), and gave free leave to all who wished to be baptized. India here means Arabia.

Conversion of Colchis (Mingrelia), and proposed Roman adoption of Chosroes.—In A.D. 515, after the expiration of the seven years' truce made by CELER, Asia Minor was flooded with Huns, perhaps to teach the Romans from what ills Persia would protect them if they paid her.

Anastasius's successor, Justin (A.D. 518-527), shewed that he too could tamper with Huns. One Zilgibis was retained by both the powers. Cabades was politely informed of it by Justin, slew the Hun, and made peace with Rome, A.D. 522. Justin desired peace to give himself to church affairs.

Two things disturbed the treaty. (1) Tzathes, king of the Lazi, a people of Colchis, came to Constantinople to be baptized, and put himself under the protection of the Romans. He carried back a Christian wife, Valeriana. (2) Surprising to hear, and resting on only a single original testimony, but that one of unquestionable authority, the conditions of peace were to be the adoption of Chosroes by Justin. Justin was himself a barbarian, and childless. Chosroes would have shared, or filled, or more than filled, the place of Justinian. But the father's reasons for desiring this honour for his son are most curious. He had three sons, Coases (Cambyses), the first born, who had best right; Zames (possibly the Zamasphes, who had for awhile filled his father's throne, and was disgraced for ever in consequence), and Chosroes. Zames was the popular favourite; Chosroes, his father's darling. For fear of the fratricidal factions that would follow on his death, Cabades wished to make the succession secure,—whether he hoped to content his sons by sharing the known world among them, or to make his youngest indisputably paramount. Thus, after three centuries, the proposal of CARACALLA was echoed back. Justin and Justinian welcomed the proposal, but the pride of their subjects was too strong for them. Parchment title-deeds, it was answered, did not suit barbarians; they must win their heritage by the sword. The taunt stung Chosroes to the quick, and the failure of the negotiations was fatal to the son of Suferai (Procop. i. 11, p. 51).

The latter nobleman was accused by Mebodes (Mahboud), his fellow-plenipotentiary, of marring the negotiations by ill-timed complaints about Tzathes. This opponent of Byzantine baptisms had been the protector of native national churches. Raised to power, as we have surmised, by a combination of Zoroastrian and Masdekite malcontents, he diverged from both; and while Procopius tells us that he was accused of introducing new divinities, and, worst of all, of burying his wife undevoured, Eutychius ascribes his fall to the instigation of the Masdekites. Unimpeachably just, he was insupportably arrogant; both sects seem to have hated him, and gratitude is too costly a luxury for sovereigns. His extraordinary office perished with him; the parties that joined against him were soon at each other's throats, and his royal betrayer bitterly regretted him.

A change of policy at once appeared. An attempt was made to force the Persian religion on the Georgians, or Iberians; they were forbidden to bury their dead. They appealed to Rome, and Probus was sent round the Black Sea to hire them Hunnish allies, but failed. They took refuge among the newly-converted Lazi, but these were unable to guard their own forts, and a Roman force could not persist there. Iberia was subdued by the magi for another sixty years, and the Christian princes took refuge at Constantinople (Procop. i. 12, p. 58). Malelas tells us also that the Romans in Lazica fought each other, and were withdrawn, and so the Persians re-entered. Justin chose to retaliate by sending Belisarius—it was his first command—to ravage the one Christian province of Persia, Persarmenia (ib. p. 59). Belisarius then took command of the East; Procopius was his secretary.

The suppression of Masdekism (A.D. 528 or 529) was among the results of the death of Seoses.* Malelas (p. 444) learnt his tale from an eyewitness. In making it contemporaneous with the reappearance of Al Mondar the Saracen, as Persia's vassal in Arabia, he is confirmed by Hamza. Nor is it unnatural that the latter and many Easterns should make it subsequent to the death of Cabades; it so distinctly marked the accession of Chosroes to manhood and power. The Shih Nameh, as well as Malelas, speaks of the old king as yet alive. From Malelas' story, if it stood alone, we should not suspect Masdekism to be meant. As it is, it seems to point to an action and reaction between the heresies of Rome and Persia. In A.D. 527, under Justin and Justinian, he records the execution from city to city of many Manicheans; then between Sept. 528 and June 529 he says:

* Theophanes dates the slaughter of the Manichees A.D. 421, but a careful study of more competent authorities, or even of his own story, proves him wrong.

"At the same time the doctrine of the Manicheans reappeared in Persia, and when the king of Persia heard it he was wroth, and so were the chief magi; for the Manichees had made then a bishop, named Indarazar. And the king of Persia called a conclave, and got possession of them all, and of the bishop of the Manichees, and gave orders to his armed force that stood by him; and they hewed down with swords all the Manichees and their bishop with his clergy, and they were all slain in the presence of the king and of the bishop of the Christians; and their properties were confiscated, and he gave their churches to the Christians, sending out his divine ordinances in the commonwealth administered by him, that a Manichee when found should be burnt with fire, and he burnt up all their books. Which things one Bartagarius, of the Persians, related, who when baptized changed his name to Timothy." The mention of churches and a bishop, and of the burning of their books, seems to shew that the sect was really Manichean, or semi-Christian, a development of Masdekism driven back from the West (Malel. p. 444).

Theophanes gives a different account of the king's motives. "The Manicheans said to Phthasuarsas, 'Your father is old, and the archimages will make one of your brothers king. We can persuade your father to abdicate and appoint you, that the Manichean dogma may everywhere prevail.' And he agreed to do so (i.e. to become a Manichee) if he should reign thereby. And when Cabades knew it he called a conclave to make his son Phthasuarsas king, and bade all the Manichees be present with their wives and children, and likewise the archimage Glonazes, and the Christian bishop Bazanes, whom Cabades loved as a most excellent physician. He bade the Manichees sever themselves; then slew them in the sight of the archimage and the Christian bishop. And when Justin heard it, he too made a great persecution of the Manichees." Michael the Syrian tells the same story, but for Phthasuarsas writes Chosroes (Patrianien).

The tale in the Shah Nameh is as follows. Masdek had great influence with Cabades, but Chosroes would not listen to him. Masdek seized his hand: Chosroes turned away. At last the prince said he was open to conviction. Let them have a great conference, and decide which was the true religion, Masdek's or Zoroaster's. Chosroes' argument was, "If all things are to be had in common, a child will not know its own father." This was conclusive. Masdek was asked into a garden to see the fruits of his doctrine. He saw a gibbet, was hung head downwards, and beaten to death. Some say that Masdek had asked the king's daughter in marriage (pp. 143-155). According to others, it was Chosroes' own mother that the prophet demanded, and to save her from his embraces Chosroes had to stoop to an indignity he could never forget: "I kissed thy feet, and their stench is yet in my nostrils" (Pocock, quoted by Gibbon, xlii. n. 49).

The Kamel Al Tawarikh, or Universal History (13th century), stated that Masdek and Al Mondar were one day together before Nushirvan, who said that before he mounted the throne he desired two things, to reinstate Al Mondar and to exterminate the Masdekites. "Destroy then," said Masdek, "all there are of us, if you can." Before noon, 100,000 were gibbeted (Mirkhond, p. 362).

These various accounts seem to relate to one event, to be illustrated by the occurrences that led up to it. The Christianity of Armenia was Monophysite. Nestorians, the sect most opposed to the Monophysites, had been driven to take refuge in Persia by Zeno (A.D. 485). At this time Justinian was, so to speak, purging off upon Persia the religious rancours of the Roman empire. He was expelling the Monophysites to a region where the dominant form of Christianity, the Nestorian, was yet more opposed to their own. Many Monophysite refugees, expelled by Anastasius or Justin, had been converted by the Nestorian patriarch, Silas. On the death of Silas there was a schism in the church of Persia between two rival patriarchs—the physician of Cabades, a married Nestorian, called Elisaeus, son-in-law of Silas, supported by most of the bishops, and consecrated at Ctesiphon the seat of the court; and one Narses consecrated at Seleucia (as had been the custom) by the bishop of Nisibis (Le Quien, ii. 1116). Unless the Persians reckoned the years of Alexander differently to the Greeks, the death of Silas belongs to A.D. 523, to which year Theophanes refers our conclave. The schism was only terminated after twelve or fifteen years by the death of Narses and deposition of Elisaeus. One sect of the Monophysites, that of the Incurrupticolae, was reproached with Manicheism. Before the sects diverged the name may have been applied to both. Manichee was in fact a common term of reproach. In Persian, the same term, Zendik, was applied to the Manicheans (Langlois, ii. 376) and the Masdekites. We have seen that Al Mondar had been driven from Hira by a Zendik. According to Theodore the Reader he had been baptized, and Severus, the leader of the other party of the Monophysites, the Corrupticolae, sent two bishops to bring him over to his own way of thinking. Al Mondar informed them that the archangel Michael had just died, and when they were incredulous, demanded, "How then can God be crucified?" (Theod. Lect. ii. 35.)

Justinian's persecutions had deeply affected Arabia. In Yemen, Dsu Novas (Dimnus, Dunaas), "King Curly," tenant of a throne which he had won some twenty years before, when a mere boy, by stabbing a monster of unnatural lust named Dsu Shanatir, had become a Jewish proselyte, and, in retaliation for Justinian's persecution of the Jews, attacked the Roman merchants, dug a pit, and burnt the Christians in it. Therefore the Abyssinian Christians made an alliance with Justinian, and conquered Yemen (Procop. B. P. 19, 20; Hamza, p. 106; Tabari, i. 179; Malel. p. 433). Diomed, duke of Palestine, quarrelled with Aretas, the Monophysite heikh of the Ghassanide Arabs. Al Mondar took occasion thence to fall upon and slay a heikh of the Roman party. Justinian commissioned Aretas, with others, to punish Al Mondar, who took to flight, and a great prey of men, women, children, dromedaries, and cattle was carried off by the Roman party from his camp in Persian territory. Afterwards, when a Persian bishop, Simeon of Beth-Arsam, was deputed by Justinian to Al Mondar, news arrived from Yemen of a revolt against the Abyssinians and a persecution of the Christians of Nedjran, which Al Mondar was invited to imitate, and he warned his guest that he himself was no better than his neighbour (Zacharias, c. 18). This may illustrate the probable position of Al Mondar. Antioch had just been dismantled by earthquake, and the Saracen could promise to lead the Persians to an easy and just revenge. The ancient devotion of Cabades to Masdek had been more and more modified by respect for Christianity. Any real Manicheans or remnants of the ancient Gnostics that were expelled from the empire would gather round Masdek. But Cabades distrusted the Romeward tendencies of Christianity, and several new accessions to the church and empire (as the conversion of the Tsanni, whose land supplied a vantage ground against Persarmenia, and of Boa, a Hunnish queen, who vanquished two Hunnish kings that were fighting for Persia) must have increased his alarm. Justinian had not yet attacked the heathen, but was only endeavouring to enforce uniformity among Christians. Persian persecutors often alleged Roman example. That year (A.D. 528), while the re-occupation of Lazica and the affairs of Persarmenia kept Perozes (whom Malelas calls the elder son of Cabades) fully employed, Xerxes, his younger son (whom we may suppose to be Chosroes), had been sent into Mesopotamia, where Justin was ordering the fortification of Martyropolis, and of Mindon, near Nisibis, and there had completely routed the Romans, Belisarius alone of the generals escaping with his life. The mother of Chosroes was by this time a Christian. Two years previously she had been vexed by a devil, and had been healed by Moses, abbat of Tarmel, near Daras, who seems to have been a Catholic, and had received from him a "blessing" from the bones of St. Cyriac for an amulet, which she cherished in a secret oratory (Zacharias, c. 18; cf. Assem. B. O. t. ii. c. 10). While Justinian was engaged in chastising unnatural vice in Christian bishops, and Theodora in rescuing kidnapped girls from wholesale traffickers in their flesh and blood, it was time to suppress a doctrine that encouraged lust. In Masdek and Al Mondar two opposing principles met, and Nushirvan made his choice. (Jo. Malel. pp. 426-436, 440-444; Procop. B. P. i. 15.)

In March, A.D. 529, Al Mondar ravaged up to the suburbs of Antioch, and retired with his booty. To this time we should probably refer the statement of Michael Syrus that in the reign of Justin Cabades ravaged Syria and sacrificed 400 captive maidens to his god Covz. Human sacrifices were practised by the Arabs, but it is more probable that for "god" we should read "son," and that these virgins stocked the harem of Caoses. (Malel. p. 445; Theophan. p. 273; Patkauien, p. 179.) Negotiations of peace between the two great powers went on. Cabades's letter, preserved in Malelas, is noteworthy; as the keynote of the wars of Chosroes. He appeals to the Romans, as Christians and godly men, to spare men's souls and bodies, and give up their gold (Malelas, p. 449).

In A.D. 530 Belisarius retrieved his honour by the overthrow of the Persian army near Daras. It was commanded, according to Malelas, by the Mihran and the king's son. Perozes is by him identified with the king's eldest son, by Procopius with the Mihran. Procopius relates that on account of this defeat Perozes was stripped of his tiara of gold and pearl. If Perozes were really the heir apparent, it is possible that the contrast of this defeat with his younger brother's victory may have been the ostensible reason for setting him aside. Procopius tells us that Cabades thought of taking the field himself, but Al Mondar suggested a new plan of campaign, a march through the deserts west of the Euphrates; and this was carried out.

On Easter eve, April 19, A.D. 531, when the Roman army was faint with fasting, as well as with their march, a battle was fought, against Belisarius' judgment, in which that general took fright, and fled in a little boat. Belisarius was recalled, but the battle was indecisive; and the reverses of the Persians on the whole were so great that Cabades had a stroke of paralysis. Mebodes hastened to obtain from him a will that gave Chosroes the crown, Sept. 13, A.D. 531.

The principles of Nushirvan's rule.—Chosroes had to secure his power by a general edict of toleration. The Manicheans, we are told, were favoured again. Toleration was a favour for them now. He then made peace with Rome, and in the same liberal spirit insisted on one stipulation. Seven philosophers had been induced, by the rumour that the Republic of Plato was realised in Persia, to seek refuge at his court from Christian persecution. One of them, Damascius, has left us much curious information about the religions of the East. The rumours that attracted them shew how great was the fame of Chosroes' government from the very first. As in the reign of our own Alfred, it was said that a purse would be safe if dropt upon the highway. But the sages did not find it so. Men had many wives, and yet were not content without stealing their neighbours' wives; many thieves were brought to justice, and many were not brought to justice at all. The king was a braggart, whose pretence to philosophy meant love of flattery; (a charge that may be illustrated by a specimen from the Shah Nameh of his discourse with his own sages: "What is the most praiseworthy thing in the world?" he asks, and is answered, "A king who adorns the throne.") These philosophers, though they had left him in disgust, were for ever to enjoy his protection, and to be suffered to hold their own beliefs in their own old homes. (Agath. ii. 30.)

He declared that his empire did not extend to men's thoughts. He saw that the attempt to exterminate the followers of Masdek would be endless, and contented himself with setting to work to remedy the evils which the practice of his tenets had caused. He would not consent to be the tool of any set of priests. The result was a revolt and an attempt to set his nephew Cabades, son of Zames, on the throne. The revolt was suppressed, and Procopius tells us that he put all his brothers to death. Probably he was hated by his father's sons as much as Joseph was by his; and the deed may have been an almost necessary prelude to his beneficent work; but it was a baleful precedent. Procopius, however, may very likely have exaggerated the fact.

At first Chosroes turned his attention to the East. His work in this direction must have opened the way for Nestorian missions, much as the work of Rome in the West prepared the way for St. Paul. He was eminently a civiliser. He submitted himself to be drilled along with his soldiers. He divided his empire into four provinces. He still further reduced the already wonderfully light taxation. He chastised the Beloochees and other mountain marauders, and turned deserts into gardens (Shah Nameh, vi. 157-187).

The Shah Nameh is principally occupied with explaining the principles of his government, and relating his discourses with the sages. The "sweet soul" earned himself a grander title, the Just. He is the Eastern personification of justice, as his Vizier, Buzurdjmihr, is of wisdom. He is said to have put an end to long languishing incarcerations; to have established orphanages and industrial schools, and funds for giving dowries with poor maidens, in short to have abolished beggary. Amorous glances at another man's wife were made punishable offences. Djundi Shapur became a kind of university—a school of physic, poetry, and philosophy. He laid a poll-tax on Christians and on Jews (Tabari, ii. 226; Mirkhond, p. 372), but when told that the Christians and Jews were his enemies, he answered, "A king without tolerance cannot be great." The annals of the empire were carefully kept (Agath. iv. 30), and the Paimani-Farang, or ancient Persian code, was translated by his orders into the dialect of his own time. We may suppose the report of its provisions to represent his institutions. Male and female hospitals, attended severally by male and female doctors, were established in every city. Once a year he dined with the peasants to hear them speak their grievances freely (Dabistan, i. 147, 166, 168). He reasoned that imperial greatness must rest on military strength, maintained by a full treasury, replenished by regular taxation, supported by industrial prosperity, secured by justice, achieved by upright administration, carried on by honest magistrates. His art of government was comprised in twelve golden maxims:—

Govern thyself: be true: consult the wise:
Honour the wise and noble: be exact
In justice; swift to punish or release:
Protect trade: check crime: lay up stores for war:
Promote thy kin: keep spies and overseers:
Take care of all thy servants and thy steeds.

The Pancha Tantra, or Indian book of fables, was translated into Persian; and contemporary rumour affirmed that the same was done for the whole works of Aristotle and the doctrinal dialogues of Plato, such as the Timaeus, Phaedo, Gorgias, and perhaps the Parmenides; though Agathias (ii. 28) is sceptical. But of all books he most loved the New Testament (John Eph. p. 417).

Chosroantioch: When Chosroes returned to Ctesiphon a horseman rode up; it was Al Mondar come to complain of Roman insults. Wittig the Goth, and Bassaces the Armenian, backed up the complaint (A.D. 539). Justinian was aiming at universal sway. Therefore Chosroes challenged the Caesar. The war was a religious war. The Zendavesta was brought out: the nobles rolled in the dust before it, and rent their clothes: the king was in tears, and gave large alms (Shah Nameh, vi. 203). Firdusi records the capture of Araishi Rum (Erzerum?), Theodosiopolis?) at this time, but Procopius is silent.

He took a great city named Shurab (Surae). He saw a lady, named Euphemia, dragged along by her left hand by a soldier, with her infant son trailing on the ground in her right, and he appealed to heaven to punish the author of such evils. He took the lady to be his wife. The captives were released on promise of 200 lb. of gold from Candidus, bishop of Sergiopolis, a fair price for 12,000 slaves; but one that Candidus found himself unable to pay. Hierapolis next had to pay a ransom; at Beroea (Aleppo) the bishop persuaded Chosroes to halve his demand; Antioch made brief resistance, her brave young men were slaughtered; two women drowned themselves for fear of Persian rape. The patriarch had fled into Cilicia. The Romans began to sue for peace [MIGAS], but murmured at Chosroes' demands. Rome could not stoop to pay tribute to Persia. Chosroes' answer was rigorous and humble enough: "You pay Saracens and Huns for doing you service; pay us likewise." Meanwhile he took all care to pay himself, and to keep his troops from marring the justice of his cause. He went down alone to bathe in the sea at Seleucia, and sacrifice to the setting sun. He took Apamea, and plundered the church of all but the fragment of the cross enshrined there. He attended the games, and insisted that the green faction should win, because Justinian favoured the blue. A complaint was laid against a soldier for outraging a woman, and in spite of the people's intercession he had the ravisher crucified. He stripped Antioch of all her treasures of art (Lydus, iii. 54, p. 257), carried all the population captive, and burnt down the whole city, except one or two churches and one lofty suburb (Proc. B. P. i. 11). He then marched on Edessa. But the promise made to ARGARUS still proved true. Chosroes was taken ill, and obliged to abandon the enterprise. He gave out that he was willing to let his captives be ransomed. The Edessenes began subscribing largely for the purpose. The harlots gave their ornaments, the husbands their hoards, or their heirlooms, or their donkeys, or their pet lambs. But a vista of unbounded possibilities of extortion seemed open to the Christian governor, Buz, the Thracian, and he found some excuse for breaking off the subscription. The people of Carrhae came out and offered to redeem the captives, but Chosroes would not admit them as purchasers; they were still idolatrous heathen (ib. 12). He had formed a new plan. Antioch had seemed to him a paradise. He would build a new Antioch of his own, in his own dominions, and plant his captives there. He carried out his purpose, built a city in Mesopotamia, with churches, baths, and laurel groves, and circus, and all the appurtenances of a Greek capital; and there he settled his captives, and gave them a Christian governor, and made it a place of refuge for runaway slaves who could find any one in it to recognise them as brethren. The captives were delighted save one loquacious cobbler, who grumbled that in his old home he had a mulberry tree in his court, and here he had none. The king gave orders to plant some.^f ^f In Mirkhond this story takes the following form. The new city was the exact counterpart of the old, except that one cobbler had a mulberry tree in his court in the old one and had not in the new, a circumstance which, as the historian observes, is not a little remarkable.

The peace had been concluded by Megas, bishop of Aleppo (the Persians call him Mihras), before Chosroes attacked Edessa. But his exactions and hostilities in those regions were construed by the Romans into a breach of the peace. Four campaigns followed (541-544), and then a five years' truce, which the Romans broke before it was over. In A.D. 542 he claimed the promised ransom from Candidus, who replied that he had known himself to be unable to pay it, but had been disappointed in his hope that the emperor would pay it for him. He was confined, and ordered to send messengers with Chosroes' heralds to urge his flock to pay for his release. They contributed, but Chosroes was dissatisfied, and would have made his way into the town but for the secret intelligence that a Christian Saracen in his army conveyed to the inhabitants. This Arab, Ambrus, warned them not to admit the Persians, and encouraged them to stand the siege two days longer. Chosroes withdrew, and put the bishop to death; saying that a perjurer was unfit to be a priest of God (Procop. i. 240).

Nushizad.—But the Persian annalists at once go on to tell of what followed when Chosroes fell sick in Syria. He had a Christian wife of surpassing beauty, by whom he had a noble son, named Nushizad, "sweet-bairn." This young man was the darling both of his father and of all the people. "He knew the doctrine of Ezra, of Zerdusht, and of Messiah, but he would none of the Zendavesta; he washed his two cheeks in the water of the Messiah." All the world was astonished. Chosroes was deeply grieved. He was willing enough to tolerate diversities of faith among his subjects, but he thought that if a king did not hold the true faith there could be no blessing on the world. He confined him at Djundi-shapur with other malefactors. When Chosroes fell sick on his homeward way, the rumour reached Persia that he was dead. Nushizad believed it, got free, had himself proclaimed, released all the "madmen." His mother gave him treasures, he laid a tribute on the towns of Susiana (Ahwaz and Shuster), he wrote for help to the Caesar. Chosroes wrote a touching letter to his general Ram Berzin mourning over his son, almost as David over Absalom, bidding them offer him free pardon—"he is my flesh and blood"—but all his followers were to be hung. He encouraged his general: his son was no kin to the Caesars; and "as for the followers of the Messiah, you have but to raise your voice and they are scared, and become enemies of the cross." He quoted the saying of a sage: "Make no friend of the changeful heaven." Again he urged mercy: "One must not make his body suffer, when his tunic shall be rent; for all the women would rise in his behalf." Nushizad had Roman allies. The armies met. Ram Berzin bade his men make the air like hail in spring with their arrows. Pirouz the lion, an aged champion, addressed Nushizad, and made one last attempt to bring him back to his allegiance. "The impostor Messiah himself was put to death when he renounced the religion of God." Nushizad answered: "Think not that an army of heroes, and the son of a king, will sue for pardon. If the Messiah was put to death, the Majesty of the Lord of the world did not abandon Him; the Holy One returned to God, the Holy One; he preferred the splendour of heaven to this dark world. If I must die, I care not for it: 'tis a poison for which there is no antidote" (Eccl. viii. 8). The contest hung doubtful, till Nushizad fell pierced with an arrow. He sent for a bishop. He testified before the Romans his repentance for his rebellion. A son warring against a father could not be blessed. "My part in life was such, how could I be happy, or a light of the world?" He bade them tell his mother that it was not death that grieved him, but his father's displeasure. He gave instructions for his funeral. He wished for Christian burial, but without any pomp, any gazers at his corpse (which should be seen by his mother only), without diadem, Roman brocade, or throne; without camphor, musk or amber; to be wrapt in a linen cloth, and laid in the earth, like any Christian slave. The bishop told his mother: "His soul is with Messiah, though he died not on the cross." His father's intense grief seems to have saved the son's followers from vengeance, and to have preserved in the Persian annals the ungarbled tale (Shah Nameh, vi. 223).

But Procopius seems to have heard only the angry speeches that dropt from the sick father's lips, and fell on the ears of his Christian physician. He tells us that Anatozadus rebelled, and committed incest with his father's wives (Bell. Goth. iv. 10). He interprets Anatozadus, "immortal" (d̄havari(av)); relates his confinement at Belapaton, in the Vazaina land; his rebellion, even after he had heard his father was better; the expedition of Phabrizus against him; his capture, and the disfigurement of his eyelids. He dates the events about A.D. 543. In connexion with them Procopius tells the story of Tribunus, a Christian physician of Palestine, beloved by Chosroes, who when offered any boon he chose, begged for the release of any captives he might choose to name, and was given 3000 more than he had requested. That he might keep this physician was made by Chosroes a condition of peace in A.D. 545.

The hope of a Christian succession to the throne of Persia may have made the newly-converted Lazi, who were tired of the tyranny of the Roman resident, readier to retransfer their allegiance, as they did in A.D. 541. In A.D. 542 Chosroes tried to take Jerusalem, but was prevented by Belisarius (Proc. Bell. Pers. ii. 20, 21).

That autumn the revolted Armenians of the Roman province who had led Chosroes into the war returned to their allegiance. In A.D. 543 the Catholicus of Dovin, who claimed to be high with Chosroes, offered his services to the Romans as a peacemaker, but his brother whispered the tale of Chosroes' domestic troubles, and suggested an inroad into Persarmenia (Proc. B. P. ii. 21, 24, pp. 249, 260). It was important to a bishop to do the king service just then. The bishop who attended the last moments of Nushizad was probably MAR ABAS, primate of the Nestorians from A.D. 538 to A.D. 552, a converted mage and an active writer, founder of the school of Seleucia (Ass. B. O. iii. 76). Abulpharagius records his dispute with Chosroes, and consequent imprisonment. The king argued, "How can it be that you Nestorians alone should be right and the rest of the Christian world wrong?" It was a great point with him that his son's creed was not that of Rome. Again he asked, "If the Virgin was not parent of a God, why did my ancestors, the magi, come so far to worship her offspring?" He charged them with falling short of other Christians, in works as well as in faith, in allowing their priests to marry. Mar Abas is said to have put a stop to the marriage of bishops. Amrus speaks of other bishops as crucified at the time when Mar Abas was imprisoned, and relates that on the revolt of Nushizad Mar Abas was again in favour, and of great use to the king in bringing the insurgents back to their allegiance (Assem. B. O. iii. 406, 408, 409, 81). The Jacobite primate of Armenia is called Endubius by Procopius. The Roman inroad was unsuccessful. The sickness that excited the hopes of Nushizad was the great plague of A.D. 543 (Proc. B. P. ii. 22, 23).

The war in A.D. 544 seems to Procopius to have assumed a new form, to be an onslaught not only on the emperor but on the God of the Christians. Chosroes and the magi bent all their energies to the attempt to falsify prophecy by a sack of Edessa, and egregiously failed (Procop. Bell. Pers. ii. 26). Mar Abas had studied at Edessa. Sergius of Edessa was the envoy who persuaded Chosroes to sell the Romans a five years' truce.

Armenian affairs.—A.D. 548, Mejej, native governor of Armenia, died, and was succeeded by Ten-Shapur, a Persian, who set up fire temples everywhere. 551, Moses succeeds John as Catholicus or primate of Armenia. 552, the Armenian era. Ten-Shapur, who had imprisoned the son of the archimage for becoming a Christian catechumen, is petitioned against by Moses, and superseded by Ushnas-Vahram. Edict of toleration, except in case of proselytes (?). Crucifixion of the aforesaid convert Isdboozid. 558, Varasdat governor. 564, Surenas governor.

War in Colchis.—A.D. 548, the Lazi were discontent at the prospect of losing the slave-trade with Constantinople, on which they had depended for the necessaries of life. Chosroes plans to transport them elsewhere, and establish a faithful military colony in Colchis, with a naval arsenal on the Euxine. 549, Gubazes, son of Tzathes, and his people, re-invite the Romans, who besiege Petra, which is relieved by Mermeroes. 550, Bessas and the Romans defeat Chorians and re-invest Petra. 551, Petra falls, and is destroyed; but Mermeroes re-occupies the country. 552, Truce for five years, but war continued in Colchis. 555, Mermeroes dies. The Romans murder their ally Gubazes. 557, Truce. 562, Treaty for fifty years; the possession of Lazica and maintenance of Daras conceded by Chosroes; the toleration of Christians (except new converts) and their burial rites promised; and the charge of the Caspian gates undertaken for 30,000 pieces of gold yearly (Menander, pp. 359-364). One bone of contention remained. Suania, a province of Lazica, had not been conquered, but surrendered freely to Persia. Chosroes kept it, and refused to allow a pléviscite (ib. p. 373).

Patriarchs.—After Mar Abas in A.D. 552, Joseph, a favourite physician of Chosroes, was made patriarch, but proved intolerable to the clergy, who obtained leave to depose him (Assem.

B. O. iii. 432). A.D. 559, Achudemes, after his dispute before Chosroes, was ordained by Jacobus Baradaeus, first Jacobite primate for Persia. He had previously been ordained by Christopher, primate of Armenia, to a missionary see among the Arabs. He founded two monasteries and made many converts. He was beheaded A.D. 575 for having baptized a prince of the blood royal [GEORGE] (Assem. B. O. ii. 414, 520; Le Quien, ii. 1533). A.D. 567, EZEKIEL was made primate of the Nestorians, and continued in office till just before the close of the reign of Chosroes, when, because of his blear eyes, Jesuiah was appointed his successor (Assem. B. O. iii. 435, 615).

Christian writers of this time in the East mentioned by Ebed Jesu (Assem. B. O. t. iii.) are John of Apamea, and his disciple James (p. 59), Hanan of Adiabene (p. 81), Thomas of Edessa (p. 86), Sergius of Rhesina and Paul of Nisibis (p. 87), Cyprian of Nisibis (p. 111), another Sergius (p. 171), Joseph the Huzite (p. 180), Isaac the Ninevite (p. 104), Bud the Wanderer (p. 219), Daniel of Rhesina (p. 223), Abraham Katina (p. 225), and Moses of Carce (p. 276). Assemanni adds—Job the Monk (p. 431). The Monophysites (t. ii.) are Xenaias (p. 10), Paul of Callinicus (p. 46), Mar of Amida (p. 48), John of Tela (p. 53), John Bar Aphthon (p. 54), Zacharias of Melitene (p. 55), Jacobus Baradaeus of Edessa (p. 62), Peter of Antioch (p. 69), Moses of Aghel, Simeon, John of Ephesus (p. 85), Cyriacus of Amida (p. 90). Of the orthodox, Simeon of Beth Arsam alone seems noteworthy (t. i. p. 341).

SIRA is said to have been a virgin martyred in Persia in his days.

A new era begins with A.D. 569, the Arabic era of the elephant. Abraham, a Christian slave, had made himself king of Yemen [GREGENTIUS], had taken to himself the wife of the last Homerite Dsu Djadan, and brought up their child, Saif, as his son. An accidental burning of his cathedral induced him to march against the temple of Mecca. The presence of an elephant with his troops added terror to his approach, but his army perished in a simoom, overwhelmed as though with the smoke of the bottomless pit. His sons Yaksum and Masrug succeeded him. His stepson, Saif, soon discovered his real parentage, and fled to Chosroes. That monarch is said to have been divided between reluctance to help idolaters against Christians' and reluctance to leave Christian outrages on Arab women unpunished (Tabari, i. 208; Hamza, p. 43). He armed 809 convicts and sent them to conquer Yemen. Two hundred perished by shipwreck; the remainder landed, burnt their ships, threw their victuals into the sea, and did conquer Yemen (A.D. 573). The reign of Saif lasted only a year, and then Chosroes sent Wahraz with 4000 men to exterminate the Abyssinian Christians from Yemen, which was thenceforward governed by a Persian Marzan. One of these had officially to report to Chosroes II. the rise of Mahometanism (Tabari, i. 218). Had a Christian power been maintained in Southern Arabia Mahometanism might have been crushed at the outset; and, as Gibbon observes, "Abyssinia would have prevented a revolution that has changed the civil and religious face of the world."

At the same time a new power had arisen in the East, that of the Turks. A quarrel between this nation and Chosroes—some of their ambassadors had fallen victims to the climate of Persia, and the king suspected poison—induced them to send an embassy to Rome. In August, A.D. 569, Zemarclus set out on a return embassy to Tartary. When after a year he arrived there, the Turks who were assembled to meet him burst into tears. There was an ancient tradition among them, that when an ambassador from Rome should appear in their midst they were to know that the whole world was passing away, and that thenceforth mankind would destroy one another. Zemarclus found that they believed the Romans to be the slaves of the Persians. He appealed to the trophy of Trajan in Persia as a disproof of this, and Chosroes had it demolished. The embassy returned impressed with the upright morals of the Turks (Menander, p. 380). Justin, who ascended the throne A.D. 565, began about the same time to set an example of persecution of the sectaries of the empire, which the magi are said to have urged Chosroes to follow. Surenas had murdered Manuel, the brother of Vartan the Mamigonian, in Armenia, and that chieftain found occasion to raise the standard of revolt. An attempt was made to raise a fire-temple at Dovin. The Armenians protested, pleaded their rights, armed for resistance, surprised Dovin, slew Surenas, massacred the magi, appealed for help to Justin. This, according to John of Ephesus (ii. 19–24), was in A.D. 569 (p. 127). Bahram Tehubin subdued Armenia, and Vartan, Gorgonis (prince of Georgia), and the Catholicus came to Constantinople in the autumn of A.D. 570 (ib. p. 403). In A.D. 569 Justin had begun to shew symptoms of insanity (John Eph. iii. 5). In the spring of A.D. 572 a Christian envoy, Sebochthes, was sent by Chosroes to Justin to claim the ten years' instalment of the promised tribute, which was then due. He pleaded that Persia was a Christian country, and that in warring against it Justin could not be blest. He was dismissed with insult (Menander, Ley. Barb. 20, p. 313).

In the Shah Nameh we are told that on the accession of a new emperor, Chosroes wrote to him in great grief, saying, "May you receive good news of the Caesar: Christ guard his soul," and offering him any help he needed, but claiming him as a vassal. The ambassador was insulted, and Chosroes swore to ruin Rome. He "made heaven giddy with his march." But to pay his troops, by advice of Buzurdjmihr, he borrowed money of his subjects; a shoemaker offered a loan of 4,000,000 drachmas. The king offered $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. interest. The shoemaker asked only that his son should be educated as a scribe. The king would not break down the barriers of society and relax the bonds of religion by teaching the sacred language to a profane person; so rejected the loan with scorn. Aleppo (Beroea) was taken. Finally the emperor sent an embassy, acknowledging himself Chosroes' vassal, and offering ten oxhides full of gold. Chosroes demanded further 1000 pieces of Roman brocade, which were duly given (Shah Nameh, vi. 509 ff.). At the outset of the war Mondar, son of Aretas, gained great advantages for the Romans; and Marcian had nearly taken Nisibis. Justin laid a plot against the life of Mondar and sent to supersede Marcian. The siege of Nisibis was abandoned. Chosroes came on like a whirlwind, and the Persians used the engines to besiege Daras. Cometes, by whom Chosroes sent his offered terms to the garrison of Daras, did not think fit to disclose them (John Eph. vi. 2-6; Simoc. iii. 10, 11). Meanwhile Adormahan ravaged up to Antioch, and took Apamea by treachery. Daras fell A.D. 574. Two thousand captive virgins were sent as a present to the king of the Turks, but found opportunity to drown themselves on the way (John Eph. vi. 7). December, A.D. 574, Tiberius was made Caesar, and a three-years' truce on the Syrian frontier followed, A.D. 575, but war continued in Armenia. Mondar was reconciled with Rome, meeting the commander, Justinian, in the church of Sergius, and made a sudden attack on Hira. Chosroes made this a ground for menacing Theodosiopolis and invading Cappadocia. But a band of Scythians plundered his camp and overthrew his sacred fire; in vain he pointed to his grey hairs and implored his troops to fight at his side; he had to flee across the Euphrates and over the Kurd mountains. He made a law that the king should no more go to battle in person. Thereupon the Romans, in the autumn of 576, overran all the northern part of his dominions and committed frightful atrocities upon the Christian inhabitants (John Eph. vi. 4, 8, 9, 10). A paltry Persian force then utterly routed the Roman army, and, on promise of an amnesty, Armenia submitted again to Chosroes. A.D. 577 was spent in negotiations. Chosroes sincerely desired peace, but the demands of Tiberius rose with every concession, and the treaty was broken off. Two Persian raids that autumn were avenged, A.D. 578, by Maurice invading Arzanene, respecting the inhabitants who were Christians, and transplanting them to Cyprus (ib. 11-15). He then turned southward and ravaged Mesopotamia up to the banks of the Tigris. Chosroes saw the fairest provinces of his empire, where no invader had been known to tread, ravaged under his very eyes. "He shut himself up in Ctesiphon," says Gibbon, "and sank indignant to the grave."

On his deathbed he is said to have sent for the Catholicus and received baptism at his hands. He examined his eldest son Hormisdas, and charged him to remember the poor. He left directions that his body should be embalmed and enthroned in state, and expressed a hope that his subjects would weep for him. He bade them cut for his epitaph: "If we have done good it is with Him who will not bate the reward; if we have done evil it is with Him who hath the power to punish" (Patkanien, p. 184; Shah Naneh, p. 539; Hamza, p. 44; Evagrius, iv. 27). His death was in March, A.D. 579.

Theology of Chosroes.—To prevent misconceptions arising from our prefatory remarks we may state that in the Paimani-i-Farhang, as reported in the Dabistan to have been translated into the vernacular by order of Chosroes, and, as far as we can trace, in the tenets of Chosroes himself, there does not seem to be either dualism or iconoclasm. One God is the creator of all, but each sphere of the concentric orbs of paradise has its own planetary genius, worshipped under material forms (Dabistan, pp.

147-154). The incarnation was the great stumbling-block of the unbeliever, hence the vehement controversies of the sects on that subject. [EDESSE.] Chosroes may be likened to Julian for his attempt to measure his strength with Christ; but with this difference, that whereas to Julian Christianity was a contemptible folly, to Chosroes it was either the truth or a diabolic delusion.

CHOSROES II. of Persia (PARVIZ or Eperwiz or Ambarviz) reigned A.D. 590-628, is described in his early days under his father Hormisdas as "a young man hardly to be distinguished from the moon," and entitled himself after his accession, "king of kings, lord of lords, master of masters, prince of peace, saviour of mankind, in the sight of gods a virtuous and immortal man, in the sight of men a most manifest god, surpassingly glorious, a conqueror rising with the sun furnishing to the night her eyes, of illustrious ancestry, a king averse to war, beneficent, hirer of the Asons (genii?), and guardian of the realm of Persia" (Theophylact. Sim. iv. 8). He was a very different kind of person from his grandfather. He may seem greater, if we look only to his Western conquests. He may seem nearer to Christianity, if we look only to his reverence for Christian saints. But a closer view will correct both conceptions.

He was employed by his father in putting down the revolt in Georgia. He entered into negotiations with the eristhaws or nobles; and by the promise of great favours and the written concession of the inheritance of their domains for their children, he induced those barons to declare themselves independent of their native sovereigns, and accept their fief each directly from the king of Persia. They paid tribute to Parviz, while the sons of Bakur, and the grandsons of Wakhtang remained entrenched in rocky fastnesses. When the Turkish invasion compelled Hormisdas to make peace with Maurice and to make Bahram Tchubin general, Parviz was recalled from Georgia. The highlanders and lowlanders of that country then came to an understanding, appealed to Maurice to give them a native sovereign, while maintaining the rights of the nobles conceded by Parviz. He agreed, and gave them one of Wakhtang's grandsons (son of Mirdat's sister), named also Gwaram or Bahram. Some of these Georgian nobles seem to have been Christians of the Chatzintzarian, or Cross-worshipping sect. An inscription by one of them has been found: "O cross of the Saviour, have pity on Stephanos, patrician of Karthli." The fire-altar surmounted by a cross appears on the coins of this Stephanos, and on those of Vrra or Gwaram, who first takes the title Agsu (Augustus) himself, instead of giving it to Hormisdas (Langlois, Numism. Georg. pp. 19, 23, 27, 29). In revenge for this annexation of Georgia, as soon as Bahram Tchubin had conquered the Turks, Hormisdas sent him to re-invade Colchis (A.D. 589). His defeat there induced the king to recall him with insult. Bahram is said to have proclaimed Chosroes. The king banished his son, and imprisoned Bindoes and Bostam, his brothers-in-law, Chosroes' uncles. They broke loose, threw him into a dungeon, put out his eyes, and finally murdered him. Bahram proclaimed himself king, and rejected all overtures from Parviz. The latter, whether himself an accomplice in his father's death or not, was supported in battle and aided in flight by his father's murderers. One of them, Bindoes, tricked the pursuers and enabled him to escape. He debated between flight to the Turks and to the Romans, and chose the latter. Some say that at this juncture he laid the reins on his horse's neck and cried to Christ to guide him rightly. He was received by Probus, governor of Circesium, who reported the matter to Commentiolus, prefect of the East at Hierapolis. With some reluctance on both sides, by suasion of bishop DOMITIAN, on cession to Rome of Martyropolis and Daras, and of Armenia up to the walls of Nisibis, and the shores of lake Van, perhaps by marriage with the emperor's daughter Maria, Chosroes was received as guest and son of Maurice (Theoph. Simoc. iv. 10). Mirkhond says he spent eighteen months at the Byzantine court, but no contemporary or nearly contemporary authorities support him. Theophylact relates how the Roman guests at a banquet were entertained with the sight of the tortures and death of one of Bahram's generals (Theophylact. v. 5). The question of the identity of the princess Maria with the Christian wife of Parviz, who is so famed in Eastern song, shall be discussed elsewhere. [SHIRIN.] Chosroes was victorious, and received from Rome a robe of honour embroidered with the cross. He hesitated about wearing it, but was assured by his grand mobed that he might safely do so. But when he appeared thus clad at a banquet, the Persians murmured that he had turned Christian. To disprove it, Bindoes bade him take the knife with the iron handle and perform the Zoroastrian ceremony of silent grace before meat. The emperor's son (or more probably nephew) objected; a fray ensued, and Bindoes gave the Greek prince a blow. Maria restored peace, causing the offender to be given up and pardoned (Tabari, ii. 299). It is very evident that Chosroes was not a Christian. He himself proclaimed, that his wife Syra was a Christian, and he himself a Hellene (Evagr. vi. 20).

He did, however, pay honour both to the Virgin and to the martyrs Sergius and Bacchus. Theophylact of Simocetta relates that when Probus, bishop of Chalcedon, was sent as ambassador by Maurice to Ctesiphon, Chosroes requested a sight of the portrait of the Virgin, which he knew to be in the ambassador's possession, adored it, said he had seen the original in a vision, and been promised by her the glories of Alexander the Great (Theoph. Sim. v. 15). To the intercession of Sergius he ascribed the success of his arms and the pregnancy of his wife. His letters to the martyr are preserved (Evagr. H. E. vi. 21; Theoph. Sim. v. 13, 14). They were inscribed on the presents he sent: "Chosroes, king of kings, to the great martyr Sergius. I have sent these gifts not for men to admire them, nor that my words should make known the greatness of thy all-worshipful name, but that the truth of the fact that has come to pass should be proclaimed, and the many mercies I have received of thee. For I hold it as a piece of good fortune that my name should be inscribed upon thy vessels. When I was at Beramas, I besought thee, O saint, that Syra (Shirin) might conceive in her womb." Sepéos tells us that Shirin built many monasteries and churches near Ctesiphon.

This alliance of Parviz with Maurice was not perhaps altogether advantageous for the church. The two sovereigns agreed to endeavour to strip Armenia of her martial population, by employing the men of that country on the Danube or against the Turk. They thus weakened what might have been a centre of resistance to the Moslems (Sepéos in Patkanien, p. 194). The story of the vengeance taken by Chosroes for the death of Maurice shall be told elsewhere. [PHOCAS, HERACLIUS.] He took Daras A.D. 605, Amida 606, Edessa 607, Aleppo 608 (?), overran Asia Minor 609, took Antioch 611, Caesarea in Cappadocia 612, Damascus 614. Jerusalem (A.D. 615) revolted against him and slew his garrison. In eighteen days he took it, filled it with 17,000 corpses, led off 35,000 slaves, and the life-giving cross, and the patriarch Zacharias to be priest of it. Modestus, abbat of St. Theodore, was made administrator of the city (Sepéos, ib. 200). The Jews bought up Christian captives and killed them (Theoph. A.M. 6106). A.D. 616, his generals took Alexandria, and besieged Chalcedon, which fell A.D. 617, and thenceforward he besieged Constantinople. A.D. 624, his fleet conquered Rhodes, and carried off the art treasures of the island. The daring and brilliant retaliations of Heraclius afterwards (A.D. 622-627) are boasted by the Mahometans as fulfilments of a prophecy of Mahomet.

Parviz had in his harem 3000 wives and 12,000 slave women (Hamza, p. 45). He demanded Hadiqah, daughter of Naaman, the Christian son of Al Mondar, in marriage. Naaman refused the demand, was summoned to court and trampled to death by elephants. His daughter Hadiqah retired to a convent founded by her aunt Hind, on the banks of the Euphrates, and seems there to have been unmolested. But Chosroes had thus provoked a revolt of his father's Saracen allies, and on the day of battle it is said that these Christian Arabs took to invoking the name of Mahomet, and gained a glorious victory at Dsu-Qar. The prophet, who had seen the battle in vision, wrote to Parviz: "Now shield thee from the chastisement of God, or prepare thee for a struggle with God and His apostle, for which thou hast no strength." Chosroes tore the letter. Mahomet said, "He has torn his kingdom" (Tabari, ii. 309-326).

Mahomet had also encouraged a wager that the Greeks would soon beat the Persians. Parviz fled for his life before Heraclius; but a different Nemesis slew him. He had himself come to the throne by the devoted attachment of those who strangled Hormisdas, and then, when he found men murmur, in affected indignation had put them to death. His son, Siroes, was not slow to follow the example of parricide.

On Whit-Sunday A.D. 628 the following despatch was read in the churches of Constantinople: "Rejoice in the Lord, all ye lands: for the proud fighter against God, Chosroes, hath fallen. He hath fallen and his memorial is perished from the earth, who exalted himself and spake unrighteousness in pride and contempt against our Lord Jesus Christ, the very God, and his undefiled mother, our blessed lady, parent of God, and ever-virgin Mary; the impious one hath perished with a crash. On the 24th of February last, sedition was raised against him by his firstborn son, Siroius and all the armies of the Persians deserted Chosroes and ran together to Siroius, and Chosroes planned to take to flight, and was taken prisoner and thrown into the new castle built by him for the keeping of his treasures. On the 25th of the same February Siroius was crowned, and on the 28th, after making Chosroes four days a prisoner bound in iron in all anguish, he destroyed the same merciless, proud blasphemer by a most bitter death, that he may know that Jesus born of Mary, crucified of the Jews, as he himself had written, against whom he did blaspheme, is God Almighty, and he gave him according to the things written to him by us. And in this life thus he perished, but he went the way of Judas . . . into the fire prepared for Satan and them that are worthy of him."

The letter of Cabat Sadasadasach, also called Siroius, to his "brother" Heraclius, is appended, and this closes the Chronicon Paschale.

The primates of the Nestorians were Jesuiab, d. A.D. 596; Sabarjesus, who followed Chosroes to Daras, and died there A.D. 604; Gregory, 607-610;—of the Jacobites: Kam Jesu, till A.D. 609; Samuel, from 614 to 624 (Assem. B. O. ii. 414).

The remaining history of Persia till the Mahometan conquest is confused, tumultuous and difficult to trace. The cross was restored to Jerusalem, whether by Purandocht, daughter of Parviz, or by the general Sharbarz. Women, infants, or usurpers held the throne, till the era of the accession of Gesdigerd or ISDEGERDIS (A.D. 632), in whose reign Persia fell an easy prey (A.D. 652) to the Arabs. [E. B. B.]

Augustine writes to cheer him, and encloses a letter to the court that he can give or not as he likes. (The enclosure is lost.) Aug. Ep. 244 (83), ii. 1059. The name is variously written "Chrisimo" and "Chrissimo" in the MSS., and edited "Chryximo" in the earlier editions. It is possible that the name has wholly disappeared, and we have only a repetition of ch(a)rissimo fratri. [E. B. B.]

CHRESTUS (1), bishop of Syracuse, was addressed by Constantine the Great A.D. 314, in a letter preserved by Eusebius (H. E. x. 5), wherein the emperor complained of the continuance of discord in Africa, and of the ridicule it brought on Christianity; and therefore ordered Chrestus to be present at the council of Arles by the 1st of August, and authorised him to apply for a public carriage, for himself and two presbyters and three servant lads, to Latronianus, the corrector of Sicily. Constantine speaks of "the catholic sect (alpeoris)," and "the reverence due to the most holy sect." Chrestus subscribed first of the bishops at Arles (Labbe, Conc. i. 1429).

CHRESTUS (2), bishop of Nicaea, elected in the year 325, after the expulsion of Theognius for refusing to sign the Nicene confession, at the same time that Amphion was appointed in the room of Eusebius of Nicomedia. In 328, Chrestus and Amphion had to retire on the recantation of Theognius and Eusebius (Theod. i. 20; Soer. i. 14; Athanas. Apolog. vol. ii. p. 727). [E. V.]

CHRISDAPHOR. [CHRISTOPHER.]

CHRISTE. [CALLISTA.]

CHRISTETA. [VINCENT of ABILA.]

CHRISTIANA, ST., Virgin, of Termonde in Flanders, is said to have been the only daughter of Migranimus, "rex Anglorum," unknown elsewhere, and probably lived in the 8th century; for she went to Dickelvenna (Ticlivinum), near Ghent, that she might tranquilly devote herself to the catholic religion, under St. Hilduardus, as it is supposed, and Hilduardus, who first introduced Christianity to Dickelvenna, died A.D. 750.

It is possible that her alleged royal birth may indicate a confusion between her and Christina, a saint of the 11th century, daughter of king Edward the Outlaw.

Her relics were translated from Dickelvenna to Termonde about the end of the 9th century, and were enshrined with those of St. Hilduardus.

St. Christiana's conversion is attributed to the visit of an angel who came to her under the guise of a poor man, and baptized her in a living stream, whereupon she forsook the idolatrous worship of her country, abdicated her royal position, and devoted herself to a life of great austerity.

She is commemorated on the 26th July; also on the 7th of September, the day on which her relics were translated to Termonde (AA. SS. July, vi. pp. 311-314, where reference is made to several monastic authorities). [D. R. J.]

CHRISTIANUS, ST., confessor, and 37th bishop of Auxerre. He succeeded St. Abbo. He was born at the beginning of the 9th century, and is thought by some to have been abbat of the monastery of St. Germanus of Auxerre. He held the see 13 years.

He was present at the council of Tousy, which he subscribed before Abbo, perhaps as a coadjutor or successor-designate.

The other councils which he attended were the three of Perrigny or Fétigny, and that of Soissons. It is said that he often pronounced the word Jesus, and found an unspeakable charm in the associations of this name. (Gall. Christ. xii. 276; Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. p. 603).

[D. R. J.]

CHRISTINA (1), a Christian woman of Athens, after the martyrdom of Peter of Lamp-sacus, arrested at Athens along with Dionysius by the same governor, and given in charge with him to two soldiers of the governor's train, whom she teaches, and they are converted. The pair of converts therefore, with Dionysius, were tortured and stoned, and Christina, since she fell upon the corpses and wept over them, was beheaded. Such is the story in the Menology on May 15. The Latin acts given by Ruinart do not mention Dionysius nor Christina, but seem to speak of the latter as Dionysia; nor do they mention Athens, but speak of Troas as the place where the governor is informed that Andrew, Paul, and Nicomachus are Christians. Nicomachus is at first most eager in confessing, but under the stress of torture, when at the point of death, he cries with a loud voice, "I have never been a Christian, but I sacrifice to the gods." He was immediately taken down, and a demon seized him, and dashed him to the ground, and, biting his tongue, he expired on the spot. Then Dionysia, aged sixteen, exclaims, "Unhappy man!" and so is arrested and given over to two young men. (This incident seems to be misplaced.) They see an angel come to protect her at midnight, and they fall at her feet, and beg her pardon for the wrong they did her. The next day Onesicrates and Macedo, priests of Diana, stir a tumult, and Andrew and Paul, after being scourged, are given over to the populace to stone. The end of the story as above; the proconsul's name, Optimus; the time, that of Decius; the day, May 15, as in the Eastern legend (Acta SS. May, iii. 450).

CHRISTINA (2), a damsel of Tyre, confined by her father in a tower that no one should see her; she looks out upon the beauty of the sky, and is convinced of the futility of idols and throws them down. Her father punishes her in every way, plunges her in the sea, which serves for a baptism, reports her to Dio, the governor, and at last she is killed. No date given, except the day, July 24. (Men. Basil.) Acts of this martyr, by Alphanus of Salerno (11th century), will be found in Migne (Patrol. Lat. cxlvii. 1269). They may, perhaps, contain fragments of the authentic record of the trial by Urbanus of a martyr of this name, but much interpolated and confused. Urbanus is made the father of Christina; and the two chief elements of the story of St. Catherine, the philosophic ability of the martyr, and the wheel on which she suffered, are both ascribed to her. Indeed an origin is suggested for the story of the fracture of the wheel, for Christina is said also to have broken a wonderful clock in the temple of the sun. Urbanus is succeeded by Idion (=Dio), and Idion by Julianus. The last name seems to be derived from the month of the Passion. (See Acta SS. Jul. v. 637; Tillem. Mém. v. 538.)

CHRISTOLOGY (Χριστολογία) embraces the doctrine of Christ's person, while Soteriology is the doctrine of Christ's work or salvation. The term was used by English divines in the 17th century (as Owen and Fleming, who named their treatises on the person of Christ Christology), and has recently been reintroduced from Germany. We confine ourselves here to a historical summary of the doctrine within the limits of this work, omitting the mediaeval and Protestant development and modern speculations, and referring for details to the articles on Arianism, Apollinarianism, Nestorianism, Eutychianism, Monophysism, Council of Nicaea, Council of Chalcedon, &c.

I. The BIBLICAL Christology embraces (1) the Messianic prophecies of the Old Testament; (2) the Christology of Christ in the Gospels; (3) the Christology of the Apostles, (a) of James; (b) of Peter; (c) of Paul; (d) of John (including the Apocalypse). See the respective articles in Smith's DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE.

II. The ANTE-NICENE Christology (from the death of St. John, about A.D. 100, to the council of Nicaea, 325). The ecclesiastical development of this central and fundamental dogma of our religion started from the confession of Peter (ὃ ἐστὶν ὁ Χριστός, ὁ υἱὸς τοῦ Θεοῦ τοῦ ζῶντος), which Christ made the rock of his indestructible church, and from the idea of the incarnate Logos of John (ὁ λόγος σὰρξ ἐγένετο), i.e. from the faith in the Messiahship of Jesus of Nazareth and in the incarnation of the eternal Son of God for our salvation. It embraced three points, inseparably connected, the divinity of Christ, the humanity of Christ, and the proper relation of the two to each other in his theanthropic person. They were developed in constant conflict with heresy, which served to stimulate and unfold the knowledge of the church, and to compel it to a logical statement of its faith. The ante-Nicene church had to contend with two fundamental and antagonistic christological heresies, Ebionism and Gnosticism; the one essentially Jewish, the other essentially heathen; the one affirming the humanity of Christ to the exclusion of his divinity, the other running into the opposite error by resolving his humanity into a delusive show (δόκησις, φάντασμα); both agreeing in the denial of the incarnation and the real and abiding union of the Divine and human in the person of our Lord. Besides there arose in the 2nd and 3rd centuries two forms of Unitarianism or Monarchianism, (a) first the rationalistic or dynamic Unitarianism represented by the Alogians, Theodotus, Artemon, and Paul of Samosata (see these articles), who either denied the divinity of Christ altogether or resolved it into a mere power (δύναμις), although they generally admitted his supernatural generation by the Holy Spirit; (b) the Patripassian and Sabellian Unitarianism, which maintained the divinity of Christ, but merged it into the essence of the Father, and so denied the independent personality of Christ; as did Praxeas, Noëtus, Callistus (pope Calixtus I.), Ieryllus of Bostra, and, in connexion with a very ingenious theory of the Trinity, Sabellius (see these articles).

In antagonism with these heresies the church taught the full divinity of Christ (versus Ebionism and rationalistic Monarchianism), his full humanity (versus Gnosticism and Manicheism), and his independent personality (versus Patripassianism and Sabellianism). The dogma was developed in close connexion with the dogma of the Trinity, which resulted with logical necessity from the deity of Christ and the deity of the Holy Ghost in connexion with the fundamental principle of Monotheism; for if Christ be strictly divine and the Holy Spirit likewise, then God, who is one in essence, must be threefold in person, Father, Son, and Spirit; and to this inherent or immanent Trinity of being corresponds an economical Trinity of revelation or self-manifestation in the works of creation, redemption, and sanctification.

The ante-Nicene Christology is not as clear and definite as that of the Nicene and post-Nicene ages; it passed through a process with many obstructions, loose statements, uncertain conjectures and speculations; but the instinct and main current of the church was steadily towards the Nicene and Chalcedonian creed-statements, especially if we look to the worship and devotional life as well as to theological literature. Christ was the object of worship, prayer, and praise (which implies his deity) from the very beginning; as we must infer from several passages of the New Testament (John xx. 28; Acts vii. 59, 60; ix. 14, 21; 1 Cor. i. 2; Phil. ii. 10; Heb. i. 6; 1 John v. 13-15; Rev. v. 6-13), from the heathen testimony of Pliny the Younger concerning the singing of hymns to Christ as God ("carmen Christo quasi Deo dicere," Ep. x. 97), from the Gloria in excelsis, which was the daily morning hymn of the Eastern church as early as the 2nd century, from the Tersanctus, from the hymn of Clement of Alexandria to the divine Logos (Paedag. iii. 12), from the statements of Origen, contra Cels. viii. 67; Eusebius, Hist. Eccl. v. 28, and many other testimonies. Christ was believed to be divine and adored as divine, before he was clearly taught to be divine. Life preceded theology. Many a martyr in those days of persecution died for his faith in the divinity of our Lord, with a very imperfect knowledge of this doctrine. It is unfair to make the church responsible for the speculative crudities, the experimental and tentative statements of some ante-Nicene fathers, who believed more than they could clearly express in words. In the first efforts of the human mind to grapple with so great a mystery we must expect many mistakes and inaccuracies. The ante-Nicene rules of faith as we find them in the writings of Irenaeus, Tertullian, Cyprian, etc., are essentially agreed among themselves and with the Apostles' Creed, so called, as it appears first in the 4th century, especially at Rome and Aquileia (see Rufinus, de Symbolo). They confess the divine-human character of Christ as the chief object of the Christian faith, but more in the form of facts and in simple, popular style than in the form of doctrinal or logical statement. The Nicene Creed is much more explicit and dogmatic in consequence of the preceding contest with heresy, but the substance of the faith is the same in the Nicene and Apostles' Creeds.

In the apostolic fathers we find only simple, practical, biblical statements and reminiscences of apostolic preaching for purposes of edification. One of them, Ignatius of Antioch, does not hesitate to call Christ God without qualification (ad Ephes. c. 18: ὁ γὰρ θεὸς ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦς ὁ Χρ.; c. 7, ἐν σαρκὶ γενόμενος θεός, comp. ad Rom. c. 6). Polycarp calls him "the eternal Son of God" (ad Phil. c. 2, 8), and associates him in his last prayer with the Father and the Spirit (Martyr. Polyc. c. 14). Comp. Schwane's Dogmengeschichte der vornicänischen Zeit (Münster, 1862), pp. 60 sqq.

The theological speculation on the person of Christ began with Justin Martyr and was carried on by Clement of Alexandria and Origen in the East; Irenaeus, Hippolytus, and Tertullian in the West.

Justin Martyr (d. 166) takes up the Logos idea, which was prepared by the Old Testament personification of the Word and Wisdom of God, assumed an idealistic shape in Philo of Alexandria, and reached a realistic completion in St. John.

Following the suggestion of the double meaning of the Greek λόγος (ratio and oratio), Justin distinguishes in the Logos, i.e. the divine nature of Christ, two elements, the immanent and the transitive, the revelation of God ad intra and the revelation ad extra. He teaches the procession of the Logos from the free will (not the essence) of God by generation, without division or diminution of the divine substance. This begotten Logos he conceives as a hypostatic being, a person distinct from the Father and subordinate to him. He co-ordinates God the Son and the prophetic Spirit as objects of Christian worship (σεβόμεθα καὶ προσκυνούμεν, Apol. i. 6). Peculiar is his doctrine of the λόγος σπερματικός, the Word disseminated among man, i.e. Christ before the incarnation, who scattered elements of truth and virtue among the heathen philosophers and poets, although they did not know it. (Comp. the monograph of Semisch on Justin Martyr, and the thorough discussion in Dorner's History of Christology, i. 415-435.) Clement of Alexandria (d. 220) sees in the Logos the ultimate principle of all existence, without beginning and timeless; the revealer of the Father, the sum of all intelligence and wisdom, the personal truth, the author of the world, the source of light and life, the educator of the race, who at last became man to make us partakers of his divine nature. Like some other ante-Nicene fathers (Justin M., Tertullian, and Origen), he conceived the outward appearance of Christ's humanity in the state of humiliation to have been literally "without form or comeliness" (Isa. liii. 2, 3), but he made a distinction between two kinds of beauty, the outward beauty of the flesh, which soon fades away, and the moral beauty of the soul, which is permanent, and shone even through the servant form of our Lord (Paed. iii. c. 1). Origen (d. 254) felt the whole weight of the christological problem, but obscured it by foreign speculations, and prepared the way both for the Arian heresy and the Athanasian orthodoxy, though more fully for the latter. On the one hand, he closely approaches the Nicene Homousion by bringing the Son into union with the essence of the Father, and ascribing to him the attribute of eternity; he is properly the author of the Nicene doctrine of the eternal generation of the Son from the essence of the Father (though he usually represents the generation as an act of the will of the Father). But on the other hand, he teaches subordinationism by calling the Son simply God (θεός), and a second God (δεύτερος θεός), but not the God (ὁ θεός, or αὐτόθεος). In his views on the humanity of Christ he approached the semi-Gnostic deistic and ascribed to the glorified body of Christ ubiquity (in which he was followed by Gregory of Nyssa). His enemies charged him with teaching a double Christ (answering to the lower Jesus and the higher Soter of the Gnostics), and a merely temporary validity of the body of the Redeemer. As to the relation of the two natures in Christ, he was the first to use the term 'God-man' (θεάνθρωπος), and to apply the favourite illustration of fire heating and penetrating the iron without altering its character.

The Western church was not so fruitful in speculation, but upon the whole sounder and more self-consistent. The key-note was struck by Irenaeus (d. 202), who, though of Eastern origin, spent his active life in the south of France. He carries special weight as a pupil of Polycarp of Smyrna, and through him a grand pupil of St. John, the inspired master θεολόγος. He likewise uses the terms Logos and Son of God interchangeably, and concedes the distinction, made also by the Valentinians, between the inward and the uttered word, in reference to man, but contests the application of it to God, who is above all antitheses, absolutely simple and unchangeable, and in whom before and after, thinking and speaking, coincide. He repudiates also every speculative or à priori attempt to explain the derivation of the Son from the Father; this he holds to be an incomprehensible mystery. He is content to define the actual distinction between Father and Son, by saying that the former is God revealing himself, the latter God revealed; the one is the ground of revelation, the other is the actual, appearing revelation itself. Hence he calls the Father "the invisible of the Son," and the Son "the visible of the Father." He discriminates most rigidly the conceptions of generation and of creation. The Son, though begotten from the created world, as increate, without beginning, and eternal. All plainly shewing, that Irenaeus is much nearer the Nicene dogma of the substantial identity of the Son with the Father than Justin Martyr and the Alexandrians. If, as he does in several passages, he still subordinates the Son to the Father, he is certainly inconsistent: and that for want of an accurate distinction between the eternal Logos and the actual Christ. Expressions like "My Father is greater than I," which apply only to the Christ of history, in the state of humiliation, he refers also, like Justin and Origen, to the eternal Logos. On the other hand, he is charged with leaning in the opposite direction towards the Sabellian and Patripassian views, but unjustly. Apart from his frequent want of precision in expression, he steers in general, with sure biblical and churchly tact, equally clear of both extremes, and asserts alike the essential unity and the eternal personal distinction of the Father and the Son. The incarnation of the Logos he ably discusses, viewing it both as a restoration and redemption from sin and death, and as the completion of the revelation of God and of the creation of man. In the latter view, as finisher, Christ is the perfect Son of Man, in whom the likeness of man to God (the similitudo Dei), regarded as moral duty, in distinction from the image of God (imago Dei), as an essential property, becomes for the first time fully real. According to this, the incarnation would be grounded in the original plan of God for the education of mankind, and independent of the fall: it would have taken place even without the fall, though in some other form. Yet Irenaeus does not expressly say this; speculation in abstract possibilities was foreign to his realistic cast of mind. He vindicates at length the true and full humanity of Christ against the docteticism of the Gnostic schools. Christ must be man, like us, in body, soul, and spirit, though without sin, if he would redeem us from sin and make us perfect. He is the second Adam, the absolute, universal man, the prototype and summing up (ἀνακεφαλαιώσις, recapitulatio) of the whole race. Connected with this is the beautiful idea of Irenaeus (repeated by Hippolytus) that Christ made the circuit of all the stages of human life to redeem them all (Adv. Haer. ii. 22, § 4: omnes venit per semetipsum salvare . . . infantes et parvulos et pueros et juvenes, et seniores, et c.). To carry this out, he extended the life of Jesus to fifty years. He also teaches a close union of the divinity and humanity in Christ, in which the former is the active principle and the seat of personality, the latter the passive and receptive principle.

Tertullian cannot escape the charge of subordinationism. He bluntly calls the Father the whole divine substance, and the Son a part of it; illustrating their relation by the figures of the fountain and the stream, the sun and the beam. He would not have two suns, he says, but he might call Christ God, as Paul does in Rom. ix. 5. The sunbeam, too, in itself considered, may be called sun, but not the sun a beam. Sun and beam are two distinct things (species) in one essence (substantia), as God and the Word, as the Father and the Son. But we should not take figurative language too strictly, and must remember that Tertullian was specially interested to distinguish the Son from the Father in opposition to the Patripassian Praxeas. In other respects he did the church Christology material service. He propounds a threefold hypostatical existence of the Son (filatio):—(1) The pre-existent, eternal immanence of the Son in the Father; they being as inseparable as reason and word in man, who was created in the image of God, and hence in a measure reflects his being. (2) The coming forth of the Son with the Father for the purpose of the creation. (3) The manifestation of the Son in the world by the incarnation. He advocates the entire yet sinless humanity of Christ against both the doctetic Gnostics (Adv. Marcionem, and De carne Christi) and the Patripassians (Adv. Praxeam). He accuses the former of making Christ who is all truth, a half lie, and, by the denial of his flesh, resolving all his work in the flesh into an empty show. He urges against the latter that God the Father is incapable of suffering and change. Cyprian (d. 250) marks no progress in this or any other doctrine except that of the Catholic unity and the episcopate.

Dionysius, bishop of Rome (262), came nearest the Nicene view. He maintained distinctly, in the controversy with Dionysius of Alexandria, the unity of essence and the threefold personal distinction of Father, Son, and Spirit, in opposition to Sabellianism, tritheism, and subordinationism. His view is embodied in a fragment preserved by Athanasius (De sent. Dionysii, c. 4, and Routh, Reliqu. s. iii. 384).

On the ante-Nicene Christology see especially Bull's Defensio fidei Nicaenae de aeterna divinitate Filii Dei (first Oxf. 1685); Edw. Burton's Testimonies of the ante-Nicene Fathers to the Divinity of Christ (2nd ed. Oxf. 1829), and the first sections in the works of Baur and Dorner (see below); also P. Schaff, The Conflict of Trinitarianism and Unitarianism in the ante-Nicene age (Bibliotheca Sacra of Andover, 1858, Oct.).

III. THE NICENE Christology (from the council of Nicaea, 325, to the council of Constantinople, 381). It is the result of the struggle with Arianism and Semi-arianism (see these articles) which agitated the church, especially the Eastern church, for more than half a century. The Arian heresy denied the strict deity of Christ (the co-equality with the Father), and taught that he is a subordinate divinity, different in essence from God (ἕτεροοῦσιος), pre-existing before the world, yet not eternal (ἦν ποτε ὅτε οὐκ ἦν), himself a creature of the will of God out of nothing (κτίσμα ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων), who then created this present world and became incarnate for our salvation. Semi-arianism held an untenable middle ground between the Arian hetero-ousiōtē and the orthodox homo-ousiōtē of the Son with the Father, and asserted the homoi-ousiōtē or similarity of essence, which of course was a very elastic term, and might be contracted into an Arian, or stretched into an orthodox sense, according to the general spirit and tendency of the men who held it. In opposition to these heresies Athanasius of Alexandria ("the father of orthodoxy") and the three Cappadocian bishops, Basil, Gregory of Nazianzus, and Gregory of Nyssa, maintained and defended with superior ability, vigour, and perseverance, the homo-ousiōtē, i.e., the essential oneness of the Son with the Father, or his eternal divinity, as the corner-stone of the whole Christian system.

This doctrine triumphed in the first oecumenical council, convened by Constantine the Great, and after a new and longer struggle it was reasserted in the second oecumenical council. It is briefly and tersely laid down in the chief article of the Nicaeno-Constantinopolitan Creed (381), which has stood ever since like an immovable rock:—

(Πιστεύομεν) . . . εἰς ἕνα κύριον Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν, τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ τὸν μονογενῆ, τὸν ἐκ τοῦ πατρὸς γεννηθέντα πρὸ πάντων τῶν αἰώνων, [Θεὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ], φῶς ἐκ φωτός, Θεὸν ἀληθινὸν ἐκ Θεοῦ ἀληθινοῦ, γεννηθέντα, οὐ ποιηθέντα, ὁμοούσιον τῷ Πατρὶ, δι' οὗ τὰ πάντα ἐγένετο.

(We believe) . . . in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, begotten of the Father before all worlds, [God of God,] Light of Light, Very God of Very God, Begotten, not made, being of one substance with the Father; by whom all things were made.

The original Nicene Creed (325) had also an express formula of condemnation of Arianism which was subsequently omitted:—

Τοὺς δὲ λέγοντας, ὅτι ἦν ποτε ὅτε οὐκ ἦν, καὶ πρὶν γεννηθῆναι οὐκ ἦν, καὶ ὅτι ἐξ οὐκ ὄντων ἐγένετο, ἢ ἐξ ἐτέρας ὑποστάσεως ἢ οὐσίας βράκοντας εἶναι, ἢ κτιστοὺν, γρεπτόν ἢ ἀλλοιωτὸν τὸν υἱὸν τοῦ Θεοῦ, ἀναθεματίζει ἡ καθολικὴ ἐκκλησία.

But those who say "There was a time when He was not," and "He was not before He was born," and "He was made out of nothing," or say, "He was of a different substance or essence," or that the Son of God is "created, changeable, or mutable,"—they are anathematized by the Catholic church.

On the NICENE Christology, see besides the general works of Petavius, Baur, Dorner, etc., Möhler's monograph on Athanasius (1844); Newman on the Arians of the 4th century (1838 and 1854); Bishop Kaye on the Council of Nicaea (1853); Hefele, Conciliengeschichte (1855 sqq. vol. i. 219 sqq.); Voigt, Die Lehre des Athanasius (1861), and Dean Stanley's Lectures on the Eastern church (1862, lect. ii.-vii.)

IV. The CHALCEDONIAN Christology is the fully developed Christology of the ancient Eastern and Western Catholic church. It finds its normal expression in the Chalcedonian statement of 451, which must be ranked with the Apostles', the Nicene and the Athanasian Creeds. It was the answer of the orthodox church to the heresies which arose after the Nicene age, and which related to the proper constitution of Christ's theanthropic person.

These heresies are chiefly three, viz., (1) Apollinarianism, which is a partial denial of the humanity, as Arianism is of the divinity, of Christ. Apollinarianism is the younger of Laodicea (d. 390), on the basis of the Platonic trichotomy, ascribed to Christ a human body (σῶμα) and animal soul (ψυχὴ ἄλογος), but not a human spirit or reason (ψυχὴ λογικὴ, νοῦς, πνεῦμα); he put the divine Logos in the place of the rational soul, and thus substituted a Θεὸς σαρκοφόρος for a real θεάνθρωπος, a mixed middle being for a divine-human person. From this error it follows either that the rational soul of man was not redeemed or that it needed no redemption.

(2) Nestorianism (from Nestorius, patriarch of Constantinople, d. in exile 440), admitted the full deity and the full humanity of Christ, but put them into a loose mechanical conjunction or affinity (συνάφεια) rather than an intimate personal union (ἕνωσις), and hence it objected to the term "mother of God" (θεοτόκος, Deipara), as applied to the Virgin Mary.

(3) Eutychianism (from Eutyches, presbyter at Constantinople, d. after 451), is the very opposite of Nestorianism, and sacrificed the distinction of the two natures in Christ to the unity of the person to such an extent as to make the incarnation an absorption of the human nature by the divine, or a deification of human nature, even of the body; hence the Eutychians thought it proper to use the phrases, God is born, God suffered, God was crucified, God died. (See the article on these several titles.)

The third and fourth oecumenical councils (Ephesus 431, and Chalcedon 451), settled the question of the precise relation of the two natures in Christ's person, as the first and second (325 and 381) had decided the doctrine of his divinity. The decree of the council of Ephesus under the lead of the violent Cyril of Alexandria was merely negative, a condemnation of the error of Nestorius, and leaned a little towards the opposite error of Eutyches. The council of Chalcedon gave a clear and full statement of the orthodox faith concerning Christ's person in opposition both to Eutychianism and Nestorianism. It has been adopted as final by the church in the East and the West, and is as follows (see Act v. in Mansi's Concil. tom. vii. p. 115).

Ἐπομένοι τοίνυν τοῖς ἁγίοις πατέριν ἕνα καὶ τὸν αὐτὸν ὁμολογεῖν υἱὸν τὸν κύριον ἡμῶν Ἰησοῦν Χριστόν, συμφῶνως ἅπαντες ἐκδιδάσκοντες, τέλειον τὸν αὐτὸν ἐν θεότητι καὶ τέλειον τὸν αὐτὸν ἐν ἀνθρωπότητι, θεὸν ἀληθῆ καὶ ἀνθρώπον ἀληθῆ τὸν αὐτὸν, ἐκ ψυχῆς λογικῆς καὶ σώματος, ὁμοούσιον τῷ πατρὶ κατὰ τὴν θεότητα, καὶ ὁμοούσιον

We, then, following the holy Fathers, all with one consent, teach men to confess one and the same Son, our Lord Jesus Christ, the same perfect in Godhead and also perfect in manhood; truly God and truly man, of a reasonable [rational] soul^a and body; consubstantial [co-equal] with the Father according to the Godhead, and con-

The same doctrine is set forth in a more condensed form in the second part of the so-called Athanasian Creed.

Sed necessarium est ad eternam salutem, ut incarnationem quoque Domini nostri Jesu Christi fideliter redat. Furthermore it is necessary to everlasting salvation: that we also believe rightly [faithfully] the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ. For the right Faith is, that we believe and confess: that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is God and Man; God, of the Substance [Essence] of the Father; begotten before the worlds: and Man, of the Substance [Essence] of his Mother, born in the world. Perfect God and perfect Man; of a reasonable soul and human flesh subsisting; equal to the Father, as touching his Godhead; and inferior to the Father as touching his Manhood. V. The POST-CHALCEDONIAN Christology. The Chalcedonian decision did not stop the controversy and called for a supplementary statement concerning the two wills of Christ corresponding to the two natures.

Eutychianism revived in the form of Monophysitism (μόνη φύσις) or the doctrine that Christ had but one composite nature (μία φύσις σύνθετος or μία φύσις διττή). It makes the humanity of Christ a mere accident of the immutable divine substance. The liturgical shibboleth of the Monophysites was, "God has been crucified," which they introduced into the trisagion (ἅγιος ὁ θεός, ἅγιος ἰσχυρός, ἅγιος ἀθάνατος, ὁ σταυρωθεὶς δι' ἡμᾶς, ἐλέησον ἡμᾶς). Hence they are also called Theopaschites (θεοπασχίται). The tedious Monophysite controversies convulsed the Eastern church for more than a hundred years, weakened its power and facilitated the conquest of Mohammedanism. The fifth oecumenical council, held at Constantinople, 553, made a partial concession to the Monophysites, but did not reconcile them. They separated, like their antipodes, the Nestorians, from the orthodox Greek church, and continue to this day under various names and organisations (the Jacobites in Syria, the Copts in Egypt, the Abyssinians, and the most important of them, the Armenians). [COPTIC CHURCH.]

Closely connected with Monophysitism was Monothelitism (μόνον and θέλημα) or the doctrine that Christ had but one will, as He had but one nature. The orthodox maintained that will is an attribute of nature rather than person, and consequently that Christ had two wills, a human will and a divine will, both working in harmony. The Monothelite controversy lasted from 633 to 680. The emperor Heraclius proposed a compromise formula—one divine-human energy (μία θεανδρική ἐνέργεια), but it was opposed in the West.

The sixth oecumenical council, held in Constantinople, A.D. 680 (also called the third Constantinopolitan council or the Conc. Trullanum I.), condemned the Monothelite heresy and repeated the Chalcedonian Creed with the following supplement concerning the two wills (Artic. xviii., in Mansi's Conc., tom. xi. p. 637):—

^b Against Nestorius.
^c All Latin editions read in duabus naturis. But the received Greek text means essentially the same, although may have been altered from the original, ἐν δύο φύσεσιν, in the interest of Monophysitism. See Church History, by the writer of this article, vol. iii. pp. 745 sq.

The council then quotes from John vi. 38, Gregory Nazianzen, pope Leo I., Cyril of Alexandria. The same council condemned pope Honorius as a Monothelite heretic, a fact which figured conspicuously in the Vatican council (1870) as an argument against papal infallibility. Monothelitism continued among the Maronites on Mount Lebanon, as well as among the Monophysites, who are all Monothelites.

With the sixth oecumenical council closes the development of the ancient catholic Christology. The Adoption controversy, which arose in Spain and France toward the close of the 8th century, turned upon the question whether Christ, according to his human nature, was the Son of God by nature (naturaliter) or simply by adoption (nuncupative). It was a modification of the Nestorian error and was condemned in a synod at Frankfort-on-the-Maine, 794, but it did not result in a positive addition to the creed statements.

The scholastic theology of the middle ages made no real progress in Christology (for the Anselmic theory of the atonement belongs to Soteriology), and confined itself to a dialectical analysis and defence of the Chalcedonian dogma with a one-sided reference to the divine nature of Christ. The evangelical Reformation symbols, Lutheran, Anglican, and Calvinistic, strongly assert their agreement with the Greek and Latin churches on the doctrines of the Holy Trinity and the person of Christ, as laid down in the oecumenical creeds. But the Christological dogma was further developed, especially in the Lutheran communion and in connection with the eucharistic controversy. The Lutheran Formula of Concord gave symbolic authority to the doctrine of the communicatio idiomatum (in a threefold form, genus idiomatum, g. apotelesmaticum, g. majestaticum), and the ubiquity of Christ's body (as a necessary support to the real corporeal presence in the Eucharist); leaving, however, undecided the question whether the ubiquity was absolute (as Brentius and Andreae maintained), or relative and dependent on Christ's will (multivolipraesentia, as Chemnitz and the Saxon divines taught). The last chapter in the orthodox Lutheran Christology is the subtle controversy between the Tübingen and Giessen divines in the early part of the 17th century, concerning the κρύψις and κένωσις, i.e., whether Christ in the state of humiliation made se-ret use (κρύψις) of his divine attributes of omnipotence, omniscience, and omnipresence (even in the mother's womb, and when dying on the cross), or renounced the use (κένωσις) except in the working of miracles. Both agreed in teaching that Christ, even as man, had the possession (κτῆσις) of the divine attributes, and they differed only as to the use (χρησις). It is plain that the Tübingen view carried the theory of the communicatio idiomatum to the verge of gnostic from it! (as the impious heretics assert), but his human will follows the divine will, and is not resisting or reluctant, but rather subject to his divine and omnipotent will. For it was proper that the will of the flesh should be moved, but be subjected to the divine will, according to the wise Athanasius.

doctecism and resolved the human life of Christ on earth into a magical illusion. The Reformed churches denied the ubiquity of Christ's body, and that kind of the communicatio idiomatum, whereby the attributes of the divine nature are communicated to the human. They opposed the Lutheran Christology as running into Eutychianism, and held fast to the Chalcedonian dyophysitism. The Reformed divines also differed from the Lutheran on the doctrine of the two states of Christ (Phil. ii. 5-9), the state of humiliation and the state of exaltation; the former refer these states to both natures, the latter only to the human nature; the former begin the humiliation with the incarnation, the latter exclude this from the humiliation. The Lutheran theory of Brenz and Andreae moreover made the two states to co-exist during the earthly life of Christ, so that the exaltation of Christ's humanity began with the incarnation and continued in a concealed form until it became openly manifest in the ascension to the right hand of the Father, i.e., the almighty and omnipresent power of God.

VI. ANALYSIS OF THE OECUMENICAL CHRISTOLOGY. The following are the leading ideas of the Chalcedonian Christology as held by the Greek, Latin, and Evangelical Protestant churches:—

1. A true INCARNATION of the Logos, or the second person in the Godhead (ἐνανθρώπησις θεοῦ, ἐνσάρκωσις τοῦ λόγου, incarnatio Verbi). This incarnation is neither a conversion nor transmutation of God into man, nor a conversion of man into God, and a consequent absorption of the one, nor a confusion (κράσις, σύγχυσις) of the two; nor, on the other hand, a mere indwelling (ἐνοικίσις, inhabitatio) of the one in the other, nor an outward, transitory connexion (συνάφεια, conjunctio) of the two factors, but an actual and abiding union of the two in one personal life.

2. The precise distinction between NATURE and PERSON. Nature or substance (essence, οὐσία) denotes the totality of powers and qualities which constitute a being; while person (ὑπόστασις, πρόσωπον) is the Ego, the self-conscious, self-asserting and acting subject. The Logos assumed, not a human person (else we should have two persons, a divine and a human), but human nature which is common to us all; and hence he redeemed, not a particular man, but all men as partakers of the same nature.

3. THE GOD-MAN as the result of the incarnation. Christ is not a (Nestorian) double being, with two persons, nor a compound (Apollinarian or Monophysite) middle being, a tertium quid, neither divine nor human; but he is one person both divine and human.

4. THE DUALITY OF THE NATURES. The orthodox doctrine maintains, against Eutychianism, the distinction of natures even after the act of incarnation, without confusion or conversion (ἀσυχύτως, inconfuse, and ἀτρέπτως, immutabiliter), yet, on the other hand, without division or separation (ἀδιαίρετως, indivise, and ἀχωρίστως, inseparabiliter), so that the divine will ever remain divine, and the human ever human, and yet the two have continually one common life and interpenetrate each other, like the persons of the Trinity.

5. THE UNITY OF THE PERSON (ἕνωσις καθ' ὑπόστασιν, ἕνωσις ὑποστατική, unio hypostatica or unio personalis). The union of the divine and human nature in Christ is a permanent state resulting from the incarnation, and is a real, supernatural, personal, and inseparable union—in distinction from an essential absorption or confusion, or from a mere moral union, or from a mystical union such as holds between the believer and Christ. The two natures constitute but one personal life, and yet remain distinct. "The same who is true God," says pope Leo, "is also true man, and in this unity there is no deceit; for in it the lowliness of man and the majesty of God perfectly pervade one another. . . . Because the two natures make only one person, we read on the one hand: 'The Son of Man came down from heaven' (John iii. 13), while yet the Son of God took flesh from the Virgin; and on the other hand: 'The Son of God was crucified and buried,' while yet he suffered, not in his Godhead as co-eternal and consubstantial with the Father, but in the weakness of human nature."

6. The whole WORK of Christ is to be attributed to his person, and not to the one or the other nature exclusively. The person is the acting subject, the nature the organ or medium. It is the one divine-human person of Christ that wrought miracles by virtue of his divine nature, and that suffered through the sensorium of his human nature. The superhuman effect and infinite merit of the Redeemer's work must be ascribed to his person because of his divinity; while it is his humanity alone that made him capable of, and liable to, toil, temptation, suffering, and death, and renders him an example for our imitation.

7. The ANHYPOSTASIA, IMPERSONALITY, or, to speak more accurately, the ENHYPOSTASIA, of the human nature of Christ; for anhypostasia is a purely negative term, and presupposes a fictitious abstraction, since the human nature of Christ did not exist at all before the act of the incarnation, and could therefore be neither personal nor impersonal. The meaning of this doctrine is that Christ's human nature had no independent personality of its own, besides the divine, and that the divine nature is the root and basis of his personality.

The Chalcedonian Christology has latterly been subjected to a rigorous criticism (by Schleiermacher, Baur, Dörner, Rothe, and others), and has been charged with a defective psychology, and now with dualism, now with docetism, according as its distinction of two natures or of the personal unity has most struck the eye. But these imputations neutralise each other, like the imputations of tritheism and modalism, which may be made against the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity when either the tripersonality or the consubstantiality is taken alone. This, indeed, is the peculiar excellence of the Creed of Chalcedon, that it exhibits such tact and circumspection in uniting the colossal antithesis in Christ, and seeks to do justice alike to the distinction of the natures and to the unity of the person. In Christ all contradictions are reconciled.

The Chalcedonian Creed is far from exhausting the great mystery of godliness, "God manifest in flesh." It leaves much room for a fuller appreciation of the genuine, perfect, and sinless humanity of Christ, of the Pauline doctrine of the Kenosis, or self-renunciation and self-limitation of the Divine Logos in the incarnation and during the human life of our Lord, and for the discussion of other questions connected with his relation to the Father and to the world, his person, and his work. But it indicates the essential elements of Christological truth, and the boundary-lines of Christological error. It defines the course for the sound development of this central article of the Christian faith so as to avoid both the Scylla of Nestorian dualism and the Charybdis of Eutychian monophysitism, and to save the full idea of the one divine-human personality of our Lord and Saviour. Within these limits theological speculation may safely and freely move, and bring us to clearer conceptions; but in this world, where we "know only in part (ἐκ μέρους)," and "see through a mirror obscurely (δὴ ἐδοῦρρον ἐν αἰνίγματι)," we can never fully comprehend the great central mystery of the theanthropic life of our Lord.

CHRISTOLYTAÆ. A sect mentioned by John Damascene in his Treatise on Heresies. They taught that when Jesus Christ had been recalled to life from the place of the departed, He left His Body with His Soul in the earth, and that it was the Divine Nature alone which had ascended into heaven. Their name comes from this dissolution of the personality of Christ. (Joh. Damasc. Treatise on Heresies, num. 93, § 108; Patrol. Græc. xciv. p. 681; Ceillier, xii. 69.) [W. M. S.]

CHRISTOPHER, ST. (Χριστοφόρος, CHRISTOPHORUS, CHRISTOFORUS, CHRISTOFERUS, CHRISTOFANUS, etc., CHRISTÓBAL, CHRISTOPHLE, KESTER, KITT, CHRISDAPHOR.)

(1) A martyr of universal fame. He was baptized by St. Babylas, the martyr-bishop of Antioch, and about the year 250 suffered under

Decius in Lycia.^a From early times down to the current edition of Acta Sanctorum, the untrustworthy character of some popular stories related of him has been declared. Usuard (A.D. 876) thus commemorated him (25th July) after St. James, according to the common Western use,^b in his Martyrologium. "At Samos in Licia. After he had been scourged with iron rods, and then delivered from the broiling flames by the virtue of Christ, his head was at last severed from his body, which had fallen full of arrow-wounds, and the martyr's witness was complete."

In the Greek church St. Christopher is commemorated 9th May (in company with the prophet Isaiah, who is called ὁ θεοφόρος ἀνὴρ, by Theodoret IV. 968), with this troparion (4th tone), in the Uniate New Anthology of Arcudius. "With the head of a dog, noble in faith, and fervent in prayer, as a soldier of Christ thou didst endure torments; at thee the powers of heaven were astonished, thee the king of idols wounded, Christopher of golden-name, wherefore solemnly entreat (δυσώπει) the Lord for us."

The saint's cynocephalism, however, had been repudiated long before in the Menology of Basil II. (A.D. 984). "Some marvellous and miraculous relations concerning this saint are current in some quarters; as that he was a dog-headed man-eater, until he was metamorphosed at his conversion. This is not the fact, only some supposed him such because he was a heathen wild and grim. Howbeit he lived in the reign of Decius; and being taken in battle by the Comes,^c he was not able to speak Greek: he prayed to God, and an angel was sent unto him, saying 'Play the man;' and he touched his lips, and gave him power to speak Greek. So he entered into the city and began to preach Christ. And when soldiers are sent out to take him, and his staff put forth buds, they believed Christ, and are baptized with him at Antioch by St. Babylas, at which time he received his name Christopher. Afterward, being brought before the emperor, he was first tried with divers torments, and at the last beheaded."

In a Latin poem, Gualt. Spirensis, subdeacon, gives the Western version of the same date ("983, vel paulo serius"). He devotes five books out of six, and a corresponding prose narrative, to his acts: dwelling upon his miraculous baptism by a cloud after a catechetical instruction from heaven, attested by the budding of his club. His Gentile name Reprobis, Canaanitish origin, conversion of multitudes and of the harlots,

^a Later legends conspire in naming a town Samos, Salmon, or Salomon, in which it is just possible a vestige of the old name Solyimi survives. The scribe reviling one of the Peterhouse MSS. of Legenda Aurea (longer text) treated Salomon as a clerical error for Christophorus, as the construction permits. The vulgar text combines the readings.

^b There was a monastery and basilica dedicated in his name on the bank of the Guadalquivir standing in A.D. 852 (St. Eulogius, Mem. Sanct. II. iv. xi.).

^c Cf. the Mozarabic hymn:—

"Declusque Imperator
Captum a Comitibus
Necti suis hunc Beatum
Nititur millitibus."

A poetical plural, unless, according to the Spanish legend, "Comitibus" be a proleptic designation for the soldier-martyrs Gelonicas and Aquilinas.

Nicea or Galonica, and Aquilina, sent to tempt him in prison by the blustering tyrant Dagnus, the great iron chair, the arrows, and axe of martyrdom, and the healing of his persecutor's sight are detailed. The story of his dog's head is apologised for, but there is not the slightest allusion to the beautiful modern legend, which is ignored (though he can hardly have been ignorant of it), by Surius, as late as 1573.

The Mozarabic Missal and Breviary (saec. vii.-xvi.) represent the opinion of Toledo, where his relics once rested, in a very simple form. The hymn and the missal speak of Decius Imperator trying to secure the strong man for his army; of Christopher's mouth being miraculously opened; of his providing food for the soldiers (in later times developed into a miracle) who cast in their lot with him. His name was given him at baptism "quia Christum indutus." The missal alludes also to his being tempted (but see AQUILINA), and mentions the amelioration of his visage after baptism. The legend is found in a similar short form in the 33rd sermon of St. Peter Damian (on the festival of the saint), A.D. 1072, and in England as late as the 12th century, MS. Passionale (where, however, Dagnus, Niceta, and Aquilina, appear); but in the following century there are traces of the adoption as history of what art had devised as allegory, and what was explained allegorically by Vida, bishop of Alba, in the 16th century. An 11th century column-capital, preserved in the Campo Santo at Pisa, and a 12th century window in the south transept of Strasburg Cathedral are mentioned by Guénébault as representing St. Christopher, and very early in the 14th century Simon Memmi, of Sienna, painted, in a series of saints, a figure, holding a flowering staff, walking in, or on, water between two rocks, and bearing the Holy Child astride his neck: a head in one corner may be intended to foreshadow his decollation.

Before that time James de Voragine, bishop of Genoa, when compiling his Legenda Aurea, found "in quibusdam gestis," in addition to a development of the earlier history, an allegorical tale of the heathen giant Reprobis^d, in a Search after the Stronger-than-he, quitting the service of the king of Canaan, who feared the name of Satan, of Satan who feared the cross, and taking up with a hermit who taught him to serve the Strongest in the charitable work of fording wayfarers across the water, for the giant had neither the gift of fasting nor the conception of prayer. One night a child insisted on being carried over, and in mid-water Reprobis felt his strong knees failing beneath the weight of Him by whom all things were made. By-and-by he apprehends the precious yoke, and finds the burden light. At dawn he has the token of his staff budding, wanders to "Samos of Licca," Dagnus, and so on with the older legend.

It is easy now to recognize in this sort of rebus on the saint's name. The etymological note stating that he was called Christopher because he carried Christ in four ways, "in humeris per traductionem, in corpore per macerationem, in mente per devocionem, in ore per professionem sive predicacionem," not found in a

^d 'Adocimus': alias 'Onuphris', 'Onuferus', and even the perversely ingenious 'Oferus.'

MS. of the 123 legends written in 1299, a year after the compiler's death, occurs (as does the missal extract (Ambrosius in Prefatione), in later MSS. and printed editions, with the 177 legends.

From this period the cultus of the saint was yet more popular than before, not only in Spain and Italy, but in France. A colossal wooden figure, erected in Notre Dame by Antoine des Essars in 1413, and destroyed in 1785, is mentioned by Sir T. Browne; the pictures by Memling (1484) and Dürer (1521) are noteworthy. In Western art the Van Eycks' great Adoration of the Immaculate Lamb (1432) is almost alone in representing St. Christopher without our Lord on his shoulders, but the simplicity and general intention of the picture would have been marred by the more popular treatment. The Roman service books provide a proper collect at lauds only, the rest from the common of martyrs. The Parisian particularise a little more—an alternative ninth lesson, merely mentioning a church and convent of his dedication. His popularity must have been increased by the superstition which is to be found expressed, e. g. on the much-veiled Spencer print of (or copied from some work of art of) 1423.

"Cristofori faciem die quacuque tueris Illa nempe die morte mala non morieris."

In many English churches painted windows and wall-paintings are preserved; a colossal pulpit in Salisbury museum. Chaucer's yeoman wore a silver medal of the saint, whose aid was commonly invoked here against storms (Hom. On Peril of Idolatry, iii. A.D. 1562-3). In the Sarum use he is commemorated (with Cucufas on St. James's day) by a special memorial at 1st vespers, matins, and mass, and his name in the litany on Fridays in Lent. In 1492 and later editions of the missal a supplemental mass is printed, containing a reference to the later legend.

Hone (Every-day Book) mentions that the flower Actaea spicata is dedicated to him, and called Herb Christopheri. A synagogue of Jews at Valencia told Vincent Ferrier (A.D. 1357-1413) that they had been converted by a vision of St. Christopher on July 10, and observed that day in his honour. (Moreri.)

Christophorus (Χριστοφόρος, Christigerulus, not Χριστόφορος, a Christo gestu.) probably became a baptismal name very early. It was a title for Christians with some such idea as St. Matt. xi. 29, 30; 2 Cor. iv. 10, vi. 16; and with a special reference to Communion. Suicer refers to Phileas ap. Euseb. H. E. viii. 10, 3; and passages in Chrysostom, comparing ὁ Θεοφόρος the name of Ignatius. We may add that in one place (Martyrium Ign. v. Ruinart, pp. 13, 705), that apostolic martyr is actually called Christopher instead of the commoner Deifer.

CHRISTOTOKOS. [NESTORIUS.]

CHRODEBERT I., archbishop of Tours. His name is otherwise Rigobert, or Zerobert. He occurs in a diploma of king Clovis the younger. Dom Bouquet (Scriptores Rerum Gallicarum et Francicarum, Paris, 1738-65, 22 vols. fol.) considers him archbishop of Tours.

The Chronicon Turonense makes him the prelate who granted that privilege to St. Martin's Abbey at Tours, which was confirmed by pope Adeodatus. Adeodatus, in his letter on the subject to the bishops of Gaul, speaks of "our brother Chrotbert, prelate of the church of Tours" (St. Adeodat. Pont. Rom. Epist. Patrol. Lat. lxxxvii. p. 1141). Pope Adeodatus held the Roman see from 672 to 675.

The Chronicon Turonense makes Papolenus successor to Chrotbert I., and puts Chrotbert II. after Papolenus. It describes Chrotbert II. as only confirming the privilege already granted by the earlier Chrotbert.

It is impossible, without further evidence, to settle the relations of the two Chrotberts; and the editors of the 14th volume of Gallia Christiana prefer to follow the Chronicon Turonense. So also Gams (Series Episcoporum, p. 640).

[W. M. S.]

CHRODEBERT II., archbishop of Tours. His name is also given as Ruotbertus, Crabertus, and Erabertus. He is said to have taken his vows A.D. 662. He is distinguished for a judgment which wrote he concerning a woman who had committed adultery after she was professed, or had joined a religious order. The document which contained the judgment was seen by Sirmond in the De Thou library, but was suppressed, as it is thought, for two reasons: first, because Chrodebert, who wrote about the middle of the 7th century, says in it that they did not then acknowledge in France more than the first four general councils, viz. Nicaea, Constantinople, Ephesus, and Chalcedon: whence it follows that the churches of that kingdom did not acknowledge as oecumenical the fifth council, which condemned the three chapters, i.e. the council of Constantinople. The other reason was because he maintained that Mary Magdalene merited seeing the Saviour after His resurrection, before that privilege was accorded to the apostles, and even before it was accorded to the blessed Virgin. It is made to appear that Chrodebert treated the affair of the Three Chapters in the same way as the other bishops of France did, when the fifth general council had not yet been acknowledged under the pontificate of St. Gregory, nor under the episcopate of Chrodebert; that with regard to his opinion on the appearance of the Saviour to Mary Magdalene it is founded on Scripture, instead of which those who maintain that He first appeared to His Virgin Mother only so reason in order to suit their own prejudices. In his judgment on the woman accused of adultery and what sort of punishment the canons impose on that offence, Chrodebert says that, first, he found nothing on that subject in the decrees of the first four general councils, which were alone accepted in his country, but that there was something about it in the 19th canon of the council of Orleans. He goes on to say that with regard to the particular woman whom they wished him to judge, they ought to follow the example of the Saviour in His judgment of the woman accused of a similar offence, and in His merciful treatment of all sinners who shewed signs of repentance. Chrodebert does not doubt that the woman of whom the Saviour said that her sins were forgiven her because she loved much, was Mary Magdalene, sister to Martha and Lazarus. At the end of his letter he returns thanks to the person to whom he addresses it for having sent him a linen robe without seam, long and wide, and proportionate to his body. Chrodebert's letter is to be found in the 54th volume of the Latin Patrology, among the notes of Quesnel on the epistles of St. Leo the Great. (Gallia Christ. xiv. p. 29; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs sacrés, xii. 762; Le Coite, Ann. Eccl. Franc. iii. p. 573.)

[D. R. J.]

CHRODEGANG (ST.), bishop of Metz, in the 8th century. The name is spelt by mediaeval writers with even more than usual diversities. Chrodegangus, Chrodogangus, Chrotgangus. Grodegangus, Grodogangus (Fabric. Biblioth. Med. et Inf. Aet.); Ruggandus (Trithem. Script. Eccles. c. 255); Rotgandus (Epitoph. ap. Mabill.; Analecta Nova, p. 377); Rodegang, Rotigang (Herzog, Real Enkyklop.). The ruggedness of the sound, from the abundance of dental consonants, made the word particularly difficult of pronunciation to lips more accustomed to the smoother languages of the south.

The materials of his biography are chiefly to be found in a notice of him by Paulus Diaconus, almost a contemporary, and well qualified by his position to report faithfully, and who seems to have undertaken his work about the bishops of Metz at the request of Angilramm, the immediate successor of Chrodegang in that see (cf. Paulus Warnefr. de Gestis Langobard. vi. c. 16. ap. AA. SS. Mart. vi. p. 451). This memoir of Chrodegang, the only fault of which is that it is not longer, is repeated almost word for word, but with considerable additions, in a Vita Chrodegangi, of which Pertz gives a minute account in a learned and exhaustive treatise, read before the Royal Academy of Science at Berlin on July 8, 1852, and published among the transactions of the Academy. (Abhandlung über die Vita Chrodeg. Episc. Mett. Konigl. Akad. der Wissenschaft. 1852.) In his collection of ancient German records, Pertz had already pronounced this Life of Chrodegang inaccurate, especially in its dates, and generally unauthentic. (Monum. German. Hist. x. p. 552. Praef. Vit. S. Chrodeg.) In his address at Berlin, investigating the work more closely, he comes to the conclusion from internal evidence, that its date is A.D. 970, and its author most probably John, abbat of Gorze, near Mentz, one of Chrodegang's foundations (cf. Wattenbach, Deutschl. Geschichtsquellen; Rettberg assigns an earlier date, Kircengesch. Deutschl. I. ii. 87). Ac-ording to Pertz, this Life of Chrodegang appeared first, but in part only, in the work of the Magdeburg Centuriators (viii. c. 10, p. 767); in 1730 it was republished in its complete text by Ecard (Comment. Rer. Franc. Orient. 1. App. p. 912), from a manuscript apparently transcribed in the 12th century, and marked occasionally in the handwriting of Siebert von Gemblours (Sigebertus Gemblacensis). It is not without interest as a specimen how legends and fables clustered, as it were inevitably, round the lives of great and good men under the hands of monastic biographers, but it adds little or nothing to our knowledge of Chrodegang. It is worth noticing that abbat John dignifies his founder and benefactor with the title of "Confessor."

Chrodegang's lot was cast in an eventful period of European history. He was not merely an eyewitness of the great changes, social, political, and religious, that were transforming Europe, but played a prominent part in them—the severance of the ties which bound Rome and Italy to the decaying empire of Byzantium, the safe emergence of the papal see from the dangers with which the hostility of the Lombardic kingdom threatened it, the various preliminaries of conquest and of legislation which paved the way for the extension and consolidation of the Frankish dominion under Pepin's great successor, and for the welding together of Christendom under the joint sovereignty of emperor and pope. In his official capacity of "referendarius" (keeper of the seal), Chrodegang (as Pertz suggests) probably accompanied Charles Martel in his victorious campaigns against the Saracens and the Frisii. His intimacy and his influence with Pepin and his sons lasted apparently throughout his life without an interruption. As one of the foremost prelates in Europe, and, at the same time, one of the Frankish king's most trusted counsellors, Chrodegang exercised an influence almost unique at that time both in church and state. He is about the first of that long series of ecclesiastics holding high temporal office at court, which terminated in Europe with the 17th century. Personally, as his career shews, and as his biographer describes him, Chrodegang was a man with much force of character, and with more than ordinary ability; a man of large munificence, of winning, gracious presence, and of ready speech; accomplished both in his native language and in the Latin, which was fast becoming the language of educated men in all parts of Europe ("decorus ac facundus in Latino et in patrio sermone," Paul. Diac. v. s.). Chrodegang thus occupies a place in the history of Christendom, of which the importance has hardly been sufficiently appreciated.

Chrodegang was born very early in the 8th century, in Brabant ("Hasbania," Paul. Diac. v. s., a district near Louvain. The word is curiously miswritten by some mediaeval chronicler "Hispania," A. A. SS. not. ad Mart. VI.). He was of noble Frankish family; his parents' names in their Latinised form were Sigramnus and Landrada. The anonymous Life of Chrodegang already mentioned, followed by Fabricius (v. s.), makes Chrodegang son of a daughter of Karl Martel. But this is obviously one of the writer's exaggerations. Nothing to this effect is found in Paulus Diaconus, nor in the diplomas where the names occur together of Chrodegang and Pepin, and where Pepin is simply styled

"Chrodegangi Senior" (e. g. Diplom. pro Fundat. Gorz. Mon^o, quoted in Migne, Bibl. Patr. from Bréquigny, Diplomata II.); and the difficulties of chronology, which this supposition involves, are insuperable (Pertz, v. s.; A. A. SS. v. s.; Rettberg, Kirchenjgesch. Deutschl. I. ii. § 87). That Chrodegang was of noble, though not of royal blood, is attested by the foundation-deed of the monastery of Lorsch, where he is styled kinsman ("consanguineus") of the founder and foundress, the son and widow of a count in one of the Rhine districts (Rettberg, v. s.).

The story of Chrodegang having been educated in the monastery of St. Trond (St. Trudo) in the diocese of Liège (Lutich, Leodium), rests on no foundation* (A. A. SS. v. s.). Apparently, like other youths, he passed the early part of his life at court, and was subsequently promoted by Karl Martel to the office of referendarius or chancellor (Paul. Diac. v. s.; cf. Diplom. Karol. Monast^o. S. Dionysii, ap. A. A. SS. Mart. VI.). By the favour of Pepin Chrodegang became bishop of the important see of Metz, retaining his civil office, in A. D. 742 (Paul. Diac. v. s.; Fabric. v. s. gives the date A. D. 745).

In 752 Chrodegang was specially selected by Pepin and his nobles ("singulariter electus a Pippino et omni coetu Francorum," ib.) for a very delicate and arduous embassy. It was a critical time for pope Stephen (II. otherwise styled III.). Rome itself was menaced by the Lombards. In his distress the pope looked eagerly beyond the Alps for succour ("cunctorum vota anhelabant," ib.); and not in vain. From policy, or from motives of a less worldly kind, Pepin willingly responded to the call; and the bishop^b of Metz was despatched to Italy with one of Pepin's counts ("Auchardius dux") to mediate, if possible, between the pope and his invaders, and, if not, to bring the pope to a safe refuge in Pepin's dominions (ib.). Mediation was fruitless. But Chrodegang succeeded in extricating Stephen from any dangers that were to be apprehended to his own person, and in conducting him safely, to be lodged in the monastery of St. Denis at Paris. The pope was not ungrateful to his advocate and escort. From his place of exile he sent Chrodegang the archiepiscopal "pallium" (ib. Paul. Diac. v. s.; cf. A. A. SS. v. s., where a foundation-deed of the time of Pepin is cited, styling Chrodegang "archiepiscopus;" cf. Anastas. Biblioth. Vit. Steph. P. III.). Probably Chrodegang's services on this occasion were recalled some ten years later by Stephen's successor Paul I., when he conceded to Chrodegang, what was then considered a boon of priceless value, the relics of certain saints, Nabor, Gorgonius, and Nazarius, to enrich the monasteries which he had founded of Gorze, Lorsch, and St. Avold ("Hilaricum," Mabill. Ann. O. S. B. viii. 27). Some accounts add that Chrodegang fetched these precious treasures from Rome himself; and that an attempt was made one night by the monks of St. Maurice to rob him

* D'Achery imagines from the style of Chrodegang's Regula Canoniconum, and from its very close resemblance to the Regula Sti. Benedicti, that Chrodegang was perhaps a member of the Benedictine community. "Nomen sodalitis nostro dedit" (Prol. Reg. Chrod.).

^b According to the Chronicle of Lorsch, Chrodegang was sent again to attempt negotiations with Astolph just before Pepin's invasion of Lombardy, but in factually (Chron. Lauresham. ap. A. A. SS. v. s.).

of them on his way home (Vit. Chrod. p. 934; cf. Hist. Transl. Sti. Gorgonii, 10th century, ap. Mabill. AA. SS. Saec. III. ii. p. 207).

Chrodegang's activity in these secular affairs by no means interfered with the vigorous discharge of more strictly ecclesiastical duties. In his own diocese he set himself to correct the laxity and worldliness of his clergy; and this was the primary cause and immediate occasion of his "rule" for the clergy, which was soon to gain a much wider acceptance (Reg. Chrod. praef.). He endeavoured to induce the clergy to attend their synodical meetings regularly (Conc. Met. A.D. 753, c. 3). As archbishop and legate he consecrated many bishops, as well as ordained many priests and deacons (Paul. Diac. v. s.). It was probably at Chrodegang's instigation that a council, held A.D. 755, in Pepin's palace, enacted that ascetics must live either as cloistered monks or under their several bishops "in canonical order" (Conc. Vernens. c. 11). He used liberally and wisely the great resources at his command; content himself with a simple and unostentatious way of living, he bestowed alms on the poor largely, and exercised, unsparsingly, a truly episcopal hospitality; to churches and monasteries his munificence was princely (ib. cf. Epitaphium Chrod. ap. Fabric. v. s.). With the assistance of his royal master he built the choir and presbytery of the cathedral of St. Stephen in his own city, and embellished it with ornaments; he was also a liberal benefactor to the cathedral of Verdun (ib. cf. AA. SS. v. s.). In the immediate neighbourhood of his cathedral he founded a clergy-house (his biographer terms it a "monasterium,"^e using the word, as was sometimes done, in its largest sense), where the clergy might live together in common, and endowed it with a revenue sufficient for their wants. The great monasteries, more strictly so called, bore witness to his zeal for organisation, his lavish devotion, and his influence with the powerful and wealthy, at Gorze, at Lorsch, and at St. Avold (ib.). Gorze, about 8 miles from Metz, which afterwards became famous for its schools, seems to have been endowed, in part at least, from the estates of the church already mentioned of St. Stephen at Metz, and, as a colony, to have inherited the designation of its parent church ("de rebus S^{ti} Stephani . . . cum consensu omnium parium nostrorum, abbatum, presbyterorum, diaconorum . . . et . . . laicorum in servitio S^{ti} Stephani ecclesiae ad cellam et ecclesiam S^{ti} Stephani in Gorze," Diplom. pro Fundat. Gorziens. Monast. v. s.). It is to be noticed that in the foundation deed, Pepin, one of the co-founders, appears as "major-domus" in the confirmation deed, of later date, as "rex." The monastery at Lorsch or Loesheim (at Aldenmünster), near Worms, was founded A.D. 764, by "Canero" or "Cancor," a count apparently of the Rhine ("Rhemensis," probably a misprint for "Rhenensis"), and his mother "Chillisuvidis." By their express desire the monastery was exempted from all other jurisdiction—probably they feared, what was a not uncommon danger, the vexatious rapacity of their bishop,—and subjected solely to the archbishop of Metz, as being their kinsman ("tanquam consanguineo," AA. SS. v. s.). Chrodegang appointed his brother "Gundelandus" first abbat, and transplanted thither some of his monks from Gorze (ib.). The monastery of St. Hilary^d in Chrodegang's own diocese, on the Saar, gave origin to the town of St. Avold.

Chrodegang's episcopate lasted rather more than 23 years. He died A.D. 764, two years before his royal patron and friend. In the previous year he presided at the council of Attigny-sur-Aisne.^e He was interred in the monastery at Gorze, the greatest of his foundations (Paul. Diac. v. s.). His influence did not die with him. The attempt which he made to check the irregularities of the clergy, and to reform their morals, by imposing on them the strict discipline of the cloister, was renewed with characteristic energy, and with all the authority of his imperial sceptre, by Pepin's son (cf. Milman's Hist. Lat. Christ. ii. 294), himself probably in earlier manhood one of those who felt, personally, the influence of the statesman-bishop. Even so, though backed by the all the weight of Karl the Great's name and position, the attempt failed, because it was an attempt to impose on the clergy generally a rigid discipline which they would not submit to, and which, had it ever become general, would have severed them too inexorably from the sympathies of their people. In the next century the attempt was renewed under the feebleness of Louis, but, as was to be anticipated, without success. By the "diet-council," as Milman terms it (Lat. Chr. ii. p. 316), at Aachen, in A.D. 817, the bishops and archbishops were ordered to extend the canonical discipline to all the priesthood. But, practically, the "canonici" became a class by themselves; distinct from the secular clergy on the one hand, the monks on the other; and, practically, the very evils which Chrodegang strove to correct were fostered by the very remedy which he devised. As the "canonici" increased in wealth and honours, so, like the monastic coenobites, they gained an evil pre-eminence in luxury and worldliness.

It is interesting to compare Chrodegang with the almost contemporary "Apostle of Germany." In many ways they resembled one another, and their work was in many ways identical. In Boniface the politician is more lost in the saint, but in both there is the same combination of religion with practical sagacity. As Boniface extended the limits at once of the Christian church and of the Frankish kingdom among the heathen beyond the Rhine, so Chrodegang was compacting and amalgamating church and state at home. As the great missionary, wherever his enterprises led him, went as the missionary of Rome as well as the missionary of the gospel, so Chrodegang, in his more peaceful sphere of work, legislated in the same spirit of deference, if not of submission, to Rome, introducing Roman rites and ceremonies, the observance of the Ember seasons, and the Roman manner of singing in church, as part of the discipline which he was enforcing. "Romanâ cantilenâ imbuit. Morem ac ordinem Romanæ, ecclesiæ servare præcepit." (Paul. Diac. v. s. Cf. H. Wharton Auctarium ad Usserium de Scripturis et sacris Vernaculis, p. 358.) Both were essentially Teutonic in character, and in aspirations; both found it necessary to subordinate the Teutonic element to the Latin; both found that, if they wished to organise permanently, they must avail themselves, in those days of license and turbulence, of the centralising authority of Rome.

The missionary and the legislator seem never to have been brought into actual contact; no record of it is preserved. An anonymous writer at Mainz in the 10th century (AA. SS. Jun. V. Supplem. ad Vit. Bonifac. ii. p. 475 c), represents Boniface as protesting against pope Stephen making Chrodegang bishop (archbishop) of Metz; and Rettberg argues (Kircheng. Deutschl. i. § 73, p. 413), not only that such a protest would be quite in accordance with all that we know of Boniface, but that the idea of any such opposition to Rome would hardly occur to the imagination of a monk in the 10th century. There is however no reference to anything of the kind in the letters of Boniface and Stephen. It would be interesting to know in what relation such men as Boniface and Chrodegang stood to each other personally.

Chrodegang's famous rule for the canonical clergy, "Regula Canonicorum," is extant in two forms. The longer rule, consisting of 86 chapters (D'Achery, Spicileg. i. 565) appears to be an anonymous copy of the original rule in 34 chapters, which was evidently intended by Chrodegang primarily, though not, perhaps, exclusively, for his own clergy. This longer form omits carefully the special references to Metz, and inserts ("non satis commode," Labbe, Oss. in Reg.) various precepts, taken chiefly from the canons of the council of Aachen (Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 816), of more general application (cf. Sigeo. Gemblac. de Scr. Eccl. c. 73, ap. Fabric. Bibl. Eccl.).

Neither the thing itself, which Chrodegang had in view, nor his name for it, were altogether new. (Cf. Muratori de Canonici ap. Antiq. Ital. Med. Aevi, v. p. 183; Thomassin, de Benef. I. iii. 8.) The idea of the clergy living together in common under the eye of their bishop dates back to the time of the great Augustine and Eusebius of Vercelli, and never became utterly extinct in the church. The name "Canonici," which Chrodegang preferred to "Coenobitæ," probably as more palatable to his clergy, was one of the most ancient designations of the clergy, either because they lived under special rules, or because their names were enrolled in the ecclesiastical registers. In a similar sense, or, less probably, from the custom of reading aloud a chapter of Holy Scripture or of some other religious book on such occasions, the word "capitulum" was used before Chrodegang's time for a clerical conclave.

Chrodegang's aim was to revive the primitive discipline among the clergy. The result of his endeavours was that the canonical clergy in their chapter house became distinct from the ordinary clergy in their several parishes. He adopted for his purpose the wise and temperate rule of the great founder of Western monachism, even in many of its details. The same canonical hours for divine service are enjoined, and the word "claustrum" is retained for the clergy-house. Some changes were unavoidable. "Canonicus" is substituted for "monachus," the bishop stands in the place of the abbat, the archdeacon of the prior. Otherwise there is a strong resemblance at first sight between the two rules. But there are two fundamental differences. The canonici were bound neither by the vow of poverty, nor, in its monastic strictness, by the vow of implicit, unquestioning obedience. Thus Chrodegang's rule contained itself the elements at the same time of future disintegration, and of the deterioration and demoralisation which are the bane of all wealthy corporations. His rule was formally enacted almost word for word, with sundry additions and without acknowledgment, by the council of Aachen already mentioned. ("Ad mores clericorum reformandos," v. s.) But even so, though backed by all the weight of public and deliberate recognition by the emperor and the nation, it failed to attain the end which its originators intended.

Chrodegang's Rule, properly so-called, consists of thirty-four chapters, and was apparently intended by him for the clergy of his cathedral (c. 4, 5), and of another church in Metz (c. 24). In the preface Chrodegang censures the laxity of his clergy. His successor, Angilramn, in a postscript to the rule (c. 20), allows a richer diet. The longer rule, which, though bearing the name of Chrodegang and retaining his preface, is of rather later date, contains eighty-six chapters, and by the adaptation of its requirements to other places than Metz (c. 8) seems framed for the clergy generally. It contains (c. 7) a citation from the council of Aachen, A.D. 816 (Conc. Aquisgr. c. 121), on diet, another (c. 48) from the same council (c. 135), on the education of boys, and another (c. 48), from a council of Toledo A.D. 633 (Conc. Tolet. iv. c. 23), on the discipline requisite for the younger clergy.

Chrodegang, as has been said, followed the Benedictine Rule. It is interesting to notice the points of difference. The officials of the monastery remain, but in some cases with new titles and new duties. The abbat, as we have seen, is replaced by the bishop, and the prior by the archdeacon; the doorkeeper is sometimes called "portarius," sometimes by his old designation "ostiarius." The seven canonical hours for divine service remain. After "compline" silence and abstinence are enjoined (c. 4), as by Benedict (Bened. Reg. c. 42); it is added, that no "canonicus" outside the gates after that hour without the bishop's leave, is to be admitted. In the dormitory the beds for the younger "canonici" are to be arranged each between two beds of seniors, unless by a special order from the bishop (c. 3). Chrodegang omits the old Benedictine enactment (Bened. Reg. c. 22), that the monks should sleep in their habits and girded, but without knives; and another about the night light burning in the dormitory (Bened. Reg. c. 22), appears only in the later form of Chrodegang's Rule (c. 49). Vigils are ordered to be sung soon after midnight (c. 5); in Benedict's Rule the time is at 2 A.M. (Bened. Reg. c. 8). The "canonici," like the monks, are to be punctual to the moment at the sound of the bell, if within the precincts (C. 6. Bened. Reg. c. 50). Manual labour for winter and summer is prescribed by Chrodegang (c. 9), but less exactly than by Benedict (Bened. Reg. cc. 48, 57). Chrodegang defines winter as lasting from Nov. 1 to Easter. There is a similar gradation of punishments in both rules, the diet is less ascetic, but is defined more minutely (cc. 20, 22. Bened. Reg. cc. 39, 40, 41). Benedict gave a general permission for wine to be taken moderately (Bened. Reg. c. 40). Chrodegang fixes the quantity, allowing more to "canonici" of higher rank (c. 23). Thus a priest or deacon is allowed three glasses at dinner, two at supper; a sub-deacon two at each meal, those of lower degree two glasses at the one meal, one glass at the other (c. 23). But these too nice distinctions were abolished in the later rule (c. 7. Conc. Aquisgr. A.D. 816, c. 135). Benedict, to encourage a generous hospitality in his monks, sanctioned and enjoined the invitation of laymen to the refectory (Bened. Reg. c. 53). Chrodegang, legislating not for monks in seclusion, but for clergy dwelling in populous places, forbids it, except by special order of the bishop or arch-deacon (c. 3). He takes care, besides, to order the lay guests not to bring their weapons with them into the hall. They are not to be admitted into any other part of the buildings, but are to be "bowed out" after dinner. There is no "hospitale" or "hospitium" as in the monastery. More particular directions are given for the care of the sick (c. 28. Bened. Reg. c. 36). In the eyes of Benedict all the brethren were on a footing of equality in hall and choir, except, of course, the abbat, prior or provost, and dean. The rest were ranged according to seniority, unless any were thought by the abbat worthy of special distinction. Chrodegang seats his "canonici" according to rank at seven tables, the first for the bishop, archdeacon, and guests, the next for priests, and the next in a descending scale. The clergy of the city not dwelling within the cloisters, "clerici canonici qui extra claustra commanent," are to dine in hall on festivals at a separate table, after having performed their own masses (c. 21). Chrodegang requires them also, with the intention evidently of bringing them as far as possible under his canonical discipline, to be present on festivals at nocturns and matins, that is at the early service in the collegiate chapel. All the clergy, whether "canonici" in the stricter sense or not, he orders to confess to their bishop, twice in the year at least, once in the beginning of Lent, and again between August and November (c. 14). All the officials belonging to the several churches in the city or neighbourhood, whether or not residing together as "canonici," are to meet together at the cathedral, twice every month for a roll-call and the distribution of a dole, twice yearly for confession. The bishop is to be present, or, in his absence, the "presbyter-custos" corresponding to the English dean in our day of the cathedral (cf. Ducange, Gl. ss. Lat. s. vv. Matricularii, Primicerus).

Throughout Chrodegang's system there is a recognition of rank on its own merits. Within the monastery all were "brethren." Priest and layman, the noblest and the lowest in origin, the wealthiest and the poorest, the accomplished student and the rudest boor, all, as soon as they became monks, were by the very act equals except so far as the monastic discipline placed some in authority, and made others subordinate to them. But Chrodegang allows the distinctions of the outer world to intrude within his walls. He excuses the higher clergy from their turns in the weekly routine of tasks; the lower orders of the ministry are to wear the cast-off clothes of their superiors, and are to be content with one suit a year ("sarceiles" or "consiles") instead of two (c. 29); they are to take lower places in chapel and hall. Add to this the absence of the implicit obedience vowed by the monk to his abbat. No wonder if lax and secular habits of life soon undermined the fabric which Chrodegang had erected so carefully.

Chrodegang seems to have granted reluctantly what was a still wider departure from Benedict's rule, and a still more fatal blow to the monastic discipline among his clergy, the right to retain property. It was a concession, in his eyes, to the degeneracy of his clergy from primitive and apostolic simplicity. Benedict made the skill and industry of the individual entirely subservient to the common good, by requiring every monk to hand over his earnings to the common fund (Bened. Reg. c. 57). Chrodegang allowed a "canonicus" to keep for himself the fees and offerings which he received, unless they were expressly given for the community (c. 32). The real property of a "canonicus" was to pass after his death to the church that he belonged to; his personal property to his church and to the poor. But in both he was allowed a life-interest. Only he was exhorted to use this life-income for the advantage of his community, and, if possible, to defray all his own expenses from it, so as not to be burdensome to the general fund. Even offenders were not to be mulcted of their possessions. It is easy to see how the wealth and luxuriousness of the great capitular bodies were an inevitable outgrowth of a rule that was originally intended to revive a stricter and more frugal way of living among the clergy. Chrodegang is not the only great reformer, whose labours have been followed by a reaction proportioned to the greatness of the end in view.

CHRODGARIUS. A count, sent by the Emperor Charlemagne in the retinue of his son Pippin, king of Italy, for the purpose of devastating the territory of Beneventum (circ. A.D. 801). Alcuin wrote to him on this occasion. Chrodegarius had sent him his young son and his brother to be taken care of during his absence. Alcuin describes the one as a "good little boy," the brother as "a most praiseworthy person, whose character suits him excellently, in all religion and holiness."

He exhorts him "to work his soul's salvation by alms, by justice to all, pity to the wretched, and such good counsels as should be for the safety and prosperity of the Lord Emperor and the realm of the Franks."

He warns him against the pestilential air of Beneventum, and begs him to wind up his affairs carefully, lest any injustice or neglected fault might clamour about him, should he die in so dangerous a place.

Chrodegarius is perhaps Rotharius, Rotherius or Rotgerins, described in the Vita Sancti Austremonii, as "a very great general, skilled in the Pythagorean tongue, and an illustrious knight, more brilliant than the seed of Agamemnon, in the court of King Pippin." Rotgarius and his countess Eufrasia founded the monastery of Carroficum, in the diocese of Poitiers, as appears from the eighth poem of the third book of Theodulfus Aurelianensis, who calls him "a mighty count, a famous hero." (Alcuin I. Epist. 137, Patrol. Lat. tom. c. p. 376; Theodulf. Aurelianens. Carm. lib. iii. num. 8, Patrol. Lat. cv. p. 329.) [W. M. S.]

CHRODIELDIS, a natural daughter of king Caribert I. and a nun of the monastery of the Holy Cross (Sainte Croix), at Poitiers. Her chief, if not her only claim to notice, is that she was the author of one of the greatest scandals of her age. Although Merovaeus, bishop of Poitiers, had taken the monastery under his protection, a violent faction arose against Leuovera, who had succeeded Agnes as abbess. That faction was led by Chrodieldis, who disliked living under command, and aspired to become abbess in the place of Leuovera. Chrodieldis incited Basine, daughter of king Chilperic, and forty other nuns to revolt and leave the monastery with her, making them swear to accuse Leuovera of several heinous offences. On leaving the monastery she exclaimed, "I am going to see my royal relations, in order to let them know what we suffer. We are not treated like the daughters of kings, but like the daughters of miserable slaves." Merovaeus in vain opposed her design. Nor would she listen to Gregory of Tours, who, at the request of king Chilperic, tried to quell the disturbance. All that he accomplished in the matter, was to induce the forty rebellious nuns to pass the winter at Tours, while Chrodieldis went alone to king Gunthramnus. That prince ordered a council of bishops to assemble to investigate the scandal (Concil. Pictav. ad ann. 590, Hardouin). Meanwhile, Chrodieldis returned to Tours, and then to Poitiers, where, having assembled a troop of thieves, murderers, and other bad characters, she broke into the church of St. Hilary and the monastery of Sainte-Croix, and imprisoned the abbess. Gregory of Tours informing king Childebert and king Gunthramnus that the bishops would not assemble unless the sedition was put down by the secular arm, Mavon count of Poitiers restored peace by force. For these crimes she and her associate Basine were excommunicated at the council of Poitiers in the year 590. In the same year another council was held at Metz with reference to the same subject. While the bishops were conferring, Chrodieldis and Basine went there to try to obtain reconciliation with the church, and at the desire of king Childebert they were restored to the communion. They were then sent back to Poitiers, on condition that Basine, who had made entire submission, should re-enter the monastery; and Chrodieldis, who continued obstinate, retired to an estate accorded her by Childebert. (Greg. Turon. ix. 39; x. 15, Patrol. Lat. lxxi.; Ceillier, Histoire des Auteurs sacrés, xi. 366, 905, 906; Labbe, Concilia, vol. v. pp. 1593, 1596.) [D. R. J.]

CHRODINUS, a general, contemporary with Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers. He died in the year 582. Gregory of Tours commemorates him as a man "of magnificent goodness and piety, exceeding liberal in almsgiving, a feeder of the poor, a profuse benefactor of churches, a provisioner of the clergy. He often founded villas, laid out vineyards, erected houses, and brought lands under cultivation. He would then invite those bishops who were poor, make a banquet, and hand over to them the houses, the farms, and farmers, with money, furniture, utensils, servants, and serfs, saying that these were to belong to the church, that while the poor were being supported God might pardon him." Gregory had not space to repeat all the good he knew about him. He died at the age of 70. Fortunatus praises his justice, modesty, affability, and universal popularity, saying that he is famous throughout all Germany and Italy, bound by closest ties to the nations, and dear especially to the Romans.

He is thought to be Rodinus the general, of whom Aimoin speaks with equal enthusiasm; adding a story that when he had ordered his young men to open a tomb for the purpose of burying a corpse, and they had found it full of a vast treasure, he immediately distributed the whole of it to the poor. (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. vi. cap. 20, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. p. 390; Venantius Fortun. Pictav. Miscell. x.; Carm. xvi., Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. p. 312; Aimoin, Hist. Franc. iii. 40.) [W. M. CHRODOGANDUS. [CHRODEGANG.]

CHROMATIUS, bishop of Aquileia, at the end of the 4th and in the first years of the 5th century, one of the most influential of the Western prelates of his day, the friend and correspondent of Ambrose, Jerome, Rufinus, and most of the chief ecclesiastics of the age, and a warm supporter of Chrysostom against his Oriental assailants. Chromatius was a native of Aquileia, where he resided under the roof of his widowed mother, together with his brother Eusebius, and his unmarried sisters. Jerome, writing about A.D. 374, congratulates the mother on her saintly offspring, comparing her to Anna the wife of Phaauel, with prophetesses for her daughters, like those of Philip the Evangelist, and a "geminus Samuel" for her sons [Hieron. Epist. xliii. (vii.)]. On the death of Valerian, Chromatius became bishop of his native city. The date is uncertain, but it is placed by Baronius towards the end of A.D. 388. He was still a presbyter when he took part in the council held at Aquileia, against the Arians, Palladius and Secundianus, A.D. 381 (Ambrose, Gest. Concil. Aquil. tom. ii. pp. 834, § 45; 836, § 51; 843, § 76). Eusebius his brother also became a bishop, but his see is unknown. He died before A.D. 397, when Chromatius received a consolatory letter from Jerome (Hieron. Epi-st. iii.).

Chromatius is better known by the wholesome influence he exercised over some of the first men of the age than by any remarkable actions of his own. It was at his request that St. Ambrose expounded the prophecy of Balaam in an epistolary form, transmitting the work to him with the words "hoc munusculum sanctae tuae menti transmissi" (Ambros. Epist. lib. i. Ep. 50, § 16). To his frequent importunities, together with those of Iliodorus, bishop of Altino, and the liberality with which they both contributed to the expenses of the work and the salaries of the amanuenses, we owe several of Jerome's translations of the books of the Old Testament. To gratify them Jerome consented, somewhat reluctantly, to translate the book of Tobit (Praef. in lib. Tob.). Weakness of health prevented his doing what they desired with regard to commentaries on Hosea and other of the minor prophets, but to shew that he was not altogether unmindful of their wishes he forwarded to them translations of Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Canticles (Praef. ad version. Proverb.). In A.D. 392 he dedicated to Chromatius his two books of Commentaries on Habakkuk (Prolog. ad Habacc.) and c. A.D. 397 yielded to his urgency and undertook the translation of Chronicles (Praef. in Paralip.).

Chromatius was also an early friend of Rufinus, who, whilst an inmate of the monastery at Aquileia, received baptism at his hands while still a presbyter, his brother Eusebius assisting as deacon, c. A.D. 371 (Rufin. Apolog. in Hieron. lib. i. p. 204). When, on the publication of Rufinus's translation of Origen's work de Principiis,—styled by Jerome that "ship laden with blasphemies brought into the port of Rome,"—the affectionate friendship between Jerome and Rufinus was exchanged for violent animosity and fierce invective, Chromatius maintained his friendship with both parties and did his best to mitigate their irritation and make them at one again. To give healthy employment to Rufinus's active mind, Chromatius imposed on him the task of translating the Ecclesiastical History of Eusebius into Latin, together with Origen's Homilies on Joshua, which when completed he dedicated to Chromatius (Rufin. Hist. p. 15).

In the persecution of Chrysostom, Chromatius warmly embraced the cause of the deposed bishop against his enemies. The position he held in the West is shewn by Chrysostom's uniting his name together with those of Innocent, bishop of Rome, and Venerius, bishop of Milan, in the protest addressed to the Western church against the enormities perpetrated at Constantinople on his deposition (Pallad. c. ii. ad fin.). Chromatius sent Chrysostom a letter of brotherly sympathy by the hands of the unfortunate Western deputation (Pallad. c. iv.), and A.D. 406 received from him a letter of grateful thanks (Chrys. Epist. clv.). Chromatius also wrote in Chrysostom's behalf to Honorius, who forwarded his letter to his brother Arcadius as an evidence of the sentiments of the Western church (Pallad. c. iii. iv.). Chromatius died somewhere about A.D. 407, but the exact year is uncertain.

Chromatius was more a man of action than of literature. He does not appear to have written much, and of what he wrote but little has come down to us. We have under his name eighteen homilies on "the Sermon on the Mount," commencing with a Tractatus singularis de Octo Beatitudinibus, followed by seventeen fragments of expositions on Matthew, c. iii. vv. 15-17, and cc. v. vi. These homilies are written in a plain sensible style; the diction is not lofty but well chosen. His interpretation is literal, not allegorical, and his reflections moral rather than spiritual. They are valuable for plain common-sense piety. They are printed by Galland and Migne. The correspondence between Jerome and Chromatius and Heliodorus, on the apocryphal "Infancy of Christ," and "Birth of the Virgin;" also that on a martyrology of Eusebius, are undoubtedly spurious.

CHRONAN. [CRONAN.]

CHRONICA (χρονικά), histories or epitomes of history, in which special care was taken to fix the date of each event recorded. The earliest works of the kind bore the title Chronica, Chronological disquisitions, or some other equivalent title in the plural number. St. Jerome however several times speaks of having translated the Chronicon of Eusebius (Comm. in Dan. cap. ix. vol. iii. p. 1113; de Vir. Ill. cap. 135; Ep. 33 ad Panmach. iv. 250), and gradually the singular number prevailed. Mediaeval Latinity introduced the form Chronica, -ae, which is even to be seen in the earlier printed editions of St. Jerome, though without MS. authority. Scaliger, but apparently merely on his own authority, would limit the strict use of the singular number to the appendix in which the results of the chronological discussions were summed up and exhibited in a tabular form (κανών).

Christians were early led into chronological computations by their study of prophecy. Eusebius (H. E. vi. 7) mentions a discussion of the seventy weeks of Daniel by the historian Judas, who brought down his chronology to the tenth year of Severus, A.D. 203, and who then expected the immediate appearance of Antichrist. Christians also engaged in chronological discussions with a polemical object. Heathens had been fond of contrasting the antiquity of their rites with the novelty of the Christian religion; and consequently the apologists for Christianity found it important to confute them by establishing the still higher antiquity of the Jewish system, or which Christianity was the legitimate continuation. This argument was dwelt on by Tatian (Or. ad Græc. cap. 39), Theophilus of Antioch (ad Autol. iii. 21), Clement of Alexandria (Strom. i. 21). It has been even imagined that one of the earliest of Christian chronological works bore on its title this polemical object. In the list of the works of Hippolytus inscribed on his statue we read consecutively Chronicles against the Greeks (Χρονικῶν πρὸς Ἕλληνας); and though it is certainly more natural to understand this as describing the titles of two distinct works, some have taken it for the title of a single chronological work composed with a professedly controversial purpose. However this may be, we cannot mistake in detecting this purpose in the great work of Julius Africanus, who first attempted to embody in a single history the most important facts recorded either in Scripture or by secular historians, so arranged in chronological order that the synchronisms between sacred and profane history should be apparent. In this way Moses was shewn to be of vastly higher antiquity than the earliest secular historians; and the heathen gods themselves were shewn to be more recent than Judaism, the theory of Eumerus that they were but deified men being confidently adopted. Africanus also made Daniel's prophecy of the seventy weeks the subject of elaborate computations. This work of Africanus was the basis of the great chronological work of Eusebius, which was translated into Latin and continued by Jerome, and afterwards further continued by several writers. There seems some reason to think that the work of Africanus had been previously known in the West by direct translation (see Dodwell, Dissert. de Rom. Pontif. Success. vii. 98; Routh, Rel. Sac. ii. 399).

Controversies concerning the right time of observing Easter gave an additional stimulus to Christian chronological inquiries. It was found that the full moons, on which the time of Easter depended, returned after a certain number of years to the same days of the solar years in the same order. To exhibit this recurrence Paschal cycles were formed, which gave the date of the Easters of a series of consecutive years, distinguished by the names of their consuls or otherwise. As confidence in the accuracy of these cycles increased, they were applied to the solution of chronological problems. For example, we can obtain approximately the date of the Crucifixion from St. Luke's statement that our Lord was baptized in the fifteenth year of Tiberius; but in determining the exact year there is a double uncertainty, how many years are to be assigned to our Lord's ministry, and whether we are to count the years of Tiberius from the death of Augustus or from an earlier period. It was attempted to remove this uncertainty by the help of the Paschal cycles. Our Lord suffered on a Friday, which was also according to some the day of the Jewish Passover, according to others the day after; that is to say, the fourteenth or fifteenth day of the lunar month. The exact year of the Crucifixion is then determined by selecting from among those years between which our choice lies, that one in which the Paschal full moon fell on the right day of the week. A still more precise indication was gained when the day of the year on which our Lord suffered was supposed to be traditionally known. The problem would then be to determine by the Paschal cycles in what year Easter Sunday fell on the 25th of March; or whatever other date we assume to be that of the Resurrection; and since two years in which Easter Sunday falls on the same day are usually separated by a considerable interval, it would seem that this method ought to give the year of the Passion without any ambiguity. The same method was also supposed capable of determining the year of the world in which our Lord was born and died. An assumption was made as to the position of the heavenly bodies at the time of the Creation, and the date of the Paschal full moon in the first year of the world being thence derived, it was supposed that the date of the full moon for every subsequent year could be obtained by the tables, of which use could be made for chronological verifications in the manner already explained.

It is needless to say anything as to the merely historical use of Chronica. The purpose of the several continuators of St. Jerome was only to bring down to their own time the history contained in the earlier Chronica. These may be most conveniently consulted in Roncalli's Vetus-tiorum Latinorum Scrip-torum Chronica, Padua, 1787, which contains the Chronicle of St. Jerome with its several continuations.

It is not easy to draw any well-defined line of separation between chronicles and histories on the one hand and Fasti on the other. The articles immediately following contain notices of those chronicles whose authors' names are unknown. We give a list of the principal chroniclers of the first eight centuries, merely adding the period embraced by the chronicle, and referring to the articles under each author's name for fuller information. Africanus (Creation-A.D. 221), Beda (Creation-A.D. 729), Cassiodorus (Creation-A.D. 519), Eusebius (Call of Abraham-A.D. 325), Hieronymus (Abraham-A.D. 378), Hippolytus (Creation-A.D. 222), Ildatus Lemicanus (379-468), Isidorus Hispan-lensis (369-625), Joannes Abbas Biclariensis (565-593), Joannes Malalas (Creation-A.D. 565), Joshua Stylites (495-507), Judas (-A.D. 203), Marcellinus Comes (379-518-534), Marius Aventicensis (456-580), Prosper Aquitanus (Creation-A.D. 459), Sulpicius Severus (Creation-A.D. 400), Victor Tunnonensis (445-566). We add from Fabricius (Bibl. Gr. vii. p. 444 ed. Harles.) a list of other Greek chroniclers whose works have been lost, though some of them, such as Anianus and Panodorus, were probably not so much chroniclers as writers on chronology; Ancyrianus, Anianus, Brunichius, Brutius, Clemens, Diodorus, Dominus, Eustathius, Euty-chianus, Heliconius (Adam-Theodosius), Hero, Hesychius, Isidorus, Magnus, Milichius, Nestor-ianus (to the reign of Leo Junior, A.D. 474), Nicolaus, Panodorus, Pyrrho, Theophilus, Timotheus. [G. S.]

CHRONICON ATHANASIANUM. The Festal Epistles of Athanasius, published in Syriac by Cureton, 1818, and afterwards with a Latin translation by Mai (Pat. Nor. Bibl. vi.), have prefixed a chronicle of the episcopate of Athanasius (A.D. 328-373). It throws much light on the history of the period, marking the Easter of each year, together with the names of its consuls and the other modes of designating the year both in the East and in the West. There is also a Latin Athanasian chronicle (Mai, l. c. p. 161; Gallandi, Bibl. v. 222). [G. S.]

CHRONICON CANISIANUM SEU LAB-BEANUM SEU POTIUS HIPPOLYTI. The chronicle intended by this description was published first by Canisius in 1602 (Antiq. Lect. ii. 580), then in 1657 by Labbe (Nov. Bibl. i. 298), and was in 1688 appended by Du Cange to his edition of the Paschal Chronicle as the fourth in his collection of illustrative documents. For an account of the MSS. from which the printed editions are derived, see an essay by Mommsen (Ueber den Chronographen vom Jahre 354; Abhandlungen der Königl. Sächs. Gesellschaft, i. 585). This chronicle is anonymous and in Latin, but internal evidence shews that it is a translation from the Greek. It is needless to quote instances of Greek words or Greek constructions, because we have a decisive proof in the fact that there is extant a second version of a large portion of it, differing altogether in language, but agreeing perfectly in sense; except in one place, where to "cities" (civitatium) in one version answers "wars" (bellorum) in the other, a difference easily explicable by a difference of reading πόλεων, πολέμων in the MSS. from which the two versions were derived. This second version has been published by Mommsen (l. c.); it forms part of a chronicle (see CHRONICA HOROSII) which incorporates much of the older work, and continues it for a hundred years further. The original work, which bears the title Liber generationis et De Divisionibus et generationibus gentium, begins with Adam and ends with the thirteenth year of Alexander Severus. As it mentions the whole length of the reign of Alexander, thirteen years and nine days, it must have been written in the reign of his successor Maximin, A.D. 235-238, it being usual with chroniclers to bring their work to a conclusion with the last year of the immediately preceding emperor. It can scarcely be called a chronicle in the modern sense of the word, for it does not contain any continuous history, its object being chronological rather than historical; it merely gives from the Old Testament a series of names and dates sufficient for the purposes of chronological computation, and it arrives at the following results (the years marked being years of the world): the Deluge, 2242; Peleg, 2271; Abraham, 3387; the Exodus, 3817; David, 4364; Babylonish Captivity, 4842 years 9 months. It then passes immediately to the Incarnation, to which it assigns the date 5502, and gives only two subsequent dates, the Passion, 5532, and the thirteenth year of Alexander, 5738. The calculation proceeds also in another way: it counts the interval between the Exodus and the Passion by Passovers; from the Exodus to the Passover celebrated by Joshua, 41 years; thence to that celebrated by Hezekiah, 464; thence to Josiah's Passover, 114; thence to Ezra's, 108; thence to the Conception of Christ, 563; thence to the Passion, 30. For a purpose which will presently appear, we notice that on adding we find only 1320 instead of the 1715 years previously assigned for the interval between the Exodus and the Passion. It is plain then that there must be some transcriber's error in the numbers, and equally plain that the chief error must be in the interval between Joshua and Hezekiah, which is about 400 years less than that deduced from the dates elsewhere given in the chronicle. The work gives a genealogy of Christ; lists of prophets, priests, and kings, Jewish, Persian, and Macedonian; a list of Roman emperors; and it appears from the table of contents at the beginning that the chronicle originally contained a list of Roman bishops, which, owing to accidental mutilation, is absent from our present copies.

Du Cange suspected that this chronicle was the work of the celebrated Hippolytus, a conjecture supported by many arguments. Hippolytus wrote in Greek; his connexion with the church of Rome would account for the presence in the chronicle of a list of Roman bishops; and he lived in the reign of Alexander Severus. The list of the works of Hippolytus inscribed on his statue includes two chronological works, one of which Eusebius makes mention, containing the explanation of his cycle, and terminating with the first year of Alexander, the other a chronicle, apparently unknown to Eusebius, and which might well be identical with the present work, continued to the last year of Alexander. Further Syncellus (p. 218) states that Hippolytus attributed to Joachim (Jehoiachin), king of Judah, a reign of three years instead of three months, a peculiarity to be found in the present chronicle. Lastly, a less decisive argument is drawn from the fact that the date 5502 given for the Incarnation in this chronicle nearly agrees with the date 5500 which was assigned to it by Hippolytus, as inferred indirectly by Du Cange (p. 15), from Cyrillus Scythopolitanus, and as directly asserted by Photius (Bibl. 202).

On the other hand, Bianchini undertook to prove (see Hippolytus, Ed. Fabric. p. 117) that Hippolytus was not the author of this chronicle, by an argument which, though slighted by Mommsen on account of a supposed connexion with a fanciful theory concerning the cycle of Hippolytus, rests on perfectly sound principles. It turns out, however, that Bianchini strangely went astray in the application of these principles, and that the argument, which as he supposed disproved the connexion of Hippolytus with this chronicle, really gives an almost demonstrative proof of it. In the cycle inscribed on the chair of Hippolytus certain years of the cycle are marked as follows: 2. Conception (γένεσις) of Christ; 3. Hezekiah; 4. Josiah; 15. Exodus according to Daniel; 17. Esdras, according to Daniel, and Wilderness; 22. Hezekiah according to Daniel, and Josiah; 32. Passion of Christ; 35. Joshua; 55. Joshua according to Daniel; 106. Exodus; 108. Wilderness; 111. Esdras.

Bianchini first explained that these words refer to the different passovers mentioned in the Bible, the table indicating on what day of the month and week each of these was celebrated. And he shewed that the table thus afforded the means of recovering the chronological system on which it was framed. Thus the passovers of Hezekiah and Josiah being assigned to consecutive years in the cycle, Hippolytus must have supposed these passovers to have been separated by an interval either of one year, or of one year together with some entire number of cycles, that is to say, either of 1, 113, 225, &c. years. We have no difficulty in choosing 113 as the number intended. Similarly if we can only tell within 112 years what interval Hippolytus must have supposed to have elapsed between any two of the other passovers, the cycle enables us to determine that interval exactly; and further, since we know that the first year of the cycle was the first of Alexander Severus, we can recover the whole chronological system of Hippolytus and compare it with that of the chronicle. We find thus that Hippolytus assigned to the Passion the date A.D. 29, that of the consulship of the two Gemini; and that he agreed with the chronicle in placing an interval of only thirty years between the Incarnation and the Passion. The four intervals between the passovers, Joshua, Hezekiah, Josiah, Esdras, and the Incarnation, as deduced from the table on the chair, are 864, 113, 107, 563; as given in the chronicle 464, 114, 108, 563. As has been already said, even on the evidence afforded by the chronicle itself, we can have no hesitation in correcting the 464 into 864, the difference when expressed in Roman numerals being only the change of the first C into D. We find then absolute agreement between Hippolytus and the chronicle in the two larger numbers, and a difference only of a unit in the other two. To shew how little this agreement can be due to chance (without quoting modern chronologers whose results differ widely from the above), the same intervals as given by Eusebius are 730, 114, 111, 514, by Syncellus 909, 105, 128, 502, and by a computist contemporary with Hippolytus, who followed in his steps (see CHRONICON CYPRIANICUM), 826, 103, 144, 465. We could easily explain the two differences of a unit by shewing that the author of the chronicle was in the habit, when counting intervals, of including both the extreme terms; but in truth his work will not bear minute examination. On comparing several of his items with the sums total which he gives, although we can set many matters to rights by correcting from the Septuagint the figures given in the MSS. of the chronicle, yet there remain errors for which the author and not the transcriber seems to be responsible.

It will have been observed that the table gives a second computation "according to Daniel." The four intervals are by this computation 863, 112, 107, 433. The last interval, 433 years, agrees to a unit with the 62 weeks which St. Jerome tells us, in his commentary on Daniel, that Hippolytus counted between Ezra and Christ. And it would appear that Hippolytus, finding a difference of 130 years between his prophetic and historical calculation of this interval, gave the two results in his earlier work without attempting to reconcile them. No mention is made of the calculation "according to Daniel" in the later work. Possibly Hippolytus had in the mean time become acquainted with the system of Africanus, in which the prophecy is reconciled with history by counting the weeks from the 20th of Artaxerxes instead of from the 1st of Cyrus, as Hippolytus had done.

It is in any case plain that we must refuse assent to Mommsen's opinion that Hippolytus derived his chronological system from Africanus. The main points of the system of Hippolytus are embodied in the table inscribed on the chair; but at the time of the formation of that table he could not have known the work of Africanus, which would have taught him how to solve the difficulty as to the difference of 130 years which Hippolytus had given up as hopeless. The systems of Africanus and Hippolytus come into close but not into complete agreement as to the date of our Lord's birth and the duration of his ministry, the numbers 5502 and 30 in the system of Hippolytus answering to 5500 and 31 in the system of Africanus. But in other respects the systems have every mark of being the work of independent computers. They do not even agree as to the date of the Deluge. Hippolytus recognises the second Cainan whom Africanus rejects, and consequently a difference of over 100 years runs through a great part of their chronology.

If the chronicle under consideration has been rightly claimed for Hippolytus, it furnishes, as Bunsen pointed out, strong evidence for also connecting with Hippolytus the L'ejut tion of all Heresies, first published under the name of Origen's Philosophumena. About a third part of the chronicle is taken up with a subject which the author declares that he had investigated with the utmost industry; "summa cum industria praevidere cupientes juxta veritatem," and which seems the part of his work to which he attached most value, namely, the division of the earth among the sons of Noah. An enumeration is made of the 72 nations of the world; for such, it had been inferred from Deut. xxxii. 8, was their entire number. In the Rejectionum, x. 30, the same subject is treated of, the author also claiming credit for the labour he had bestowed on the investigation; τὴν ἀδίστακτον γνῶσιν ἣν πρόνοις κεκτήμεθα περὶ τὴν ἀλήθειαν. He states that he had published the names of the 72 nations in other books, but here only gives the summary that 25 of them were descended from Shem, 15 from Japhet, and 32 from Ham, a result precisely agreeing with that of the chronicle. The proof of identity of authorship is very strong, as it is difficult to believe that two contemporary writers should have separately entered on this investigation and arrived at coincident results, each using language excluding the supposition that he is copying the results of another. The chronicle was made use of by Epiphanius (Ancoratus, 115), and its results thence passed, with some modification, into the Paschal Chronicle and other works.

It has been already mentioned that the chronicle contained a list of bishops of Rome, which is absent from our present MSS. This Mommsen has attempted to restore by the help of the catalogue extending to the episcopate of Liberius, which was published by Bucherius, and by Du Cange in his appendix to the Paschal Chronicle, No. 17. Mommsen shewed from internal evidence that this catalogue consists of two parts, the later beginning with the pontificate of Pontianus, A.D. 231, having historical notices interspersed and having the consuls at the beginning and end of each episcopate marked from trustworthy and probably from official sources; the former part founded on an earlier document which only contained the name of each bishop with the duration of his episcopate, and which the later compiler brought into uniformity with the subsequent entries by an unskilful and inaccurate addition of names of consuls and emperors. Mommsen shewed also that this later compiler was the author of the chronicle already mentioned, founded on the work of Hippolytus, and that the names of consuls and emperors added to the catalogue tally with those in the lists of that chronicler. When then we find this chronicler omitting from its proper place the section of Hippolytus "Quis episcopus quot annis praeuit," but elsewhere giving a catalogue with the title "quis episcopus quot annis praeuit quove imperante," there is every presumption that the chronicle of Hippolytus supplied the list of bishops to which the later writer added the emperors' names. And we accept this conclusion notwithstanding the formidable objection urged by Döllinger (Hipp. und Cullist. p. 67) that, in this catalogue only, and in one other, Cletus and Anacletus are reckoned as distinct popes, and that if Hippolytus had so reckoned them he would certainly have had many followers. The second fact which he urges, that the names of three popes are omitted, Anicetus, Eleutherus, and Zephyrinus, might possibly be explained as originating in transcribers' errors.

What has been stated as to the connection of the Bucherian catalogue with Hippolytus gives especial weight to its statement, that in the year 235 Pontianus the bishop and Hippolytus the presbyter were banished to the unhealthy island Sardinia. See HIPPOLYTUS. [G. S.]

CHRONICON CUSPINIANEUM. This chronicle having prefixed an enumeration of the kings of Rome, gives a list of consuls from C. Julius Caesar, B.C. 47 to A.D. 533. It is interspersed with historical notices rare in the earlier periods, but tolerably numerous in the later years. This chronicle is a valuable and trustworthy authority for the history of the 5th century, and especially for the succession of the emperors of the West. It has been preserved in a single MS. in the Vienna Library, and was first published by Cuspinianus, but may be most conveniently consulted in Roncalli, Vet. Lat. Chron. viii. and ix., and in Mommsen's essay, Abhand. K. Sächs. Gesell. p. 656. Roncalli's preface gives an account of the preceding editions of this chronicle (see also Mommsen, pp. 572, 585). Mommsen has shewn that the two chronicles given in Roncalli as distinct are really to be regarded as different recensions of the same original, as their verbal agreement in many places proves, and that the one may be used to supply the gaps in the other. The first recension terminates with A.D. 496; the second, which is more corrupt and less circumstantial, has also in its present form had several of its parts transposed. The compiler appears to have lived in Ravenna (see, in particular, under A.D. 488). In the second version (Roncalli, ix.) he marks several times the course of the 84 years Paschal cycle, and he shews that he made use of the chronicle of Prosper and of that which bears the title CHRONICA HOROSII. [G. S.]

CHRONICON CYPRIANICUM. A short treatise is appended to the works of St. Cyprian (first published in Fell's edition, 1682, pp. 938-971) which bears the titles "Expositio Bissexti" and "De Pascha computus." This is probably the "very useful chronicle" which, in his life of St. Cyprian, Paulus Diaconus asserts that that father composed. It is in the same sense a Chronicle as that of Hippolytus, which we have described as CHRONICON CANISIANUM. Both works contain a system of Scripture chronology; but the Cyprianic being essentially a Paschal Chronicle, counts the years not from the Creation but from the Exodus. And both writers add a note bringing down the chronology to their own time, which in this case is the last year of Gordian, A.D. 243. It is common with chronological writers to terminate their calculations with the last year of the preceding emperor, and therefore we might conclude that this work was written some time during the reign of Philip (244-249) were it not that it concludes by calculating the Easter of the year 243, which would seem to limit its publication to the early part of that year.

The main object of the book was to provide a trustworthy method of calculating Easter, which at that time was anxiously sought for. At the end of the 2nd century western Christians were dependent on Jewish sources for information as to the right time for their Paschal celebrations. It was by freeing them from this dependence that Hippolytus earned for himself that place in their grateful recollection to which his statue still bears witness. The present treatise very well supplies the place of the lost work in which Hippolytus himself explained the principle of his cycle. It explains as follows the theory of the eight-years cycle. The lunar year of 354 days (or twelve months of $29\frac{1}{2}$ days each) is shorter than the ordinary solar year by $11\frac{1}{4}$ days; and hence each full moon of one year must come $11\frac{1}{4}$ days earlier than the corresponding full moon of the preceding. Similarly thirty-six months will come short of three solar years by $33\frac{3}{4}$ days. This being more than a month, an intercalation is made of a month of thirty days; and the full moons will still be $3\frac{3}{4}$ days earlier than those of three years preceding. But since eight times $11\frac{1}{4}$ is 90, or exactly three times 30, if in eight years an intercalation of three months be made, there will be no remainder, and the full moons will return on the same days as eight years previously. In order to exhibit the day of the week on which the full moon fell, Hippolytus joined two eight-year cycles together so as to make a cycle of 16 years. On the recurrence of such a cycle the full moons fall each one day earlier in the week than the corresponding full moon of the preceding cycle; and after seven such cycles, or 112 years, the full moons come back to the same days of the week as at first.

But this method is not astronomically accurate. In point of fact, after sixteen years the full moons do not return to the same days, but fall three days later. This Cyprianic chronicle proves that on the very first recurrence of the cycle (introduced A.D. 222) Christians were perplexed by finding it gave erroneous results, and were tempted to abandon the use of it, and "to walk after the blind Jews." This would point to an earlier date than 243 as that of the chair of Hippolytus, since it is unlikely that after the cycle had been found to be erroneous it would be inscribed on the chair by persons intending to do him honour. The Cyprianic author does not mention Hippolytus by name, but his whole system is based on the cycles of Hippolytus. He never doubts that after sixteen years the full moons return to the same day, and therefore he supposes that the full moons in the cycle had from the first been marked three days wrong.

He finds one of the eight Paschal full moons in the cycle to be the 25th of March; and he assumes (if indeed he did not find it in the lost work of Hippolytus) that this was explained as follows. The text "God divided the light from the darkness" shows that the world was created at the equinox; the equinox was the 25th of March, and the moon was created at its full; therefore the first full moon was the 25th of March, and it must fall on the same day every eight years afterwards. Now the Cypriatic author observes that it was here overlooked that the moon was not created until the fourth day of the world, and therefore it was the 28th and not the 25th of March which was the full moon. And he infers that all the full moons of the cycle should be pushed on three days later, after which correction he supposes that it would always give the full moons exactly. He has no suspicion that in another sixteen years it would be three days wrong again.

He follows Hippolytus in marking on his cycle the different passovers recorded in the Bible. But his chronological system is different from that of Hippolytus, and the places in the cycle assigned to these passovers are not the same. In other respects also he differs from Hippolytus, as for instance, in holding that our Lord ate the passover with His disciples on the fourteenth and suffered on the fifteenth day of the month.

This absence of any trace of direct Hippolytine influence makes it likely that the treatise was written not in Rome but in Africa. In placing the Nativity of our Lord on the 28th of March the writer was opposed to what we have reason to believe was even then the belief of the Roman church. He was probably misled by finding on the table of Hippolytus γενεσις Χριστοῦ; but by this Hippolytus doubtless intended the conception of our Lord, probably then as afterwards celebrated at the passover season. A presumption of African origin arises from the fact that the writer's Scripture quotations agree verbally with those of St. Cyprian. But it is extremely unlikely that Cyprian was himself the author of the treatise. It swarms with mystical calculations of numbers, not at all in Cyprian's taste (such as finding the Greek numeral letters in the name of Adam to represent the 46 years which the temple was in building); and if the work was written so early as 243 it is doubtful whether Cyprian was then a Christian. [G. S.]

CHRONICON EDESSENUM. An anonymous Syriac chronicle, published by Assemani (Bibl. Orient. i. 387), apparently compiled about A.D. 550; the last event recorded being the breaking out of the Persian war between Justinian and Chosroes, A.D. 540. The writer was orthodox, and expressly recognises the first four general councils, though one doubtful passage has brought him under suspicion of Pelagianism (p. 402). He uses the era of the Seleucidae, which begins B.C. 311, and he places the birth of Christ in the 309th year of his era, or two years before the vulgar computation. He commences his chronicle with the foundation of the kingdom of Edessa, B.C. 131, but the first event recorded with any fullness is an inundation, which caused much destruction in the city, A.D. 202. He enumerates in all four destructive floods by which the city suffered. Great part of his chronicle is occupied with local occurrences, and he gives the succession of bishops of Edessa, beginning with Conon, A.D. 313, who, however, was not the first bishop, the church claiming a succession from apostolic times. He makes no mention of the celebrated correspondence between Abgarus and our Lord, the breaking out of the heresy of Marcion, A.D. 138, being the earliest event in church history which he records. Of Roman bishops Leo the Great alone finds a place in the chronicle. [G. S.]

CHRONICA HOROSII (see also FREDGAR). The chronicle which in the manuscript bears this title is in substance the chronicle of Hippolytus, already described under the title CHRONICON CANISIANUM, but with an appended note bringing the chronology to the writer's own time (ad hodiernum diem). In this the years are summed up separately from Agrippa the last king of the Jews, A.D. 71, to the consulate of Severus, 194, thence to the consulate of Emilianus, 249, thence to that of Diocletian IX., 304, and thence to that of Optatus and Paulinus, 334. It thus appears that this chronicle was written A.D. 334, and that the writer probably had before him an older list of consuls, containing 55 years on a page, the years on each page of which were separately added up. The name Horosius in our MS. seems entitled to no regard. The well-known Orosius, to whom doubtless the copyist intended to ascribe the work, flourished a century afterwards.

This chronicle, originally published, as we have said, in 334, was republished twenty years afterwards as part of an interesting and valuable collection respecting which see Mommsen, "On the chronographer of the year 354," as cited in the article on CHRON. CANISIANUM, and De Rossi (Inscriptiones Christianae, i. LV.). This collection consists of a calendar, consular Fasti to A.D. 354, a table of Easters from 312, a list of city prefects, 254-354, notes of the places of burial and days of commemoration of Roman bishops and martyrs, a list of Roman bishops, a city chronicle mainly occupied with local occurrences at Rome, and a description of the city. Internal evidence shews that the work of 354 was but a continuation of one made some twenty years previously. For example, the list of commemoration days of Roman bishops is arranged according to the order of the days of the year, including Sylvester, Dec. 31, 335; but after this are added, out of their proper order, Marcus, Oct. 7, 336, and Julius, Apr. 14, 352, shewing that the list as it now stands is the completion of one made in the early part of 336. We have already given the reasons for thinking that the writer of 336 had before him the work of Hippolytus. The work of 354 was inscribed to a certain Valentinus, and was illustrated with pictures and with an ornamental title-page by Furius Dionysius Philocalus. De Rossi has shewn from the inscriptions that this Philocalus was a scribe of singular skill, whose hand may be traced in the inscriptions placed by pope Damasus, one of which Philocalus marks with his name, describing himself as "Damasi sui Papae cultor atque amator." [G. S.]

CHRONICON PASCHALE SIVE ALEXANDRINUM; an anonymous epitome of the history of the world from the creation to the 20th year of the reign of the emperor Heraclius,

A.D. 630. It has been preserved for us in a manuscript of the 10th century, now in the Vatican library, which has lost some leaves in the middle, and is also mutilated at the beginning and the end. The preface with which the work opens has sustained some injury, and the history does not now proceed beyond the 18th year of Heraclius, the pages containing the events of the last two years being wanting or illegible. This MS. was found in a Sicilian library in the middle of the 16th century, and thence brought to Rome. The lists of consuls which it contains were first extracted, and were made use of by Sigonius (Comm. ad Fastos et Triumphos Romanorum), and by Onuphrius Panvinus (Comm. ad Fastos), who refer to them under the name of Fasti Sicili, so called from the place of discovery of the manuscript. A transcript of the manuscript was made in Spain by a Greek named Darmar, and sold by him to Casaubon, who communicated large extracts from it to Joseph Scaliger. These were published by Scaliger as an appendix to his edition of the Chronicon of Eusebii, with the title ἐπιτομή χρόνων, and are referred to by him as Chronicon Casaubonianum. Darmar's manuscript is now in the Munich library, and is described by Hardt (Catal. Cod. MSS. Bibl. Reg. Buv. v. 416). In comparing it with the Vatican MS., it is found to be manifestly derived from it, being defective in the same places; but since it omits some things which are easy to read in the Vatican MS., there is a possibility that it was not taken from it directly, but through the intervention of another MS. in which those places were less legible. A complete edition, taken from Darmar's MS., was published by Rader at Munich in 1615. Rader having concluded on very insufficient grounds that the work had been compiled in Alexandria, gave it the name of Chronicon Alexandrinum, under which it has been very commonly cited. A much more accurate edition was published in Paris, in 1689, by Du Cange, whose edition, though also founded on Darmar's MS., was corrected in several places by comparison with the Vatican MS. Du Cange, rejecting the title Chronicon Alexandrinum, gave it the name Chronicon Paschale from the Paschal computations which form so essential a part of the writer's chronological system. In 1825, Cardinal Angelo Mai (Script. Vet. Nov. Coll. vol. i. pt. ii. p. 222), published from the Vatican MS. portions of the mutilated pages at the beginning and the end, which had been omitted by Darmar as illegible. Finally, in 1831, an edition founded on a thorough collation of the Vatican MS. was published at Bonn, by Dindorf, as part of the Corpus Scriptorum Historiae Byzantinae.

What has been said being all that is known of the external history of the work, we are left to internal evidence to determine the time and place of its composition. The fulness with which the events of the reign of Heraclius are told (changes of liturgical usage at Constantinople being carefully recorded), indicates that this part was written by a contemporary, a conclusion strengthened by a passage in which Heraclius is spoken of as "our emperor" (τὸν ἡμῶν βασιλέα, i. 735, ed. Bonn). Further, in recording the accession of every other emperor the total number of years of his reign is given, but not so in the case of Heraclius, from which we naturally infer that the work was published before the conclusion of his reign. The only reason for assigning to the work a later date is that it does not appear to have been made use of by Georgius Syncellus, or to have been known to Photius; but even if we had better proof than we have that Photius did not know the book we have no right to assume that Photius, with all his learning, was acquainted with every work extant in his time. On the whole, the great probability is, that the conclusion of the chronicle was written not long after the year 630, with which the history terminates. The only question is, whether the author of this part was also the compiler of the whole work. A statement was made by Holstenius, which has been very generally accepted by subsequent writers, that the original work ended with the 17th year of Constantius, A.D. 354, and that what follows is the work of a continuator. But internal evidence constrains us to reject this statement, the only ground for which appears to be the very insufficient one that a MS. collated by Holstenius broke off at this point. The events of the reign of Constantius are not related with the accuracy of a contemporary; the very last event recorded in the MS. of Holstenius, the death of Magnentius, is placed under a wrong year; and there are blunders also in the account of the elevation of Constantius himself to the dignity of Caesar. But the strongest arguments are derived from the marks of unity of design which pervade the whole work. We shall presently mention several indications that the preface was written by one who must have been later than A.D. 354, and could scarcely have been much earlier than the date we have assigned for the conclusion of the chronicle; but the principles laid down in the preface are systematically applied through the entire work. We conclude then that the whole is the work of one compiler who lived in the reign of Heraclius, but there are occasional inconsistencies which attest that his materials were taken from different sources, and it is in fact the remains of older authors incorporated in the work which give it its chief value.

What has been just said shews that it is no sufficient reason for giving the chronicle the name Alexandrinum, that in a few places Alexandrian affairs are related with some minuteness. The places in question may have been derived from Alexandrian sources, but the work as a whole certainly does not bear an Alexandrian character. It does not use the Egyptian months, but generally the Macedonian and Latin; it employs the divisions kalends, nones and ides; it begins the year not as in Egypt with the 1st of Thoth (= 29th of August), but usually with the 1st of January; and, contrary to Egyptian usage, it marks years by their consuls and by their places in the series of Olympiads and Indictions. Some of these indications point to Constantinople as the place of composition of the chronicle, certain usages having been transferred from Old to New Rome which were not prevalent elsewhere in the East. In that part of the work which was not borrowed from any predecessor, the account of the reign of Heraclius, the writer's point of view is unmistakably Constantinople. Different conjectures have been made as to the author's name, of which it is sufficient to mention St. Maximus, George of Pisidia, and on the theory of Alexandrian authorship, George bishop of Alexandria. More can be said against than for any of these conjectures, and the least improbable guess is that of Henschenius (in the preface to the third March volume of the Bollandist Acta Sanctorum) that the author was one of the Studite monks of Constantinople, in whose church was buried Bonus Magister, whose acts are related with much detail in the chronicle.

The actual reason why the name Alexandrian was given to this chronicle was a misunderstanding of the preface. This, as published by Rader, began with the name of Peter of Alexandria prefixed to a quotation, and it is not plain where this quotation stops, and where the writer of the chronicle speaks in his own person. Accordingly the name of Peter of Alexandria was supposed by Rader to be prefixed as that of the author of the chronicle, and by Oudin as that of the bishop under whose sanction it was published: and this Peter was identified with a Peter who was bishop of Alexandria about 640. But all this was a mistake; it was merely by accidental mutilation that the chronicle appeared to begin with the name of Peter; and whether the passage quoted be genuine or not, the Peter intended is certainly the Peter who was martyred in the persecution of Diocletian, A.D. 311.

The preface begins with a discussion of the question, the chronological importance of which has been shewn in the article CHRONICA, On what day of the lunar month did our Saviour suffer? Did He at His last supper (according to the most natural interpretation of the narrative of the Synoptic evangelists) eat the Jewish Passover with His disciples and suffer the next day, which consequently would be the fifteenth day of the month; or did He (as one who had only St. John's Gospel would infer) suffer on the fourteenth, the day of the Passover Feast? The advocates of the former view seem to have explained St. John's statement that the Jews had not eaten the Passover on the morning of the crucifixion by attributing to the nation laxity and irregularity in the time of keeping the feast, and to have applied to this subject the complaint of the Psalmist "They always err in their heart." On the other hand the writer of the chronicle maintains that, down to the destruction of Jerusalem, the Jews always kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month; in defence of which assertion he quotes the authority of Philo, Peter of Alexandria, and Athanasius; and he quotes Hippolytus, Apollinaris of Hierapolis, and Clement of Alexandria in support of his view that our Lord, being himself the true Paschal lamb, was slain on the day of the Passover Feast. In referring to St. John's Gospel a statement is made, afterwards repeated in the body of the work, that the autograph of this Gospel was preserved and worshipped at Ephesus.

It having been thus established that in the year of the Passion the fourteenth day of the month fell on a Friday, and that the 16th was the Sunday of the Resurrection, the writer proceeds to the subject of cycles. Having told that the fathers of the Nicene council made it the rule of the universal church that Easter should be celebrated on the Sunday next following the first full moon after the vernal equinox, he goes on to relate that the same fathers (but apparently after the breaking up of the council) by divine inspiration (θεοπνεύστως) set forth the cycle of nineteen years which exhibits on what day of March or April the full moon falls. He adds that this cycle was not the invention of the Nicene fathers, but that they only ratified in writing what from the very beginning had prevailed by unwritten consent. He proceeds to say that though this cycle would suffice for the determination of Easter, certain had put five such cycles together, supposing that at the end of this new cycle of 95 years the full moons would return not only to the same days of the solar month, but also to the same days of the week, and that by setting up such cycles on tablets in churches, they had made the church a laughing-stock to heathens, Jews and heretics; that to correct this evil the cycle of 532 (28 < 19) years had been introduced, at the expiration of which the full moons really would return to the same day of the week and year: that several such cycles had been published, but up to that time all likely to mislead in one or other of two ways. Either in the elementary cycle of 19 years the full moons were marked on days different from those to which they had been affixed by the inspired fathers, and so the cycle would give Easters on different days from those on which the church celebrated them; or if this grosser fault were avoided, the years of the cycle were marked with wrong dates Anno Mundi, or Anno Domini, in consequence of which, though the cycle gave Easter on the right day, it led those who used it to imagine that the church was in error as to other feasts, in particular as to keeping the Nativity on the 25th of December, the Annunciation on the 25th of March, the Purification on the 2nd of February, and the birth of St. John the Baptist on the 24th of June. The author then proposes to set forth a completely new cycle of 532 years, agreeing both with Scripture and church rule, and the nature of things; he proposes to commence the solar cycle of 28 years and the lunar of 19, with the creation of the sun and moon, to give rules which will shew what places in each cycle any given year of the world holds, and so which will determine on what day of the week and year the Paschal full moon in that year will fall; as for instance, in the year of the Exodus, of our Lord's Nativity, and of His Crucifixion; and he further undertakes to shew in what year ends the first cycle of 532 years beginning with our Lord's crucifixion and when the second such cycle begins. This last sentence proves so conclusively that the preface was written later than the year 562 under which the termination of the first cycle of 532 years is marked in the chronicle, that it seems scarcely necessary to add other arguments. For instance, the cycle of 95 years referred to in the preface appears to have been first used by Cyril of Alexandria, A.D. 437, and after him by Dionysius Exiguus, A.D. 525; who, however, were not guilty of the mistake attributed in the preface to the framers of this cycle, of supposing that the full moons after this interval return to the same days of the week: they were aware that in bissextile years there is a difference of a day. The preface was written after cycles of 532 years had become common, and is therefore later than Victorius of Aquitaine, A.D. 457, even though he may not have been the first to use this cycle. None of the feasts referred to in the preface appears to have been celebrated in the East so early as A.D. 354; a homily of Chrysostom fixes to A.D. 378 the first celebration in Antioch of the Nativity on the 25th of December; the feast of the Presentation of our Lord in the Temple is said by Cedrenus to have been introduced in the reign of Justin, and by Nicephorus in that of Justinian. A further argument may be founded on the fact that in the lunar table given in the preface the January moon is called the moon of St. Basil, who died the 1st of January, 379. And lastly in the conclusion of the preface is incorporated the prologue de Paschate anni 380 addressed to the emperor Theodosius by Theophilus of Alexandria (Gallandii Bibl. Pat. vii. 614), the name of Theophilus, however, being omitted, and some alteration being made to make it express the view of the chronicler and not of Theophilus, who held that our Lord suffered on the 15th day of the month. It is then abundantly evident that the author of the preface was later than A.D. 354, and therefore was the author of the latter part of the chronicle, while in order to convince ourselves that he was also the author of the former part, we have only to look at the calculation of the day of the week, and year of the Passover of the Exodus, made in exact conformity with the rules laid down in the preface, and to the calculation by the same rules of the Passovers of our Saviour's time, which gives a date of the Incarnation different from that used by any previous writer.

The basis of the author's method of calculation is the assumption that the first year of the world was the first of each of his solar and lunar cycles, and that then by the help of these cycles could be ascertained the days of the week and year on which fell the Paschal full moon in any given year of the world. In point of fact, although at the end of 19 years the full moon returns to the same day, it does not return to the same hour of the day, and the difference when accumulated by a certain number of repetitions of the cycle, makes calculation by the cycle inapplicable to years separated by a considerable interval. He assumes also as a fixed point that the vernal equinox always falls on the 21st of March; and that on this day the sun and moon were created. From this day accordingly he counts his years of the world. Since, however, the luminaries were created on the 4th day of the week, there were three days πρὸ τῶν φωστήρων, for which the author always makes allowance in calculating on what day of the week any given day of a given year falls. In the first year of his lunar cycle the Paschal full moon falls on the 13th of April, from which it follows that the 21st of March was the 21st day of the preceding moon; or, if we may so express it, that on the author's system the moon was created 21 days old. The author always makes allowance for the 20 preceding days, in calculating the age of the moon on any given day; but he divides these 20 days into 13, which he calls πρὸ τῶν φωστήρων, and 7 which he calls προσελήθους. Van der Hagen (p. 46) attempts an explanation of this which he himself owns to be unsatisfactory. By the methods here indicated the chronicler calculates the date of a number of Paschal full moons, the first being the passover of the Exodus which he computes fell on Sunday, April 13th, A.M. 3839.

It is necessary next to explain what connexion there is between chronological calculations and the times of keeping the church feasts named in the preface. These feasts are evidently all connected together, since the Purification ought to be forty days after the Nativity, and the Nativity nine months after the Annunciation, and six months after the birth of St. John the Baptist. It is the last of these which the author of the chronicle accounts for by a calculation which seems to be peculiar to himself. The whole depends on the assumption that the ministration of Zacharias at which the angel appeared to him, was during the feast of Tabernacles, which began on the 15th, and ended on the 22nd of the seventh Jewish month. The author then calculates for the year A.M. 5506, which he holds to be the proper year, the age of the moon on the 1st of September; and he finds, but not without some forcing, that it was the second day of the moon, and also the Sabbath day. The feast of Tabernacles would therefore be over on September 21st, but on account of the Sabbath, Zacharias remained in Jerusalem on the 22nd; on the 23rd he returned home, and the conception of John the Baptist took place on the 24th; and the birth on the 24th of the following June. St. Luke's phrase "in the sixth month" was interpreted to mean immediately after the completion of the sixth month; and so the birth of our Lord was made to fall six months and a day after that of St. John the Baptist or Dec. 25th A.M. 5507. Thus it will have been seen that the author counted it as a test of the accuracy of his chronology to assign such a year of the world for the conception of St. John the Baptist that the termination of the feast of Tabernacles should neither fall after the 24th of September, nor at any great interval before it. The year of the Crucifixion is determined independently. Hippolytus had assigned the 25th of March as the day of the Passion (followed by Tertull. adv. Jud. 8, August. C. D. xviii. 54): but at the time of the chronicler this was taken to be the traditional date of the Resurrection, and it is March 23rd which he assumes to be the day of the Crucifixion. It is necessary for him then to find a year of the world in which this shall be a full moon and also a Friday. These conditions he tries to prove are satisfied by the year A.M. 5540; but here too his calculations are forced, for it so happens that without a special artifice, he would not have found the full moon in any year of his cycle to fall on the 23rd of March. Anianus had previously used the same principles of calculation, but had arrived at a different result, because he held our Lord to have suffered on the 15th day of the month. It is needless to discuss the chronicler's success in reconciling the years he has assigned for our Lord's birth and death with the duration he has assigned to His ministry, namely three years and seventy-six days. His difficulties were increased by his having felt himself bound to adopt Jan. 6th as the date of the Baptism, because this falls so near the 25th of December that he could not take advantage of the ambiguity of the phrase "about thirty years of age," but was compelled to hold that the Baptism took place immediately after the completion of the thirtieth year. The author's dates correspond to B.C. 3 for the birth and A.D. 32 for the crucifixion of our Lord. His system is discussed in Clinton's Fasti Romani, to which work we also refer for corrections of the author's tables of consuls, and discussions of other parts of his chronological system (see vol. i. pp. 16, 863; vol. ii. pp. 163, 169, 209, 179 et seq.). See also Ideler, Chronologie, vol. ii. pp. 350, 354, 462; Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. vii. 449, ed. Harles. Hody, in the preface to his edition of John Malalas, discusses the origin of the passages common to the chronicle with that author, and states that he had treated of this chronicle in a separate writing which, as far as we are aware, was never published. This chronicle is the subject of a special essay by Van der Hagen (Amst. 1736), where will be found the best explanations of those points in the chronicler's method of computation which present difficulty. [G. S.]

CHRONICON RUINARTIANUM. A short Latin chronicle appended to two MSS. of Victor Vitensis, and first published by Ruinart (Hist. Persec. Vandul. p. 112), and afterwards by Roncalli (No. xii.). It consists chiefly of extracts from other writers, in particular from Gennadius, Idatius, Marcellinus Comes and Victor Tunnunensis, put down without much regard to chronological order. It begins with the reign of Arcadius and Honorius, and goes on to that of Justin II. 565-578. It makes mention of the dialogues of pope Gregory the Great, and was probably compiled about the end of the 6th century. [G. S.]

CHRONICON SCALIGERIANUM SIVE ALEXANDRINUM. As an appendix to his edition of the Chronicon of Eusebius, Scaliger published what he called "Extracts from the first book of the Chronica of Eusebius, Africanus and others, made by a barbarous and silly writer, most ignorant of Greek and Latin." The work thus described is in Latin, and is of undoubted antiquity, being contained in an ancient MS. preserved in the Imperial Library of Paris. A note in a later hand ascribing the work to Georgius Ambianensis or Victor Furogensis (sic) deserves no attention. The chronicle begins with Adam, and breaks off with the reign of Arcadius and Honorius; but a list of emperors in an earlier part (p. 80) is continued as far as Anastasius, 491-518, and since the length of his reign is not given, in the same way as those of the other emperors, it is probable that the work was published during the life of that emperor. Internal evidence points to Alexandria as the place of its composition: it constantly uses the Egyptian months; and records several Alexandrian occurrences, noting not only the consuls of the year, but also the Egyptian Augustal prefect. Hence Du Cange in the preface and notes to his edition of the Paschal chronicle, after Cujacius (in Cod. Justin. p. 140) refers to this work as Chronicon Alexandrinum. Herwart (in his Chronology, cap. 184) urges an argument for its Egyptian origin founded on the name of Christ which the author adopts. But the passage on which he relies, in which the year of the accession of Julian, A.D. 360, is said to be also that of the completion of the eleventh period of 62 years since the creation, appears to have been simply extracted from Anianus (see Syn-cellus, p. 36). And the truth seems to be that the compiler had no chronological system of his own, but put down results gathered from different sources, without much regard to consistency. The Latinity of the book and its blunders in translating from the Greek are as bad as Scaliger described them, but the use made by the compiler of writings not now extant renders it worthy of being consulted. He used the chronicle of Hippolytus (from whom he took the ethnographical account of the division of the earth between the sons of Noah), Africanus, Castor and others. And he appears to have taken from apocryphal sources stories of the martyrdom of Zacharius, the father of John the Baptist, and of the miraculous preservation of Elizabeth and her infant, of the names of the wise men, of the maidservant who questioned Peter, &c. [G. S.]

CHRONICON VALESIANUM. This chronicle, or fragment of a chronicle, by an unknown author, embracing the period from Diocletian to Theodoric, is in Latin. It was communicated by Sirmondi to Valesius, and published by him as an appendix to his edition of Ammianus Marcellinus. Mommsen notes that the writer made use of CHRONICON CUSPINIANEUM. [G. S.]

CHRONOPIUS (1) I., third bishop of Le Périgord. He succeeded Anianus in the first half of the 4th century. In an ancient breviary of that church occurs the following record: "Chronopius etiam, Elpidii et Benedictae filius, a morte suscitatus, B. Frontonis discipulus, ac demum in episcopatu successor, cum numerosa familia ab eo baptizatus, multorum conversionis ad fidem causa exstitit" (Gall. Christ. ii. p. 1448). [D. R. J.]

CHRONOPIUS (2) II. was the seventh bishop of Le Périgord. Fortunatus mentions that both his father and grandfather had followed the custom of taking orders after a former state of matrimony. Chenu (Archiep. et Ep. Gall. Paris, 1621) says that it was not unusual to look for prelates in families of senatorial and episcopal rank. The phrase of Fortunatus is, "Ordo sacerdotum cui fluxit utroque parente," which has generally been understood to indicate his father and his paternal grandfather. The author of the second volume of Gallia Christiana instances the case of Simplicius, bishop of Bourges. (Gall. Christ. ii. 1451.) Chronopius is described as having been of noble birth, modest, gentle, eloquent, the father of the poor, the prop of his country, the restorer of churches, the redeemer of citizens. He was present in 506 at the synod of Agde (Agatheusis). In the year 511 he subscribed to the first synod of Orleans, and in 533 to the second. He built the basilica of St. Front and translated his relics. In his time lived Avitus, who was his first preceptor in literature and philosophy. Then he was sent by his father to Clovis, and followed the standard of that king against Alaric, king of the Visigoths. At length, warned by an angel, he returned to his country, where having built an oratory in a very thick wood, he led a holy, or to use the words of Sammarthanus, an angelic life, and died full of years, being more than eighty. It is uncertain in what year he died, but it was probably about the middle of the 6th century. (Venant. For-tuat. Miscell. iv. 8, Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. p. 160; Gall. Christ. ii. p. 1450.) [D. R. J.]

CHRONOPIUS (3). A bishop of the time of the emperor Valentinian I., mentioned in his law of July 9, A.D. 369. His see is unknown, but contrary to the laws he had appealed to a secular magistrate named Claudianus, and again to another, against the decisions of a certain council, the name of which is also unknown. Seventy bishops were at this council, and they deposed him. His fine, supposed to be 50 lbs. of silver, was this year not to be paid to the treasury, but to the poor; and this was to be done likewise in other ecclesiastical matters. (Cod. Theod. lib. xi. tit. 36, leg. 20, p. 307; Ceillier, iv. 600; vi. 356.) [W. M. S.]

CHROTBERTUS. [CHRODEBERT.]

CHROTECHILDIS, CHROTILDIS. [CLOTILDA.]

CHRYSANTHUS (1), martyred along with the virgin Daria at Rome. Thus much only is told us, from Acts then extant, by Gregory of Tours (Glor. Mart. i. 38, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 764, 816). The extant Acts put the martyrdom under the emperor Numerian, but as they profess to be written by Verinus and Armenius by order of pope Stephen, it is manifest that we must substitute the name Valerian: OYAA easily became OYM and NOYM. This is the more manifest, as according to Ado, who, however, gives a tissue of prodigies, they suffered under a prefect Celerinus, whose name does not occur in the list of prefects from A.D. 254 onwards, in the calendar of Philocalus (Tillem. iv. 763). According to the same Acts his father was one Polemo, or Polemius, of Alexandria, his Christian instructor the presbyter Carpophorus; the virgin Daria was of Athens. The story, as given in the menology of Basil, is to the effect that Chrysanthus went to Rome with his father who was a senator, and was made a Christian at the hands of a certain bishop, who was hiding in a cave. When his father knew it, he shut him up in a dark prison, then compelled him to take a wife, and gave him Daria, the lady philosopher. But when Chrysanthus saw her, he treated her as a sister, and they took counsel to be virgins till death. Then she too was baptized, and they both taught the people concerning chastity and sobriety. The Gentiles, vexed at their persuading their wives to leave them and be espoused to Christ, slandered them to the prefect. The saints are given over to Claudius the tribune, and are led outside the city and tortured diversely. Then a miry ditch is dug, and they are both thrown into it, and earth is thrown over them, and they are trampled down, and thus they are perfected. (Men. Bas. Oct. 17.)

Gregory further informs us that a vault of wonderful work was made over their tomb, and that the crowd which assembled here on their festival were buried alive, by order of the emperor, by the obstruction of the entrance with a great mass of stones and earth. The site was forgotten when Rome became Christian. Diodorus the priest, and Marianus the deacon, are mentioned in the Acts as among the martyrs thus buried alive.

The site, according to Gregory, was discovered by revelation, and a wall was put up, severing the graves of Chrysanthus and Daria from the bodies of the later crowd of martyrs. An aperture was left in this wall, that the bodies of the saints might be visible. Through this aperture the silver vessels with sacred wine, that had been deposited at their burial, could also be seen. These excited the cupidity of a subdeacon, who entered the cell by night to steal them, but could not find the way out again in the dark, and durst not emerge by day. Night after night his perplexity was repeated, till he was nearly starved, and obliged to confess his attempt. The event was recorded in an inscription by Damasus, who also had the window more carefully closed. "And there," says Gregory, "our Lord Jesus Christ is blessed to the praise of His name unto this day." This was in the cemetery of Thraso, on the left of the new Salarian way (De Rossi, Roma Sotterranea, i. 176).

The above stories suggest three occasions that might give rise to commemorations; the martyrdom of the two saints, and of the throng of worshippers, and the discovery of the bodies. But it is furthermore related in the Acts, that the above-named Claudius, the tribune, with his wife Hilaria, and children Jason and Maurus, were converted and martyred soon after. They are commemorated, with Chrysanthus and Daria and eighty-six soldiers, Aug. 12 (Mart. Hieron.). Hilaria was afterwards commemorated the same day as mother of Afra. The same martyrology commemorates our pair along with Saturninus and Maurus, on Nov. 29 and 30. They may perhaps be mentioned at this time from a confusion between a Saturninus connected with them and the Saturninus of Toulouse, who died Nov. 29. Peter de Natalibus has a story of Maurus, coming from Africa to worship at the tomb of the apostles, and being put to death by Celerinus, Nov. 30. The Romanum Parvum names our pair, with Diodorus, Marinius, and an infinite multitude, Dec. 1. Rabanus and Notker commemorate them Oct. 25, which has been the usage of the Roman church from the 7th century. The Greeks assign them to Oct. 17, as we have seen, and also, though not in the menology of Basil, to March 19 (Tillem. iv. 566; cf. also Sollier's Usuard, Dec. 1; Ruarin, p. 420; Acta SS. Oct. xi. 437).

The inscription by Damasus, to which Gregory alludes, is lost; but we have his epitaph on the tomb of Maurus at the same place (Tillem. viii. 422; Patr. xiii. 395, Carm. 21). A long poem on the martyrdom of our saints, discovered in 1845, is ascribed to him, but wrongly. The source of the error may perhaps be traced in the terms in which Gregory of Tours concludes the story of the sub-deacon narrated above. The chapter (Glor. Mart. i. 38) says that after a long while pope Damasus "jussit diligentius operiri fenestram, ubi et versibus decoravit locum. E ibi benedicitur Dominus Noster Jesus Christus ad laudem nominis sui, usque in hodiernum diem." If Damasus was thus understood to have had versus inscribed, it would be natural to assign the long Carmen to him. It is given in the Acta SS. and in the Patrologia lxxiv. 527. [E. B. B.]

CHRYSANTHUS (2) A bishop of the Novatians at Constantinople, who succeeded Sisinnius in 407. Chrysanthus was the son of Marcian the predecessor of Sisinianus. He had passed the greater part of a long life in various civil and military employments, having filled with great credit the offices of ὑπατικός in Italy, and Vicarius of the British Isles. Having returned to Constantinople at an advanced age, in the hope of being appointed prefect of the city, he was unexpectedly named by Sisiunius, when at the point of death, as his successor. Being disinclined to the episcopal office he retired from Constantinople to Bithynia, but was pursued and dragged from his retreat and forced to submit to ordination. He held his office seven years, till his death in 414. Socrates praises his singular modesty and prudence, as well as his liberality. He states that he was the first who distributed money out of his private means to the poor of his church, and that he refused any official remuneration beyond two of the eulogiae, or loaves offered by the people and blessed by the bishop. Under his government the Novatian church at Constantinople advanced in numbers and prosperity. He secured the services of Ablavius, the most celebrated orator of his day, afterwards the Novatian bishop of Nicaea, whom he induced to be ordained presbyter (Socr. H. E. vii. 6, 12, 17). [E. V.]

(4) Bishop of Spoleto, addressed by Gregory the Great (Ep. vii. 72, 73), and begged to give some relics of SABINUS for a church at Fermo (v. Tillem. v. 42). [E. B. B.]

CHRYSAPHIUS, an eunuch, chief minister at the court of Theodosius II., Eastern emperor. He is mentioned as gaining over his master and the empress Eudoxia to the party of Eutyches. After the death of Theodosius, A.D. 450, he was disgraced, banished to an island, and put to death at the instance of the empress Pulcheria. It is thought that through the influence of Chrysaphius, Eutyches obtained a letter from Theodosius to pope Leo the Great, exhorting him to peace. Chrysaphius and Eudoxia also supported Dioscorus in his desire that Theodosius would summon the Eutychian council of Ephesus. (Letters of Pulcheria, Theodoret, Letters, 124, 125; Concil. iv. pp. 108, 109; Ceillier, viii. 475, x. 75, 210, 675.) [W. M. S.]

CHRYSE (in Latin versions of the story known as AUREA), the principal figure in that account of the martyrdom of Hippolytus which found most circulation in the East. The Greek text was first published by Simeon de Magistris in 1795, but may be most conveniently consulted in Lagarde's Hippolytus (v.-xii.). It purports to relate to martyrdoms which took place during a violent persecution of the Christians by the emperor Claudius. Magistris, who defends the historical character of the narrative, would have us understand the emperor Claudius Gothicus (A.D. 268-270); but it is clear that the writer of the story intended the first Claudius, for one of the characters is made to speak of Christ's appearance on earth as an event of his own time. The substance of the story is as follows:—The prefect Censorinus, at first only in secret a Christian, makes his religion known by his kindness to the confessors under imprisonment, and is in consequence himself also imprisoned at Ostia by the Emperor's command. There he is ministered to in prison by Maximus the priest, Archelaus the deacon, and by Chryse, a lady of the imperial family. A miracle exhibited in the prison leads to the conversion of the guards, seventeen in number, whose names are given, among which, for a reason presently to be mentioned, the names Herculaneus and Taurinus are to be noted. They are baptized under the direction of the bishop Cyriacus, by whose prayers about the same time a young lad is raised from death to life. The emperor hearing of this miracle, and imputing it to magic, orders a fresh persecution of the Christians, in which Cyriacus, Maximus, Archelaus, Chryse, and the guards suffer martyrdom by various deaths, Chryse in particular being subjected to a great variety of tortures. Nonus, the presbyter, whose name we are told had been changed to Hippolytus (that is to say who had received the second name on his conversion), buries the body of Chryse in his own ground outside the walls of Ostia; and in consequence of his loud expressions of indignation at the cruelties exercised on the Christians himself also suffers martyrdom by being drowned in a ditch at the wall of Portus. These acts mention no other connexion between Hippolytus and Portus, nor do they speak of him as a bishop, but only as presbyter. However much of the story may be pure invention, the writer of the acts derived some of his names from historical sources, for in the "Depositio martyrum," contained in the chronicle of the year 354 (CHRONICON CANISIANUM), are given under Sept. 5 the names "Aconti in Porto et Nonni et Herculani et Taurini." The Greek version of the story just described is clearly the original from which are derived all the extant Latin versions which assume a great variety of forms. One departs but little from the Greek form. In another (Bollandist Acta Sanctorum, Sept., ii. 520), Censorinus is the chief figure, the emperor Gallus (A.D. 252) is made the persecutor, and no mention is made of Hippolytus. In another Cyriacus is the chief figure. In another later form (Acta Sanctorum, Aug., iv. 757), Hippolytus is made bishop of Portus, and the emperor Alexander is made the persecutor. In some forms of the story the Nonus-Hippolytus of the original is confounded with Nonnus, bishop of Elessa, who lived at the time of the Council of Chalcedon, and was celebrated as the converter of St. Pelagia (see the story as told by Peter Damiani in Fabricius's Hippolytus, p. xi.) The most complete discussion of all these stories is to be found in Döllinger, Hippolytus und Kallistus, chap. 2. [HIPPOLYTUS.] [G. S.]

CHRYSEROS, a sophist and apologist of paganism in the 5th century, rebuked by St. Nilus (Ep. ii. 42; Ceillier, viii. 217). [E. B. B.]

CHRYSIPPUS, one of four brothers, Cappadocians by birth, of whom the other two were named Cosmas and Gabriel, recorded by Cyril of Scythopolis. Having resolved on embracing a religious life, they left their native country and betook themselves to Jerusalem, that they might profit by the instructions of the celebrated abbat Euthymius. In 455 Chrysippus was made the superior of the monastery of Laura, and subsequently of the church of the Resurrection, by the patriarch Juvenal. He was raised to the presbyterate, and on the elevation of his brother Cosmas, who had held the office, to the see of Scythopolis, was appointed "guardian of the Holy Cross," which he held for ten years, till his death. Chrysippus was a copious author, and according to Cyril, who praises him as θαυμαστός συγγραφεύς, "left many works worthy of all acceptation," very few of which are known to exist. A "laudatio Joannis Baptistae," delivered on the occasion of his festival, is printed in a Latin translation by Combefis (Biblioth. Concionat. vii. 108). This homily is couched in the inflated style of the panegyrist, overloaded with metaphors and similes, with an ostentatious display of classical and mythological learning. Herod at his banquet is compared to Polyphemus, and the Baptist in his solitude is contrasted with Timon. Fabricius mentions a Homilia in Deipavam, printed in the Auctarium Biblioth. Patr., Paris, 1624, vol. ii. p. 424, and a Laudatio Theodori Martyris, which appears to be lost. Photius (cod. 171) records his having read in a writing of Chrysippus a statement relating to the baptism of Gamaliel and Nicodemus by the apostles Peter and John, and the martyrdom of the latter, which Chrysippus had derived from a fellow-presbyter, Lucian, to whom it had been revealed in a dream, together with the localities in which their bodies, and that of St. Stephen were to be found. This is a very early example of the convenient dreams indicating the position of valuable relics which we meet with so frequently in the middle ages, by which the failing fortunes of a religious house were revived, or the rival attractions of another establishment emulated. (Cyrill. Seythop. Vit. S. Euthym. Cave, Hist. Lit. i. 444; Combefis, Bibl. Concionat. i. 8.) [COSMAS.] [E. V.]

CHRYSOGONUS (1), martyr in the persecution of Diocletian, whose name was inserted in the canon of the mass from a very early period, so that we may be sure that he was a very important person, though little is now known of him. In his case, from the very little that we are told, we are better able than in almost any other to trace the several stages of the persecution of Diocletian. In the Menology he is commemorated along with Anastasia, Dec. 22. He was of great Rome, "a man that feared God," "teacher of the Christians;" "and when persecution was set on foot he was arrested and cast into prison." Anastasia was of rich and noble parents, and learnt to believe in Christ from her mother, and was taught the Scriptures by Chrysogonus. She received a husband named Publius, rich, but a heathen, whence also she hated him, and would not come into contact with him, but pitied the poor and visited those in prison. Wherefore she was cast into prison (probably a private custody) by her husband; but when he died she came out. She had written to Chrysanthus in his prison "to pray for her, that, if her husband would become a Christian, he might be preserved alive, but if he would not be persuaded, he might die and not spend her wealth with idolaters, but that she might empty it upon the saints and upon the poor, which thing came to pass. Then the holy lady obtained liberty of action and gave all she had to the poor, and put on poor apparel, and went about and ministered to the saints in the prisons; when also Diocletian, staying at Nice, wrote to Rome that all the Christians should die, and that Chrysogonus should be brought bound to Nice, and when he was brought he beheaded him." For Nice we should probably read

Nicomedia. In these acts it is easy to trace the effects of the first and second of Diocletian's edicts. Chrysogonus evidently was not one of the traitors, who were so numerous at Rome, under the first edict, Feb. A.D. 303. Hence, when by the second edict, not long after, all the clergy were committed to jail, he exercised great influence from his prison on the faithful, who were still for the most part unscathed and at large. The question is to what we are to refer the statement about the decree that all Christians should be killed, and that Chrysogonus should be brought to Bithynia. His passion is assigned to the 22nd of December. By the third edict, on the great anniversary festival of the 21st, it was made the necessary preliminary to the inclusion of the captive clergy in the general release of prisoners, that they should consent to sacrifice; if they would not, torture was to be employed to induce them. But this only applied to the clergy. There were no general orders for the arrest of all Christians. The rescript of Trajan was still in force. But the great festival of the emperor's 20th anniversary must have brought to light many a recusant. The suggestion of torture in combination with the outlawry of Christians before decreed, was really equivalent to condemning them to slow deaths. They might not be executed, but if they died under torture it was strictly legal. When, in the spring of A.D. 304, the fourth edict appears, it sets forth no new penalties; it merely interprets the previous decrees in all the grim pregnancy of their meaning: "certis poenis intereat."

It may well be that the constancy of men like Chrysogonus, under their tortures, was among the things that drove Diocletian mad; and that he left word at his hurried departure from Rome (Dec. 22, A.D. 303), "Send him after me." The martyrdom is assigned by several Western authorities to Aquileia or the neighbouring Aquae Gradatae in Friulia. The day to which it is almost universally assigned in the West from the Calendar of Carthage onwards, is Nov. 24. As for the one horror that seems to be new in the persecution of A.D. 304, the condemnation of virgins to the brothel, we may perhaps infer that the inclusion of the female with the male ministers of the church in the order for imprisonment was provoked by the conspicuous activity of women like Anastasia. Those who were so unabashed in visiting men in prison, should be visited by men in prison themselves. Her story is closely entwined with that of Irene, whom she is said to have visited whether in body or in a dream. "She buried those that were martyred, and encouraged many to martyrdom. So she was tortured by different rulers and cast in the sea and given over to fire; and when she came out of the fire she was beheaded with the women that were with her." The last account does not mean that they tried in vain to drown or burn her, and found her proof against all but the headsman's axe; but that she was cast into the hold of a ship to be taken to a place of trial or of exile, there subjected to the horrible fiery tortures that were then so common, till at last her living ashes were laid to rest by the severance of her head from her body. Miracles of fortitude were easily transformed to vulgar prodigies of invulnerability. Her commemoration in the West is on Dec. 25, and in some of the Hieronymian martyrologies her passion is assigned to Sirmium, which was probably the scene of Diocletian's illness. But Usuard tells that she was transported to the little isle Palmaruola (about lat. 41°, long. 31°) in the Tyrrhene sea.

The Paris Breviary tells us that "the body of Chrysogonus was thrown into the sea. Shortly afterwards the presbyter Zoilus found it and buried it in his own house. There is an ancient parish of St. Chrysogonus at Rome, mentioned in the acts of the council under Symmachus, and in the epistles of Gregory the Great. Gregory III. adorned it. His name was celebrated throughout Illyria." His body is said by Alban Butler to be now at Venice. [E. B. B.]

CHRYSOGONUS (2), monk, of Aquileia, to whom St. Jerome writes (Letter 9, ed. Vall.) from the desert, asking him to write to him. [W. H. F.]

CHRYSOLIUS, ST. (ST. CHRYSÉUL), bishop and martyr, celebrated at Comines in Flanders as the apostle of that neighbourhood. He suffered under Diocletian. By De Saussay he is said to have been bishop of Tornacum (Tournay) (Martyrolog. Gallic. p. 98, Paris, 1637). The authorities for his life are the martyrologists of Belgium and Flanders. He is said by the MSS. at Comines to have been a native of Armenia, and is stated, but without any substantial authority, to have been of royal blood (nam Armeniae Rex Reginaque eidem B. Chrysolio parentes carnales dicuntur veraciter existisse (AA. SS. Boll. ex MSS. Cominien. and Rubeavallis). In the same MSS. he is said to have been made archbishop while still living in Armenia, and to have been equally distinguished for his learning and the holiness of his life. But Molanus doubts whether he was ever a bishop. By order of Diocletian, Armenia was visited with a cruel persecution of Christians, many of whom were put to death. Chrysolius then fled to Rome, where he was received with much honour by pope Marcellus. As a token of his esteem, the pope presented him with the Canola of St. Peter, but it is not clear what is meant here by "Canola," whether some relic of St. Peter, or merely a vestment consecrated by the pope. He was accompanied on his journey from Rome to Gaul by St. Dionysius of Paris, St. Quintinus of Amiens, St. Piatius of Tournay, St. Lucianus of Beauvais, and others, most of whom, like himself, won the martyr's crown. Chrysolius went to Verlenghem, where he converted many to the Christian faith.

The fame of his pious works caused him to be arrested by the imperial authorities, and he was publicly scourged and scalped. The legend states the miracle, which the monkish annalists deemed commonly appropriate, that the martyr carried his scalp and brain in his hands. His death is placed in A.D. 302. His relics were translated to Bruges to the basilica of St. Donatian, but some of them were also taken to Tournay, Lens, and other places.

Chrysolius is commemorated on the 7th of February (AA. SS. Boll. Feb. ii. pp. 9-13; De Saussay, Martyrol. Gall. p. 98; Tillemont, iv. 158). [D. R. J.]

CHRYSOLOGUS, PETRUS, archbishop of Ravenna, A.D. 433-454, who like Chrysostom obtained the name by which he is usually known from the golden brilliancy of his oratory. The title was given to the subject of this notice by the Greeks residing at the court of Valentinianus and his mother, Galla Placidia, at Ravenna. He is said to have been born at Forum Cornelii (Imola), according to Agnellus, in the episcopate of Cornelius, by whom he was brought up and instructed (Serm. 165). In due time Cornelius ordained the young Peter deacon, and made him oconomus of the church. The ordinary account of Peter's elevation to the see of Ravenna, which is repeated by successive biographers with ever increasing definiteness of statement, does too much violence to the facts of history to be worthy of credit. The improbabilities of the story are exposed by the learned and candid Tillemont, and it is stigmatised by Dupin as "a groundless tale related by no credible author." It is however given so circumstantially by Agnellus in his Liber Pontificalis (a work of which Wattenbach speaks highly in his Geschichtsquellen, as evidently derived from early and trustworthy sources), that it may contain some distorted elements of truth, and therefore cannot be omitted altogether. Agnellus's account is that on the death of John, bishop of Ravenna, A.D. 433, the whole people came together (according to the usual custom), with their presbyters, one of whom they chose as bishop and sent him to Rome to be consecrated by Sixtus III. Among the bishops who accompanied the newly elected to Rome was Cornelius of Imola, attended by his deacon Peter. The consecration of the bishop-elect was stayed by a vision. The apostles Peter and Paul appeared to Sixtus in a dream, bringing a young man between them, whom they commanded him to consecrate instead of the Ravennese nominee. A second vision was required to overcome the pope's indisposition to set aside the choice of the diocese. On the repetition of the command in sterner terms he yielded, and recognising in the deacon Peter the person who had been indicated by the apostles, in spite of the displeasure of the clergy and laity of Ravenna at having a young stranger set over them, he consecrated him bishop. The improbabilities of this story are patent. It assumes that the church of Ravenna was subject to that of Rome, when, if not already possessing metropolitan rank, which Tillemont thinks was probably the case, it was one of the suffragan sees of Milan, and it was to the metropolitan of that city, and not of Rome, that the confirmation and consecration of the bishop-elect belonged: and even if Ravenna had been subordinate to the papal see, it ascribes to the bishop of Rome the uncanonical power of cancelling a legitimate election, without any proved disqualification, and of appointing a bishop by his sole authority. Besides, as Tillemont has shewn, there is some reason to believe that Chrysologus was bishop of Ravenna before the date of Sixtus's accession in 432. His biographers load the episcopate of Chrysologus with panegyrics which add but little to our knowledge of him. We may gather from his sermons that he presided over his diocese with vigorous authority, taking special pains to extirpate the pagan customs still kept up among the half-leavened heathen of Ravenna (Serm. 155); regulating the lenten fast (Serm. 166); and correcting the habit of catechumens deferring their baptism (Serm. 10, 59). During the early progress of the Eutylian coutrovcrsy, A.D. 449, a letter was addressed to Chrysologus, in common with the occupants of all the principal sees of the West, by Eutyches himself, remonstrating against his condemnation by Flavian of Constantinople, and seeking to stir up all the Western bishops against him. Chrysologus's reply, which is extant among the acts of the council of Chalcedon (Labbe, Concil. iv. 35, cf. the notes of Binius, ib. 992), expresses the sorrow with which he has received Eutyches's letter, and exhorts him to submit to the decision of the see of Peter, as declared in the Encyclical of Leo, since "the blessed Peter lives and presides in his own cathedra, and gives the true faith to all who seek for it." That Chrysologus died either this or the following year is plain from the 37th letter of Leo, addressed to his successor.

In the 176 sermons still extant we look in vain for any traces of the golden eloquence to which he owed his surname. They are very short, written in brief simple sentences; his meaning is always clear, and his language natural; but there is nothing in any of them calculated to touch the heart, or move the affections. His fame as a preacher must have evidently depended much more on his voice and manner than on the matter of his discourses. His sermons are almost without exception on subjects taken from the gospels, usually on the parables and miracles: he begins by explaining his text in a plain common-sense way, and goes on to draw moral reflections, in which we find neither theology nor eloquence. The series commences with a course of six on the prodigal son. Many other works are ascribed to Chrysologus, including commentaries on scripture, and letters against the Arians. These have all perished by fire, partly in the siege of Imola, by Theodoric, c. A.D. 524; partly in the conflagration of the archbishop's library at Ravenna, c. A.D. 700.

CHRYSOPHORA, a correspondent of Dionysius of Corinth, "a most faithful sister" (Eus. iv. 23). The letter is not extant. [E. B. B.]

CHRYSORETES, chamberlain of the emperor Theodosius II. (reigned A.D. 408-450). He was exceedingly powerful, and opposed to the Catholic party. It is thought that he was the chamberlain who had in A.D. 433 asked for all the writings of Cyril of Alexandria. About that time Cyril wished the empress Pulcheria to introduce Lausus into the palace, and to give him the place of Chrysoretos, in consequence of his influence and hostility. (Labbe, Concil. vii. 909 b; Tillemont, xi. p. 527; Ceillier, viii. 294.) [W. M. S.]

CHRYSOSTOM, JOHN. (Ἰωάννης Χρυσόστομος.) The surname "golden-mouthed," given to the great preacher of Antioch, and bishop of Constantinople, on account of the magnificent brilliancy of his eloquence (cf. Petrus Chrysologus), has entirely superseded his personal name of John, which alone is found in contemporary or closely subsequent writers. When the epithet was first applied is unknown. There is no trace of it in his lifetime, but it was in common use before the end of the fifth century.

Chrysostom, as throughout this article we shall call him, was born at Antioch towards the middle of the fourth century. The precise date of his birth is uncertain, but it may be fixed with some probability in A.D. 347. He was of good birth. His father Secundus was an officer high in command, filling the post of "magister militum" (στρατηγός), one of the eight who commanded the imperial armies, who, according to Vegetius, were all men of distinguished rank — illustres viros (Veget. de Re militari, ii. 9). His mother Anthusa, was also a lady of good family (Pallad. p. 40; Socr. vi. 3). Secundus died while his son was yet an infant. Anthusa was left a widow at the age of twenty, but she steadily refused all offers of marriage, and devoted herself to watching over the education of her boy, and the care of the property which was to be his (De Sacerdot. lib. i. c. 55). Anthusa was no common woman. She was a Christian from the bottom of her heart, and her chief object was to train her son to God's service, and to keep him unspotted by the contaminations of the luxurious and profligate city of Antioch. Anthusa's unremitting devotion to her maternal duties excited universal admiration. Her son himself informs us that when he began to attend the lectures of one of the Antiochene professors, probably Libanius, who was still a heathen, his master on learning that he was the son of a widow forty years of age, who twenty years before had lost her husband while still in the flower of her youth, and had remained unmarried, exclaimed "Good heavens! what women these Christians have" (Epist. ad Vid. Jun. i. c. 2, p. 340). The church owes no common debt of reverential gratitude to the memory of Anthusa, who deserves to be placed in the very first rank of Christian mothers, with Monica the mother of St. Augustine, Nonna the mother of St. Gregory Nazianzen, and Osburh the mother of king Alfred. Chrysostom had a sister born before himself, but as there is no further reference to her she probably died in early childhood (Pallad. p. 40).

St. Chrysostom's life may be conveniently divided into five epochs. (a) His life as a layman at Antioch till his baptism and admission as a reader, A.D. 347-370; (b) his ascetic and monastic life, A.D. 370-381; (c) his career as deacon, presbyter and preacher at Antioch, A.D. 381-398; (d) his episcopate at Constantinople, A.D. 398-404; (e) exile, A.D. 404-407.

(a) Life as a layman at Antioch.—The intellectual power manifested by Chrysostom at a very early age marked him out as fitted for one of the learned professions. The bar was chosen, and at the age of eighteen or thereabout he began to attend the lectures of the celebrated sophist Libanius, the intimate friend and correspondent of the emperor Julian, and tutor of Basil the Great, who after his various sojourns as a professor at Athens and Constantinople and other chief cities of the Eastern world had come to end his days in his native city of Antioch. The genius and ability of the pupil excited the greatest admiration in his master. A panegyric on Constantine and his sons, composed by him as a literary effort, received his highest commendations (Isid. Pelusiot. lib. ii. Ep. 42). Sozomen records that when on his deathbed, about A.D. 395, being asked by his friends which of his pupils he thought worthiest to succeed him, Libanius replied, "John; if the Christians had not stolen him from us" (Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 2). The name of another of his teachers, Andragathius, who instructed him in philosophy, of whom nothing further is known, is preserved to us by Socrates and Sozomen. On the completion of his education Chrysostom commenced practice as an advocate. His gift of eloquence speedily displayed itself. His speeches were listened to with delight, and were highly praised by Libanius, no mean judge of rhetoric. A brilliant career was opening before the young man, leading to all that men most covet, wealth, fame, high place. But a change, gradual but mighty, came over his spirit, and like another young student of the neighbouring province of Cilicia, "the things that were gain to him he counted loss for Christ." Like Timothy at the knees of Eunice, "from a child" Chrysostom had learnt from his devout mother the things that were "able to make him wise unto salvation," and his soul revolted at the contrast between the purity of the gospel standard, and the baseness of the aims and viciousness of the practices prevalent in the profession he had chosen. To accept a fee for making the worse appear the better cause seemed to his generous and guileless soul to be bribed to lie—to take Satan's wages—to sin against his own soul. His disinclination to the life of a lawyer was much increased by the influence of the example of his intimate friend, Basil, the companion of his studies, and the sharer of all his thoughts and plans. The two friends had agreed to follow the same profession; but when Basil decided on adopting a monastic life, and to follow, in Chrysostom's words, "the true philosophy," Chrysostom was unable at once to resolve to renounce the world, to the attractions of which his ardent nature was by no means insensible, and of which he was in some danger of becoming a slave. In his own words he was "a never-failing attendant at the law courts, and was passionately enamoured of the theatre" (De Sacerdot. lib. i. c. 14, p. 363). Basil's adoption of an ascetic life at first caused an interruption of the intercourse of the two friends. But life was intolerable separated from his second self. He renewed his intimacy with Basil, by whose influence the desire to lead a religious life was rekindled. The pleasures and pursuits of the world became distasteful to him, and he soon conceived the resolution of abandoning it altogether, quitting his mother and his home, and finding some sacred retreat where he and his friend could devote themselves to strict asceticism (ibid. c. 4). This decisive change—Chrysostom's conversion we should now call it—was greatly promoted by the acquaintance he formed at this period with the mild and holy Meletius, the orthodox and legitimate bishop of Antioch, who had recently returned to his see after one of his many banishments for the faith. Meletius quickly observed the intellectual promise of the young lawyer, and enamoured of the beauty of his disposition, he sought frequent opportunities of intercourse, and in a prophetic spirit declared the greatness of his future career (Pallad. p. 40). Up to this time Chrysostom, though the child of Christian parents, according to a not unfrequent practice at this epoch, had remained unbaptized. The time for public profession of his faith was now come, and after a period of probation of three years, Meletius baptized him, and ordained him to the office of reader. This was in A.D. 369 or 370, when Chrysostom was about twenty-three years old (Pallad. p. 41).

(b) Ascetic and Monastic Life.—The baptism of Chrysostom restored the balance which he tells us had been so seriously disturbed by Basil's higher religious attainments (De Sacerdot. lib. i. c. 3, p. 363). He became in the truest sense "a new man." From the hour of his baptism, says Palladius, "he neither swore, nor defamed any one, nor spoke falsely, nor cursed, nor even tolerated facetious jokes" (Pallad. p. 184). His desire to flee from the world, with his beloved Basil, was established, and was only frustrated by the passionate entreaties of his weeping mother that her only child, for whom she had given up all, would not desert her. The whole scene, to which we can only allude here, is narrated by Chrysostom with great dramatic power in a passage of exquisite simplicity and tenderness (De Sacerdot. lib. i. c. 5, pp. 363–365). The affectionate nature of Chrysostom was not one that could resist a mother's tears. In spite of Basil's continued urgency, he yielded so far as to consent to remain at home. But in all other respects his resolution was unchanged. If out of filial regard he abstained from deserting his home for a monastery, he would make a monastery of his home. He practised the most rigid asceticism. He ate little and seldom, and of the plainest food. He slept on the bare ground, and rose frequently for prayer. He rarely left the house, and lest he should fall back into his habit of slander, he kept almost unbroken silence. It is not surprising that his former associates should have called him morose and unsociable (De Sacerdot. lib. vi. c. 12, p. 431).

Upon some of these associates, however, his influence began to tell. Two of his fellow pupils under Libanius, Maximus, afterwards bishop of Seleucia [MAXIMUS], and Theodore, bishop of Mopsuestia [THEODORUS OF MOPSUESTIA], adopted the ascetic life under the superintendence of Diodorus [DIODORUS OF TARSUS] and Carterius [CARTERIUS], who presided over a monastery in or near Antioch. From Diodorus Chrysostom learnt the clear common-sense mode of interpreting Holy Scripture (repudiating the allegorising principle), of which he and Theodore became such distinguished representatives. The inability of his friend Theodore to part definitively with the world, and stifle natural instincts, was the occasion of the composition of Chrysostom's earliest extant treatises. Theodore was warmly attached to a girl named Hermione, and his love for her led him to leave the ascetic brotherhood and return to his secular life. Chrysostom's heart was deeply stirred at this desertion. He regarded it as a sin to be repented of and forsaken if Theodore would not forfeit his salvation. He therefore addressed two letters to his friend full of impassioned eloquence, earnestly calling him to penitence and amendment. His fervid remonstrances were successful. Theodore gave up his engagement, and finally abandoned the world (ad Theodorum lapsum, Epist. i. ii.; Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 3).

We now come to a passage in Chrysostom's life which we cannot hesitate to condemn as utterly at variance with the principles of truth and honour. While saying this we must bear in mind that the moral standpoint of the Fathers was on this point different from our own. It was generally held that the culpability of an act of deception depended upon its purpose, and that if this was good the deception was laudable. Chrysostom himself says, "there is a good deceit such as many have been deceived by, which one ought not even to call a deceit at all," instancing that of Jacob, "which was not a deceit, but an economy" (Homil. vi. in Coloss. c. ii. v. 8). On this principle, which every healthy conscience now repudiates, Chrysostom proceeded to plan and execute a deliberate fraud to entrap his friend Basil into consecration to the episcopate. The facts were these. Several sees were vacant in Syria which it was desirable to fill without delay. A body of prelates met at Antioch for this purpose. Among those suitable for the episcopate, the young friends Chrysostom and Basil were pointed out, though they were not yet even deacons. Chrysostom's awful sense of the weight and responsibility of the priestly office, which breathes in every line of his treatise De Sacerdotio, and of his own unfitness, made him tremble at the idea of ordination. Basil, on the contrary, he considered to be as well qualified as he was unfit, and he was as fully resolved that the church should not lose the services of his friend as he was to avoid ordination himself. While, therefore, he pretended acquiescence in his friend's proposition that they should act in concert, and either both accept or both decline the office sought to be thrust upon them, he secretly resolved to adopt his own line of action, and avoid the dreaded honour by concealment. When the time of consecration arrived, and Basil was seized and carried before the bishops, and like St. Ambrose, and St. Augustine, and St. Martin of Tours, and many others, forced to allow the ordaining hands to be laid upon his reluctant head, Chrysostom was nowhere to be found. To his friend's inquiries the answer was returned that he had already submitted to be consecrated, and that therefore there was no reason for his refusing to comply. When too late Basil discovered the cheat that had been put upon him, and upbraided Chrysostom with his breach of their friendly compact, his complaints were received with bursts of laughter and loud expressions of thankfulness at the success of his plot (De Sacerdot. lib. i. c. 3, p. 365.) [BASILIUS, p. 297.]

Soon after this singular and characteristic passage, A.D. 374, Chrysostom encountered a more formidable peril, his escape from which he ever regarded as a remarkable proof of God's providential care. An imperial decree against the practisers of magical arts was being executed at Antioch with the greatest severity. Even the possession of a magical book, or one ignorantly supposed to be such, might lead to torture, banishment, or death. It happened that Chrysostom, walking with a friend by the side of the Orontes, fished out of the river some leaves of a volume which its owner had flung into the stream. A playful contest for the prize ensued, which changed into horror on its proving to be a book of magic. The terror they felt on discovering its nature was heightened by observing a soldier approaching. What to do with the fatal leaves they knew not. To keep them or to throw them away seemed equally dangerous. At last they flung them back into the water. The soldier's suspicions had not been aroused, and Chrysostom and his companion were allowed to pass on unchallenged (Homil. in Act. Apostol. 38, in fine, vol. ix. p. 326).

Shortly after this romantic event, about A.D. 374, Chrysostom carried into effect his resolution of devoting himself to an ascetic life, and he left his home for a monastic community on one of the mountain ranges to the south of Antioch. As there is no reference in any of his writings to any opposition on the part of his mother, it is not improbable that her death had left him free to follow his bent. Falling in with an old Syrian monk, who practised the strictest asceticism, he made him his model in the severity of his self-discipline (Pallad. p. 41). His writings give us a graphic picture of the difficulty with which a young man accustomed to the easy life of a luxurious city inured himself to the hardships of such a lot (ad Demetr. de Compunct. lib. i. c. 6, vol. i. p. 162). After four years spent in unremitting austerities, not being able entirely to extirpate the instincts of human nature, he left the society of his kind, and, making his home in a cavern in the mountain side, practised still more rigid self-discipline, in exposing himself to the extreme cold of those altitudes, and limiting himself to the smallest portion of food and sleep on which life could subsist (Pallad. p. 41). At the end of two years his health so completely gave way that he was forced to abandon the monastic career, and forsaking "the life of angels" for that of men, return with shattered constitution to his home in Antioch. To the austerities of these six years may doubtless be attributed that debilitated frame, weakness of digestion, and irritability of temperament, to which not only his constantly recurring physical sufferings, but many of his chief difficulties and calamities are not remotely traceable.

(c) Career as a Preacher and Presbyter at Antioch.—It is needless to say that Chrysostom did not return to Antioch to be idle. He was ordained deacon by Meletius A.D. 381, shortly before the latter left to preside over the Oecumenical Council of Constantinople (Pallad. p. 42). Meletius died during the session of the council, and it was left to his successor Flavian to raise Chrysostom to the presbyterate in the early part of A.D. 386 (Pallad. ibid.). During his five years' diaconate he had gained great popularity by his aptness to teach, and the elevating influence of his intercourse and conversation had made itself widely felt at Antioch. He also pursued his career as an author. While deacon he composed the treatise De Virginitate (vol. i. pp. 328-411); the Epistola ad Viduam Juniram (ib. pp. 413-427), addressed to the young widow of Theodorus (c. 381); together with its sequel de non iterando Conjugio (ib. pp. 427-439); and the orations de Martyre Babylas (vol. ii. pp. 634-689). After his ordination he preached his first sermon in the presence of the bishop, and a vast crowd gathered by the general report of his eloquence. The sermon, like most first sermons, is a somewhat formal and laboured discourse, encumbered by rhetorical ornament, and characterised by more of self-depreciation, and extravagant laudation of Flavian and Meletius than would please now (Sermo, cum Presbyt. fuit Ordinatus, de se ac de Episcopo, deque populi mul- titudine, ibid. pp. 534-542). The succeeding ten years, embracing Chrysostom's life as a presbyter at Antioch, were chiefly devoted to the cultivation of the gift of pulpit eloquence on which his celebrity mainly rests. It was during this period that "the great clerk and godly preacher," as our First Homily terms him, delivered the greater part of the discourses extant, which however must be but a very small portion of those actually preached. Their number must have been enormous, for he preached regularly twice a week, on Saturday and Sunday, besides Lent and saints' days. We learn from his homilies on Genesis that he sometimes occupied the pulpit five days in succession (Tillemont, tom. xi. p. 34).

Flavian was so well satisfied with his sermons that he at once opened the cathedral pulpit to him, and appointed him one of the most frequent preachers there. Whenever he preached the church was densely thronged, the hearers testifying their delight in loud and noisy applause. This conduct was highly offensive to Chrysostom, who often rebuked their unseemly behaviour. Pickpockets found so favourable a field in these crowded congregations, rapt in admiration of the eloquent preacher, that Chrysostom had occasion to recommend his auditors to leave their purses behind them (Adv. Arian. de Incompreh. Dei Natura, Homil. iii. c. 7, p. 471; Homil. iv. § 6, p. 480).

The most remarkable series of homilies delivered by him, containing his grandest oratorical flights, and which evinced most strikingly his power over the minds and passions of men, are those known as the Homilies on the Statues, delivered in March and April, A.D. 387, while the fate of Antioch was hanging in awful suspense on the will of the justly offended emperor Theodosius. The demand of a large subsidy to provide for the payment of a liberal donative to the army had exasperated the citizens. The ominous silence with which the proclamation of the edict was received, Feb. 26, broken only by the wailings of the women, was soon succeeded by mutinous cries, and all the symptoms of a popular outbreak. The passions of the mob were stimulated by those designing wretches, never absent from public disturbances, who have nothing to lose, and may gain from the relaxation of the bonds of order. The influence of Flavian might have calmed the tumult, but he was from home. The rabble, swelling in numbers and fury as it rushed through the city, proceeded to acts of open violence. The public baths were ransacked; the praetorium was attacked and the mob with difficulty repulsed, the governor saving himself by flight through a back door, and finally the hall of judgment was stormed. This was the scene of their crowning act of insurrection. The portraits of the emperors, which decorated the walls of the court, were pelted with stones and filth, and torn to shreds, the Augusti themselves were loaded with curses, and the statues of Theodosius and his deceased wife, the excellent Flacilla, were torn from their pedestals, and ignominiously dragged through the streets. Further outrages were only stopt by the appearance of a band of archers despatched by the prefect. The mutiny quelled, calm reflection set before them the probable consequences of this recent fury. Panic fear, as is usual, succeeded the popular madness. The fierce outbursts of unrestrained passion, to which the emperor was subject, were well known. The insult to his beloved empress would be certain to be keenly resented, and terribly avenged. It was only too probable that an edict would be issued for the destruction of Antioch or for the massacre of its inhabitants, foreshadowing that of Thessalonica, which three years later struck horror into the Christian world. Their only hope lay in the intercession of Flavian, who, regardless of his age and the serious illness of his sister, had instantly started for the imperial city, to lay at the emperor's feet the confession of his people and to supplicate for pardon. This is not the place to record the subsequent proceedings at Antioch,—the arrival of the imperial commissioners, the daily arrests of guilty or suspected parties, the examinations by torture, the terror of the citizens, their preparations for flight, or the intervention of the monks, who, pouring down from the mountain solitudes, boldly demanded the acquittal of the city—our attention is concentrated on Chrysostom, who, day by day, during this terrible period of suspense, lasting for three weeks, devoted his noblest gifts as a sacred orator to allay the fears and revive the hopes of the panic-stricken citizens, and with holy skill sought to awaken repentance, and enforce amendment of life among the fickle and dissolute crowds who were hanging on his impassioned words. The forum was deserted; the theatres and circuses were empty; but the church was always thronged. It is noted as an unusual circumstance that people even came to hear after dinner. Never did a great emergency find a man better qualified to take advantage of it for the highest purposes (Homil. ad Pop. Antioch. iv. c. 1, vol. ii. p. 57). The issue of the affair, with its many picturesque attendant circumstances, belongs to the history of the period. We have only to record how this master of human hearts, who had consoled the inhabitants under the prospect of the degradation of their city and the closing of their baths and circus, and had strengthened them amid the fluctuations of hope and fear, with equal wisdom taught them how to moderate their joy, when, just before Easter, Flavian returned bringing the glad tidings that the emperor's wrath was appeased and their crime pardoned, as well as how to make this unhopèd-for deliverance from imminent destruction the occasion of lasting spiritual benefit. The homily delivered by Chrysostom on Easter day (the 21st of the series), in which he describes the interview of Flavian with Theodosius, the prelate's moving appeal for clemency and forbearance, and its immediate effect on the impressionable mind of the emperor in the granting of a complete amnesty and urging Flavian's instant return to relieve the Antiochenes from their terrible suspense, affords a worthy close to this most remarkable historical passage, illustrating vividly Chrysostom's power as a sacred orator. One happy result of this crisis was the conversion of a large number of the still heathen population to Christianity. Chrysostom speaks, in one of his homilies, of the labour imposed on him after Flavian's return, of accurately grounding in the faith those who, in consequence of the calamity, "had deserted from the side of Gentile error" (Homil. de Anna. I. c. 1, vol. iv. p. 812).

his labour as a preacher and teacher at Antioch, during which time he composed the greater part of his commentaries on Holy Scripture. To this period may be assigned his commentaries on Genesis and the Psalms, on the Gospels of St. Matthew and St. John, the Acts, the Epistles to the Romans, Corinthians, Galatians, and Ephesians. Those on Timothy i., ii., Titus, and on the other Epistles of St. Paul, are considered by Tillemont to have been certainly delivered at Constantinople (Tillemont, Mém. Eccles. tom. xi. pp. 92-97, 370-376).

(d) Episcopate of Constantinople.—The close of the year A.D. 397 saw the termination of Chrysostom's residence at Antioch. In September of that year the bishop of Constantinople, the amiable and indolent Nectarius, died. The place he left vacant was one of the most dignified and influential in the church. Public expectation was excited as to his successor. The nomination to the see rested virtually with the prime minister of the day, the eunuch Eutropius, the contemptible favourite of the feeble Arcadius, who had inherited a power he was utterly incapable of wielding on the death of his father, Theodosius, the last Roman emperor worthy of the name, A.D. 395 (EUTROPIUS). Eutropius, passing by the numerous candidates for the episcopal seat, who were urging their claims with indecent importunity, determined to elevate one who had no thought of being a candidate at all, the great preacher John of Antioch, of whose eloquence he had had personal experience, during a recent visit to Antioch on state business. His name was received with delight by the electing prelates, and he was at once unanimously accepted. The only difficulty lay with Chrysostom himself, and the people of Antioch. The double danger of a decided "nolo episcopari" on Chrysostom's part, and of a public commotion, when the Antiochenes heard of the intention of robbing them of their favourite preacher, was overcome by stratagem. Asterius, the "Comes Orientis," in accordance with secret instructions received from Eutropius, induced Chrysostom to accompany him to a martyrs' chapel outside the city walls. There he was apprehended by the officers of the government, and conveyed to Pagrae, the first post station on the road to Constantinople. His remonstrances were unheeded; his inquiries met with obstinate silence. Placed in a public chariot, and hurried on under a military escort from stage to stage, the 800 miles traversed with the utmost despatch, the future bishop reached his imperial see a closely guarded prisoner. However unwelcome the dignity thrust upon him was, Chrysostom, knowing that resistance was useless, felt it more dignified to submit without further struggle. He was consecrated Feb. 26, A.D. 398. Theophilus, the patriarch of Alexandria, was the consecrating prelate. The duty was very unwelcome, for he had left no stone unturned to secure the nomination of Isidore, a presbyter of Alexandria, who had been his confidant in some not very creditable transactions. Nothing but the menace of Eutropius, that if he refused to consecrate Chrysostom he would bring him to trial on charges the proofs of which he held in his hand, overcame his resolution. Theophilus yielded, nursing his revenge for a more convenient season. Chrysostom was consecrated Feb. 26, A.D. 398, in the presence of a vast multitude, assembled not only to witness the ceremony, but also to listen to the inaugural sermon of one of whose eloquence they had heard so much. This "sermo enthronisticus" is lost (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 2; Sozom. H. E. lib. viii. c. 2; Pallad. p. 42).

Constantinople was not long in discerning the difference between the character of the new bishop and his predecessor. To one trained in habits of the strictest asceticism, accustomed to few and frugal meals, averse to pomp and display of every kind, shunning society, and devoted to the duties of his sacred calling, nothing could be more distasteful than the luxury and magnificence of Nectarius and his predecessors. He at once dis furnished the episcopal residence, and disposed of the costly plate and rich equipment for the benefit of the poor and the hospitals of the city (Pallad. pp. 46, 47). Instead of giving grand banquets to the laity, or dining at their tables, he ate the simplest fare in his solitary chamber (Pallad. pp. 101-102). Unless duty compelled, he studiously avoided the court and association with the great, and even ordinary conversation he unequivocally shewed to be a tax on his time and attention, which he would escape if he could (Ibid. pp. 103, 120-123). Such behaviour could hardly fail to be misunderstood and misrepresented. To the populace, accustomed to the splendour of former bishops, Chrysostom's simplicity appeared unworthy of his lofty station, while he was openly charged with parsimony, moroseness, and pride (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 4, Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 9).

Nor was the contrast with his predecessor more acceptable to the generality of his clergy. The moral tone of the clerical order in Constantinople was far from elevated; their standard of duty was low and perfunctory; worldliness, avarice, flattery of the great, prevailed; and even graver faults were common. A thorough reform was needed. Chrysostom, with uncompromising zeal, attempted to bring back his clergy to simplicity of life, and to rouse them to activity in their calling. He deposed some on charges of homicide and adultery, and repelled others from the Eucharist. He set his face resolutely against the perilous custom of receiving "spiritual sisters" (συγγεμιστραι), which was frequently the source of the grossest immoralities. To obviate the attractions of the Arians who at night and at early dawn gathered large crowds by their antiphonal hymns under porticoes and in the open air, as well as for the benefit of those who were unable to attend the church in the day, he revived the old custom of nocturnal services with responsive chanting, to the indignation of those clergy to whom their own ease was dearer than the spiritual improvement of their flocks (Pallad. p. 47; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 8; Homil. in Acta, 26, c. 3, p. 212). The disciplinary measures instituted were rendered more unpopular by the want of a conciliatory manner, coupled with irritability of temper, and no small obstinacy in dealing with his clergy (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 3, 21; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 3). He was too much swayed also by his archdeacon, Serapion, a proud, violent man, who is reported to have exclaimed at an assembly of the clergy, "You will never be able, bishop, to master these mutinous priests unless you drive them before you with a single rod" (Pallad. 18, 19; Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 4; Sozom. lib. viii. c. 9).

But while his relations with his clergy were becoming increasingly embittered, he stood high in favour with the people, who flocked to his sermons, and drank in with greedy ears his vehement denunciations of the follies and vices of the clergy and the aristocracy (Socr. u. s. c. 4, 5). He was no less popular with Arcadius and his lovely but imperious empress, the Frankish general's daughter, Eudoxia, who was beginning to supplant the author of her elevation, the eunuch Eutropius, and to make her feeble partner bow to her more powerful will. For a time the bishop and the empress, who afterwards waged so uncompromising an hostility, vied with one another in expressions of mutual admiration and esteem. An occasion for the public manifestation of this common feeling was offered towards the latter part of A.D. 398, not long after Chrysostom had taken possession of his see, by the remarkable ceremony of the nocturnal translation of the relics of some anonymous martyrs from the great church to the martyrdom of St. Thomas, on the seashore at Drypia, about nine miles from the city, which the empress had instituted in a fit of religious excitement. So lengthened was the procession, including persons of all classes and of both sexes, and so brilliant the torches, that Chrysostom compares it to a river of fire. The empress herself in her royal diadem and purple, attended by nobles and ladies of distinction, walked by the side of the bishop, in the rear of the chest enclosing the sacred bones. It was dawn before the church was reached and Chrysostom began his sermon. It was full of extravagant laudations of Eudoxia and of ecstatic expressions of joy, which afterwards formed a ground of accusation against him. (Homil. dicta postquam reliquie, &c. vol. xii. pp. 468-473.) The next day the emperor with his court visited the shrine, and, laying aside his diadem, revered the holy martyrs. After the departure of Arcadius Chrysostom delivered a second enthusiastic homily in praise of his piety and humility (Homil. dicta præsente Imperatore, ibid. pp. 474-480).

At the same period the largeness of Chrysostom's heart and the sincerity of his Christian love was manifested by his care for the spiritual state of the Goths, who were becoming numerous at Constantinople. Some were Catholics, but the majority were Arians. He had portions of the Bible translated into their vernacular, which were read by a Gothic presbyter to his countrymen assembled in the church of St. Paul, and this presbyter afterwards addressed them in their own tongue (Homil. 8, vol. xii. pp. 512-526). Chrysostom himself not infrequently preached to the Goths by an interpreter. He ordained native readers, deacons, and presbyters, and despatched missionaries to the Gothic tribes who still remained in their original seats on the banks of the Danube, and consecrated a bishop from among themselves named Unilas (Theodoret, H. E. lib. v. c. 30; Epist. xiv., c. vii.). Having learnt that the nomad Scythian tribes on the banks of the Danube were desirous of being instructed in the faith he at once despatched missionaries to them, and corresponded with Leontius, bishop of Ancyra, with regard to the selection of able men from his diocese for this work (Theod. H. E. lib. v. c. 31). In his zeal for the suppression of pagan idolatry he obtained an imperial edict, A.D. 399, for the destruction of the temples in Phœnicia, which was carried into effect at the cost of some of the Christian ladies of Constantinople, who also supplied funds for missionary exertions in that country (Theod. H. E. lib. v. c. 29). These efforts for the propagation of the faith were very dear to Chrysostom's heart, and even during his exile he continued by letter to superintend and direct them (Epist. 53, 54, 123, 126). He endeavoured to crush false doctrine wherever it was making head. Having learnt that the Marcionite heresy was infecting the diocese of Cyrus he wrote to the then bishop, desiring him to expel it, and offering to help him in putting in force the imperial edicts for that purpose. He thus evidenced, in the words of Theodoret, that, like St. Paul, he bore in his heart "the care of all the churches" (ibid. c. 31).

The fall of the contemptible Eutropius succeeded at no distant interval the elevation of his episcopal nominee, A.D. 399. He had hoped to have had a subservient bishop, ready to lend him his important aid whenever he might demand it. Chrysostom's uncompromising honesty speedily shewed him his mistake. Not only did Chrysostom refuse to countenance his nefarious designs, but he denounced from the pulpit with unsparing fidelity the vices with which his life was stained. The implacable enmity thus excited might have proved perilous for Chrysostom had not his insolent treatment of the empress Eudoxia aroused a foe even more fatal to himself. Passing over here the various stages of the favourite's downfall (EUTROPIUS), it is enough to say that the unhappy man, hurled in a moment from the pinnacle of his greatness, was compelled to appeal to the law of sanctuary which he himself had abrogated, and took refuge in the church. To the clamorous demands of the soldiers and the raging populace that their victim should be given up to them, Chrysostom opposed a courageous refusal. The indignation of Eutropius's pursuers was turned to the bishop, who was marched off like a prisoner between two rows of spearmen to the palace to lay the matter before the emperor. He had little difficulty in working on the feelings of the impressionable Arcadius, from whom he obtained the promise that Eutropius' sentence should be commuted to banishment. The next day was Sunday, and Chrysostom delivered a magnificent harangue on the instability of fortune, pointing the application by the spectacle displayed through the curtains of the bema of the fallen minister crouching before the holy table to which he clung with a convulsive grasp. Chrysostom's eloquence had succeeded for that time in saving the life of Eutropius. But whether deceived by treachery, or hoping to find a safer retreat, in a few days he left the church, was seized and conveyed to Cyprus as a place of exile, whence he was in a few days brought back and beheaded at Chalcedon. (*Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 5; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 7; Philost. H. E. lib. xi. c. 6; Zosimus, lib. v. c. 18; Chrys. Homil. in Eutrop. vol. iii. pp. 454-460; De Capto Eutrop. ibid. pp. 460-482.*)

In his dealings with the commander of the Gothic troops, Gainas, the eloquence of Chrysostom gained another triumph. Elated at his success in ruining Eutropius, and presuming on the strength of his army, which a nod from him would have turned loose like a pack of hungry wolves to pillage Constantinople, early in A.D. 400 Gainas, the haughty Goth, demanded the surrender of three of the leading ministers, Aurelianus the consul, Saturninus, and Count John, the empress's chief favourite. To relieve the emperor of his embarrassment, they surrendered themselves to Gainas. Their lives were in extreme danger. Chrysostom lost no time in resorting to Gainas' camp, and pleading the cause of the hostages, as well as in endeavouring to persuade the Goth to lessen his extravagant demands to be made consul and commander-in-chief, which would have placed the emperor at his mercy. But however anxious to conciliate Gainas, on one point he was resolute. No misbeliever should worship within the walls of the imperial city. Haughtily as Gainas had urged his claim for one of the churches of Constantinople for Arian worship, and reasonable as in many respects the plea was, Chrysostom's conjoined eloquence and spiritual authority overpowered him, and he desisted for a time at least in pressing his demand (Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 4; Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 6; Theod. H. E. lib. v. c. 32, 33; Chrys. Homil. cum Saturninus et Aurel. &c. vol. iii. pp. 482-487). The sequel of these events belongs rather to general history. The emperor, as a last resort, declared Gainas a public enemy; the inhabitants of the city, awakened at last to the danger of a general pillage, rose against the Goths; a general massacre ensued, and Gainas himself was forced to seek safety in flight (Zosim. lib. v. c. 18-22).

At this epoch the power and popularity of Chrysostom may be said to have reached its culminating point. We have now to trace its swift and complete decline. The author of his overthrow was the empress Eudoxia. Her short-lived religious zeal had burnt itself out, and when she found that Chrysostom was too clear-sighted to be imposed upon by the outward show of piety, and too uncompromising to connive at wrong doing even in the highest places, and that not even her rank as empress could save her and her associates from public censure, her former seeming attachment was changed into the most implacable enmity. Jealousy of his influence over Arcadius contributed its share to her growing aversion. The fall of Eutropius and Gainas had removed her two most formidable rivals in power. Chrysostom was now the only obstacle to her obtaining undisputed supremacy over her imbecile husband, and through him over the Eastern world. Means must be found to get rid of this obstacle also. Nor was the opportunity long in presenting itself. Chrysostom himself afforded it in his excess of zeal for the purity of the church, by overstepping his episcopal jurisdiction, not then so strictly defined as in modern dioceses. Properly speaking the bishop of Constantinople had no jurisdiction in Asia Minor, or indeed anywhere beyond the limits of his own city and diocese. For Constantinople, as a city whose imperial dignity was of modern creation, was not a metropolitan see, but was subject ecclesiastically to the metropolitan of Heraclea (otherwise Perinthus), who was exarch of the province of Thrace. The claims of Heraclea becoming antiquated, the prelates of Alexandria, as the first of the Eastern churches, gradually assumed metropolitan rights over Byzantium. But subjection to any other see was soon felt to be inconsistent with the dignity of an imperial city, and by the third canon of the Oecumenical council held within its walls, A.D. 381, its bishop was declared second to the bishop of Rome, after him coming the metropolitans of Alexandria and Antioch. But this precedence was simply honorary, and although Nectarius had set the precedent followed by Chrysostom of exercising jurisdiction in the Thracian and Asiatic dioceses, the right might at any time be called in question, nor did it receive legal authority until the council of Chalcedon (can. 28). It was therefore as the bishop of the imperial city, in constant association with the emperor and the ruling powers of the state, as well as from his personal capacity as a man of energy and ability, able and willing to discuss and apply the remedies required by ecclesiastical abuses, that Chrysostom held his visitation of the churches of Asia Minor, which was the first step towards his overthrow. The circumstances were briefly these. At a conference of bishops held at Constantinople in the spring of A.D. 400, Eusebius of Valentinopolis accused his brother bishop, Antoninus of Ephesus, of selling ordination to bishoprics, melting down the church plate for his own benefit, and other grave offences (Pallad. p. 126). A delegation was despatched to Asia to investigate these charges. Many dishonest and vexatious delays occurred, and the accused party died before any decision could be arrived at (Ibid. pp. 130-133). The Ephesian clergy and the bishops of the circuit entreated Chrysostom to come to their rescue, and apply his healing hand to the wounds and diseases of the church. Prompt at the call of duty, Chrysostom, though it was the depth of winter (January 401), and he was in very feeble health, crossed the Bosphorus and proceeded to Ephesus. On his arrival he exercised metropolitan authority, deposing six bishops convicted of simony, and correcting with unsparing hand the venality and licentiousness of the clergy, which had become painfully apparent during the visitation which he undertook of the provinces (Ibid. pp. 134-135; Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 10; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 6). The excessive severity of his disciplinary measures did not reconcile the reluctant ecclesiastics to the questionable authority from which they proceeded, nor were they indisposed when the day of retribution came to swell the roll of his accusers. Chrysostom was more than a quarter of a year away from Constantinople. The results of this protracted absence were disastrous. He had entrusted his episcopal authority to Severian, bishop of Gabala, who basely abused his trust to undermine Chrysostom's influence with the emperor and empress and the leading personages at court. Severian was an adroit flatterer, and knew well how to play upon the weaknesses of those with whom it was his interest to stand well. The cabal against Chrysostom, which was rapidly forming, was headed by the empress and her favourite ladies, of whose extravagance of attire, and attempts to enhance their personal charms, the bishop had spoken in terms of contemptuous ridicule, and among whom the wealthy and licentious widows, Marsa, Castricia, and Euphrosinia, "who used for the ruin of their souls the property their husbands had gained by extortion" (Pallad. pp. 35, 66), were conspicuous. This cabal received an important accession by the arrival of two bishops from Palestine, Antiochus of Ptolemais, and the greyhaired Acacius of Beroea, the latter not at all displeased at the prospect of fulfilling his undignified threat, when dissatisfied with the hospitality of the episcopal palace, "I'll season his soup for him" (Pallad. 49). [ACACIUS; ANTIQCHUS.] Serapion, Chrysostom's irascible archdeacon, had kept his master informed of Severian's base proceedings, and continually urged the necessity of his speedy return. His return was the signal for the outbreak of open hostilities, which Chrysostom's vehement and unguarded language in the pulpit could not fail to exasperate. In his first sermon preached after his return, he openly denounced Severian and Antiochus as flatterers and parasites. "You have become the town-talk; your conduct is as good as a play." A few days later his language was still more perilously rash. Having chosen his text from the history of Elijah, he exclaimed, "Gather together to me those base priests that eat at Jezebel's table, that I may say to them, as Elijah of old, 'How long halt ye between two opinions? . . . If Jezebel's table be the Table of the Lord eat at it; eat at it till you vomit'" (Pallad. p. 74). This allusion was too clear to be mistaken. He had called the empress Jezebel. The insult could not be brooked by the haughty Eudoxia, and from that moment the doom of Chrysostom was sealed. But until the plot was ripe it was necessary to keep up the semblance of friendship, and even of deference, towards one with whom ecclesiastical authority rested and who could still make it felt. Some half-heard words of Severian, uttered in annoyance at Serapion's discourtesy, were distorted by the archdeacon into a blasphemous denial of Christ's Divinity. (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 10; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 10.) The charge was rashly credited by Chrysostom, who, without further inquiry, proceeded to the sentence of excommunication and banishment from Constantinople. Chrysostom was still the idol of the common people. The news spread that Severian had insulted their bishop, and Severian's life would have been in danger had he not speedily fled to Chalcedon, and put the Bosphorus between himself and the enraged mob. All the authority of the emperor and the passionate entreaties of the empress, who went so far as to place her infant son on Chrysostom's knees in the Church of the Apostles as an irresistible plea for yielding to her petition, were needed to extort Severian's forgiveness, and obtain the assurance of reconciliation from his incensed bishop. The favour of the populace was not so easily recovered. Chrysostom was compelled to intercede for him with them (Homil. de recipiendo Severiano, vol. iii. pp. 492-494), and the semblance of peace was restored. (Soer. Soz. u. s.)

The secret intrigues, though checked for the time, soon broke out afresh. The allusion to Jezebel could not be forgiven by Eudoxia. Severian was equally implacable for his wrongs. The clergy were eager to do anything to rid themselves of one, who, in the words of Palladius, "like a lamp burning before sore eyes," was intolerable from the brilliancy of his virtues. All they wanted was a powerful leader, and the organisation would be complete and ready for action.

Such a leader was presented to them in Theophilus, bishop of Alexandria, who had been watching for an opportunity of revenge ever since he had been unwillingly compelled to consecrate Chrysostom. A pretext for his interference in the ecclesiastical affairs of Constantinople was afforded by the kindness and hospitality shewn by Chrysostom and his faithful adherents to some unhappy Egyptian monks, known from their remarkable stature as "the Tall Brethren," whom Theophilus had treated with great injustice and cruelty, nominally on account of their adherence to Origenistic views, but really because they were privy to the avarice and other vices with which his character was stained (Isid. Pelusiote. Epi-t. i. 142). Beaten, pillaged, driven from their monastic homes in the Nitrian desert, they had taken refuge in Palestine. But the unresting hatred of Theophilus had pursued them there, and they were fain to embark for Constantinople and appeal to the emperor and archbishop for protection. Chrysostom received them kindly, manifested sympathy in their sufferings, and wrote in their behalf to Theophilus. The reply of the latter was an indignant remonstrance against protecting heretics, and interfering in the affairs of another diocese. With this letter he despatched emissaries to accuse the "Tall Brethren" before the emperor, and to disseminate the charge of sorcery in the city. Chrysostom had earnestly dissuaded the fugitives from appealing to the civil powers, and had warned them that if they did so he should cease to act as their protector. But the public contumely with which they were treated in the streets exasperated them, and they claimed the right of prosecuting their defamers. (Pallad. pp. 51-62; Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 7, 9; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 12, 13.) A personal appeal to Eudoxia secured for them what they desired. Theophilus was summoned to appear before a council to be held for the investigation of the whole case of the Nitrian monks, while their calumniators were called upon to substantiate their charges or to suffer punishment. Theophilus had no choice but to obey the imperial summons. But he had devised a scheme for turning the tables upon Chrysostom, and transforming the council summoned that he might give an account of his own conduct into one before which Chrysostom himself might be arraigned. The case of the "Tall Brethren," the ostensible cause of the intended council, was forgotten. The object on which Theophilus's heart was set was the condemnation and deposition of Chrysostom (Pallad. p. 64.) [DIOSCORUS.]

To pave the way for the execution of this monstrous plot Theophilus induced Epiphanius, the venerable bishop of Salamis, to visit Constantinople, with the decrees of a council recently held in Cyprus, by which the tenets of Origen which the Nitrian monks were charged with holding were condemned, and for Chrysostom's signature (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 10-14; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 14). Epiphanius on his arrival petulantly declined the honours and hospitality prepared for him by Chrysostom until his expectant host had formally condemned Origen and expelled "the Tall Brethren." Chrysostom replied that he left both to the coming council, and would not prejudice the matter. The relations between the two prelates were further embittered by the ordination of a deacon by Epiphanius in violation of the canons of the church (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 11). No better success attended Epiphanius's attempt to obtain a condemnation of Origen from the bishops then at Constantinople. An interview with the accused monks, at which he was obliged to acknowledge that he had not read a page of their writings, and had condemned them on hearsay, seems to have opened his eyes to the real character of Theophilus, and the nature of the transaction in which he had become an agent. He refused to take any further share in the designs of Theophilus, and set sail for Cyprus, dying on his voyage or soon after his return. The unchristian wishes attributed to the two bishops at their last interview may be safely regarded as the invention, or at least the exaggeration, of unfriendly historians (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 12-14; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 14, 15).

Shortly after Epiphanius's departure Theophilus arrived at Constantinople. He was accompanied by a body-guard of rough sailors from his own city of Alexandria, laden with costly presents destined for those whom it would be convenient to secure as auxiliaries. He received a vociferous welcome from the crews of the Egyptian corn ships, but the bishops and clergy of the city kept aloof. He refused all communications with Chrysostom, rejected all his offers of hospitality, and, assuming the position of an ecclesiastical superior, not of a defendant about to take his trial, openly declared that he had come to depose Chrysostom for grave offences. The three weeks between his arrival and the commencement of the synod were devoted to ingratiating himself with the influential personages of the city and the disaffected clergy, by flattery, sumptuous banquets, and splendid gifts. Arcadius, probably unaware of the plans of the secret cabal of which his empress was the leading spirit, remonstrated with Chrysostom for his delay in proceeding to Theophilus's trial, which he justified by his unwillingness to usurp a jurisdiction which was not legitimately his. (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 15; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 16; Pallad. 65, 66; Chrys. Epist. ad Innocent. 1.) Theophilus had no such scruples. He assumed as patriarch of Alexandria the supremacy over all Eastern bishops, and claimed the right of summoning Chrysostom as a suffragan before his tribunal. Apprehensive of the well-known popularity of Chrysostom with the lower orders he dared not venture to hold a synod in Constantinople. The place chosen was a suburb of Chalcedon, on the other side of the Bosphorus, known as "the Oak," where was a large church with contiguous buildings for the clergy and monks. Thirty-six bishops, of whom all but seven were Egyptians, Theophilus' suffragans, formed the council. The Asiatic bishops were mainly such as Chrysostom had made his enemies during his recent visitation. None was more hostile than Gerontius of Nicomedia, whom he had deposed. The presidential chair was occupied by the bishop of Hieraclea, as metropolitan. To this packed council, called not to investigate but to condemn, the members of which were at the same time, "judges, accusers, and witnesses" (Phot. cod. 59, ad init.), in the middle of July, A.D. 403, Chrysostom was summoned to answer to a list of charges containing twenty-nine articles drawn up by the Archdeacon John. Many of these were most contemptibly frivolous, others grossly exaggerated, some entirely false. The utmost research of the emissaries despatched by his enemies to Antioch had failed to discover anything on which to ground an accusation in his early career, either as layman or presbyter. The articles had been concocted by two disreputable deacons, as the price of their restoration to holy orders from which they had been deposed for gross crimes by Chrysostom (Pallad. p. 66). They had reference to the administration of his church and the alleged malversation of its funds; to his violent and tyrannical behaviour towards his clergy; to his private habits—"he had private interviews with women"—"he dined gluttonously by himself as a cyclops would eat;" to ritual irregularities—"he robbed and unrobed himself on his episcopal throne, and ate a lozenge after celebration" (Pallad. p. 66), and had violated the rule as to fasting communion;—to his having ordained unworthy persons; and heretical deductions were drawn from some incautious and enthusiastic expressions in the course of his sermons. A second list of charges under eighteen heads was presented by Isaac the monk. In these among other counts the accusation of violence and inhospitality was renewed; he was charged with invading the jurisdiction of other prelates (Phot. cod. 59; Chrysost. Epist. 125, ad Cyr.). The most flagrant offence charged was that of uttering treasonable words against the empress, comparing her to Jezebel (Pallad. p. 74). This was construed into exciting the people to rebellion, and on this his enemies chiefly relied. The sessions of this synod lasted fourteen days. Four times was Chrysostom summoned to appear before the self-appointed tribunal. His reply was dignified and unwavering. He refused to present himself before a packed synod of his enemies, to which he was summoned by his own clergy, and he appealed to a lawfully constituted general council. But irregular as the synod was, he expressed his readiness, in the interests of peace, to appear before it, if his avowed enemies, Theophilus, Severianus, Acacius, and Antiochus, were removed from the number of the judges. As this proposal met with no response, Chrysostom summoned a counter-synod of bishops attached to his cause, forty in number, by whom a letter of remonstrance was despatched to Theophilus which was treated with equal contempt. At its twelfth sitting a message from the court urged the synod to come to a speedy decision. To this expression of the Imperial will the synod yielded prompt obedience. They came to a unanimous vote, by which they condemned Chrysostom as contumacious, and deposed him from his bishopric. The charge of uttering treasonable words they left to be dealt with by the civil power, secretly hoping that a capital sentence would be the issue (Soer. H. E. lib. vi. c. 15; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 17). The disappointment was severe with not a few when the imperial rescript confirming the sentence of depositor simply condemned the bishop to banishment for life. On the other hand, the indignation of the people knew no bounds, when, as the evening wore on, the sentence on their beloved bishop became generally known. A crowd collected round Chrysostom's residence, and kept watch at its doors and those of the great church, lest he should be forcibly carried off. This voluntary guard protected their spiritual father for three days and nights. Chrysostom's power over the popular mind was never greater. A word from him would have raised an insurrection. But the sermons he addressed to the vast multitudes that filled the cathedral advocated patience and resignation to the Divine Will. He shrank, "whether from timidity or Christian peacefulness of disposition, from being the cause, even innocently, of tumult and bloodshed. He had neither the ambition, the desperate recklessness, nor, perhaps, the resolution of a demagogue" (Milman's Hist. of Christianity, vol. iii. p. 141). On the third day he took advantage of the hour of the noontide meal to slip out unperceived by a side door, and quietly surrendered himself to the imperial officers, by whom he was conducted after dark to the harbour and put on board a vessel which conveyed him to Hieron, at the mouth of the Euxine. The victory of the enemies of Chrysostom seemed complete. Theophilus entered the city in triumphal state, and wreaked his vengeance on the bishop's partisans. The people, who had crowded to the churches to pour forth their lamentations, were forcibly dislodged, not without bloodshed. Furious at the loss of their revered teacher, they thronged the approaches to the imperial palace, clamouring for his restoration, and demanding that his cause should be heard before a general council. Constantinople was almost in revolt. (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 16; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 18; Theod. H. E. lib. v. c. 34; Zosim. Hist. lib. v. c. 23; Pallad. p. 15.) The following night the city of Constantinople was convulsed by an earthquake. The shock was felt with peculiar violence in the bedroom of Eudoxia. The empress, as superstitious as she was unprincipled, fell at Arcadius's feet, and entreated him to avert the wrath of Heaven by revoking Chrysostom's sentence. Messengers were despatched in different directions to discover the exiled prelate, bearing letters couched in terms of the most abject humiliation. The news of Chrysostom's recall spread universal jubilee. Late as it was his friends took shipping, and a whole fleet of barks put forth to meet him. The Bosphorus blazed with torches, and resounded with songs of triumph (Theod. H. E. lib. v. c. 34). Chrysostom at first halted outside the city, claiming to be acquitted by a general council before resuming his see. The people suspected another plot, and loudly denounced the emperor and empress. In alarm of a serious outbreak, Arcadius sent a secretary to desire Chrysostom to enter the walls without delay. As a loyal subject he obeyed. On passing the gates he was borne aloft by the crowd, carried into the church, placed on his episcopal seat, and forced to deliver an extemporaneous address. Chrysostom's triumph was now as complete as that of his enemies had been a few days before. These enemies, however, did not give up all for lost. Theophilus, and some of the leaders of the cabal, lingered on in Constantinople, in the hope of a turn in the tide. But they were now the unpopular party, and could hardly shew themselves in the streets without being attacked and ill-treated. The person of Theophilus was no longer safe in Constantinople; while a more formidable danger was to be apprehended if the general council, which Chrysostom prevailed on the emperor to convoke, met and proceeded to inquire into his conduct. On the plea that his diocese could no longer put up with his absence, Theophilus abruptly left the city, and sailed by night for Alexandria (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 17; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 19; Chrysost. Epist. ad Innocent.). The flight of Theophilus was speedily followed by the assembling of a council of about sixty bishops, which annulled the whole of the proceedings at the council of the Oak, and decreed that Chrysostom was still the legitimate bishop of Constantinople. This judicial sentence removed all Chrysostom's scruples as to the legality of his position, and he returned without further question to his episcopal duties (Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 19).

The first result of the failure of the machinations of Chrysostom's enemies was an apparently complete reconciliation between him and the empress, who seemed entirely to have forgotten her former resentment. The two vied with one another in complimentary and eulogistic expressions—on each side equally extravagant and equally insincere. But a reconciliation forced on contending parties by motives of fear and self-interest is as shortlived as it is hollow. Within two months of Chrysostom's return circumstances arose which proved the unreality of the friendship, and awakened a still more irreconcilable feud. The insatiable ambition of Eudoxia aspired to higher honours than any yet obtained. Not content with the virtual rule of the Eastern world, she aspired to semi-divine honours. A column of porphyry was erected in the lesser forum, in front of the church of St. Sophia, bearing aloft her silver statue for the adoration of the people. The dedication in Sept. A.D. 403 was accompanied by the boisterous and licentious revelry handed down from the days of heathenism. The noise of this unseemly merriment penetrated the church, and disturbed the sacred services. Chrysostom's holy indignation took fire, and with ill-timed zeal he mounted the ambo, and thundered forth a homily, embracing in its fierce invective all who had any share in these profane amusements, the prefect who ordered them, the people who joined in them, and, above all, the arrogant woman whose ambition was the cause of them. "Herodias," he is reported to have exclaimed, "is once more maddening; Herodias is once more dancing; once more Herodias demands the head of John on a charger." These words, whether actually uttered or not, were reported to Eudoxia. Can we wonder that all her former fury revived, and that she demanded of the emperor signal redress for such treasonable insolence? Compromise was no longer possible. Reconciliation was utterly hopeless. Sacerdotal and imperial authority stood confronted. One or other must yield (Socr. H. E. lib. vi. c. 18; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 20; Theophan. p. 68; Zosimus, lib. v. c. 24).

The signal given, the enemies of Chrysostom were not slow in reappearing; flocking, like vultures, from Egypt, Syria, and Asia, ready to swoop down on their prey the moment it shewed symptoms of tottering. Acacius, Severian, Antiochus, with other members of the old cabal, hastened from their dioceses, and were soon in close conference with their former confederates, among the fashionable dames and worldly and frivolous clergy of the city. After repeated deliberations they resolved on a line of policy. For months past Chrysostom had been wearying the emperor with his demands for a general council. Let such a council be called, care being taken to select its members discreetly, and let this fresh outburst of treasonable language be laid before it, and the result could not be doubtful. Theophilus, too wary to appear again on the scene of his defeat, directed the machinations of the plotters unseen. He at once put a new and powerful tool in their hands, in the 12th canon of the council of more than doubtful orthodoxy held at Antioch, A.D. 341, pronouncing the ipso facto deprivation of any bishop who, after deposition, appealed to the secular arm for restoration. The council met towards the end of A.D. 403. On the succeeding Christmas day the emperor refused to communicate, according to custom, in the cathedral, on the ground of the doubtful legality of Chrysostom's position (Soz. H. E. lib. vi. c. 18; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 20). Such a step from one who usually shrank from any decisive action, was justly regarded as ominous of Chrysostom's condemnation. Chrysostom was supported by 42 bishops, and maintained his usual calm confidence. He continued to preach to his people, and his sermons were characterised by more than common vigour and unction (Pallad. p. 81). The difficulty of arriving at any practical solution of the question before them determined the synod to submit the decision to the emperor. An adroit demand was made in Chrysostom's favour by Elpidius, the aged bishop of Laodicea, himself a confessor for the faith, that the chief promoters of the authority of the canon of Antioch, Acacius and Antiochus, should subscribe a declaration that they were of the same faith as its original promulgators, who were mainly Arians. The emperor was amused, and at once agreed to the proposal. The two bishops caught in the trap became livid with rage (ἐπὶ τὸ πλείονστον μεταβαλόντες τὴν μορφήν, Pallad. p. 81), but were compelled to dissemble their annoyance, and promise a compliance, which their astuteness had little difficulty in evading. The synod continued its protracted session. We have no record of any formal decision, or regularly passed sentence. None indeed was necessary: Chrysostom's violation of the Antiochene canon had deposed him: he was no longer bishop of Constantinople. Meanwhile Lent was wearing away and Easter was fast approaching. It would be intolerable if the Emperor were a second time shut out from his cathedral on a chief festival of the church. Some decisive step must at once be taken. Chrysostom must be removed: if possible, quietly; if not, by force. Public peace might be endangered if the accused prelate, who was still the idol of the populace, though the upper classes had deserted him following the ebbing tide of imperial favour, were allowed to preach on the high festivals, when more than ordinary numbers filled the church. Overpowered by these representations, as well as by the assurances of Antiochus and his companions, that Chrysostom had been actually condemned and had ceased to be a bishop, Arcadius was persuaded to issue an order for his removal (Pallad. p. 81). One of the imperial officers was sent to desire the bishop to leave the church immediately.

Chrysostom returned a respectful but firm refusal. "He had received the church from God, and he would not desert it. The emperor might expel him forcibly if he pleased. His violence would be his excuse before God for leaving his post." Fearing to use force, lest he should again provoke the vengeance of heaven, Arcadius ordered him to remain a close prisoner in his episcopal palace, and not to leave it even for the church without his permission. To obey God rather than man was a fixed principle in Chrysostom's mind. It was impossible for a bishop to absent himself from his flock at the great baptismal function on Easter Even, when no fewer than 3000 catechumens were expected to present themselves. When the time arrived he calmly left his residence and proceeded to the cathedral. The imperial guards, forbidden to use force, dared not interfere. The perplexed emperor summoned Acacius and Antiochus to his presence, and reproached them with the issue of their advice. They replied that "Chrysostom being no longer a bishop, was acting illegally in administering the sacraments, and that they would take his deposition on their own heads" (Pallad. p. 82). The emperor overjoyed at having the responsibility of the bishop's condemnation removed from him, at once ordered some guards to drag Chrysostom from the cathedral as usurping functions no longer his, and reconduct him to his domestic prison. A vast crowd was assembled that night in the church of St. Sophia, to keep the vigil of the resurrection. The sacrament of baptism was being administered to the long files of catechumens, male and female, whom the deacons and deaconesses had prepared for the rite by the removal of their outer garments. Suddenly the din of arms broke the solemn stillness. A body of soldiers, sword in hand, burst in, and rushed, some to the baptisteries, some up the nave to the sacred bema and altar. The catechumens were driven from the font at the point of the sword. Many were wounded, and, as an eye-witness records, "the waters of regeneration were stained with blood" (Pallad. p. 18). The baptisteries appropriated to the females were invaded by the rude, licentious soldiers, who drove them, half-dressed, shrieking into the streets. Others of the troop forced open the holy doors, and the sanctuary was profaned by the presence of pagans, some of whom, it was whispered with horror, had dared to gaze on and even to handle the Eucharistic elements. The clergy, clad in their sacred robes, were forcibly ejected from the church, and, with the mingled troop of men, women, and children, were chased along the dark streets by the brutal soldiery. With holy courage the dispersed catechumens were reassembled by their clergy in the baths of Constantine, which, hastily blessed by the priests, became sacred baptisteries. The candidates for baptism were again approaching the laver of regeneration, when they were once more forcibly dispersed by the emissaries of Antiochus. The soldiers, rude barbarians from Thrace, executed their commission with indiscriminating ferocity. The ministering priest received a wound on the head; a blow on the arm caused the deacon to drop the cruet of sacred chrism. The women were plundered of their robes and ornaments; the clergy of their vestments, and the extemporised altar of its holy vessels. The fugitives were maltreated and beaten, and many of them dragged off to prison. The horrors of that night remained indelibly imprinted on the minds of those who witnessed them, and were spoken of long afterwards with shuddering. Similar scenes were enacted wherever the scattered congregations endeavoured to reunite. For the greater part of the holy Easter week, Constantinople wore the aspect of a city that had been stormed. Private dwellings were invaded to discover clandestine assemblies. The partisans of Chrysostom—the Joannites, as they began to be called—were thrown into prison on the slightest suspicion, and were scourged and tortured to compel them to implicate others. The sound of the scourge, and the oaths of the soldiers, were even heard in the church (Chrysost. Epist. ad Innocent. ap. Pallad. pp. 17-20; Pallad. pp. 82-88).

For two months the timid Arcadius could not be prevailed upon to sign the decree for Chrysostom's banishment, and he continued to reside in his palace, which was again guarded by successive detachments of his adherents. Chrysostom's anger was a very real one. His life was twice attempted by assassins (Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 21).

(e) Exile.—At last, on the 5th of June, A. D. 404, Arcadius's wavering mind was persuaded to sign the edict of banishment. Chrysostom received it with calm submission, and after a final prayer in the cathedral with some of his faithful bishops, prepared to yield it prompt obedience. A stratagem was employed to guard against the danger of a popular outbreak. Having directed that his horse should be saddled and taken to the great west entrance, after a tender farewell to his beloved Olympias and her attendant concubines, he passed out unobserved at a small eastern and surrendered himself to the guard, who conveyed him, with two faithful bishops who refused to desert him, to a vessel which instantly started under cover of night for the Asiatic shore (Pallad. pp. 89-90). Chrysostom had scarcely left the city when the church he had just quitted took fire, and the flames, which he said to have broken out first in the episcopal throne, caught the roof, and the whole building was involved in a conflagration which spread to the senate house and other adjacent public buildings (Pallad. pp. 91-92; Soz. H. E. lib. vi. c. 18; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 22; Zosim. lib. v. c. 24). The cause of this fire was never satisfactorily ascertained. But the suspicion that it was the work of Chrysostom's adherents, resolved their frantic grief that the church identified with the ministrations of their beloved teacher could never be possessed by his enemies, however unjustly entertained, was the occasion of a most relentless persecution of the Joannites under the semblance of a judicial investigation. Innocent persons of every age and sex were put to torture, in the vain hope that confession would be extorted from them inculcating leading members of their party. The presbyter Tigrinus of the young reader Eutropius expired under the torturer's hands without eliciting any confession of the suspicious. Others barely escaped with their lives, maimed and mutilated (Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 22-24). The tender heart of Chrysostom was wrung with the accounts that reached him of the sufferings inflicted on his faithfuls, especially his dearly loved Olympias, on account of their devotion to him. To the charge of incendiarism was added that of contumacious resistance to the emperor's will, in refusing to hold communion with Arsacius and Atticus, who in succession had been thrust into Chrysostom's episcopal chair [ARSACIUS; ATTICUS]. This was made a crime punishable with degradation from official rank, fine, and imprisonment. The clergy who continued faithful to Chrysostom were deposed, and banished with every circumstance of brutality. Some did not reach their place of banishment alive. The most persevering endeavours were made to stamp out the adherents of the banished prelate, not only in Constantinople but in Asia Minor and Syria—endeavours which only deepened their attachment to him, and confirmed their resolution never to yield (Theod. H. E. lib. v. c. 34).

All other help failing, the persecuted part of the church of Constantinople appealed to the Western church as represented by its chief bishops. Letters were sent addressed to Innocent bishop of Rome, Venerius of Milan, and Chromatius of Aquileia, by Chrysostom himself, by the forty friendly bishops, and by the clergy of Constantinople (Pallad. p. 10). Theophilus and his adherents also sent counter-representations (ib. p. 9). Innocent was in no difficulty to see on whose side right lay. He pronounced the synod that had condemned Chrysostom irregular, and annulled his deposition, on the ground that it had been pronounced in the absence of the accused, and wrote authoritative letters to the chief parties. To Theophilus he addressed words of sharp reproof, and of fatherly sympathy to the Constantinopolitan clergy, while to Chrysostom himself he replied in terms of sympathy and encouragement (Pallad. pp. 23, 24; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 26). At the same time he used all his influence with Honorius to write a letter to his brother Arcadius, urging the convocation of a general synod. This letter was conveyed to Constantinople by a deputation of Western bishops. But Arcadius was not a free agent. The bishops were not allowed admission to his presence. The letters they bore were wrested from them, the thumb of one of the bishops being broken in the struggle. They were insulted and maltreated, and were sent home with every mark of contumely (Pallad. pp. 30-33; Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 28).

The place of exile selected by Eudoxia's hatred was Cucusus, a lonely mountain village buried in the depths of a valley of the Tauric range, on the borders of Cilicia and the Lesser Armenia. The climate was most inclement, and it was exposed to perpetual inroads from the Isaurian marauders. When he arrived at the city of Nicaea Chrysostom first learnt what was to be the place of his future abode. His disappointment was severe, but remonstrance was vain.

The refreshing breezes from the lake Ascanius invigorated his worn constitution, and helped him to face the long and sultry journey before him. It was the season of the year when the heat was most oppressive, and his conductors had received instructions to push on with the utmost speed, without regard to the strength or comfort of their prisoner. Whatever kind consideration could do to mitigate his sufferings was done by the officers in whose charge he was, Anatolius and Theodorus, who gladly executed for him all the duties of personal servants. On July 5th Chrysostom left Nicaea to traverse the scorching plains of Galatia and Cappadocia under a midsummer sun. The squalid villages, which by the emperor's orders were selected for their nightly halts, furnished no food beyond black bread, which from its hardness had to be steeped in water before Chrysostom could masticate it. The water also, from the bituminous nature of the soil, was unwholesome, raising thirst instead of allaying it. He was seized with ague-fever, and was almost incapable of travelling. But the orders of his convoy were imperative, and he was forced on, till, more dead than alive, he reached the city of Caesarea. The bishop Pharetrius, an unworthy successor of the great Basil, was a concealed enemy of Chrysostom, who, though deterred by fear of his people from being present at the synod, had secretly forwarded his assent to whatever decrees it might pass against him (Pallad. p. 77). He was greatly troubled at a halt being fixed at Caesarea. His clergy were Joannites almost to a man; if he treated Chrysostom badly he would offend them; if well, he would incur the more terrible wrath of the empress. So, while sending complimentary messages expressing his eagerness to see Chrysostom, he carefully avoided an interview, and used all means to despatch him from Caesarea as quickly as possible. This was not so easy, for a severe access of his habitual ague-fever had rendered him quite unfit to travel, and compelled him to seek for medical aid (Epist. 12). Chrysostom's stay was not rendered more welcome to Pharetrius by the enthusiastic affection with which he was received by all ranks of the city. An incursion of the Isaurian banditti having delayed his departure other means were tried to get rid of the intrusive guest, and the house in which he was lodging was attacked by a body of fanatical monks, probably the tools of Pharetrius, threatening to burn it over his head unless he instantly quitted it. Driven out by their fury, Chrysostom, suffering from a fresh attack of fever, found refuge in the country house of a wealthy lady near, named Seleucia. But not even there was he permitted to repose. The threats of Pharetrius prevailed on Seleucia to violate the rights of hospitality, and turn Chrysostom out of doors in the middle of the night, on the pretext that the barbarians were at hand, and that he must seek safety by flight. The dangers of that terrible night, when the fugitives' torches were extinguished for fear of the Isaurians, and his mule having fallen under the weight of his litter, he was taken up for dead, and hid to be dragged or rather carried along the precipitous mountain tracks, are graphically described in his letters to Olympias (Epist. 14). We have no details of the later stages of his journey, which were rendered somewhat more tolerable by the care of one of the physicians of Caesarea, who accompanied him (Epist. 12). He reached the place of his destination, Cucusus, towards the end of August. His reception here was of a nature to compensate for the fatigues of the way, and to mitigate the trials of exile. Of the many houses placed at his disposition he selected that of Dioscorus, who went to considerable expense to render it a suitable habitation for an aged invalid. Adelphius, the bishop of Cucusus, vied with Dioscorus in his attentions to Chrysostom (Epist. 14, § 1). Many of his friends at Constantinople, who had estates in that district, directed their stewards to make provision for his comfort, and some of them actually came to share his exile. He found himself nearer to Antioch than at Constantinople, and he was cheered by visits from several of his old friends from his native city. He found agreeable occupation for his hours of leisure in writing and receiving letters, and in social intercourse with congenial friends. Nor did his higher energies want adequate exercise. Never even as bishop of Constantinople did he exert a wider and more powerful influence. The East was almost governed from a mountain village of Armenia. His advice was sought from all quarters. No important ecclesiastical measure was undertaken without consulting him. In the words of Gibbon "the three years spent at Cucusus were the most glorious of his life. From that solitude Chrysostom, whose active mind was invigorated by misfortunes, maintained a strict and frequent correspondence with the most distant provinces; exhorted the separate congregations of his faithful adherents to persevere in their allegiance; urged the destruction of the temples of Phoenicia, and the extirpation of heresy in the isle of Cyprus; extended his pastoral care to the missions of Persia and Scythia, and negotiated by his ambassadors with the Roman pontiff and the emperor Honorius." Though deposed from his see and deprived of all legal rights, never was his episcopal power more of a reality in Constantinople. Others might occupy the throne, but the real authority over the minds and hearts of men was his. His voluminous correspondence, which all belongs to this period, shews how close was the connexion he kept up both with the clergy and laity of his former diocese, and how unremitting his oversight of the interests of his church. Reproof and encouragement, consolation and exhortation, were administered as he saw them to be needed. The bishops and ecclesiastics, together with those of the laity who suffered from their fidelity to him, had his liveliest sympathy, and his most active endeavours for their deliverance. Nor did he overlook the necessities of those who were his immediate neighbours in his place of exile. He devoted much of the money sent him by wealthy friends to the relief of the wants of the poor around Cucusus, especially during a famine that afflicted the district, and to the redemption of those who had been carried off by the Isaurian banditti. The desolate Cucusus thus proved to be the exile a home of happy usefulness (Soz. H. E. lib. viii. c. 27). The chief cause of suffering to Chrysostom was the variable climate and the length and severity of the winter. The sudden alternations from extreme heat to intense cold seriously affected his fever-worn frame. He had to keep the house during the winter, with a fire perpetually burning, and piles of blankets on his bed. He was confined to bed for many weeks at a time by excruciating headache, and he was more than once brought to the gates of the grave. The apprehension of the attacks of the Isaurian brigands was another constantly recurring trouble. In the winter of 405 the intelligence that these barbarians were intending a coup de main on Cucusus drove nearly the whole of the inhabitants from the town. Chry-

Chrysostom joined the fugitives. The feeble old man with a few faithful companions, the presbyter Evethius, and the aged deaconess Sabiniana among the number, wandered on from place to place, often passing the night in forests or ravines, pursued by the terror of the Isaurians, until they reached the mountain fort of Arabissus, some 60 miles from Cucusus, in the castle of which place, "more a prison than a home," he spent a winter of intense suffering, harassed with the apprehension of famine and pestilence, unable to procure his usual medicines, and deprived of the comfort of his friends' letters, from the roads being blocked with snow and beset by the Isaurians, who ravaged the whole district with fire and sword (Epist. 15, 61, 69, 70, 127, 131). On one occasion Chrysostom himself narrowly escaped falling into the hands of the marauders, who had made a nocturnal attack, and had all but taken the town (Epist. 135). With the return of spring the Isaurians retired, and Chrysostom was permitted to descend to Cucusus early in 406. After Arabissus this desolate little town seemed to him a paradise. His greatest joy was in being brought nearer to his friends, and receiving their letters more regularly (Epist. 126, 127, 128). A third winter came, and brought its usual hardships, but by this time Chrysostom was in some measure acclimatised, and he endured the severities of the season without a recurrence of illness (Epist. 4, § 1; 142). His wonderful preservation from the dangers to which he had been exposed, and the manner in which his feeble health, instead of sinking under the accumulated trials of his banishment, became invigorated, awoke sanguine anticipations, and in his letters written at this time he confidently foretold his return from banishment, and his resumption of the care of his church and diocese (Epist. 1, § 1; 2, § 13; 4, § 4). But this was not to be. The unhappy Eudoxia had preceded the victim of her hatred to the grave to which she had destined him, but she left other not less relentless enemies behind. Stung with disappointment that the rigid climate of Cucusus had failed to do the work they intended; that Chrysostom still lived, and from his mountain banishment exercised a daily growing influence, they obtained a rescript from Arcadius transferring the exile first to Arabissus (Pallad. p. 96), and then to the small town of Pityns at the roots of Caucasus on the bleak north-eastern shores of the Euxine. This was chosen as the most impregnable and inhospitable spot in the whole empire, and therefore the most certain to rid them quickly of his hated existence, even if it should prove to be the case, the long and toilsome journey had not previously quenched the feeble spark of life. This murderous purpose was plainly evidenced by the selection of two praetorian guards of specially ferocious and brutal temper to convey Chrysostom to his new place of exile, with instructions to push forward with the most merciless haste, regardless of weather or the health of their prisoner, a hint being privately given that they might expect promotion if he died on the road (Pallad. p. 98). The journey was to be made on foot. Towns where he might enjoy any approach to comfort, and have the refreshment of a warm bath, were to be avoided. The necessary halts, as few and brief as possible, were to be made at "qualid villages, or in the unsheltered country. All letters were forbidden, the least communication with passers-by was punished with brutal blows. In spite of some approach to consideration on the part of one of his guards, the three months spent on the journey between Cucusus and Comana must have been one long slow martyrdom to the fever-stricken old man. His body was almost calcined by the sun, and, to adopt Palladius's forcible image, resembled a ripe apple ready to fall from the tree (Pallad. p. 99). On reaching Comana it was evident that Chrysostom's strength was entirely worn out. But his pitiless guard hurried him through the town "as if its streets were no more than a bridge," without a moment's halt. Five or six miles outside Comana stood a chapel with its appendent buildings, erected over the tomb of the martyred bishop, Basiliscus. Here they halted for the night. In his sleep Chrysostom saw the martyr stand by his side, bidding him "be of good cheer, for on the morrow they should be together." A similar vision, it was said, had been previously seen by the priest in charge of the chapel, bidding him "prepare a place for our brother John." In the morning Chrysostom earnestly begged for a brief respite, but in vain. He was hurried off, but scarcely had he gone three or four miles when a violent attack of fever compelled them to retrace their steps. On reaching the chapel Chrysostom was supported to the altar, and having clothed himself in the white baptismal robes he had requested might be given him, and distributed his own clothes to the bystanders, he partook of the blessed Eucharist, prayed a last prayer "for present needs," uttered his accustomed doxology "Glory be to God for all things," and having sealed it with an "Amen," yielded up his soul to his Saviour, Sept. 14, A.D. 407, in the sixtieth year of his age, and the tenth of his episcopate, three years and a quarter of which he had spent in exile. He was buried in the martyr's tomb by the side of Basiliscus, in the presence, according to Palladius, of a large concourse of monks and nuns (Pallad. pp. 99-101). One and thirty years afterwards (Jan. 27, A.D. 438), when Theodosius II. was emperor, and Proclus, formerly a disciple of Chrysostom, was bishop of Constantinople, the body of Chrysostom was taken from its grave near Comana and translated with great pomp to his own episcopal city, and deposited hard by the altar in the church of the Holy Apostles, the place of sepulture of the imperial family and of the bishops of Constantinople, the young emperor and his sister Pulcheria assisting at the ceremony, and asking the pardon of Heaven for the grievous wrong inflicted by their parents on the sainted bishop (Socr. H. E. lib. vii. c. 45; Theodor. H. E. lib. v. c. 36; Evagr. H. E. lib. iv. c. 31).

The personal appearance of Chrysostom, as described by contemporary writers, though dignified, was not imposing. His stature was diminutive (σμῦντιον); his limbs long, and so much emaciated by early austerities and habitual self-denial that he compares himself to a spider (ἀραχνώδης, Epist. 4, § 4, p. 575). His forehead was very lofty, and furrowed with wrinkles, expanding widely at the summit, his head bald "like that of Elisha," his eyes deeply set, but keen and piercing; his cheeks pallid and withered; his chin pointed and covered with a short beard. His habits were the simplest. His personal wants were few, and easily satisfied. The excessive austerities of his youth had ruined his digestive powers, and he was unable to eat food except in the smallest quantities and of the plainest kind. Outward display in dress, equipage, or furniture was most distasteful to him. Enamoured of the cloister, the life of the bishop of the capital of the Eastern world, compelled by his position to associate with persons of the highest rank and magnificence of life, was intolerable. He avoided the society of the great, and was never seen at their tables. It is not surprising that he was considered morose and ungenial, and became excessively unpopular with the upper classes. His strength of will, his manly independence, his dauntless courage were united with an inflexibility of purpose, a want of consideration for the weaknesses of others, and an impatience at their inability to accept his high standard, which rendered him harsh and unconciliatory. Intolerant of evil in himself, he had perhaps too little tolerance for it in other men. His feebleness of stomach produced an irritability of temper, which sometimes led him to violent outbursts of anger. He was accused of being arrogant and passionate. He was easily offended, and too ready to credit evil of those whom he disliked. Not mixing with the world himself, he was too dependent on the reports of those who had his confidence, which, as in the case of Serapion, was not unnaturally sometimes abused to their own purposes. But however austere and reserved to the worldly and luxurious, he was ever loving and genial to his chosen associates. In their company the natural playfulness and amiability of his disposition displayed itself, and perhaps few have ever exercised a more powerful influence over the hearts and affections of the holiest and most exalted natures. His character is well summed up in the words of Dr. Newman—"a bright, cheerful, gentle soul," his unrivalled charm "lying in his singleness of purpose, his fixed grasp of his aim, his noble earnestness; he was indeed a man to make both friends and enemies, to inspire affection and kindle resentment; but his friends loved him with a love 'stronger' than 'death,' and his enemies hated him with a hatred more burning than 'hell,' and it was well to be so hated, if he was so beloved."

Chrysostom was the author of so vast a number of works that Suidas says none but the Omniscient One could recount them all. His extant works are more voluminous than those of any other father, filling thirteen folios in the Benedictine edition. It is difficult to form any precise classification of these multifarious writings, but they may be roughly divided into—I. Treatises; II. Expositions of Scripture, chiefly in the form of Homilies, but partly continuous Commentaries; III. Homilies, divided into (a) doctrinal, (b) occasional, (c) pamphletical, (d) general; IV. Letters; V. Liturgies.

I. Treatises.—The earliest works we have from the pen of Chrysostom are his letters to his friend Theodore (ad Theodorum lapsun, i. ii.), who was proposing to give up the ascetic life and return to the world. These were written while Chrysostom was still resident at Antioch before

A.D. 372. To an early part of his monastic life we may assign the two books De Compunctione, addressed respectively to Demetrius and Stelechius. His three books in defence of the monastic life (adversus Oppugnatores Vitae Monasticae, i. ii. iii.) were called forth by the decree of Valens enforcing military service and civil functions on monks, A.D. 373. His short treatise, Comparatio Regis et Monachi, belongs to the same period. The three books de Providentiâ written to console his friend Stagirus, the subject of an hysterical seizure then identified with demoniacal possession, were probably composed after his return to Antioch, i.e. subsequently to A.D. 381. Before his ordination to the priesthood he also composed his two letters on the superior happiness of a single life (ad Viduam juniorem, i. ii.), and his treatise on celibacy (de Virginitate). His six books de Sacerdotio, which are justly ranked among the ablest, most instructive, and most eloquent, as they are among the earliest that ever proceeded from his pen, are placed by Socrates (H. E. vi. 3) in the first days of his diaconate, c. A.D. 382. The maturity of thought and sobriety of tone displayed in this work prevents our fixing it at a much earlier period. The treatises denouncing the custom for the clergy to have "spiritual sisters" residing under the same roof with them (contra eos qui subintroductus habent; Regulares foeminae viris cohabitare non debent), incorrectly assigned by Socrates (H. E. lib. vi. c. 3) to his diaconate, were written, Palladius tells us (p. 45), after he became bishop of Constantinople, c. A.D. 398. To the period of his exile belong the book Nemo laeditur nisi a seipso; and that ad eos qui scandalizati sunt ob adversitates.

II. Expositions of Scripture.—It is as an expositor of Scripture that Chrysostom is most deservedly celebrated. His method of dealing with the divine Word is characterised by the sound grammatical and historical principles, and the healthy common sense introduced by his tutor Diodorus, which mark the exegetical school of Antioch. He seeks to discover not what the passage before him may be made to mean, but what it was intended to mean; not what recalcitrant lessons or truths may be forced from it by mystical or allegorical interpretations, but what it was intended to convey; not what may be introduced into it, but what may be legitimately elicited from it. While regarding Scripture in the strictest sense as the word of God, no sentence of which must be neglected, he is far from ignoring the human element in it, holding that though its writers "spoke as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," they retained their personal individuality; that their natural powers were quickened and illuminated, not superseded by divine inspiration. He regards the Scriptures as a connected whole, and avoiding the erroneous plan of treating texts as isolated gnomes, he seeks always to view a passage not in relation only to its direct context, but to the general teaching of Scripture. His expository works being chiefly homiletic, we must not usually look in them for any continuous or systematic exegesis of the sacred text. His primary object was a practical one—the conversion and edification of his hearers, and he frequently disappoints those who consult him for the meaning of a difficult passage, who find, instead of a carefully considered interpretation, the vehement denunciation of some reigning vice or fashionable folly, or an earnest exhortation to the cultivation of some Christian grace or virtue (cf. Photius, cod. 174).

We are told by Suidas and Cassiodorus that Chrysostom wrote commentaries on the whole volume of Holy Scripture, from the beginning to the end. Many of these have unfortunately perished, especially those on the Old Testament. Among those that remain to us are the Homilies on Genesis, 67 in number, preached at Antioch and placed by Tillemont, but, as he confesses, on weak grounds, in A.D. 395. These follow the plan of a commentary more closely than is usual with Chrysostom; the hortatory and practical part being less fully developed than that concerned with direct interpretation. The style is plainer and less rhetorical than in his homilies generally, and they are composed with less care, the sentences being of inordinate length, and encumbered with parenthesis within parenthesis. In addition to these 67 homilies, there are eight sermons on topics from the first two chapters of Genesis, which were delivered earlier in the same year. They are shorter and slighter, but more florid and rhetorical. The ninth of these sermons, de Mutatione Nominum, does not belong to the series. The only other homilies on the historical books of the Old Testament are five on the narrative of Hannah in the first book of Samuel, and three on David and Saul, assigned by Tillemont to A.D. 387., Chrysostom delivered homilies on the whole book of Psalms, of which we have only those on Ps. iii.—xii.; xliii.—xlix.; cviii.—cl. (inclusive), collected at an early period with great critical acumen. As early as Photius the gaps indicated already existed. An ill-advised attempt has been made to supply them by piecing together materials from the works of Theodoret, Eusebius, and Athanasius. There is a homily on Ps. xli., but it only embraces the opening verses, and belongs to a different series. On the book of Isaiah a continuous commentary was composed by Chrysostom, which appears to have been one of his most admirable works, of this the whole has perished, with the exception of the portion ch. i.—viii. 11. There is also a series of six homilies on the opening verses of the sixth chapter, in Oziam seu de Seraphinis. The fourth of these belongs to a different series. To these we may add a homily on Is. xlv. 7. "Dominus Deus feci lumen et tenebras." The only extant commentary on any part of Jeremiah is one "on free will," Jer. x. 23. "Domine non est in homine via ejus." There is also a Ἐπιπέλα in Daniele, which bears his name, but it is so much below Chrysostom's usual style, and has so many marks of dissimilarity, that, if it is really his, it is either an unfinished work or one compiled by inferior writers from rough notes of his homilies. His general views on prophecy are given in two sermons de Prophetiarum obscuritate, justly ranked by Montfaucon "inter nobilissimas." The Synopsis Sacrae Scripturae is an imperfect work, ending with the prophet Nahum.

Chrysostom's commentaries on the New Testament commence with 90 on St. Matthew, delivered at Antioch. St. Thomas Aquinas is reported to have said that he would rather possess these homilies than be the master of all Paris. There are no homilies on the gospels of St. Mark or St. Luke; but we have 88 on that of St. John, also preached at Antioch. These are more doctrinal than hortatory or practical, being chiefly devoted against the errors of the Anomoeans. The 55 homilies on the Acts are among Chrysostom's feeblest works. The style is inelegant, the language unrefined, and the line of interpretation jejune (Photius, cod. 174). "Multa plumbea" is Savile's verdict, while that of Erasmus is harsher still, "ebrius et stertens scriberem meliora" (Epist. lib. xxvi. p. 1052). The secret of their inferiority is that they were written at Constantinople in the midst of the troubles arising from Gainas and the Goths, when he had no time for studied composition. But if the homilies on the Acts are among his feeblest, the 33 on the Romans, which were certainly delivered at Antioch, are among his most elaborate discourses. Nowhere does he shew more argumentative power or greater skill in developing his author's meaning. On I. Corinthians we have 44 homilies, and 30 on II. Corinthians, preached at Antioch, of which the former series "have ever been considered by devout men as among the most perfect specimens of his mind and teaching" (Keble). The commentary on the Galatians is continuous, not in the homiletical form. It is a somewhat hasty work, on which no great amount of time or care can have been spent. The 24 homilies on the Ephesians hardly reach Chrysostom's highest standard of excellence, being probably delivered at Constantinople when he wanted leisure for study. The same may be said of the 15 homilies on the Philippians, the 12 on the Colossians, the 11 on I. Thessalonians, and the 5 on II. Thessalonians, all belonging to the same epoch. Montfaucon correctly assigns the 18 homilies on I. Timothy, the 10 on II. Timothy, and the six on Titus to the period of his ministry at Antioch. From some marks of negligence in the three on Philemon, they have been considered to be extemporaneous addresses taken down by others. In the 34 on the Hebrews we certainly have not the benefit of Chrysostom's corrections. They were delivered at Constantinople, and were published from notes by Constantine, a presbyter, after Chrysostom's death.

III. Homilies, (a) doctrinal.—The chief of these is the series of 12 delivered against the Anomoean form of Arianism, in the first year of his presbyterate, at Antioch, A.D. 387. "They are," writes Stephens, "among the finest of his productions, and deserve perusal on account of their intrinsic merit no less than of the important doctrines with which they are concerned." These were succeeded at no great distance of time by eight directed against the Jews and Judaizing Christians (contra Judaeos). Many others of his homilies deal with doctrinal matters, but these cannot be particularised here.

(b) Occasional.—Not a few of Chrysostom's grandest flights of Christian oratory were called forth by the events of the stirring times in which he lived. The most remarkable is the series of 21 'On the Statues' (Ad populum Antiochenum de Statuis), the circumstances of which are detailed in the former part of this article. Another class includes the orations delivered at Constantinople on the fall of Eutropius, on the insurrection of Gainas, on the troubles connected with Severias, and the noble and pathetic series connected with his own deposition and exile. To these we may not improperly add the homilies delivered on the great Church Festivals, the Nativity, Epiphany, Easter, Pentecost, &c.

(c) Panegyric.—These compositions deserve careful attention as illustrating "the passionate devotion to the memory of departed saints which was rapidly passing into actual adoration." The earliest of these probably is that delivered in commemoration of his venerated spiritual father Meletius, A.D. 386. The others are mostly devoted to the eulogy of the bishops and martyrs who had illustrated the church of Antioch by their lives and deaths, St. Ignatius, St. Eustathius, St. Babylas, St. Pelagia, St. Domnina and her two daughters, and others, and were delivered at the martyria, or chapels erected over their remains. With these may be associated a homily delivered on the day of the commemoration of the emperor Theodosius, and the extravagant laudations heaped on the Empress Eudoxia and Arcadius during the ardent but shortlived friendship between them at the outset of his episcopate contained in the homilies. "Postquam reliquiae martyrum," &c. "Praesente imperatore," &c.

(d) General.—Among these we include those belonging to Christian life generally, such as the nine de Poenitentia, the two Catecheses ad illuminandos, those de Continentia, de Perfecta Caritate, de Consolatione Mortis, and those on single texts of Scripture or separate parables, of which the number is considerable.

It is on his homilies, both expository and practical, that Chrysostom's fame chiefly rests, and that deservedly. Chrysostom was in truth, in the words of Dean Milman, "the model of a preacher for a great capital. Clear, rather than profound, his dogmatic is essentially moulded up with his moral teaching. . . . His doctrines flow naturally from his subject or from the passage of Scripture under discussion; his illustrations are copious and happy; his style free and fluent; while he is an unrivalled master in that rapid and forcible application of incidental occurrences which gives such life and reality to eloquence. He is at times, in the highest sense, dramatic in manner" (Hist. of Christianity, bk. iii. c. 9).

IV. Letters.—The whole of Chrysostom's extant letters belong to the period of his banishment, written partly on his road to Cucusus, during his residence there, or while taking refuge in the fortress of Arabissus. The most important of these are the 17 addressed to the deaconess Olympias, the depositary of his hopes and fears, and the sharer of all his inmost feelings. The whole number of his letters is 242, written to every variety of friends—men of rank, ladies, ecclesiastics of every grade, bishops, presbyters, deacons and deaconesses, monks and missionaries, his old friends at Antioch and Constantinople, and his more recent acquaintances at Caesarea and other halting places on his journey—and including every variety of subject; now addressing reproof, warning, encouragement, or consolation to the members of his flock at Constantinople, or their clergy; now vigorously helping forward the missionary work in Phoenicia, and soliciting funds for that and the other pious and beneficent works to which his heart was given; now thanking his correspondents for their letters or their gifts; now complaining of their silence; now urging the prosecution of the appeal made in his behalf to Innocent and the Western bishops, and expressing his hope that through the prayers of his friends he would be speedily given to them again; and the whole poured forth with the undoubting confidence of a friend writing to friends of whom he is sure. We have in this correspondence an index to the inner life of Chrysostom such as we possess for few of the great names in history. The letters are simply inestimable in aiding us to understand and appreciate this great saint. In style, as Photius remarks, they are characterised by his usual brilliancy and clearness, together with great sweetness and persuasive power (Photius, col. 86).

V. Liturgical.—In the present infancy of the science of liturgiology, it is rash to pronounce an opinion as to how much contained in the liturgies passing under the name of St. Chrysostom is really of his age. There are very many editions of the liturgy, no two of which, according to Cave (Hist. Lit. i. 305), present the same text. There are hardly any that do not offer the greatest discrepancies. It would be, of course, a fundamental error to attribute the composition of a liturgy de novo to Chrysostom or any of the old Catholic Fathers. When a liturgy is called by the name of any father, all that is implied is that it was in use in the church to which that father belonged, and that it may have owed some corrections and improvements to him. The liturgy known in comparatively later times by the name of Chrysostom has been from time immemorial that of the church of Constantinople. We cannot question that Chrysostom found it in use there on his appointment as bishop, and though it is possible he may have introduced some modifications of detail (although of this we have not the slightest proof), nothing would be further from his thoughts than to make any alterations in the form or structure of a ritual which had in all probability been received by the churches of Thrace and its neighbouring provinces from primitive times, and was justly regarded by them as their most sacred possession.

Editions.—The first edition of the Greek text of any part of Chrysostom's works was that of his Homilies on St. Paul, published at Vienna, "typis Stephani et fratrum," in 4 vols. folio, with a preface by Maximus Donatus, A.D. 1529. Fabricius speaks of the text of this edition as in some cases better than that of Savile. His 'Commentaries on the New Testament' were also published by Commelin, a printer at Heidelberg, in 4 vols. folio, A.D. 1591-1602.

The first complete edition was that brought out by Sir Henry Savile, in eight thick folios, printed at Eton, by Norton, the king's printer, in 1612. The chief value of this edition lies in the prefaces and notes, contributed by Casaubon and other scholars as well as by Savile himself.

Contemporaneously with Savile's edition one was undertaken by a French Jesuit of Bordeaux, Fronton le Duc (Fronto Ducaetus), who accompanied his Greek text with a Latin translation, made by himself, when he failed to discover a satisfactory version already existing. Suspended by his death, it was taken up and completed by the brothers Frederick and Claude Morel, and published at Paris, 1609-1633, in 12 vols. folio, and again in 1636.

The best and most complete edition of Chrysostom, as of most of the Christian Fathers, is the Benedictine, prepared by the celebrated Bernard de Montfaucon, who devoted to it more than twenty years of incessant toil, and of journeys to consult MSS. It was published at Paris, in 13 volumes folio, in 1718. The value of this magnificent edition lies more in the historical and critical prefaces, and other literary apparatus, than in the text, which is faulty. It has been reprinted at Venice in 1734 and 1755, and at Paris in 1834-1839.

The most practically useful edition is that contained in the Patrologia of the Abbé Migne, in 13 vols. 8vo. Paris, 1863. It is in the main a reprint of the Benedictine edition, but it has been enriched by a judicious use of the labours of the best modern commentators, especially those of the Rev. F. Field in his excellent edition of the Homilies on St. Matthew, 8vo. Cantab. 1839, and of those on Romans, Corinthians, and Ephesians, 8vo., Oxon. 1838 sq. The editions of separate portions of Chrysostom's works are nearly innumerable.

The chief early authorities for the life of Chrysostom after his own works are the "Dialogue" of his contemporary Palladius, bishop of Hellenopolis, which, however valuable for the facts it embodies, too justly deserves Gibbon's censure as "a partial and passionate vindication," and the Ecclesiastical Histories of Socrates (lib. vi.), Sozomen (lib. viii.), and Theodoret (lib. v.), the Lexicon of Suidas (sub voc. Ἰωάννης), and the letters of Isidorus of Pelusium (ii. Epist. 42). The biography, composed by George of Alexandria, is utterly worthless, being more of the character of an historical romance than of a memoir. Equally untrustworthy are those of Leo the emperor, and an anonymous writer, who have drawn their facts chiefly from George. Of modern works, it will suffice to name "the moderate Erasmus" (tom. iii. Epist. 1150), the "patient and accurate" Tillemont (Mém. Eccl. tom. ix.), and the diligent and dull Montfaucon. The brilliant sketch of Gibbon (Decl. and Fall, ch. xxxii.) must not be omitted. Coming to our own times, Neander's Life of St. Chrysostom is a work of much value, but more for the account of Chrysostom's opinions and words than for the actual life of Chrysostom as a man. Amadée Thierry's biographical articles in the Revue des Deux Mondes bring the circumstances of Chrysostom's fall and exile before us most graphically, though allowance has to be made for some abuse of the licence of an artist. The most satisfactory biography of Chrysostom, however, that has yet appeared, is that by the Rev. W. R. W. Stephens, London, 1872, to which the foregoing article is largely indebted. [E. V.]

CHUMBRECHUS (Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 461), bishop. [CYNEBERTH, bp. Winch.] [C. H.]

CHUNIALDUS, ST., presbyter, of Salzburg. Lived about the middle of the 8th century, and is commemorated on Sept. 24.

St. Rupert, the apostle of the Boii, had two disciples or chaplains, Chuniald and Gisilar, who are both commemorated on the same day, viz. Sept. 24, because on that day their relics, together with those of their master, were translated by St. Virgilius, the eighth bishop in succession from Rupert. The church of St. Rupert (Rudbertus, Rudpertus) was dedicated by Virgilius in the year 773, and in the 26th year of the reign of Duke Thassilo (?). The bodies of Rupert and his two chaplains were translated the same year.

According to some writers Chunialdus was commemorated on Feb. 8, but, as the Bollandists think, without good reason.

David Camerarius says that he was commemorated in Scotland on Feb. 21. Henry Fitz-Simon, in his Catalogue of the Saints of Ireland, mentions a Gisilarius commemorated on Sept. 10; others on Sept. 12.

He is supposed by some authors to have been a Scotchman or an Irishman, but by the Bollandists to have been either a Frenchman or a German.

It is uncertain how long Chunialdus and Gisilarius survived their bishop, or in what year they died. Chunialdus is said to have been married, probably before his ordination, and to have had children, but there is no proof of this. (AA. SS. Sept., vi. p. 708.) [D. R. J.]

CHUNIBERTUS, ST., the eleventh archbishop of Cologne, was, says Gelenius, descended from an illustrious line of Austrasian dukes, whose territories were situate on the river Moselle. He was for some time archdeacon of Treves, and upon the death of Remedius in 623 he was appointed to succeed him in the archbishopric of Cologne. In 625 he was one of the bishops present at the council of Rheims, over which archbishop Sonnatius presided, and Flodeardus assigns to him the eighth place and the see of Cologne. Chunibert was a famous statesman, renowned for prudence and integrity, and trusted by king Dagobert more than his mayor of the palace, Pepin. In the eleventh year of his reign Dagobert made his son Sigebert king of Austrasia, and on account of his youth placed him under the guardianship of Chunibert and duke Adalgisel. By order of the king he consecrated two monasteries, Otmars and Malmedy, although they were in different dioceses, Cologne and Tongres; over the latter of which St. Remaclus presided as abbat and bishop.

Sigebert II. having, in 633, been placed on the throne of Austrasia, Chunibert retained his position, and was principal minister of that prince. Such was his influence that Grimoald, son of Pepin, who became mayor of the palace after his father, did not feel able to maintain his position without his assistance and counsel. Even after his retirement he was recalled to become the minister of Childeric, brother of Clothaire III., and he retained that post till his death.

In the year 656 he retired from political life and devoted himself to the care of his diocese, of which he was bishop forty years. He died in 663 or 664 and was buried in the church of St. Clement, which he had built and which was afterwards called by his own name. In an ancient document in the church of St. Chunibert occurs the following sentence:—"Susatum in Westphalia Angariae metropolim D. Petro S. Chunibertus archiepiscopus acquisivit."

He is said to have accompanied Sigebert to the field of battle when he was at war with the Saxons, and to have received Soust as his share of the booty. (Flodoardus, Hist. Rem. lib. ii. cap. 5, Patrol. Lat. cxxxv. p. 102; Fredegarius, Chron. cap. 58 and 75, Patrol. Lat. lxxi. pp. 642 and 653; Gregor. Turon. 636, 647, 655, 656, Patrol. Lat. lxxi.; Aimoïn, lib. iv. cap. xxxvi., Patrol. Lat. cxxxix. p. 792; Gall. Christ. iii. 626.) [D. R. J.]

CHURCH, not the material building (on which see the Dict. of Antiquities), but the spiritual society known as "ecclesiu" to the Greek and Latin fathers alike: being a derivative from the Greek verb ἐκκαλεῖσθαι, "to be called out," as St. Cyril says (Cat. xviii. 24)—"I. A body collective, because it contains a huge multitude; II. A body mystical, because the mystery of their conjunction is removed altogether from sense" (Hooker, E. P. iii. 1, 2). Under this twofold aspect, we shall be able to group whatever dogmatic statements are to be found on the church in scriptural or patristic literature. The latter, indeed, being its supernatural or celestial aspect, should be taken first: and its human aspect, being dependent on, and ancillary to this, should follow.

As to the word: it was appropriated, not coined, by the writers of the New Testament, and perhaps dictated to them, if not used, by our Lord. It cannot have been accidental, that all the books of the New Testament, though written by Jews exclusively, were, if we except the Gospel of St. Matthew, written in Greek: and this word occurs again and again in the Greek version of the Jewish Scriptures (Tromm's Concord. s. v.) circulating so widely then as to deserve to be called the Jewish Vulgate. Further, the only gospel in which it occurs—that of St. Matthew (xvi. 18 and xviii. 17)—happens to be the only gospel originally written, not in Greek, but in the vernacular (πατριῶν γλώττη, Euseb. iv. 24). In the Acts of the Apostles, on the other hand, whose Greek is all but classical, the word is used as well in its common as in its scriptural sense (ii. 47 and xix. 39, 41). Yet familiar to the apostles as it may have been, even as Jews, yet as Jews they would have probably substituted another word for it, had they been left free to employ what Greek word they pleased. The word "synagoga" occurs at least as often in the LXX, and has almost the same meaning as "ecclesia." But in their time it was used also to designate the house of prayer in their native towns. It thus had a previous endearing association for them which was wholly wanting in "ecclesia." Nevertheless, the two words had just that difference between them in sense, strictly speaking, as accurately expressed the difference between the law and the gospel. The "synagoga," was an assembly brought together without reference to its own free choice, the "ecclesia," was an assembly brought together by invitation addressed to each one composing it, St. Aug. on Psalm lxxxi. (or ii.).

But both these distinctions were merged in the body mystical, to which we must now turn our thoughts, the mystical Eve, or spouse of the second Adam, whose bodily training was symbolised under the law, and whose mental under the gospel; the first a carnal, the second a spiritual dispensation.

1. St. Augustine, commenting on v. 25 of Psalm xxxvi. (or vii.), "I have been young, and now am old," says "the Lord was young in His body, which is the church, in primaeval times, and now is old. You know and can appreciate this both from belonging to it yourselves, and inasmuch as it is your belief also that Christ is our head, and we are His body. We alone, do I say, and not they also who were before us? All the just that ever were since the world began have Christ for their head. They believed that He should come, we believe that He has come. They were healed by faith in Him, even as we are. To the end that he might be head of the entire city Jerusalem, composed of all the faithful from the beginning to the end of time, the legions of angels included, thus constituting one people under one king; one province under one ruler; rejoicing in perpetual peace and safety, praising God without end, and for ever blest." And again on Psalm cxxviii. (or cxxix.) 1. "The saints were no sooner called, than the church started into being on earth. At one time it was in Abel alone, and was crushed by his evil brother Cain. At another time it was in Enoch alone, and was translated from the wicked. At another it was confined to the household of Noah, suffering at the hands of all who perished in the Deluge, till having been supported on the waters in the ark alone, it got safe to dry land. At another time it was in Abraham alone, and how much it endured from the wicked we well know. . . Afterwards it commenced life with the children of Israel, persecuted by Pharaoh and the Egyptians, under which phase its numbers increased. . . At length it arrived at our Lord, when by the preaching of the gospel it was multiplied, so that it could not be numbered." In other words, the church, in this general and ideal sense, was created on the day on which man fell, and created to repair his fall, by embracing without distinction of sex or race all to whom the free gift of God, offered conditionally to the free will of man—eternal life through Christ—should not be offered in vain; all who should come to God when He called them to Him, no matter how. It is from this point of view that the same Father says in another place, tersely:—"mundus damnatus, quicquid praeter Ecclesiam; mundus reconciliatus, Ecclesia." (Serm. xvi. De Verb. Evang. § 8). Those who accept salvation on the terms on which it is offered them constitute the church, those who reject it constitute the world; good men and angels belong to the one, wicked men and angels to the other; the head of the first is Christ, and the head of the last, Satan. "Et videte nomina duarum istarum civitatum," continues St. Augustine, "Babylonis et Jerusalem—Babylon confusio interpretatur, Jerusalem, visio pacis. . . Unde dignosci possunt istae duae civitates; numquid possumus eas modo separare ab invicem? Permixtae sunt, et ab ipso exordio generis humani permixtae currunt usque in finem saeculi. . . Possumus tamen et aliquid afferre, quantum Dominus donat, unde distinguantur pii fideles, etiam hoc tempore, cives Jerusalem a civibus Babyloniam. Duae istas civitates faciunt duo amores. Jerusalem facit amor Dei. Babyloniam facit amor saeculi. . . (on Psalm lxiv. or lxv. 1). Post resurrectionem vero, facto universo completoque judicio, suos fines habebunt civitates duae; una scilicet Christi, altera diaboli; una bonorum, altera malorum; utraque tamen et angelorum et hominum" (Enchir. § iii.). For any further development of this idea, we must refer in general to his great work, De Civitate Dei, which exhausts it; the last twelve books more particularly.

Not, however, that this idea was mere symbolism with the fathers. It was deeply practical. "Let us gaze upon the blood of Christ," says the earliest of them, "and see how precious before God is His blood, and that, shed for our salvation, it has obtained the grace of repentance for the whole world. Let us mount upwards through all generations, and let us learn that from generation to generation the Lord has bestowed a place of repentance on all such as were willing to be turned to Him" (St. Clem. Ep. i. 7). "For He called us when we were not; and was willing that, though dead, we should live" (Ib. ii. 1). "Pray for all other men without ceasing," says St. Ignatius (Ep. ad Eph. c. 10), "for there is hope of their repenting and thus finding God." It was this hope which inspired their prayers. "The church prays everywhere," says St. Prosper, "not only for saints, and the already regenerated in Christ, but for all infidels, and enemies of the cross of Christ, for all who worship images, and for all who persecute Christ in His members; for the Jews who are blind to the light of the gospel; for heretics and schismatics estranged from the unity of faith and love. And what is it that she asks for them, but this, that abandoning their errors, they may be turned to God, that they may receive faith and love, and freed from the darkness of ignorance, arrive at a perception of the truth. . . The Lord who is merciful and just wills that prayer should be made to Him for all men; that when we see them rescued in such numbers from such depths of woe, we may not doubt His having done what He has been prayed to do; so that, while praising Him for those who have been saved, we may hope likewise that any who have not yet been enlightened will, by a similar act of divine grace, be removed from the power of darkness, and translated to His kingdom before departing from this life" (De Vocat. i. 12). "The fact is," says Eusebius, "though we are confessedly new, and our name of Christians has become but recently known, our conduct, manner of life, and rules of piety, far from having been invented by us recently, were developed by the natural instincts of God-serving men from the creation of mankind downwards. . . So that should anybody reckon all those who have been commemorated for their righteousness from Abraham upwards to the first man, as really Christians, though they never bore that name, he would not be far from the truth. For, if by the term Christian we understand a man who by the knowledge and teaching of Christ excels in justice and temperance, in continence and fortitude, together with the worship of the one and only true God; in all these respects we must confess the ancients to have shewn equal diligence with ourselves." (E. H. i. 4.) "In this way," says St. Augustine, "the saving effects of this the only true religion, through which salvation is really and truly promised, were never wanting to the deserving; and only wanting where they would have been bestowed in vain" (Ep. ad Deog. cii. 9, 2, § 15). As the first bishop of Ephesus had learnt from St. Paul; "God will have all men to be saved, and to come to the knowledge of the truth" (1 Tim. ii. 3). And as the first Gentile converts had heard from St. Peter: "Of a truth I perceive, that God is no respecter of persons, but in every nation, he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him" (Acts x. 34-5). And as all the apostles had themselves heard from our Lord: "I say unto you, that many shall come from the east and west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven" (St. Matt. viii. 11). It is a curious circumstance, notwithstanding, that the first of these passages was always more or less of a difficulty to St. Augustine (Enchir. c. 103, De Corrupt. et Grat. c. 14, &c.), and that neither he nor any of the fathers till Venerable Bede can be quoted for anything like comment on the second, and not even Bede on the last. Yet all three passages are virtually taken into account and presupposed in this view of the church: which view must, therefore, be taken into account itself and presupposed in determining the sense attached by them to their favourite dogma "Nulla extra ecclesiam salus." In the words of St. Cyprian: "If any were able to escape who were outside the ark, he may, who is outside the church" (De Unit. Eccl. c. 6), or, as St. Gregory puts it; "It was said of the paschal lamb, 'In one house shall it be eaten, thou shalt not carry forth ought of the flesh abroad out of the house' (Moral. xxxv. 8, and Exod. xii. 46). Practically, they meant that none could be saved, who rejected impliedly or professedly, by a direct act of their own, God's offer of salvation through Christ in whatever way it was brought home to them: "Sciebant etenim, quia nulli esset salus, nisi in sanguine Christi" as Origen says (On Josh. Hom. iii. 5). Mystically, they meant that none could be saved who were not incorporate members of His mystical body called the church. Finally, to this body mystical they attributed three distinct stages or periods:—1. Ante legem, 2. sub lege, 3. sub gratiâ (Bede, E. H. v. 21), or "1. lex naturae; 2. lex Mosis; 3. lex Christi," as they have since been called, each marked by characteristics of its own, adapted to its day, each intended for the moral and social advancement, as well as probation, of the generations brought into contact with it, but all three deriving whatever efficacy they possessed, retrospectively as well as prospectively, from the offering made by Christ on the cross, and in no case designed to prejudice those less favoured races in the sight of God, who through no fault of their own, have from age to age lived and died outside their influence. "That servant," said Christ (St. Luke xii. 47), "which knew his Lord's will, and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes;" or, as paraphrased by St. Augustine, "will be doomed for ever" (Expos. in ch. at Rom. § 18), "but he that knew not, and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes" that is, "enough to bring him to his senses, and comfort with his ultimate pardon" (ib.)

the body mystical, in its general or ideal aspect. What they dwelt on most in their teaching, however, as we might expect, was the aspect in which it was presented to them daily, viz., that of the Christian church. In this sense the church was to them a veritable expansion of the humanity of their crucified and risen Lord, and themselves literally, "members of His flesh and bones," as St. Paul had said (Eph. v. 31). "And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and He took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof, and the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, made He a woman, and brought her unto the man" (Gen. ii. 21). When the eyes of the second Adam were closed on the cross in death, the second Eve, said they, was similarly taken out of His side (St. Chrys. in Eph. v. Hom. xx. § 3; St. Amb. in S. Luc. ii. 86; St. Aug. De Civ. D. xxii. 17). The water and the blood which then flowed, expressed the two sacraments on which His church lives. He had said Himself, in instituting the Eucharist, "Take, eat, this is My body," relevant to which was the general maxim expressed by St. Augustine, "Quicquid manducamus, in corpus nostrum trahimus" (in Psal. xxx. Enar. iii. § 5); His own miraculous multiplication of the loaves and fishes, twice repeated, in feeding the multitude (St. Matt. xiv. and xv.); and His intermediate discourse thereon, which St. John records (c. vi.). According to the teaching of His apostles, baptism was not a mere ceremony for conferring church membership, but people were "baptized into Christ, put on Christ (Gal. iii. 27), and were buried with Christ" (Col. i. 12), in receiving it. Their union with Christ was thus a real union of the closest kind, answering in all strictness to that of the body with the head, the prime figure for expressing it with St. Paul (Col. ii. 19; Eph. i. 22, and iv. 13-16); and second only to which was that of the marriage tie, regarded in the light in which Adam had apostrophised it before the fall (Gen. ii. 23; Eph. v. 28-31).

The church which He was about to found was also designated "a kingdom," by our Lord Himself. We find it called by that name no less than thirty-six times in St. Matthew alone, qualified indeed by the reserve that it was "of God," and "of heaven," or "not of this world." Still it was a kingdom which, in the thrilling language of prophecy, was to be set up upon earth, and to break in pieces all other kingdoms that had preceded it; whose servants all people, nations, and languages should become, and whose nursing fathers and mothers should be kings and queens. St. John, the last of the apostles, had seen, in vision, "the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband;" and had heard a great voice from heaven saying, "behold, the tabernacle of God is with men; and He will dwell with them, and they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them and be their God" (Rev. xxi. 2-3, comp. Art. "CHILIASTS"). It must have been hard for the fathers to decide, particularly for those who lived after the Roman empire had become Christian, how much of this was intended for the church triumphant rather than militant. And it was at least as much from what they saw around them, as from what they read in Scripture, that the fathers of the 2nd council described the church to which they belonged, in the creed in which they professed their faith, as 1. one; 2. holy; 3. catholic; 4. apostolic; the four primitive notes of the church, as they are called, and their contemporaries said of it, in appealing to its decisions: "Securus judicat orbis terrarum." When St. Augustine wrote this, his "orbis terrarum" was of course bounded by the limits of the Roman empire: but that there was any world beyond this entered into the minds of none then; and further, though even this was not half Christianised, not only was it becoming more and more Christian every day, but Christianity went hand in hand everywhere with the church. This was a fact so patent, that even heretics and schismatics could only meet it by silence, when it had been once stated. No matter where they existed, their rise could be dated, their numbers counted, their locality defined, their heterogeneousness exposed, with precision too literal to be evaded. "Edant origines ecclesiarum suarum, evolvant ordinem episcoporum suorum," was the crucial test with which Tertullian was not afraid to meet them all (De Præsc. c. 32). "Tell me, ye Donatists," said St. Augustine, "or find out, if you cannot, how many stations there are on the route by land between Jerusalem and Illyria. Then, on our affirming that there are no fewer churches than stations, shew us, if you can, how they have disappeared through the local strife that has been waged in Africa. You merely read the epistles addressed by the apostle to the Corinthians, Ephesians, Philippians, Thessalonians and Colossians; we not only read and regulate our faith by them, but hold living communion with those churches to whom they were addressed. . . Against these churches, members of the one church that is diffused throughout the world, and authenticated to us as they are by the Scriptures which the Holy Ghost inspired, have you the face to ask us to entertain all the calumnies that may be preferred by man? Unquestionably they preach another gospel, who say that the church has failed in all the rest of the world, except Africa, where it is upheld by Donatus and his party" (De Unit. Eccl. 12-13, and c. Cresc. ii. 37). The church is conspicuous and clear as noonday to all. Like the city set upon a hill, it cannot be hid, Christ rules in it from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. The seed of Abraham has been multiplied in it as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea-shore, and therein all the nations of the earth have been blessed" (ib. ii. 36). Similarly, "The episcopate is one," says St. Cyprian, "whose parts severally represent the entire whole. The church is one likewise, though dispersed and ever increasing. . . Part a ray of the sun from its orb, and unity forbids this division of light. Break a branch from the tree, once broken, it can bud no more. Sever the stream from its fountain, it is no sooner severed than it dries up. . . This sacrament of unity, this bond of concord inseparably cohering is foreshadowed in the gospel, where the tunic of our Lord Jesus Christ, neither rent nor parted, and undivided by him into whose hands it fell. . . He cannot own Christ's garment, who rends and divides Christ's church. . . In the sacrament or sign of His garment, He has declared the unity of His church" (De Unit. Eccl. c. 6, with the note in the Oxford Tr.)

One more note, that of holiness, remains. As eye-witnesses of the abominations, denied by none, with which Gentile society, religious equally with secular, was steeped, of the contrast presented by the radically different life prescribed in the gospels, and by the high standard of it realised among Christians in general, the holiness of the church was a topic on which the fathers could well afford to dwell with enthusiasm, without being the least unmindful of the qualifications attendant on it, when viewed in the concrete. There could be no reasonable doubt that post-baptismal sin was both contemplated in Scripture—witness the Lord's Prayer—and existed in fact. Those who shut their eyes to this, like Tertullian and Novatian, soon found themselves repudiated by the majority, and became sectarians. Still, even the majority could contemplate with just pride the countless numbers of men, women, and children in all ranks, who continued through life faithful in general, to the double vow of profession and renunciation made by them at the font, who hung in speechless admiration on such sermons as were preached to them by SS. Gregory, Basil, and Chrysostom, and regulated their daily conduct by such treatises as were written by Tertullian, St. Cyprian and St. Augustine on prayer, fasting, almsgiving, faith, hope, charity, martyrdom, virginity, widowhood, and marriage. That such preachers and such writers should have found hearers in such multitudes proves abundantly that this note was no dream. Well, again, might St. Cyril say (Cat. vi. 35), "Is it not to compare darkness with light, to talk of the loftiness of the church in the same breath with the slough of the Manichees? Here is order and knowledge; here is gravity with purity; here the mere looking on a woman for lust is a sin—here is the dignity of marriage, and the steadfastness of continence, and the aspiration of virginity to compete with angels. Here food is never taken but with giving of thanks, gratitude is poured out to the Creator of all things, and the father of Christ is worshipped." Rufinus, finally, may be cited for the practical sense put on this article, as it stood in the creed (in Symb. Ap. ad l.), "I have stated already that belief is not professed in the church as it is in God. What we are required to profess is, merely, that there is one holy church, in which one faith and one baptism is maintained, and one God the Father, one Lord Jesus Christ His Son, and one Holy Spirit, believed on. Such then is this holy church, not having spot or wrinkle." . . . and so far, standing alone. At the same time, when the question turned on individuals, St. Augustine was free to confess, that as there were tares which grew inside, so there was corn which grew outside the church: "Sicut ergo et intus quod diaboli est arguendum est, sic et foris quod Christi est arguendum est. . . Aut si zizania ea sola dicenda sunt, quae usque in finem in maligno errore perdurant: et foris multa frumenta sunt, et intus multa zizania" (De Bapt. c. Don. iv. 9-10). Consequently, there was as broad a distinction in the minds of the fathers between the Christian church of their own days and the ideal, as between the church militant and the church triumphant. Not but that, so far as words are concerned, it seems forgotten by them in the fervour of the moment now and then.

2. The remaining aspect of the church—that of a body corporate—was naturally considered by them also with special reference to the Christian church, though it had been in a manner derived from the synagogue. "Go," said our Lord to His apostles, "and make disciples of all nations, baptizing them" &c. (St. Matt. xxviii. 19). In these words our Lord finally commissioned His apostles to set about organising a society, to which baptism should give admission, and for the consolidation of which He had charged them with other rules and ordinances some time before. Among these was the power of excluding from it on the ground of sin. From this point of view, therefore, the administration of the sacraments was committed to the apostles, as a means of determining church-membership in its outward acceptance, a consideration quite distinct from their supernatural effects upon the soul. Those whom they admitted to the sacraments were made, or were continued, members of the corporate body called the church; those from whom they withheld the sacraments were excluded from it. The apostles on their part made provision for the administration of the sacraments by others to the end of time, on terms which they must have considered themselves free to initiate, for the same purpose. First, they laid their hands upon seven, chosen by the multitude, to act for them in the more ordinary details of their ministry (Acts vi. 1-6). These seven had hardly been ordained, before we find one preaching, and another baptizing as well as preaching, with considerable effect. No further coadjutors seem to have been employed by the twelve, while their labours were confined to Judaea. But among the acts of the first foreign missionaries—apostles, though distinct from the twelve—we read of their "ordaining elders in every church" (Acts xiv. 23). Not long afterwards on their returning to Jerusalem, they were themselves "received of the apostles and elders" of the mother-church (Acts xv. 4). Then the "apostles and elders, gathered together" there, form a council, the first of its kind to arrive at a joint decision after much disputing; and unite in forwarding it with the concurrence of the church at home to the churches abroad (ib. 6, 22, and 23). When the missioners returned to Jerusalem after their latest voyage, the rest of the apostles were gone, but St. James remained. And "all the elders were present," when he received St. Paul and his companions the day following their arrival (ib. xxi. 18).

In fixing himself at Jerusalem, St. James set an example that was soon followed. Hitherto the apostles had exercised a personal superintendence over all the churches founded by them from time to time. We read of St. Peter "passing through all quarters" at one time (Acts ix. 32); of St. Paul having "the care of all the churches day after day" upon him at another (2 Cor. xi. 28); of SS. Peter and John being sent to Samaria by the apostles in general "to hold a confirmation," as we should say (Acts viii. 15). Just before revisiting Jerusalem for the last time, St. Paul had called together "the elders of the church" at Ephesus, and taken leave of them in a way illustrating his own previous relations to that church and theirs to him (ib. xx. 17 et seq.) Even then, he seems to have made an effort to maintain this connexion for some time longer by writing to them. But, sooner or later, we find him begging Timothy to continue there, as his representative (1 Tim. i. 3) for a time or longer, as God might will (ib. iii. 14), and to this calling he leaves us to infer his companion had been designated in the first instance "by prophecy" (ib. i. 18, and iv. 14)—just as he had been "separated" for his own work at Antioch in former days himself—and then obtained the requisite gift (χαρίσμα) for it by imposition of hands, from the elders of the church, as well as from him (ib. iv. 14 and 2 Tim. i. 6). Till then, the elders of every church had practically been its "overseers," in his absence, and such he had formerly called them more than once (Acts xx. 28, and Phil. i. 1). As yet, indeed, there was a vagueness about all such terms, in point of fact the apostleship even being called a "diaconate" by the apostles themselves (Acts i. 25) and the apostles "presbyters" (1 Pet. v. 1, and 2 and 3 John, 1), which admitted of their being interchanged. "Quia eosdem episcopos illo tempore quos et presbyteros appellabant, propterea indifferenter de episcopis quasi de presbyteris est locutus;" as St. Jerome says (on Tit. i. 5, comp. Theodoret on 1 Tim. iii. 1).

But in this correspondence with Timothy the word "overseer" is used in the singular number throughout with marked care (1 Tim. iii. 1-7), thus establishing a difference between the person so called, and the deacons (ib. 8-14) and presbyters or presbytery (ib. v. 17, and iv. 14), who are named afterwards, and in a sense that instantly became special, viz., that of bishop, and this being the office which Timothy was designed to fill, its duties are sketched at becoming length, and first of any. Titus who was despatched to Crete by St. Paul on the same mission, and about the same time, had them repeated to him in almost identical terms, save that Crete not having had half the church-extension of Ephesus as yet, he was told, in addition, "to ordain elders in every city," duly qualified, like their bishop (Tit. i. 5-9). It would have been mere tautology for the New Testament to have recorded more cases, but we cannot doubt the same course that was pursued at Ephesus and Crete, having been pursued at Thessalonica, Colosse, Philippi, Corinth, Athens, &c., by St. Paul, and by others elsewhere. Thus it was, accordingly, that most of the churches founded by the apostles were provided by them with bishops during their lifetime, though, in some cases, where they attached themselves ultimately to particular churches, as at Jerusalem and Rome, bishops only succeeded them on their decease. Anyhow the succession of bishops in all the principal sees, from apostolic times downwards, is as certain a fact as any which history records. Bingham (ii. 1. 4) comments in detail upon each case. Tertullian, as we have seen, challenges heretics on this point alone (De Praesc. c. 32, 36). And if St. Jerome says in more than one place (in Tit. i. 5, and Ep. ad Evang. cxlvi. ed. Ben. with the note), that the object of episcopacy was to correct schism; its having served that purpose to some extent, is not inconsistent with its having also served, and been designed for, another. When every local church was officered by deacons and priests with a bishop at their head, it not only fulfilled what had been prefigured by the high-priest, priests, and levites of the synagogue, but, as St. Cyprian says, represented the whole church in miniature. The universal was thus everywhere brought home familiarly to flesh and blood in the particular. And the particular, in all that concerned the sanctuary, left nothing to be desired. Each diocese contained within it all that was necessary for the work of the church in the application of the Incarnation for the saving of souls. The maxim, which St. Ignatius is so fond of repeating (ad Trall. § 2; ad Philad. § 11), "Do nothing without the bishop," itself implied that one bishop was as good as another for that matter. It is St. Jerome who says, "Wherever he may be, bishop of Rome or Eugubium, of Constantinople or Rhegium, of Alexandria or Tanis, his priesthood is the same, and his gift all one. Rich or poor, all bishops are successors of the apostles" (Ep. cxlvi. ad Evang. § 1). He distinguishes in the same letter between the offices of bishop, priest, and deacon respectively: "What," he asks, "can a bishop do which a presbyter cannot, except ordain? . . . or, what can a server of tables and widows mean by placing himself above those," bishops and priests alike, so far, "at whose prayers the consecration of the body and blood of Christ takes place?" Wherever there was a local church there was a bishop: and every bishop was the vicar of Christ, the fountain of liturgical order, the centre of ecclesiastical unity, within his diocese. All he did, however, was in the name of the whole church, and not his own: and therefore subject to her laws. He alone could ordain, and regulate the functions of the deacons and priests of his church: yet he could not authorise deacons to consecrate the eucharist, nor presbyters to hold ordinations: nor presbyters or deacons to minister anyhow in a diocese that was not his. He was nothing in another diocese, though everything in his own. Within it he alone could consecrate churches, hold ordinations, administer vows, prescribe liturgies, sanction the insertion of any fresh names of departed saints in them for commemoration, exclude offenders from communion, decide what their penance should be, and readmit them when they had performed it to his satisfaction. Nobody who was under censure in his diocese could be restored in another. He was, in a manner, wedded to his diocese, as Christ was to the whole church (Vallars. in St. Hieron. Ep. lxxix. 5, ad Ocean.).

But when he transgressed, to whom was he to render account? or when two or more neighbouring bishops quarrelled or differed in opinion, who was to decide between them? or, again, how was the mind of the whole church to be declared on a given question? or, lastly, forasmuch as every bishop was a recognised centre of unity within his own diocese, was there no centre of unity recognised or required amongst the bishops themselves for binding their churches in one?

When St. Cyprian talked of the episcopate being one, he presupposed all its members being in communion with each other (Ep. lii. ad Anton.), and this fact, as long as it held good, would establish the schism of any few here and there not included in their communion. But what guarantee was there that the episcopate would always remain one?

Strictly speaking, the three first questions concern discipline, and may be answered easily from the canons. Questions affecting a single diocese were settled in a diocesan council. Questions affecting either the bishop of a diocese, or more dioceses than one, were settled in a council of bishops belonging to the province within which they had arisen. Questions affecting the whole church were settled in a council of bishops from every province sufficiently numerous to represent the whole church. Now, in this last more particularly, and at all times in general, was there such an episcopal centre recognised, or its need felt?

From the times of the fathers downwards, this question has always been regarded from a twofold point of view: 1. dogmatic; and 2. disciplinary. It is the first which exclusively concerns us here. In approaching it, we shall do well to call to mind the distinction already drawn between the Christian and the ideal church which, even in Scripture, seems occasionally lost sight of; Christ in some places appearing to be represented as Head of the Christian church instead of the ideal, whereas it is of the ideal alone that He is Head in the full and strict sense; and of this, of course, the Christian church merely forms part. The fathers, then, with their gaze fixed upon the church before them, or the Christian church, and on its first bishops the apostles, saw its unity foreshadowed in the person of St. Peter, and represented in their own day by his chair—"Peter, to whom the Lord left the keys of heaven, and through him to the church," says Tertullian (Scorp. c. 10). Or, as St. Cyprian has expressed it more fully, "The Lord spake to Peter as follows: 'I say unto thee that thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my church,' &c.; and again, after His resurrection, 'Feed my sheep.' He builds his church on one: and though He bestowed on all the apostles equal power, and said, 'As my Father sent me, even so send I you . . . Receive ye the Holy Ghost: whosoever sins ye remit,' &c., still to manifest unity, He arranged of His own authority that its origin should commence from one" (De Unit. Eccl. c. 4),—"Peter, whom the Lord chose first, and on whom he built His church," as he says in another place (Ep. lxxi. ad Quint.), "the chair of Peter, the principal church," meaning Rome, "from which sacerdotal unity took its rise," as he says in another (Ep. lv. ad Corn.)—"Peter, the first of the apostles, the coryphaeus and spokesman of the church," as St. Cyril of Jerusalem says (Catech. xi. 3)—"whom the apostles themselves yielded precedence and made their spokesman," as St. Chrysostom (in Matt. Hom. li. 2)—"Christ here founds His church, and makes Peter its shepherd," says St. Cyril of Alexandria (in Matt. xvi. 18)—"Christ gave the keys of the kingdom of heaven to the bishops through Peter," says St. Gregory Nyssen (Op. p. 609, ed. Paris.)—"We should look upon Peter as a type of the one church," says St. Augustine (Serm. lxxvi. 1, De Verb. Ev.)—"It was as representing the whole church in his single person that our Lord said to him 'I will give thee the keys of the kingdom of heaven;' for it was not one man who received those keys, but the one church" (Serm. cxcv. 2, De Temp.)—"Peter answered for the rest, or rather before the rest," says St. Ambrose, "and was therefore called the foundation; because he knew how to preserve not merely what was his own, but what was common property . . . Still, indisputably, the primacy which he bore was not of honour, but of confession; not of order, but of faith" (De Incarn. c. iv. §§ 32, 33). "It was for the good of unity," says St. Optatus, with equal plainness, "that St. Peter, who would have received enough had he been only pardoned his denial, was preferred to all the apostles, and alone received the keys of the kingdom of heaven, to be communicated to the rest. . . . It was for the good of unity that the rest, through love, forbore to separate from his communion when he denied Christ" (De Schism. D. vii. 3). Lastly, the fathers of the 4th council, in their synodical letter, solemnly tell St. Leo that "it was he who interpreted the voice of Peter for all, and drew down the blessing of his faith upon all," yet pass a canon in the same breath, on discipline, which they had strong reasons for believing he would not accept.

In all these passages, unquestionably, St. Peter is considered a type of the Christian church, with special reference to that attribute on which the fathers themselves laid most stress, viz., its oneness—a conspicuous type, but no more than a type—a type in no other sense than Moses and Joshua, David and Solomon, were types of Christ: and St. John and he types, on other occasions (St. John xx. 1-9, and xxi. 15-23) of the dispensations of the law and the gospel, compared with each other—a distinction which, if recognised, certainly was not supposed to have been increased in his see. The notion that St. Paul or St. Andrew held their commission, or had their powers from St. Peter, is in direct opposition to the explanation given of his primacy by St. Ambrose, "primatum confessionis utique, non honoris: primatum fidei, non ordinis." St. Cyprian and his colleagues denied that there was any "bishop of bishops" known to them whom they were bound to obey (Op. p. 329, ed. Ben.). St. Gregory the Great stigmatised the bare taking of the title of universal bishop as a mark of antichrist, when it was assumed by another (Ep. v. 18). Finally, no bishop of Rome was ever called or considered husband of the Christian, let alone the ideal church, as every bishop often was of his particular see. Practically, the see of Rome was no doubt honoured at all times, and deferred to then constantly, by collective Christendom, as being a model of the faith that should be professed by all, and a common centre with which all should be in communion—and this the fathers with one consent depose to finding typified in the constitution of the apostolic college. But of the idea, that the sacraments pass to the church in all ages through the see of Rome, making all other bishops its vicars: indebted to it for every power they possess, accountable to it all their lives for their several acts—there is no trace, but that of disproof, anywhere to be found in patristic literature, unless where it has been interpolated. Of this, St. Cyprian de Unit. Eccl. c. 4 (v. Fell ad l.) is a prime specimen.

When St. Augustine pressed unity upon the Donatists, this was his recipe for securing it: "What person," he asks, "is ignorant that holy canonical Scripture, whether of the Old or of the New Testament, has its own definite limits; and that it stands so far above the writings of all later bishops, as to preclude all doubt and debate, whether a thing is right or true, whatever it be that is manifestly contained there? But that all episcopal letters written now, or at any time subsequent to the settlement of the canon, are, should they deviate from the truth in any respect, liable to correction, whether by the reasoning of one better informed on a given subject than they are, or by other bishops of graver authority and more matured judgment, or else by councils; and that councils themselves held in the provinces, or in particular countries, have to yield to the authority of plenary councils representing the whole Christian world; and that of plenary councils, in fine, the earlier are frequently corrected by the later: should that which was closed come to be unlocked by increased experience, or that which was hid to be ascertained, without any display of pride, arrogance, or envy whatever, with saintly meekness, and catholic peace, and Christian love" (De Bapt. c. Don. ii. 3).

Little more need be said on the general subject. Baptism, besides washing away sin, gave admission to the Christian church. Union with Christ, effected by the operation of the Holy Ghost, ensued (1 Cor. xii. 13). Both, however, were liable to be suspended or forfeited in after life. There was a twofold engagement exacted in every case before baptism was conferred: 1. No one was baptized till he had first declared publicly that he renounced the devil and all his works; and 2. That he believed in God, and would keep His commandments. The bishops of the church further claimed the privilege, granted to the apostles, of not only remitting, but retaining sins, as their successors—in a word, of excluding from, as well as admitting into, the church. Yet heretics and schismatics, who had been cast out of the church, might baptize validly, thus giving entrance to it. Manifold questions would arise from hence. Persons pledging themselves at the font in bad faith gained admission to the church on false pretences, and remained merely nominal members of it all their lives, unless they changed. Persons pledging themselves in good faith, but false to their engagements subsequently, might forfeit their union with Christ, and still, by preserving a smooth exterior themselves, or through lax discipline on the part of the church, retain their church membership. Persons pledging themselves in good faith, and never otherwise than true to their engagements, might be deprived of their church membership unjustly; in which case they would retain their union with Christ after having been excluded from the church by His ministers. Persons baptized by heretics were not considered in communion with the church till they had been formally received. Thus union with Christ and church membership were far from being convertible terms in practice, though in theory they went together, and in practice as well as in theory might be lost together. Not one of these questions escaped, and all were keenly probed by, St. Augustine, who saw in the distinction between the church militant and the church triumphant their only possible solution. His sermons on the two draughts of fishes—one before the passion, the other after the resurrection of our Lord—are beautiful specimens of his manner of handling it in their way (Serm. de Temp. cclxviii.-lii.). But it will be noticed that in the church militant he thus includes the synagogue; and by the church triumphant he means the church of all ages—the ideal church—at its completion. The parable of "the tares and the wheat" (St. Matt. xiii. 24-30), the "great house," with its vessels of wood and earth, as well as silver and gold (2 Tim. ii. 20), are constant topics with him in his controversies with the Donatists (e. g. De Bapt. c. Don. iv. 8-14); and with St. Cyprian in arguing against Novatian (Ep. li. and lii. ed. Ben.). Membership with the church militant was declared by both to be quite compatible with exclusion from the church triumphant. Grace given in this life was at all times liable to be withdrawn. Or, again, as St. Jerome says, "Ecclesias vocat, quas postea errore arguat depravatas. Ex quo noscendam dupliciter ecclesiam posse dici; et eam quae non habeat maculam aut rugam, et verè corpus Christi sit: et eam quae in Christi nomine absque plenis perfectisque virtutibus congregetur. Quomodo sapientes bifariam nuncupantur: tam hi, qui sunt plene perfectaeque virtutis, quam illi qui incipiunt et in profectu positi sunt" (In Galat. i. 1, 2). The two first rules of the African divine, Tichonius, are to the point on this head (Migne's Patrol. xviii. 15-22), "De Domino et Ejus corpore:" and "De Domini corpore bipartito:" comp. St. Isid. Etymol. viii. 1.

After all that has been stated, it is obvious we must not expect to find anything like a precise definition in the fathers of a term whose various aspects overlap and interlace so much as the church. When, for instance, the church is called the body, or spouse, of Christ, what must be meant is the ideal church, as the Christian, or church militant, is neither of these strictly or completely. When Rufinus, on the other hand, explains the one holy church as being that in which one faith and one baptism is maintained, and one God the Father, one Lord Jesus Christ His Son, and one Holy Ghost believed on: this is not a full description, even of the Christian church, and of course cannot be received in a sense that would exclude the ideal. When our Lord speaks of His church as "the (never a) kingdom," He adds, in general, and always means "of God" or "heaven:" in other words, "not of this world," still less confined to one period. It would, of course, be possible to construct a definition out of the writings of the fathers that should fit the Christian church militant exclusively; but then it should be stated avowedly that it was the Christian church and not the church in general which was so defined; as when St. Isidore says: "Inchoavit ecclesia a loco, ubi venit de caelo Spiritus Sanctus, et implevit uno loco sedentes," there can be no doubt of his meaning the Christian church alone. Thus it would express their teaching, to describe the Christian church as a state or society founded by Christ and organised by His apostles on earth, to bring men to heaven; whose members, as long as they were true to their engagements, were knit together amongst themselves and joined to Christ their Head, through the sacraments of

This institution, by the operation of the Holy Ghost, who sanctifies and informs it.

But it is not often that they themselves speak even of the church before them in this measured way; for in their day the actual approached the ideal so much more closely than it has ever done since, that they could afford to be enthusiastic over both in the same breath, and yet keep within the literal truth. "What else," says St. Nicetas (on the creed, in Migne's Patrol. lii. 871), "is the church but the congregation of all the saints? For, from the beginning of the world, whether patriarchs, as Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, or prophets, or apostles, or martyrs, or all the just men that ever were, or are, or shall be—they form one church because, being sanctified with one faith and conversation, sealed with one Spirit, they are made one body, whose Head is Christ. Nay, I must go further still: even angels, principalities and powers in heavenly places form part of this confederacy called the church. In this one church, then, believe that the communion of saints will be found by you. This is that one catholic church established in all the world, to whose communion you should firmly cleave. There are, doubtless, other counterfeit churches—but you have nothing in common with them . . . believing differently, living differently, as they do, from what Christ enjoined, and the apostles taught. . . ."

Such was the dogmatic account of the church given at Aquileia to catechumens in the fifth century; and with this we may close. B to Dict. of the Bible*, s. v.; Maréchal's excellent Concordantia S. Pat. Eccl. Gr. atque Lat., though it goes no further than the middle of the third century, faithfully represents the opinions of the fathers on it till then; comp. Kaye's *Eccl. CIAN, early Welsh saint, patron of Llangian, a chapel under Llanbedrog in Carnarvonshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302).

[C. H.]

CIANAN (KENANUS), bishop of Duleek (Damliag); commemorated Nov. 24. From the different accounts we have of St. Cianan of Duleek, we must infer that there were two of the same name, but at different times, whose histories were mixed up together. Ussher and Colgan consider the one, who was a contemporary of St. Ciaran, as a native of Connaught, going to Gaul, and returning to teach in Connaught and Leinster. (Ussher. De Brit. Eccl. Prim. Dubl. 1639, p. 1070 and Ind. Chron. A.D. 450; Colgan, Acta SS. 443, n. 11, and Tr. Thaum. 8, 182, 217; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 342.) But Cianan of Duleek was rather a native of Kiennacta in Meath, between Dublin and Drogheda: his father was Sedna, son of Trenius or Drona, descended from Cian, son of Oilíoll Olum. He appears to have been a great favourite with St. Patrick, who ordained him bishop, and presented him with a copy of the Gospels, a most valuable gift at that time. The church of Duleek was also among the first that St. Patrick built in Meath, and had this special pre-eminence that it was built of stone; it is called the first stone church in Ireland, and to this day perpetuates the name of the "Stone Building," Damliag, of which Duleek is a corruption. (On this and other Damliags, see Petrie, Round Towers of Ireland, 141 sq.) The Ann. Tighernach give the true date of his death A.D. 490. The Cal. Cashel says he wrote a Life of St. Patrick, but it is very doubtful, though Colgan, Ussher, and Ware accept it. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 315; Ware, Ir. Bps. 137, Harris's ed.; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 217; Butler, Lives of the Saints, xi. 505; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 301; O'Conor, Rev. Hib. Scrip. ii. 123 n.) [J. G.]

CIAR, CIER, CERA, CYRA. The Irish calendars give three dedications to saints of this name—Jan. 5, Feb. 8, Oct. 16; but the first and last probably belong to the same individual. At Jan. 5 is the feast of the birth of St. Ciar or Cera, Virgin, of Kill-Cheire, and at Oct. 16 is that of her death. She was of the race of Conaire, monarch of Ireland, and flourished at Muskerry, in the county of Cork. Her father was Dubrens or Duibhre, but she cannot be the Ciar to whom St. Brendan of Clonfert sent to have a pestilential fire extinguished, as he died towards the end of the 6th century, and she towards the end of the 7th. [BRENDAN (2) of Clonfert.] When her sanctity became known and her disciples were numerous, she went forth with several (aliquot—quinque) virgins, and received from St. Munna or Fintan (Oct. 21) the monastery of Tech-telle in Heli, or Ely O'Carrol in King's County, which he had built and then left to St. Ciar. After remaining there some time she returned to her native province, and founded the nunnery of Kil-cheire, Kilchree (now Kilerca in the barony of Muskerry and county of Cork), which she governed till her death, A.D. 680. O'Donovan (in Four Mast. i. 284) places her monastery at Kilkeary, in the barony of Upper Ormond, and near to Nenagh, in the county of Tipperary, but he does this from relying on Colgan's adapting the story in the Life of St. Brendan to the later history of St. Ciar, and thus placing our St. Ciar's monastery in Muscraige-Thire, Tipperary, in place of in Muscraige-Mitine, Cork. If Oct. 16 is the festival of her death, she is called "of Maghaseadh," and Colgan says she was buried there. (He has gathered all the traditions known regarding her in Acta SS. 14–16. See Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. iii. 129 sq.; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 51; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 7; O'Hanlon, Irish Sain'ts, i. 62 sq.; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Soc. Ir. 3rd ser. i. 23.) [J. G.]

CIARAN (KIERAN). Seventeen saints of this name appear in the Irish calendars, but of these only five have much more than the date and place of dedication.

(1) Son of Aelh (Mart. Doneg. and Tullaght); commemorated Jan. 5. The identity of this person seems hopelessly obscured. Colgan calls him the brother of Finntan Munnu, son of Tulchan, and says he died at Clonagh, but evidently there is some error. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 482, n. 49; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, 67–8.)

(2) The Pious, of Belach-duin—June 14. He was of the race of Irial, son of Conall Cernach. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 171.)

Little is known of him further than that he wrote Acts of St. Patrick, and died A.D. 770, according to the Four Masters. Belach-duin was the ancient name of Disert-Charain, or Castlekieran, near Kells in Meath (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 374, n. 375; Colgan, Tr. Thaur. 128, c. 69, 167, c. 99, 218, col. 2; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 87.)

CIARAN (3) Abbat of Rathmaighe—Oct. 8. He was abbat of Rath-maighe-Eonaigh, now the church of Rath, in the district of Tir-enna, co. Donegal; he was also abbat of Taghmon, bar. Corkaree, co. Westmeath, and died A.D. 784. He could not have been brother of St. Fintan Munnu (Oct. 21) as some say. (Mart. Doneg.; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 383-5.)

(4) Of Saighir, B. C.—March 5. Of this saint Colgan (Acta SS. 458-73) gives two Lives, the first taken from a Kilkenny Codex, and the second is "Lectiones officii ejus ex MS. Salmanticensi." In these Lives there is much that is apocryphal and irreconcilable both with history and with the lives themselves; while, in order to give an appearance of harmony, the age of St. Ciaran is extended to three centuries. The Bollandists (Acta SS. Mart. tom. i. 387-97) give a memoir of the two saints, Ciaran or Kiaran, and Carthach the Elder, who are commemorated on the same day. St. Ciaran, "the firstborn of the saints of Ireland," was descended from the chieftains of Ossory (of the posterity of Labhraidh Lorc, who is of the seed of Heremon). His father was Lugneus, and his mother Liadain, of the race of Corcaluidhe, in the south of Munster. The Lives detail his birth while the Irish were yet heathens, an apocryphal journey to Rome, and yet his baptism there. To be a contemporary of St. Ciaran of Clonmacnoise, St. Ruadhan of Lothra, St. Finian of Clonard, and others who belonged to the second order of saints in Ireland, he must have flourished in the middle or second half of the 6th century, and could not have been born much before A.D. 500. Lanigan is of opinion that he became a bishop about A.D. 538, that, retiring to a lonely spot in Hele or Ely O'Carrol, he lived as a hermit, and then built the monastery of Saighir, around which a city gradually arose, the monastery giving the name of Seirkieran to the parish where it lay, in the barony of Ballybritt, King's County. He was the founder and first bishop at Ossory, and died there after A.D. 550, but the year is unknown. Some English martyrologists call him Piran, and place him at Padstow in Cornwall, where they say he died. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 63; Ussher, De Brit. Eccl. Prim. c. xvi.; Colgan, ut supra; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 29 sq., ii. 7, 98; Butler, Lives of the Saints, iii. 47; Skene, Four Anc. Books of Wales, i. 123; Hardy, Descrip. Cat. i. 102, 103; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. i. p. cccxvi.; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Soc. Ir. 4th ser. ii. 277-79.)

(5) Macantsnoir, or son of the carpenter, and abbat of Clonmacnoise—Sept. 9. He is one of the most famous saints of Ireland, and half the monasteries of Ireland are said to have followed his rule. His father was Beaidh or Beoan, and his mother Darerca, daughter of Earean: his birth took place in Meath, though he was descended from Rudhraighe, king of Ulster. The year of his birth is variously stated from A.D. 507 to 516. He received his baptism and early education from St. Justus, a disciple of St. Patrick, was under St. Finian, at Clonard, along with St. Columba, the Brendans, and other Irish saints of the second class, and lived also for some time with St. Nennidius, St. Enna of Inishmore, and St. Senan of Inishcathay, the latter becoming his Amchara or spiritual director. His first foundation was on Aingin, an island in Lough Ree, but his chief one was at Clonmacnoise or the Seven Churches, in the barony of Garrycastle, King's county, on ground given him by his friend king Diarmaid, before he came to the throne. This saint is very largely mixed up with the legendary accounts of the period. Like all the others of his age he is famous for his miracles, and also for his humility and purity. He died of the plague which raged A.D. 549, called the cron-chonail or yellow jaundice; his age was 33 years. He is one of the "Patres priores" in St. Cumin or Cummian's Paschal letter, and his Law or Rule was revered not in Ireland only, but in Scotland, where many churches were dedicated to his memory, on account probably of his friendship with St. Columba, who is said to have written a poem in his praise. In the Scotch calendars he is usually Queranus, and called "abbat in Scotland." (Colgan, Acta SS. 265-6, 709, and Tr. Thaur. 91, 132, 472; Ussher, De Brit. Eccl. Prim. c. xvii.; Lanigan, *Eccl. CIBAR (Mabillon, Acta SS. Ord. Sanct. Bened. i. 252, ed. Venet. 1733, margin), recluse. [CYBAR.] [C. H.]

CIER. [CIAR.]

CILIAN (KILIAN), martyr in Franconia; commemorated July 8. Of the birth or youth of St. Cilian, the apostle and martyr of Franconia, history and tradition say nothing beyond the one fact that he belonged to Ireland. With twelve companions, of whom the two most famous were Coloman, Colman, or Colonatus, a priest, and Totnan, a deacon, he left Ireland, and established a mission at Würzburg. He is said to have gone to Rome to obtain the papal sanction, but this is disputed. Duke Gozbert received him kindly, and was converted, but St. Cilian fell a victim to the hatred of Geilana, whose marriage with Gozbert was contrary to Christian morality. He and his companions, in the absence of the duke, were cruelly murdered, A.D. 689, and their relics translated by Burchard, bishop of Würzburg, in the middle of the following century. He was probably a priest when he left Ireland, and made bishop in Germany about A.D. 687. Colgan (Acta SS. 328 sq.) gives the Translation of St. Kilian the martyr and his companions, from Notker, Egilward, and others. Canisius (Lect. Antiq. iii. 175-182, ed. Basnage) has two memoirs. The first and longer one, by an anonymous author, is given in Messingham (Flor. Sanct. Hib. 318 sq.), with a fragment of a Chronicle of Thadeus, abbat of the Scots at Ratisbon, and extracts from the annotations of Serarius on the Life of St. Cilian. The shorter life is given in Acta Benedict. saec. 2, p. 991. (See also Lanigan, *Ecol. Hist. CILINIA, ST., a matron, connected with Rheims. She was the mother of St. Remigius, archbishop of Rheims, and apostle of France, but very little is known of her history except the few facts which have been transmitted to us by the biographers of her son. She was of noble birth, the wife of Aemilius, the mother of two saints, Principius and Remigius, and the grandmother of a third, St. Lupus.

Remigius was born about A.D. 436, ordained bishop about 458, and died Jan. 1, about 532; it seems likely that in the year 436 Cilinia must have been of mature age, and was probably born about the year 400. Hucbaldus, a monk who died about the year 950, at the age of ninety, celebrated her in verse. The verses have never been found, and it is supposed that he derived all his information from the life of Remigius.

She is commemorated on Oct. 21.

She lived and died in Lauriniacum, or Lubriacum (probably Cerniacum Le Laonnois), where Remigius buried her. Her body was translated to the church of St. Remigius, Rheims, but it is uncertain when. There it was preserved in a very magnificent shrine. She is said to have been forewarned by an angel of the conception of her son, whom she presented to the Lord in his infancy, carefully bringing him up in His service, and making her own life an example worthy of the mother of so great a saint. (AA. SS. Oct. ix. pp. 318-322; Fortunat. Pictav. Vita Remegii, i., Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. p. 527; Flo-dardus, Hist. Ecol. Rem. lib. i. cap. 10; Patrol. Lat. cxxxv. p. 43.) [D. R. J.]

(2) virgin, celebrated at Meaux. The Bollandists say that although the cultus of this saint is very ancient, her name is not found in any of the earlier martyrologies. The first authority is Usuard, the later ones are Galesinius, Du Saussay, Arturus, Castellarus, Cardinal de Noailles' Paris Martyrology, and some of the calendars of particular churches. In a metrical life of St. Blandinus, an anchorite of Bruges, written by Fulcoius, a subdeacon (native of Beauvais and Meaux), in the 11th century, she is said to have been a native of Meaux, or the neighbourhood:—

"Meldis, sanctorum mater foecunda virorum, Walberti justī, sacri necnon Canoaldi,
Faronis, Farae quae Christum novit amare,
Pro quo terrenum sponsum facit haec alienum,
Meldis Celiniam, vita cum celebrē diam, Hostibus austerum Meldis tulit et Rigomerum."

Baillet says that she lived in the 5th and 6th centuries; Du Plessis, about 470; Godesard, at the end of the 5th century, but the exact date is very uncertain. It is however certain that she lived in the time of St. Genovefa, the patron saint of Paris, who died at the age of more than eighty, about 509-512. It is probable that she took the veil while Childericus, the son of Meroveus, reigned over France, 465-481. The following is the legend, included, in 1640, in the breviary of Meaux. At an early age she was espoused, but having made up her mind to remain in a state of maidenhood she was received by St. Genovefa, who lived at Meaux. When Cilinia's lover heard of her having taken the veil, he pursued her to that town, but St. Genovefa concealed her in the church, where of her own free will she remained for a long time, living in the baptisterium.*

Cilinia sought investment from Genovefa, not from a priest or bishop. Although there was one profession of the religious life public, and another private, both were equally binding. The double rites are still in use among the Greeks—"officium parvi habitus et officium magni et angelici habitus."

A virgin, man or woman, might have professed himself or herself by simply laying on himself his own hands. This use continued in the Latin church till the end of the 11th century.

The church in which Cilinia took refuge with Genovefa from her enraged lover was probably the cathedral situate near the amphitheatre. Meaux, which is now on the right bank of the Marne, was formerly on the left.

Over the sepulchre of Cilinia arose in time a monastery, which in the 9th century contained more than sixty monks, wearing a white habit, but following the rule of St. Benedict.

In 868 a synod was held there. Cilinia is commemorated on Oct. 21 (AA. SS. Oct. ix. pp. 306-309; Migne, Encyclopédie Théologique, tom. xl.; Gallia Christiana, viii. p. 1675.) [D. R. J.]

CILLA, CILLE (CISSA), niece of Cyssa a regulus of Wessex in the reign of Centwine (A.D. 676-685), and sister of Heane the founder or co-founder of the monastery at Abingdon. Out of her patrimonial estate she erected (about A.D. 690) a nunnery, which she named after the Holy Cross and St. Helena, at Helnestou or Helenstow, near the Thames, in Berkshire, a spot sometimes confused, as Tanner remarks, with Elnstow in Bedfordshire. Cilla presided over her foundation until her death, after which the community removed higher up the Thames to Witteham or Witham, where it remained until the wars between Offa king of Mercia and Cynewulf king of Wessex, when it dispersed. An account of Cilla is given in a Cottonian MS., which has been printed by Dugdale (Monast. Anglic. i. 511 sq.), and in the appendix of the Abingdon Chronicle mentioned below. In these editions she is called Cissa as well as Cilla. Camden (ed. Gough, i. 148),

* Genovefa had come to Meaux probably because she had property in the neighbourhood. At Meaux the nuns did not all live in community, but many of them lived in their own or their parents' houses. There were four orders of nuns:—1. Those belonging to the first or lowest order wore no religious habit. 2. Those belonging to the second order assumed the tunica, pulla, and pallium, with the veil, privately. 3. Those of the third order, at the Feast of the Epiphany, at Easter, or on festivals of the apostles, were publicly invested by the bishop amidst the solemnities of the mass; they were to live at home, however, like the first two orders. 4. Those of the fourth order were solemnly professed like the third, but spent their life in the monastery.

There was no time of probation (temporis medium) between the change of habit and profession.

quoting "an ancient MS." not otherwise specified, calls her "Cilla, sister of king Ceadwalla." (Monast. Anglic. i. 505, note; Tanner, Notitia, Berks, xi.; Chron. Monast. de Abingd. ed. Stevenson, App. ii. 268 sq.; Birch, Fasti Monast. 57.)

CILLEN. CILLIAN, CILLIN, KILLINUS, KILLIANUS. This name in its various forms occurs frequently in the calendars of Ireland: whether its initials be C, K, or Q, the name is the same, and derived from Cill, a cell. Colgan (Acta SS. 331, n. 3) has some judicious remarks upon the etymology and form of the word, and gives a long list of saints bearing the name as they stand in the calendars.

(1) Son of Lubnén—April 14. O'Clery, in his Irish Calendar, thinks that this may be the Cillén, son of Lubnén, abbat of Birr, who was contemporary with St. Adamnan. But Colgan (Acta SS. 473, c. 4) enumerates him among the prelates of Saighir, where he was abbat, and attended the synod at Armagh, which was summoned by Flann, Febhla, and St. Adamnan. Colgan gives his date as A.D. 695 (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 140 sq.).

(2) Cillene Droicteach—July 3. He succeeded Cillene Foda in the abbacy of Iona in A.D. 726, as fourteenth abbat, and ruled for twenty-six years. He was called Droicteach or the Bridgemaker, but for what special reason we are not informed. He was of the race of Conall Cremthann, son of Niall of the Nine Hostages, and therefore belonged to the southern Hy-Neill. In the Irish Annals he is generally called anchoret, and in the Martyrologies abbat of Hy or Ily-Columcille. Of his rule there we have no special account beyond the tradition of his carrying to Ireland many relics collected by St. Adamnan. If Cillen continued anchoret, while abbat; the active duties of his abbacy may have been discharged by Fehlmidh, who had been coadjutor to the preceding abbat. Cillen died A.D. 752. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 166, 192; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scott. i. 119 sq.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 185; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 301.)

(3) Cillene Foda—April 19. This was the thirteenth abbat of Iona, and he succeeded Faelcu A.D. 724. He was called Foda or Fada, the Tall, to distinguish him from his successor Cillene Droicteach, but his pedigree is unknown. His festival is on April 14 or 19. He died A.D. 726. (Reeves, Adamnan, 382; Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scott. i. 119; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 166.)

(4) Cillin, bishop of Techtaíain—May 27. When St. Patrick came to the region of Ui-Meithire in Ulster he is said to have built a church at Teagh-taíain and given it in charge to bishop Killenus. The festival of St. Killen is still kept at Tehallan in the barony and county of Monaghan, whether Evinus is right or not in connecting him with St. Patrick. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 150 c. 9, 184 nn.¹⁶⁻¹⁸; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 266 sq.)

(5) Cillin Ua Colla, abbat of Fathain-mura—Jan. 3. He succeeded St. Kellach as abbat of Fathain-mura, Athain, Fathain, or Othain, now Fahan, near Lough Swilly, in the barony of Inishowen and co. Donegal. He died about A.D. 724. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 7; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 57.)

CINNA, CINNE, CINNIA, virgin; commemorated Feb. 1. Mart. Tallaght calls her a priest. She was daughter of Eochaidh, prince of the Oirghiallai (Oriel), son of Crimthann, of the house of Colla Dachrioch. At the time when St. Patrick began to preach in the region of the Hy-Neill, Eochaidh was ruling at Clogher in Tyrone, and anxious that Cinna should marry Corbmac, son of Carbreus, son of Neill the Great, king of Ireland; but she persistently refused, and at last was allowed to follow out her own desire and be with St. Patrick, who gave her the veil of chastity about A.D. 480, and committed her to the care of Cethuberis [CETHUBERIS] in the monastery of Druimduchan, where she remained till death. (For the line of Cinnia or Kinnia, see Colgan, Acta SS. 234-5, and Tr. Thaum. 83, c. 79, 150, c. 7; Bollandists, Acta SS. Feb. tom. i. 96-7; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, ii. 228-34.) Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. i. 127, identifies her with Cinnenum and Richella, reputed sisters of St. Patrick. [J. G.]

CINNAUC (Annal. Camb. ad an. 606, ed. Williams), bishop. [CYNOC.] [C. H.]

CINTHILA, a king of the Goths, brother and successor of king Sisenand, who assisted at the fifth council of Toledo, the decrees of which he confirmed. Isidore of Seville calls him Chintila, and says he reigned three years, nine months and nine days. The Codex Regioaticanus adds that he held many synods at Toledo with his bishops, and strengthened his kingdom in the faith; and that he died at Toledo in the time of the emperor Heraclius. The acts of the fifth and sixth councils of Toledo, held under king Cinthila, are given at length in Migne's Patrology in the writings ascribed to Isidore of Seville, with an account of the unsettled controversy which has raged about them. That council was held in the first year of his reign (636). Eugene, archbishop of the city and metropolitan of the province of Carthage, subscribed as president, and after him twenty-one bishops with two absent deputies. The canons which they made at the council were intended for the benefit of Cinthila and his race. The punishment of excommunication was threatened against any of the Gothic nobility who might aspire to the throne to the prejudice of the king or his heirs. They recommend the execution of the decrees of the preceding council, which is called "great and universal;" and they ordain that it shall be in the power of the king to grant pardon (faire grâce) to those who shall be found guilty of faults enumerated below, provided they correct them.

The edict of king Cinthila, confirmative of all those canons, is dated on the last day of June, 636. On the 9th of January, 638, the same prince convoked the sixth council of Toledo, at which nineteen canons were made. They commence with a profession of faith, in which forty-seven bishops and five absent deputies, Silva, bishop of Narbonne, being at the head, acknowledge the procession of the Holy Spirit from the Father and the Son. (Ceillier, Hist. Gén. des Auteurs sacrés, xii. 919, 920; Concilia, tom. v. pp. 1735, 1740; Isidor. Hispal. opp. t. vii. 186, and Collectio Canonum, lib. i. and li., Migne, *Patrol. CIRCUITORES, synonymus with CIRCUMCELLIONES. [DONATISTS.]

CIRCUMCELLIONES. [DONATISTS.]

CISSA (1), (CYSSA, CYSSE), a regulus in the reign of Centwine king of the West Saxons (A.D. 676-685), having authority over what is now Wiltshire and the greatest part of Berkshire. He was a benefactor of Abingdon monastery, founded by his nephew Heane, and there he was buried. Cilla, the foundress of Helenstow, was his niece. Higden (Polychron. Gale, xv. Scriptt. 238) calls him father of king Ina and founder of the Abingdon monastery. There is an account of him in a Cotton MS. printed in the Monast. Anglic. (i. 511 sq., where he is called Cyssa and Cyssie, the niece being Cissa), and also in the appendix of Stevenson's Abingdon Chronicle cited below, where he is Cyssa and Cyssa, while the niece is Cilla. (Mon. Angl. i. 505; Chron. Monast. de Abing. vol. i. 39, vol. ii. 268 sq.; Tanner, Notit. Berks. i. ed. Nasmith; Cressy, Ch. Hist. of Brit. bk. xvii. c. 12; Kemble, C. D. No. 81.) [C. H.]

(2) Anchorite at Croyland in the earlier part of the 8th century. It shews how paganism still lingered in high quarters, that at this late period in the establishment of Christianity Cissa, a man of high rank and position (Ingulph), had long lived in the practice of heathen rites before he was baptized "in Britannia" (Flor. Wig.). The new convert and three others, Bettelin, Egbert, and Tatwine, the last being conductor and pilot of the party, penetrating through the marshes, arrived at the island abode of Guthlac, under whom they desired to live, for the benefit of his instruction and example. Their wish was granted, and there they resided until Guthlac died. The monastery of Croyland arose above the hermit's tomb, but Cissa and his party, by permission of abbat Kennulf, ended their days in separate cells near the simple oratory of their old master. Cissa is the only one of the four named by Florence, who gives him the honour of being Guthlac's successor (Ingulph, Hist., Gale, Scriptt. 4; Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 714; Monast. Anglic. ii. 90.)

CLAIR, SS. [CLARUS.]

CLAIRENECH, CLAREINECH. This is a word which sometimes stands by itself as a proper name, but it is more frequently used as descriptive of an individual: in the former use it occurs in the calendars at Jan. 17, as Clairenech of Druim-bidhg, and at June 6 as Clairenech of Cluaincaein; and in the latter form we have Berchan (Oct. 12) who is also called Mobhi Clairenech, or the "flat faced" [BERCHAN (4)]. (For the origin of the name see Reeves, Adamnan, lxxii.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 354; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 76.) [J. G.]

CLAPHIUS (or ELAPHIUS). A letter exists addressed to him about A.D. 477, from Sidonius Apollinaris, bishop of Clermont in the 5th century. Sidonius promises to go to Rouergue to dedicate a church which Claphius had built; and expresses a great desire to see him some day bishop of it, when God should have appeased the persecution of the Visigoths. (Letters of Sidonius Apoll. book iv. § 109, Patrol. Lat. lviii. 520; Ceillier, x. 388.) [W. M. S.]

CLARENTIUS, ST., bishop, Vienne, lived in the early part of the 7th century (ante ann. 625), and is commemorated on his birthday, the 25th April. He presided over the church of Vienne, in the reign of Dagobert, being next in order and merit to St. Aetherius. In the catalogue of the saints he is mentioned as "St. Clarentius sub Constantino Imperatore, et Dagoberto rege." In the martyrology of Vienne he is mentioned as confessor and 31st archbishop of that diocese, in the time of Constantine the Great, and as having appointed St. Clarus abbat of the monastery of St. Marcellus, at Vienne. At that time St. Martin was pope of Rome (AA. SS. Apr. iii. p. 373). [D. R. J.]

CLARUS (1) Bishop of Ptolemais, attended the synod convened at Caesarea, in the year 198, by the metropolitans Theophilus and Narcissus of Jerusalem, with the view of settling the paschal controversy (Euseb. H. E. v. 25). [E. V.]

(2) Bishop of Mascula in Numidia, halfway between Theveste and Lambaese, a see of whose bishops several were prominent in councils of the first six centuries, and the town of the martyr Archimimus (see Morcelli), 79th Suffr. in Syn. Carth. sub Cyp. vii. [E. W. B.]

(3) Apostle of Aquitaine, a martyr, or as some writers say, a bishop and martyr, who came from Africa to Rome, and was sent thence by pope Anacletus, in the 1st century, as a missionary, to Aquitaine. He preached the gospel in Limousin, Périgord, and the Albigeois. He was martyred at Lectoure in Gascony, and buried in the same place, but his relics were subsequently translated by Carolus M. to Bordeaux. He is commemorated on the 1st of June (Migne, Encycl. Théol. xl. p. 610).

CLARUS (4), ST. First bishop of Alby, and martyr, flourished in the 3rd century. After being honoured with a great number of conversions he died for the faith. He is commemorated at Alby on July 1 (Migne, Encycl. Théol. xl. p. 610).

(5) Bishop of Nantes, apostle of Brittany. There has been much dispute about the age in which this saint lived. There can, however, be little doubt that he was the first missionary sent into Brittany, and the first bishop of Nantes. The Bretons have always maintained (and in this opinion they are supported by many early biographers of the saints) that St. Clarus was sent into Brittany by St. Linus, bishop of Rome, if not by his immediate predecessor, the apostle St. Peter himself. The various traditions respecting this saint may be briefly summarised as follows:—

1. That St. Clarus associated with the apostles, or at least with two of them, SS. Peter and Paul.

2. That he was sent into Gaul by St. Peter, when that apostle was bishop of Rome.

3. That he was sent into Gaul by St. Linus, the successor of St. Peter, that he brought with him the nail which fastened the right hand of St. Peter to the cross, and had, as his companion, Deodatus the deacon.

4. That he was sent by St. Gatianus the first bishop of Tours.

5. That he was sent by the Roman pontiff into Brittany at the same time as St. Gatianus was sent to Tours, A.D. 280.

6. That he took up his abode at Nantes, and there built the church of SS. Peter and Paul, in which he deposited the sacred nail as a relic of the great apostle.

After the death of St. Clarus his own head and pastoral ring were added as relics in the same church, and many miracles were attributed to them; but his body was translated to the church of St. Albinus, in Angers (Andegavum), in the 8th century.

Argentæus, in Britanniae Minoris Hist., Sammarthani fratres, in Gallia Christiana, and others, give the following succession of bishops of Nantes:—

St. Clarus;

St. Ennius;

St. Similianus or Similianus.

If this catalogue be right St. Clarus could hardly have lived in the 1st century, for as St. Similianus died in the 4th century, that would leave a space of nearly 200 years between him and St. Clarus, with only St. Ennius between them, which is improbable.

He probably lived in the 3rd century, or the beginning of the 4th. He is commemorated on the 10th October (A.A. SS. Oct. v. pp. 61–66; Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. p. 610). It is unfortunate that Gregory of Tours says nothing about him. [D. R. J.]

(6) Presbyter, of Touraine, was born at Auvergne in the middle of the 4th century, and was a disciple of St. Martin, who had been brought up in the monastery of Marmoutier, and ordained him priest. He was of a rich and noble family. He died some days after that bishop, whose counsels and example he had always followed. Sulpicius Severus, his friend and companion in the monastery of St. Martin, greatly praises him. He is commemorated on the 8th of November.

An account of his life, his virtues, and his prudence is given by Sulpicius Severus (De Vita B. Martini, cap. 23; Patrol. Lat. xx. 173). Severus buried his body in his own private chapel (Appendix ad Paulin. Nolan. 899, Patrol. Lat. lxi.). Paulinus of Nola mentions him in some of his letters, and in a letter to Severus, his friend, sends two poetical epitaphs for his tomb (Paulin. Nolan. Epist. 171, 199, 200; Patrol. Lat. lxi.).

CLARUS (7), ST., of Loudun, where he is honoured as a martyr. He flourished probably in the 4th century. His day is August 8 (Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. 610).

(8) Presbyter and abbat, Vienne. In the life of this saint, as given by the Bollandists, he is said to have lived in the time of St. Cadoldus, bishop of Vienne, who was alive in 696; but St. Clarentius, the bishop by whom St. Clarus was made abbat of the monastery of St. Marcellus, lived in the early part of the 7th century (ante ann. 625); therefore St. Clarus must either have died before St. Cadoldus, or lived through the whole of the 7th century, as he must have been at least 25 before he was made abbat. At that time Vienne contained a large number of religious houses, of which the following were the chief:—

1. The Coenobia Grinianensium, founded by the bishops of the diocese, and in the largest of which were the bones of the martyr St. Ferreolus.

2. The monastery of St. Columba, containing 30 monks.

3. St. Peter's, on the south side of the city numbering about 500 monks.

4. The monastery of SS. Gervasius and Protasius, 50 monks.

5. St. John the Baptist's, 50.

6. Monastery of St. Marcellus, 30.

7. St. Blandinus's home for poor widows, 25.

8. St. Andrew's, within the city, 100.

9. St. Andrew's (another), 100.

10. The monastery of St. Nicetius, bishop, Vienne, 40.

11. St. Martin's coenobium, 150.

12. SS. Martyrs' Clergy House, many.

13. St. Severus's Clergy House, many.

Holy from a child, St. Clarus appears to have had that name bestowed upon him because he was bright in the gifts of divine grace. His widowed mother, who lived in a village called Bellicampus, was accustomed to repair to the shrines of the martyred saints, in and around Vienne, for prayers, and on those occasions she took her child with her. One day they had to cross the Rhone to visit the bones of the martyr St. Ferreolus, and when they were returning late in the evening a storm suddenly arose in the river, and placed their ship in great danger. The sailors were in despair, and all on board were in expectation of being submerged, when the boy Clarus stretched out his hands towards the church of St. Ferreolus and prayed thus:—"God, for whose name the martyr Ferreolus died, come to our aid in this danger." Whereupon the Rhone became calm, and the ship got safe to shore. Admiring the faith of the boy, those saved from danger returned thanks to God.

At an early age he was placed by his mother (who had taken him from his infancy to the neighbouring churches and religious houses) under the care of the monks of St. Ferreolus, while she herself entered the convent of St. Blandina. He was afterwards made abbat of the monastery of St. Marcellus by the bishop of Vienne. He died about 660 in the church of St. Blandina, where he was buried. His bones were scattered in the 16th century by the Huguenots.

He is commemorated on the 1st January (AA. SS. Jan. i. p. 55; Migne, Encycl. Théolog. xl. p. 611).

The St. Clarus to whom a town is dedicated in Normandy, which became celebrated through the treaty which ceded Neustria to Rollo, and which gave its name to a Norman family, is a personage of the 9th century, a native of Rochester, who settled in Vexin, in the diocese of Rouen.

CLAUDE, a churchman raised to the presbyterate by St. Rémi, on the recommendation of Clovis, a short time before the death of that king. He fell into a sin which, however, did not appear to St. Rémi sufficiently grave to merit deposition, so the merciful saint contented himself with reconciling the offender to the church by penitence. Three bishops of Gaul, Héraclé, bishop of Paris, Theodosius of Auxerre, and Leo of Sens, disapproved of his conduct, said that it was contrary to the holy canons, and wrote a common letter to St. Rémi, in which they complained of his leniency towards Claude. The saint, in order to justify his conduct, wrote a letter in reply, in which he said that he for whom they manifested such contempt had been ordained priest by him not from any interested motive, but at the request and on the recommendation of a great king, who deserved their respect, as he was the preacher and defender of the catholic faith in his kingdom; that in saying that that prince had induced him to raise Claude to the presbyterate contrary to the canons, they arrogated to themselves the authority of the sovereign-pontiff; as they virtually condemned the conduct of the master of the peoples, and the father of the country, and the vanquisher of nations; that with regard to the sacrilege of which Claude was accused, he had begged them to be satisfied with the fact that he had expiated his fault by penitence: that in that he had only followed the rules prescribed in the Scriptures, where we read that penitence delivered the Ninevites from the ruin with which they were threatened; that the holy Precursor warned the peoples to efface their sins by fruits meet for penitence; that St. John, in the Apocalypse, exhorted the churches of Asia to reform by penitence what evil they had done in the administration of the churches. "But," he adds, "it appears to me from your letter, that you are apprehensive lest this priest should be converted and live, although you cannot ignore what the Lord has said: I do not wish the death of the sinner, but rather that he may be converted and live. Is it not more expedient to follow the will of the Lord than to forsake it? He has not appointed us to domineer haughtily over the people, but to guide them with mildness, and rather to edify the faithful than to make them feel the effects of a zeal too violent and too bitter." He complains because the three bishops wished to make him responsible for some goods which a certain Celsus had confided to Claude, and even for the very person of Celsus, who had disappeared. "You only ask of me things which are impossible," he continues, "to have an excuse to treat me with indignity; and you carry your insult even so far as to reproach me with my age, because I have been bishop fifty-three years" (Ceillier, Hist. Gén. des Auteurs sacrés, xi. 80, 81; Remig. Rem. Epist. iii., Patrol. Lat. lv. p. 965.) [D. R. J.]

CLAUDIA. Sister of Sulpicius Severus, who was a disciple of St. Martin, and presbyter in Aquitaine; he flourished about A.D. 420. They were of an illustrious family. Gennadius mentions a great number of letters from Sulpicius Severus to his sister, in which he exhorts her to love God and despise the world. Two of these remain. In the first, he says he has shed tears of joy at her letters, which shew that she is following the principles of God our Saviour. It contains devout exhortations against the flesh, the age, worldliness, and fear of ridicule, and encourages a missionary spirit. The second letter has been attributed to Athanasius and Jerome. It contains general direction on the virgin state. It attributes the Apocalypse to St. John the Apostle. Virgins are spoken of as the brides of Jesus Christ. (Gennadius, de Script. Eccles. cap. xix.; Baluze, tom. i. Miscellan. Paris, 1678, p. 32; Ceillier, viii. 119.) [W. M. S.]

CLAUDIANISTS, a sect of Donatists. It was one of the charges against the Donatist bishop Primianus that he murdered in the basilica those of his presbyters who objected to his admitting Claudianists to communion. The acts are quoted in the 20th section of Augustine's second Sermon on Psalm 36 (Migne, iv. 379). He alludes to the fact again, and defends by the analogy of this name the formation of the title Donatist itself (contra Cresconium, iv. ch. ix. § 11; ibid. ix. 555). We learn from Optatus (adv. Parmenian. lib. ii.) that Claudianus was the name of the bishop or pastor of the little Donatist congregation in Rome [MONTENSES] in his time, c. A.D. 370 (ibid. 805). [E. B. B.]

CLAUDIANUS (1) Martyred with Papias and Diodorus in the Decian persecution. There are three different versions of their acts. On Feb. 4, in the Menology, we read that "they were of Attalia in Pamphylia, that they fed different kinds of cattle in their own country, but were Christians all the same, and taught the Greeks about Christ, and converted many unto Him." It is not quite clear whether this means that they were literally herdsmen, and, in spite of their humble calling, were active in making converts, or that they were pastors of various tribes that lived side by side, and were one in their Christian faith. But the simpler meaning is almost certainly the right one. "They were accused and taken before Publius, ruler of Pamphylia, and when questioned, they confessed freely the name of Christ our true God, and taught that it is He that made heaven and earth, and the sea, and all that is therein, and beside Him there is no other God." These strong confessions of the deity of Christ seem to be characteristic of the Decian persecution. "The governor heard, and was angry, and punished them severely; but as he did not persuade them to deny Christ, he beheaded them, and they received honourable burial of the Christians, to the glory of Christ our God." On the 31st of January they are joined to Victor and others, who were pounded to death under Tertius at Corinth in the same persecution, and a Serapion is joined with them, who can hardly be the same as the Serapion mentioned by Dionysius of Alexandria (Euseb. vi. 41, 44), though the third version of the acts, that given by Assemani (Acta Mart. Or. et Occ. ii. 60), after their confession at Corinth under Tertius and Decius relegates them all, Victor, Victorinus, and Nicephorus included, to Diospolis in Egypt, where they are put to death, in the same manner as is related in the second version of the acts, by Sabinus under Numerian, i.e. as usual Valerian (CHRYSANTHUS). Victor, Victorinus, and Nicephorus were pounded to death in a mortar. Claudianus had his feet and hands cut off, and was hung up to bleed to death. Diodorus was burnt; Serapion [hung head downwards] and his head cut off; young Papias thrown into the sea [with his feet and hands cut off]. The details in brackets are not given in Assemani, where yet the acts are in a later and more rhetorical form. In the Roman martyrology they are commemorated Feb. 25 (Ceillier, vol. ii. p. 464). [E. B. B.]

CLAUDIUS (2) Presbyter of Rome among the representatives of Sylvester at Arles, A.D. 314 (Conc. i. 1429). [E. B. B.]

(3) A friend of Chrysostom, to whom he wrote from Cucus remonstrating with him on his silence, and desiring him to write without delay if he wished to retain his place in his affection (Chrysost. Epist. 195). [E. V.]

(4) The law concerning CHRONOPIUS of the year 369 is addressed to Claudianus, P.V. As the praefectus urbis of that year was Olybrius, Gothofredus conjectures either that there is an error as to the praefect's name or that the year should be 374, when Claudius held the office, or else that we should read Claudius proconsul of Africa; for a Claudius held that office in 369. We know from other sources of a Gallic but not of an African Chronopius. (Cod. Theod. iv. 307.) [G. S.]

(5) (Κλαυδιανός), the reputed author of seven epigrams in the Greek Anthology, two of which, ascribed to him in the Vatican MS., are addressed to the Saviour. He is thus to be distinguished from the celebrated Latin poet of the same name, who was unquestionably a pagan (Augustin, De Civ. Dei. i. 5, c. 26; Orosius, l. 7, c. 35). He may be the poet whom Evagrius (Ecl. Hist. i. 19) mentions as flourishing in the time of Theodosius II. (A.D. 408-450). According to the scholia in the Vatican MS. he wrote poems on the history of certain cities of Asia Minor and Syria (Tarsus, Anazarbus, Berytus, Nicæa), whence it has been inferred that he was a native of that part of Asia (Jacobs, Anth. Graec. xiii. p. 872). [E. M. Y.]

CLAUDIUS ECDIDIUS MAMERTUS. [MAMERTUS.]

CLAUDIUS (1), A.D. 41-54. The reign of this emperor has the special interest of being that to which we must refer the earliest distinct traces of the origines of the church of Rome. In some way or other, even before his accession, the new faith may have found its way there. The "strangers of Rome, Jews and proselytes" (Acts ii, 10) who were at Jerusalem on the day of Pentecost may have returned with the strange tidings of the things they had seen and heard. Some of the "synagogue of the Libertines" (Acts vi. 9) may have yielded to the arguments of Stephen, and brought to the imperial city the new phase of the truth which he preached. "Andronicus and Junia or Junias," who were "in Christ" before the conversion of St. Paul (Rom. xvi. 7), and were at Rome when that apostle wrote to the church there, may have been among those earlier converts. When Herod Antipas and Herodias came to court the favour of Caligula (Joseph. Antiq. xviii. 7), and gain for the former the title of king, they must have had some in their train who had known—perhaps those who had reported to him (Matt. xiv. 1, 2)—the "mighty works" of the prophet of Nazareth. The frequent visits of Herod Agrippa must have tended to make what was passing in Judæa one of the topics of the day at Rome. His presence there when Claudius came to the throne (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 4, 5) may reasonably be connected with the indulgence extended to the Jews by that emperor on his accession (Joseph. Antiq. xix. 5).

The decree mentioned in Acts xviii. 2, and by Suetonius (Claudius, c. 25), indicates a change of policy, and the account given by the latter historian, according to a probable explanation, tells us what caused the change, "Judæos impulsore Chresto assidue tumultuantes Romæ expulit." He does not give the date of the expulsion, but it may be fixed with some probability between A.D. 43, when Agrippa left Rome, and A.D. 51, when St. Paul arrived at Corinth, and when the decree is mentioned as recent. The point on which the explanation turns is the significance to be given to the words "impulsore Chresto." We know from Tertullian (Apol. c. 3) that the word "Christianus" was commonly pronounced "Chrestianus" by those who were not members of the church, and they were ignorant of its derivation ("perperam Chrestianus pronuntiatur a vobis, nam nec nominis certa est notitia apud vos"), and that this continued for a long time to be the case with the name of Christ we learn from Lactantius ("immutatâ literâ Chrestum solent dicere," Ver. Sap. iv. 7). It seems legitimate with these data to assume that the preaching of the new faith that "Jesus was the Christ" had had the same effect among the Jews at Rome as it had at Thessalonica or Corinth, some believing, others reviling, that the two parties came into actual collision, and that the name of the Christ had been bandied to and fro between them in vehement assertion or loud revilings; that the prefects and the Roman population generally, ignorant of its true significance, took for granted that this was the name of some local ringleader in a seditious riot. The absence of any statement that Aquila and Priscilla were converted by St. Paul's preaching; the apostle's declaration, in A.D. 50, that he had desired for many years to see the disciples at Rome, and that their faith was spoken of throughout the whole world (Rom. i. 8, 13; xv. 23); his apparently intimate knowledge of no less than three distinct congregations there (Rom. xvi. 5, 13, 16) and of many individual disciples (some of them, probably, converts to the Christian faith with whom he had become acquainted at Corinth, and who had returned with Aquila and Priscilla) the presence among them of two, Andronicus and Junia (or Junias), who had been "in Christ" before his own conversion, and were conspicuous "among the apostles," therefore, it may be, also among the preachers of the faith; all this implies a considerable growth of the Christian community before the accession of Nero. So too the trial of Pomponia Graecina on the charge of having adopted an "externa superstitio" (Tacit. Ann. xiii. 32), though it took place under Nero, A.D. 57, rested on the fact that she had led a life "non cultu nisi lugubri, non animo nisi moesto," from an earlier date, beginning before the death of Messalina. The connexion of her husband Plautius with Britain suggests a possible link with Claudia and Pudens, and the description which the historian gives of her mode of life corresponds so closely with the impression which a Christian matron's retirement from the world would make on the society in which she had hitherto lived, that there is but small risk of error in assuming that she was one of the earliest converts from the ranks of the Roman aristocracy (comp. Lightfoot on the Philippians, p. 21). The name Prisca or Priscilla, belonging, as it does, to a family many of whom about this time held high official rank, suggests the hypothesis that the wife of Aquila may have belonged to the same class, and that this is the explanation of the precedence sometimes given to her name over that of her husband (Acts xviii. 18; Rom. xvi. 3; Tim. iv. 19).

It is obvious further, (1) that the expulsion of Jewish Christians, and with them of such Gentile converts as had passed previously through Judaism, would yet leave behind a certain proportion of purely Gentile Christians whom the edict would not touch. And (2) that those who returned would naturally settle, not in the Jewish trans-Tiberine quarter of the city, but as far as they could in some safer locality, and that thus the church at Rome, at or soon after the death of Claudius, would gradually become more and more free from Jewish or Judaizing influences. (On other points connected with the rise and progress of Christianity at Rome under Claudius see the papers on 'Aquila and Priscilla,' and the 'Proto-martyr Stephen,' in the writer's Biblical Studies.) [E. H. P.]

CLAUDIUS (2), enumerated by Epiphanius (Hæc. 51, p. 427) in a list of heretics who, like the Cerinthians and Ebionites, asserted our Lord to have been mere man. The next preceding name in the list is Cleobulus. No mention is made of this Claudius elsewhere, and, in the absence of a better explanation, the conjecture may be hazarded that Epiphanius wrote from a confused recollection, the names Claudius and Cleobulus being associated in his mind from their occurring together in the acts of the disputation between Archelaus and Manes, which he elsewhere quotes (Hæc. 66, p. 627), and in which they are the names of two brothers, rhetoricians by profession, who acted among the judges of the disputation. [G. S.]

CLAUDIUS (3), a monk mentioned as a companion of Epiphanius in the life by Simeon Metaphrastes (ii. 324). [G. S.]

(4) Asterius and Neon, brothers, martyred at Aegea in Cilicia, under a judge named Lysias. Their acts appear to be genuine and authentic, but the date at the conclusion is no more a part of the acts than the colophons to the epistles are a part of the New Testament. It refers them to A.D. 285, but this is incredible. The name Lysias and all the circumstances point to A.D. 303. The Latins commemorate them Aug. 23, the Greeks Oct. 29. The Menology says that they had gone to Mopsuestia to sue their stepmother for wrongfully detaining their property, and she informed against them as Christians. But the acts are registered at Aegea, where the clerk Euthalius had been able to find no other Christians but these three brothers and two women, Domnina and Theonilla, with a little infant. (There is no discrepancy here.) All the brothers are young. Claudius, Asterius, Neon, Domnina, and Theonilla are successively subjected to the most cruel tortures, throughout which they are constant. We are not told what became of Domnina's infant. The details of the story may be read in Fleury (Hist. Eccl. viii. 16). [E. B. B.]

(5) Proconsul of Africa, A.D. 369, perhaps the secular magistrate to whom the bishop CHRONIPIUS illegally appealed against the decision of a council. (Cod. Theod. iv. p. 307; Cod. xi. tit. 36; Ceillier, iv. 600.) [W. M. S.]

(6) Bishop of Picenum, at Rimini, A.D. 359 (Mansi, iii. 301, ex Hieronymo, in Dialogo adv. Luciferianos).

(7) ST., bishop of Vienne. Lived in the 4th century, and is commemorated on June 1.

The church of Vienne has very many bishops enrolled in the catalogue of saints, and amongst the number St. Claudius, who was the thirteenth* archbishop, and ruled his church in the time of the emperor Constantine the Great. He was a man of great learning and eloquence. He was present at the council of Nicaea, where he carried off the palm from the other fathers in the debate concerning the Donatists; and by the decrees of that council he obtained the primacy of his church against Marianus, archbishop of Arles (MS. Viennensis).

He is also said by Chorierius to have presided in the first council of Arles, A.D. 314, some months after his consecration; to have been one of those prelates who were most zealous and constant in observing the decrees of the council of Nicaea, and to have died June 1, 324. But there is a plain anachronism in this statement, since the council of Nicaea was not held till 325, and it is also very doubtful whether Claudius took part in the council of Arles. (AA. SS. June, i. pp. 72-73.) [D. R. J.]

(8) A bishop who sent Augustine the books that Julian, the Pelagian, had written against him, and to whom, in A.D. 421, Augustine

* In another MS. he is called the eleventh bishop of Vienne.

dedicates and sends his answer (Aug. Ep. 207), formerly prefixed to the books against Julian (Tillem. xiii. 828; Ceillier, ix. 48). [E. B. B.]

CLAUDIUS (9), ST., I., 19th bishop of Besançon (Vesuntium). The lists of the old chronologists make no mention of him; but in the year 517 he subscribed to the council of Epaonum, signing himself "Episcopus ecclesie Vesuntionensis." Sirmond thinks he was one of the bishops at the council of Lyon in 518. It is thought that this is the same bishop Claudius to whom Avitus, metropolitan of Vienne, wrote.

Pope Leo IX., enumerating in 1049 the possessions of the church of Besançon, mentions the church of Metenacum (Mainal) as the resting-place of St. Claudius. This is considered a proof by the editors of Gallia Christiana that this Claudius was a different person from the 29th bishop of Besançon, who became abbat of Mount Jura, and was buried in that monastery. (Patrol. Lat. lix. p. 271; Aviti Epist. 57; Gallia Christiana, xv. p. 11.) [W. M. S.]

(10) ST., II., 29th bishop of Besançon, successor (according to the lists) of St. Gervasius. On this saint the inventors of legends have compiled a vast farrago of improbabilities. It does not, however, seem unlikely that he sprang from a noble house, which afterwards produced the Salinensian princes; that from his earliest years he was enrolled amongst the clergy of Besançon; that after a novitiate in the abbey of Mount Jura he was elected to succeed abbat Injuriosus in the year 641 or 642, under the pontificate of Pope John IV.; that on the death of Gervase he was elected by the clergy of Besançon to be their archbishop; that after seven years he abdicated and returned to rule the abbey of Mount Jura; and that he died in A.D. 696 or 699.

St. Claudius, in his lifetime the oracle and model of the clergy of Besançon, became after his death one of the most popular saints of France. In the 9th century Rabanus Maurus mentions him in his Martyrologium as an intercessor. The abbey of St. Oyend in Mount Jura received his name, and became one of the most frequented points for pilgrimages. A town sprang up round it, as at Einsiedeln, which was only destroyed in 1799. His day is June 6. (Gallia Christ. xv. p. 17; Migne, Encycl. Theolog. xl.; Patrol. Lat. cx. p. 1149; Rabani Mauri, Martyrol.) [W. M. S.]

(11) Father of St. Fulgentius. The grandfather, Gordianus, was one of the senators driven from Carthage by Genseric, king of the Goths. He retired to Italy with his family, and died soon after. Claudius and another of his sons returned to Africa in the hope of regaining their paternal inheritance. Their houses had been given to the Arian priests, but after having obtained possession of all their goods by the authority of the king, they passed into Byzacene, and established themselves at Telepte. Claudius married Maria Anna, a Christian lady; in A.D. 468 she gave birth to Fulgentius. Claudius died soon after. (Fulgent. Vita, cap. i., Patrol. Lat. tom. lxxv. p. 118, etc.; Ceillier, xi. 1) [W. M. S.]

(12) Second bishop of Glandèves, succeeded Fraternus, and was succeeded by Basilius. He is only known from having subscribed to the fourth council of Orleans, A.D. 541. He subscribed as "Glanatensis episcopus," through Benenatus, a priest who had been sent in his place (Gall. Christ. iii. 1236; Le Cointe, Annales Eccl. Franc. i. p. 600). [D. R. J.]

CLAUDIUS (13) A letter addressed to Claudius exists in the collection of the writings of Isidore, bishop of Seville (bp. A.D. 599-636). But as this letter was written in the times of the disputes between the Greeks and Latins on the procession of the Holy Spirit, it must have been by another writer. This letter shews that the Greeks of the time believed Athanasius to be the author of the creed which bears his name. But the uncertainty of the date deprives this evidence of value. (Letters of Isidore, p. 693, Patrol. Lat., lxxxiii.; Ceillier, xi. 722.) [W. M. S.]

(14) I., bishop of Taurinum (Turin), advanced to the see before A.D. 774. He was followed in succession by the celebrated Claudius II. and Claudius III., both of whom are beyond our period (Ughellus, Ital. Sac. iv. 1023).

(15) Said to have been bishop of Auxerre (Dempster, Menol. Scot., Mar. 20 and Mar. 30), but not mentioned among the bishops of that see in Gall. Christ. (xii. 260), nor in Gams (Series Episc.). No cultus is attached to his name, and the Acta SS. place him among the praetermissi of March 5 (March, i. 359). The Menology above cited calls him also founder of the university of Paris. [CLEMENS (2).]

(16) CLAUDIUS CLEMENS, CLAUDIUS CLEMENS SCOTUS. (Colgan, Acta SS. ad diem Mar. 20.) [CLEMENS (2).]

(17) A martyr whose relics, together with those of St. Pontianus, were translated to Rome in 1650, and again translated to Antwerp in 1656. He is commemorated on the 14th of May. (AA. SS. Bolland. May, iii. p. 287.) [D. R. J.]

CLAUDIUS APOLLINARIS. [APOLLINARIS.]

CLEDAUC, 11th or 12th bishop of St. David's (Girald. Cambr. Opp. vi. ed. Dimock, p. 102; Stubbs, Regist. 155). [C. H.]

CLEDOG, Welsh saint. [CLYDOG.]

CLEDONIUS, a trusted friend and correspondent of Gregory Nazianzen. Having spent his early years about the court, he devoted himself to a religious life in the diocese of Nazianzus, and gave up his property to the service of the poor. He subscribed Gregory's will in 381 (Greg. Naz. ii. p. 924). He then styles himself a priest of Iconium. Perhaps he accompanied Amphilocheus thither in 374, when he became bishop of Iconium, and afterwards rejoined Gregory. Gregory addressed to Cleodnius his two celebrated letters against Apollinaris, written after his retirement from the see of Constantinople in 382. The second of these was written in answer to one of Cleodnius, asking him to declare his faith on the person of Christ, which he was accused of dividing. In it Gregory begs Cleodnius to assure all that he held the Nicene faith inviolate. These letters were adopted as documents of the faith by the councils of Ephesus and Chalcedon. (Labbe, iv. 826; Tillemont, ix. 370, 504, 515-18; Greg. Naz. Orat. 51, 52; Carm. 47, p. 107.) [E. V.]

CLEDREDUS, ST., one of the many Welsh saints who are arranged in the lists collectively as "the children of Brychan," the king of Brecknock, which was certainly a centre of missionary enterprise at one time, and in which numerous inscribed stones and other early Christian memorials are found (see Hubner, Inscriptiones Britanniae Christianae). This genealogical mode of connecting persons of the same tribe is common enough. The Welsh lists of Brychan's children, given in Rees, do not altogether correspond with the Cornish lists in the life of St. Nectan, and in the calendar of St. Michael's Mount (Leland, Collect. 4, 153; William of Worcester's Itinerary). The Irish calendars too make little or no mention even of the most celebrated of their missionaries, if their sphere of activity lay entirely out of Ireland. The parish of St. Clether is north of Alternun and east of Davidstow; St. Nun (Nouna), of Cornwall, being in one account the mother of the celebrated Welsh saint St. David. In fact the connexion with Wales is very manifest on this coast, and we can trace Welsh influence, though more faintly, all along North Devon and some way into Somersetshire; but the Anglo-Saxon ecclesiastics mostly rededicated the churches to the saints of the Roman calendar. [C. W. B.]

CLEMENS (1), FLAVIUS, son of Sabinus, brother of the emperor Vespasian, and therefore first cousin to Domitian, whose niece Flavia Domitilla was his wife. Domitian regarded his kinsman with great favour, and placed his two sons, whom he caused to be named after himself and his brother, Vespasianus and Domitianus, under the tuition of Quintilian as the destined inheritors of the imperial throne. Flavius Clemens held the consulate in A.D. 95, and had only just resigned the office when he and his wife Domitilla were suddenly arrested and convicted on the charge of 'atheism,' by which there is no reasonable doubt that Christianity is intended. The crime on which Clemens and Domitilla were condemned was, according to Dio Cassius, that of "Judaizing," from which in the popular mind Christianity was hardly distinguishable. The religious charge was regarded by Suetonius as a most trivial one, the object of suspicion rather than of proof,—"tenuissima ex suspicione,"—but it was strengthened by a neglect of the ordinary usages of Roman social and political life, almost unavoidable by a Christian, which was regarded as "a most contemptible indolence" meriting severe animadversion. Clemens suffered death; his wife Domitilla was banished to one of the islands off the west coast of Italy. [DOMITILLA] (Sueton. Domit. § 15; Dio Cassius, Hist. lxxvii. 14; Tillemont, tom. ii. p. 124; Merivale, Romans under the Empire; vol. vii. c. lxii. p. 383; Lightfoot, Philippians, p. 22.) [E. V.]

(2) Bishop of Ancyra and martyr under Diocletian and Maximian Jan. 23 (Menol. Basil.). He is said to have been the son of a heathen father and a Christian mother, Euphrosyne, who prophesied his martyrdom. The narrative relating to him is very dubious. (Till. Mém. v. 162.) [E. B. B.]

(3) (Κλήμης), a Greek historian and chronologer. He is described by Suidas (s. v.) as having written a history of the Roman kings and emperors, and also as having written to Hieronymus concerning the rhetorical figures of Isocrates. Suidas cites Clemens under the words Ζάλην (on which see also the Etymologicon Magnum), "Ἦρας δὲ and Παλίμβολος. It is impossible to test the suspicion expressed by Ruhnkens (Praef. ad Timaei Lexicon), that Suidas has here confounded two different Clemens, a grammarian and a historian. The historian Clemens is quoted as an authority by Cedrenus (Hist. Comp. p. 19), by an anonymous writer in his Demonstrationes Chronographicae, published by Combesis, p. 32; by Hesychius in Natalem Christi, and by Joannes Malalas, pp. 39, 295, 298, 312, b. 155, Hody's edition. Hody places this Clement in the 8th century, his argument consisting of an attempt to shew that the Constantine son of Constantius, mentioned in one of the passages just referred to, must have been Constantine Pogonatus, who died A.D. 685. But Hody has been sufficiently refuted by Cave (Biog. Lit. p. 569) who shews that Malalas, who quotes Clement could not have been much later than the death of Justinian, A.D. 565; and that therefore the Constantine in question must have been Constantine the Great. There are no other data to fix the date of this Clement. We shall probably not be far wrong in placing him in the 5th century. [G. S.]

CLEMENS. (4) When St. Boniface was enforcing submission to the papal authority in Germany, as part of the Christian law, he was keenly opposed by the Irish missionaries. Of these Clemens or Clement is one of the most prominent, and with Adelbert, a Frankish bishop, was condemned and excommunicated at a Roman synod held in the year 745 (or as others say, 748) by pope Zachary at the instigation of Boniface. He probably died in prison; his opinions and conduct have been much traduced in the exigencies of the ecclesiastical quarrels. (Neander, Ch. Hist. v. 77 sq.; Bonifacius, Opp. ii. pass.; Mosheim, Ecol. Hist. i. cent. viii. c. 5; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. 326-7.)

(5) March 20.—On this day. Colgan (Acta SS. 696 sq.) gives a memoir of St. Clemens, whom he calls Claudius Clemens, bishop of Auxerre and founder of the university of Paris, but Lanigan, (Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 207 sq.) in his account of St. Clemens, strips him of the "Claudius" and the two designations. He was a Hibernian Scot, who went over to Gaul about the beginning of Charlemagne's reign (A.D. 772), and was well received by that monarch. He was one of a band of learned men who resorted to France during that reign, and occupied a large space in the field of education. St. Clemens was entrusted with the education of boys of all classes, and was made responsible to the king for their progress, his school being probably in Paris, while his companion's was at Pavia. He probably outlived his patron, but little of his history remains to us except the fame of his name, which attracted scholars even from Germany to be instructed by him. Unfortunately he has been confounded with so many others, like Clemens bishop of Auxerre, who died in the beginning of the 8th century, and a Claudius who flourished in the beginning of the 9th, that it is now impossible to define with any precision what really belongs to him. The chief authority upon his life is the anonymous Monk of St. Gall, in his two books De Gestis Caroli Mag. in Canisius's

Antiq. Lect. tom. ii. pt. iii. 57 sq. (Fordun, Scotichron. B. iii. c. 51; Ware, Ir. Writ. 15-6; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. 326-7; Prim. Ch. Hist. I. 350.) [J. G.]

CLEMENS ROMANUS. According to common tradition, one of the first, if not the first, bishop of Rome after the apostles, and certainly a leading member of that church towards the end of the 1st century. So much that is legendary has been connected with the name of Clement that it is necessary carefully to sift the authorities which speak of him.

(1.) Among the most authentic proofs of the connection of Clement with the Roman church may be placed the mention of his name in its liturgy. It is notorious that the early Christians did not think it necessary on the death of a bishop to discontinue the mention of his name in their public prayers. Consequently those who were first mentioned by name in the prayers of a church would naturally remain commemorated in its liturgy. Now the Roman canon of the mass to this day, next after the names of the apostles, recites the names of Linus, Cletus, Clements; and we shall presently see reason to think that the liturgy contained the same names in the same order so early as the 2nd century. We may then probably conclude that this commemoration dates from Clement's own time, and that Clement is one of the three members of the Roman church who were first specially mentioned in its prayers.

(2.) An independent proof that Clement held high position in the church of Rome is afforded by the Shepherd of Hermas, a work not later than the episcopate of Pius (A.D. 141-156), the writer of which claims to have been contemporary with Clement. He represents himself as commissioned to write for Clement the book of his Visions in order that Clement might send it to foreign cities, that being his function; while Hermas himself was to read the Vision at Rome with the elders who presided over the church. In other words, Clement is recognized as the organ by which the church of Rome communicated with foreign churches; but the passage does not decide whether or not Clement was superior to other presbyters in the domestic government of the church.

(3.) Next in antiquity among the notices of Clement is the general ascription to him of the Epistle to the Church of Corinth, commonly known as Clement's first epistle. This is written in the name of the church of Rome, and neither in the address nor in the body of the letter contains any mention of Clement's name, yet he seems to have been from the first everywhere recognised as its author. We may not unreasonably infer from the passage just cited from Hermas that the letter was even then celebrated. About A.D. 170 it is expressly mentioned by Dionysius bishop of Corinth, who, acknowledging another letter written from the church of Rome to the church of Corinth by their then bishop Soter, states that their former letter written by Clement was still read from time to time in their Sunday assemblies. Eusebius (H. E. iii. 16) speaks of this public reading of Clement's epistle as the ancient custom of very many churches, and as having continued down to his own time. In the same place (and in H. E. iv. 22) he reports that Heges-sippus, whose historical work was written in the episcopate next after Soter's, and who had previously visited both Rome and Corinth, gives particulars concerning the epistle of Clement, and concerning the dissensions in the Corinthian church which had given rise to it. The epistle is cited as Clement's by Irenaeus (adv. Haer. iii. 3), several times by Clement of Alexandria, who in one place gives Clement the title of Apostle (Strom. i. 7, iv. 17, v. 12, vi. 8); by Origen (de Princip. ii. 3, in Ezech. 8, in Joan. i. 29); and in fact on this subject the testimony of antiquity is unanimous. We may infer that a letter which did not bear Clement's name, and which merely purported to come from the church of Rome, could not have been generally known as Clement's, if Clement had not been known at the time as holding the chief position in the church of Rome.

(4.) Last among the notices of Clement which we count worthy to be relied on as historical, we place the statement of Irenaeus in the place already cited, that Clement was third bishop of Rome after the apostles, his account being that the apostles Peter and Paul having founded and built up that church, committed the charge of it to Linus; that Linus was succeeded by Anacletus, and he by Clement. This order is adopted by Eusebius, by Jerome in his Chronicle, and by Eastern chronologers generally.

It is to be owned, however, that a different order of placing these bishops can also lay claim to high antiquity. The ancient catalogue known as the Liberian, because ending with the episcopate of Liberius, gives for the order and duration of the first Roman episcopates:—Peter 25 years, 1 month, 9 days; Linus 12 years, 4 months, 12 days; Clements 9 years, 11 months, 12 days; Cletus 6 years, 2 months, 10 days; Anacletus 12 years, 10 months, 3 days: thus Anacletus, who in the earlier list comes before Clement, is replaced by two bishops, Cletus and Anacletus, who come after him; and this account is repeated in other derived catalogues. Irenaeus himself is not consistent in his way of reckoning the Roman bishops. [See CERDO.] The order, Peter, Linus, Clements, is adopted by Augustine (Ep. 53 ad Generosum) and by Optatus of Milevis (de Schism. Donatist. ii. 2). Tertullian (de Praescrip. c. 32) states that the church of Rome held Clement to have been ordained by Peter; and Jerome (Cat. Scr. Ecc. 15), while adopting the order of Irenaeus, mentions that most Latins then counted Clement to have been second after Peter, and himself seems to adopt this reckoning in his commentary on Isaiah (c. 52). The Apostolic Constitutions (vii. 46) represent Linus to have been first ordained by Paul, and afterwards, on the death of Linus, Clement by Peter. Epiphanius also (Haer. xxvii. 6) suggests that Linus and Cletus held office during the lifetime of Peter and Paul, who on their necessary absence from Rome for apostolic journeys, commended the charge of the church to others. This solution is adopted by Rufinus in the preface to his translation of the Recognitions. Epiphanius has an alternative solution, founded on a conjecture which he tries to support by a reference to a passage in Clement's epistle, viz., that Clement, after having been ordained by Peter, withdrew from his office and did not resume it until after the death of Linus and Cletus. A more modern attempt to reconcile these accounts is Cave's hypothesis that Linus and after him Cletus had been appointed by Paul to preside over a Roman church of Gentile Christians, that Clement had been appointed by Peter over a church of Jewish believers, and that ultimately he was bishop over the whole united church. In still later times it has been argued that the uncertainty of order gives us a right to think that during the 1st century there was no bishop in the church of Rome, and that the names of three of the leading presbyters have been handed down by some in one order, by others in another. The authorities, however, which differ from the account of Irenaeus, seem ultimately to reduce themselves to two. Perhaps the parent of the rest is the letter of Clement to James (see CLEMENTINE LITERATURE) giving an account of Clement's ordination by Peter; for it seems to have been plainly the acceptance of this ordination as historical which inspired the desire to correct a list of bishops which placed Clement at a distance of three from Peter. The other authority is the Chronicle of Hippolytus, published A.D. 235 (see CHRONICON CANISIANUM and the memoir of Mommsen there cited), for it has been satisfactorily shewn that the earlier part of the Liberian catalogue is derived from the list of Roman bishops given by Hippolytus in the work just mentioned. The confusion of later writers is fully explained when we know that they were forced to combine and reconcile, as best they could, conflicting authorities, all of which must have seemed to them fully deserving of confidence: viz. (1) the list of Irenaeus, and probably of Hegesippus, giving merely a succession of Roman bishops; (2) the list of Hippolytus giving a succession in somewhat different order and also the years of the duration of the episcopates; and (3) the letter to James relating the ordination of Clement by Peter. Dismissing then later authorities, the main question is, which is more entitled to confidence, the order of Irenaeus or of Hippolytus, and we have no hesitation in answering the former. First, because it is distinctly the more ancient; secondly, because if the earlier tradition had not placed the undistinguished name Cletus before the well-known Clement, no later writer would have been under any temptation to reverse its order; thirdly, because of the testimony of the liturgy. Hippolytus being apparently the first scientific chronologer in the Roman church, his authority there naturally ranked very high, and his order of the succession of bishops seems to have been generally accepted in the West for a considerable time. Any commemoration therefore introduced into the liturgy after his time would rather have followed his order, Linus, Clemens, Cletus, or if of very late introduction would have left out the obscure name Cletus altogether, in the same way that the immediate successors of these three have been omitted. We must conclude then that the commemoration in the order, Linus, Cletus, Clemens, had been introduced before the time of Hippolytus, and was at that time so firmly established that even the contradictory result arrived at by Hippolytus had no power to alter it. If it be asked what inducement had Hippolytus to deviate from the order which he found acknowledged in his church we can readily answer, his acceptance as historically true of the ordination of Clement by Peter as related in the epistle to James. The Recognitions are cited by Origen, who was contemporary with Hippolytus; and the account which their preface gives of Clement's ordination seems to have been fully believed by the Roman church. This appears from the passage in Tertullian already cited, and Tertullian's intimate acquaintance with the beliefs of the Roman church in the time of Hippolytus is shewn by his adopting in his treatise against the Jews the date which Hippolytus was led by an erroneous astronomical computation to assign to the passion of our Lord, as the table engraved on his chair still exhibits. Now Hippolytus must have found chronological difficulties in reconciling the fact of Clement's ordination by Peter with the order, Linus, Cletus, Clemens. The death of Clement and the consequent accession of Evaristus is dated by Eusebius in his Chronicle A.D. 95, and in his Church History the third year of Trajan, A.D. 100. The list of Hippolytus only giving the lengths of episcopates, and not stating where the reckoning begins, does not immediately present a chronology: but there seems reason to accept the chronology of the Liberian catalogue as in the main what Hippolytus intended. According to this list, the accession of Evaristus is A.D. 95. Now no one dates the death of Peter later than the persecution of Nero, A.D. 67. If, therefore, we count Clement to have been ordained by Peter and retain the order of Irenaeus, we must assign to Clement an episcopate of about 30 years, a length far in excess of what any tradition has ascribed to it. Hippolytus therefore, probably following the then received account of the length of Clement's episcopate, has placed it A.D. 67-76; and has filled up the space between Clement and Evaristus, first by transposing Cletus, and, as the gap seemed too large to be filled up by one episcopate, by counting as distinct the Cletus of the liturgy and the Anenctetus of the earlier catalogue. It would seem that it was Hippolytus who devised the theory stated in the Apostolic Constitutions, that Linus held the bishopric during the lifetime of Peter; for this seems to be the interpretation of the dates assigned in the Liberian catalogue, Peter 30-55, Linus 55-67. But the whole ground of these speculations is removed if we reject the tale of Clement's ordination by Peter; if for no other reason, on account of the chronological confusion which it has caused. We retain then the order of Irenaeus, accounting that of Hippolytus as an arbitrary transposition devised to get over a chronological difficulty. The time that we are thus led to assign to the activity of Clement, viz., the end of the reign of Domitian, coincides with that which Eusebius, apparently on the authority of Hegesippus, assigns to Clement's epistle, and, as we shall presently see, with that to which we are led by an examination of the letter itself.

The result at which we have arrived casts the greatest doubt on the identification of the Roman Clement with the Clement named by Paul in the Epistle to the Philippians iv. 3. This identification is unhesitatingly made by Origen (in Joann. i. 29), and he is followed by a host of later writers. Irenaeus also may have had this passage in his mind when he speaks of Clement as a hearer of the apostles, though probably he was principally influenced by the work which afterwards grew into the Recognitions. But though it is not actually impossible that the Clement who held a leading position in the church of Philippi during Paul's imprisonment might thirty years afterwards have presided over the church of Rome, yet the difference of time and place deprives of all likelihood an identification which has no better ground than agreement in a very common name. Lightfoot has remarked that Tacitus for instance mentions five Clements (Ann. i. 23, ii. 39, xv. 73; Hist. i. 86, iv. 68).

With far more plausibility it has been proposed to identify the author of the epistle with another Clement, whom we have good reason to think to have been at the time a distinguished member of the Roman church. We learn from Suetonius (Domit. 15) and from Dio Cassius, lxxvii. 14, that in the year 95, the very year fixed by some authorities for the death of the bishop Clement, the punishment of death or banishment was inflicted by Domitian on several persons who were addicted to Jewish customs, and that amongst them Flavius Clemens, a relation of his own, whose consulship had but just expired, was put to death on a charge of atheism, while his wife Domitilla, also a member of the emperor's family, was banished. The language is such as heathen writers might naturally use to describe a persecution of Christians; but Eusebius (H. E. iii. 13) expressly claims Domitilla, whom he describes as a niece of the consul's, as a sufferer for Christ; and (Chron. sub anno 95) cites the heathen historian Brutus as stating that several Christians suffered martyrdom at this time. We may then well believe the consul Clement to have been a Christian martyr; and if so, his rank must have given him during his lifetime a foremost position in the Roman church. It is natural to think that the writer of the epistle must have been either the consul, or at least a member of his family. Yet if so, the traditions of the Roman church must have been singularly defective. No writer before Rufinus speaks of the bishop Clement as a martyr; nor does any ancient writer in any way connect him with the consul. It is so common with romance writers to ascribe noble birth to their heroes, that we have no confidence in counting it as more than a chance coincidence that in the Recognitions Clement is represented as a relation of the emperor; not however of Domitian but of Tiberius.

A fabulous account of Clement's martyrdom, probably of no earlier origin than the ninth century, does not deserve to be repeated at length. It tells how Clement was first banished to the Crimea, how he there worked such miracles as to cause the conversion of the whole district, and was thereupon by Trajan's order cast into the sea with an anchor round his neck, an event followed by new prodigies.

We come now to speak of the only genuine work of Clement, the Epistle to the Corinthians already mentioned. The main object of the letter is the restoration of harmony to the Corinthian church which had been disturbed by dissensions. It would appear that the questions at issue concerned rather the discipline than the doctrine of the church. The bulk of the letter is taken up in enforcing the duties of meekness, humility, submission to lawful authority, and but little attempt is made at the refutation of doctrinal error. The only thing looking that way is that some pains are taken to establish the doctrine of the resurrection; but this subject is not connected by the writer with the disputes, and so much use is made of Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians that we cannot lay much stress on the fact that one of the topics of that epistle is fully treated of. The dissensions are said to have been caused by the arrogance of a few self-willed persons who had taken the lead in a revolt against the authority of the presbyters. Their pride probably rested on their possession of spiritual gifts, and some passages favour the conjecture that it may also have rested on the chastity which they practised. Though pains are taken to shew the necessity of a distinction of orders in the church, we cannot infer that this was really questioned by the revolters; for the charge against them that they had unwarrantably deposed from the office of presbyter, certain who had filled it blamelessly, implies that the office continued to be recognised by them. But this unauthorised deposition naturally led to a schism, and it is likely enough that representations made at Rome by some of the persons ill-treated led to the letter of Clement. It is just possible that we can name one of these persons. At the end of the letter a wish is expressed that the messengers of the Roman church, Ephebus and Bito, with Fortunatus also, might be sent back speedily with tidings of restored harmony. The form of expression distinguishing Fortunatus from the Roman delegates favours the supposition that he was a Corinthian, and as Clement urges on those who had been the cause of dissension to withdraw for peace sake, assured that they would find a welcome everywhere, it is possible that Fortunatus might have so withdrawn and found a home at Rome. Another conjecture identifies him with the Fortunatus mentioned in the Epistle to the Corinthians.

However precarious this identification may be, internal evidence shews that the epistle is not so far from apostolic times as to make it impossible. None of the apostles is spoken of as living, but the deaths of Peter and Paul, who are described as men of their own generation, are referred to as then recent, and of the presbyters appointed by the apostles some are spoken of as still surviving. The early date thus indicated is confirmed by the absence of allusion to the topics which were the subject of controversy in the 2nd century, and by the immaturity of doctrinal development on certain points. Thus the words bishop and presbyter, are, as in the New Testament, used convertibly, and there is no trace that in the church of Corinth one presbyter had any very pronounced authority over the rest. The deposition of certain presbyters is spoken of neither as an exercise of the usurped authority of any single person, nor as an infringement on the lawful authority of any single person, but rather as on that of the whole body of presbyters. Again to the writer the Scriptures are the books of the Old Testament; these he cites most copiously and uses to enforce his arguments. He makes express mention of Paul's Epistle to the Corinthians; and he twice reminds his hearers of words of our Lord. The quotations being in substantial but not in verbal agreement with our gospels leave it uncertain whether he is quoting these loosely or using other sources, but the assumption that members of a distant church will be able to remember the words which he quotes, implies the existence of written records recognised by both parties. Besides these, without any formal citation he makes unmistakable use of other New Testament books, the Epistle to the Hebrews being that most largely employed, but use being also made of the Epistle to the Romans and other Pauline, including the Pastoral, epistles, the Book of the Acts, the Epistle of James, and Peter's first epistle. Still, the authority of these documents is not appealed to in support of his arguments in the same manner as that of the books of the Old Testament is urged. It may be mentioned here that Clement's epistle contains the earliest recognition of the Book of Judith. He quotes also from Old Testament apocryphal books or interpolations not now extant.

In order to fix more closely the date of the epistle, the principal fact available is, that in the opening an apology is made for that the church of Rome had not been able to give earlier attention to the Corinthian disputes, owing to the sudden and repeated calamities which had befallen it. It is generally agreed that this must refer to the persecution either under Nero or under Domitian. A date about midway between these is that to which the phenomena of the epistle would have inclined us; but having to choose between these two we have no hesitation in preferring the later. The main argument in favour of the earlier date, that the temple service is spoken of as being still offered, is satisfactorily met by the occurrence of a quite similar use of the present tense in Josephus. Indeed the passage carefully considered suggests the opposite inference; for Clement would Judaize to an extent of which there is no sign elsewhere in the epistle, if in case the temple rites were being still celebrated he were to speak of them as the appointed and acceptable way of serving God. All the other notes of time are hard to be reconciled with a date so close to the apostles as the reign of Nero.

It has been disputed whether the writer of the letter was a Jew or a Gentile, and the arguments are not absolutely decisive either way; but it seems to us more conceivable that a Hellenistic Jew resident at Rome could have acquired as much knowledge of Roman history and of heathen literature as is exhibited in the epistle, than that one not familiar from his childhood with the Old Testament Scriptures could possess so intimate an acquaintance with them as is displayed by Clement. This consideration, of course, bears on the question whether Flavius Clemens could have been the writer of the letter.

The letter of Clement quite fails to yield any support to the prominence which certain theories concerning the history of the 1st century give to disputes between a Pauline and an anti-Pauline party in the church. It would seem that such disputes had quite died out before the time when the letter was written. They appear to have had no influence on the dissensions at Corinth; and at Rome the Gentile and Jewish sections of the church seem in Clement's time to be completely fused. The obligation on Gentiles to observe the Mosaic law is neither asserted nor controverted, but seems to be nowhere a matter of dispute. The whole Christian community is regarded as the inheritor of the promises to the Jewish people. There seems to have been in Clement's mind no idea of rivalry between Peter and Paul. He holds both in the highest honour, modelling his own theological language on that of Paul, yet writing as one whose bent was practical rather than speculative, and who had not been educated by controversy to take notice of subtle doctrinal distinctions.

The epistle had till lately been known only through a single MS., the great Alexandrian MS. brought to England in the year 1628, of which an account is given in all works on the criticism of the New Testament. One leaf, containing about the tenth part of the whole letter, has been lost. In this Greek Bible of the 5th century the two letters of Clement to the Corinthians are found enumerated among the books of the New Testament, not placed however in company with the apostolic epistles, but coming after the Apocalypse. It is natural to infer that the ecclesiastical use of Clement's letter had not quite died out at the time the MS. was copied. The epistle was first edited by Patrick Young, Oxford, 1633, and has been repeatedly published since, among the most important editions being Cotelier's in his Apostolic Fathers, Paris, 1672; Jacobson's; Hilgenfeld's in his Norum Testamentum extra Canonem receptum; Lightfoot's, Cambridge, 1869; Tischendorf's, Leipzig, 1873; and Gebhardt and Harnack's, Leipzig, 1875. A photograph of this portion of the MS. was also published by Sir F. Madden in 1856.

Since the publication of the above-mentioned editions, an entirely new authority for the text of the epistle has been gained by the discovery in the library of the Holy Sepulchre at Fanari, in Constantinople, of a manuscript containing an un mutilated text of the two epistles ascribed to Clement.* The discovery was made known, and the new authority first used in establishing the text, in a very careful and able edition of the epistles by Bryennius, metropolitan of Serrae, published in Constantinople at the end of 1875. The newly discovered MS., which is cursive and dated A.D. 1056, is contained in a small octavo volume, 7½ inches by 6, which has, besides the epistles of Clement, Chrysostom's synopsis of the Old Testament, the epistle of Barnabas, the teaching of the twelve apostles (occupying in the MS. less space by one-fourth than the second epistle of Clement) and a collection of Ignatian epistles. It gives a very good text of the Clementine letters, independent of the Alexandrian MS., but on the whole in tolerably close agreement with it, even in passages where the best critics had suspected error. Besides filling up small lacunae in the text of the older MS., it supplies the contents of the entire leaf which had been lost. This part contains a passage quoted by Basil, but not another quoted by Pseudo-Justin, confirmed in some degree by Irenaeus, which had been referred to this place (see Lightfoot, p. 166). Yet although in two places a break of connexion suggests that two or three words must have dropped out, except for some such trifling omission we have the letter now as complete as it was originally in the Alexandrian MS. For Harnack has found on counting the letters in the recovered portion that they amount almost exactly to the average contents of a leaf of the older MS. Lightfoot has pointed out that by a small change in the text of Ps.-Justin, his reference is satisfied by a passage in the newly discovered conclusion of the second epistle. The new portion of the first principally consists of a prayer, possibly founded on the liturgical use of the Roman church. What had been said in the beginning of the letter as to the calamities under which that church had suffered is illustrated by some of the petitions, e.g. that God would deliver them from those that hated them unjustly; that He would save those of them that were in affliction; that He would raise up those who had fallen, would feed the hungry and redeem their prisoners. In accordance with the directions of 1 Tim. ii. prayer is made for their earthly rulers, that they themselves might submit to them, recognising the honour given them by God, and not opposing His will; and that the rulers might have health, peace, and stability, and that He would direct their counsels, so that they might administer without offence, in peace and meekness, the authority that He had given them. Very noticeable in this new part of the letter is the tone of authority used by the Roman church in making an unsolicited interference with the affairs of another church. "If any disobey the words spoken by God through us, let them know that they will entangle themselves in transgression, and no small danger, but we shall be clear from this sin." "You will cause us joy and exultation if, obeying the things written by us through the Holy Spirit, you cut out the lawless passion of your jealousy according to the intercession which we have made for peace and concord in this letter. But we have sent faithful and discreet men who have walked from youth to old age unblamably amongst us, who shall be witnesses between us and you. This have we done that you may know that all our care has been and is that you may speedily be at peace." It remains open for controversy how far the expressions quoted indicate official superiority of the Roman church, or whether only the writer's conviction of the goodness of their cause. It may be added that the epithet applied by Irenaeus to the epistle ικανωτάτη turns out to have been suggested by a phrase in the letter itself, ικανῶς ἐπιστείλαμεν.

For a list of works on the literature of the epistle, we refer to Lightfoot, who also gives references to a succession of writers who have quoted the epistle. The chief early quotations were collected in the Testimonia Veterum prefixed to Young's edition, and the list has been extended by subsequent editors. Polycarp, though not formally quoting Clement's epistle, gives in several passages clear proof of his acquaintance with it. A passage in Ignatius's epistle to Polycarp c. 5, may also be set down as derived from Clement, but other parallels collected by Hilgenfeld are extremely doubtful. The epistle does not seem to have been translated into Latin, and was consequently little known in the West.

Some of the spurious works ascribed to Clement are the subject of separate articles, see APOSTOLIC CANONS, APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTIONS, LITURGY, CLEMENTINE LITERATURE. Of the other writings ascribed to him, the first place is due to the Second Epistle to the Corinthians. This letter also formed part of the Alexandrian MS., but the conclusion of it had been lost by mutilation. We have it now complete in the edition of Bryennius above mentioned.

In the list of contents of the older MS. it is marked as Clement's second epistle, but it is not expressly described as an epistle to the Corinthians. It is so described in the later MS. It is not mentioned by any writer before Eusebius, and the language used by some of them is inconsistent with their having accepted it. Eusebius mentions it as a second letter ascribed to Clement, but not, like the former, used by the older writers, and he only speaks of one as the acknowledged epistle of Clement. The two epistles of Clement are placed among the books of the New Testament, in the 8th book of the Apostolic Constitutions, which probably belongs to the 6th century. The second epistle is first expressly cited as to the Corinthians by Severus of Antioch in the early part of the same century. Internal evidence, though adverse to the Clementine authorship, assigns to the work a date not later than the second century, and probably the first half of it. The writer is distinctly a Gentile, and contrasts himself and his readers with the Jewish nation in a manner quite unlike the genuine Clement: and his quotations are not, like Clement's, almost exclusively from the Old Testament; the gospel history is largely cited, and once under the name of Scripture. Many of the quotations however differ from our canonical gospels, and since one of them agrees with a passage referred by Clement of Alexandria to the gospel of the Egyptians, this was probably the source of other quotations also. The epistle would therefore seem to be earlier than the close of the second century, at which time our four gospels were in a position of exclusive authority. The controversies with which the writer has to deal are those of the early part of the 2nd century. In language suggested by the epistle to the Ephesians, the spiritual church is described as created before the sun and moon, as the female of whom Christ is the male, the body of which he is the soul. It seems likely that the work using this language had gained its acceptance with the church before Gnostic theories concerning the Aeon Christ and Ecclesia had brought discredit on such speculations. The doctrine of the pre-existence of the church is, as Harnack has noted, one of several points of contact between this work and the Shepherd of Hermas, making it probable that both emanate from the same age and the same circle. We therefore refer the place of composition to Rome, notwithstanding an apparent reference to the Isthmian games which favours the idea of a connexion with Corinth. But the description of the work as an epistle to the Corinthians which had never been strongly supported by external evidence, is disproved by the newly discovered conclusion, whence it clearly appears that the work is, as Dodwell and others had supposed, no epistle, but a homily. There seems no sufficient reason for refusing to believe that the work was really, as it is professedly, composed with a view to its being publicly read in church, and therefore that the writer's position in the church was one which would secure that the use which he intended would be made of his work. But the writer does not claim for himself any position of superiority, and the foremost place in ruling and teaching the church is attributed by him to the body of presbyters. The writer nowhere claims to be Clement, and, from what has already been said, he must have been at least a generation later. But it is not strange either that an anonymous, but undoubtedly early document of the Roman church should come to be ascribed to the universally acknowledged author of the earliest document of that church; or that when both had come to be received as Clement's, the second should come to be regarded as, like the first, an epistle to the Corinthians.

The two epistles on Virginitv.—These are extant only in Syriac, and are only preserved in a single MS. This was one purchased at Aleppo about A.D. 1750, for Wetstein, for the purposes of his Greek Testament. He had commissioned a copy of the Philoxenian version to be bought, and this MS. proved to be only a copy of the well-known Peshito. But the disappointment was compensated by the unexpected discovery of these letters, till then absolutely unknown in the West. After the epistle to the Hebrews, the last in the Peshito canon, the scribe adds a doxology, and a note with personal details by which we are enabled to date the MS. A.D. 1470, and then proceeds "We subjoin to the epistles of Paul those epistles of the apostles, which are not found in all the copies," on which follow 2 Peter, 2, 3 John and Jude, from the Philoxenian version, and then, without any break, these letters, with the titles: "The first epistle of the blessed Clement, the disciple of Peter the apostle," and "The second epistle of the same Clement." The MS. is now preserved in the library of the Seminary of the Remonstrants at Amsterdam. The letters were published as an appendix to his Greek Testament, by Wetstein, who also defended their authenticity. The last editor is Beelen, Louvain, 1856. The letters, though now only extant in Syriac, are proved to be a translation from the Greek by the Græcisms which they contain, and by the existence of a fragment containing what would seem to be a different Syriac translation of one passage in these epistles. This fragment is contained in a MS. bearing the date A.D. 562. The earliest writer who quotes these letters is Epiphanius. In a passage, which until the discovery of the Syriac letters had been felt as perplexing, he describes Clement as "in the encyclical letters which he wrote, and which are read in the holy churches," having taught virginitv, and praised Elias and David and Samson, and all the prophets. The letters to the Corinthians cannot be described as encyclical; and the topics specified are not treated of in them, while they are dwelt on in the Syriac letters. St. Jerome, though in his catalogue of ecclesiastical writers he follows Eusebius in mentioning only the two letters to the Corinthians as ascribed to Clement, yet must be understood as referring to the letters on virginitv in his treatise against Jovinian where he speaks of Clement as composing almost his entire discourse concerning the purity of virginitv. He may have become acquainted with these letters during his residence in Palestine.

The presumption against the genuineness of these letters, arising from the absence of notice of them by Eusebius and every other writer anterior to Epiphanius, and from the limited circulation which they appear ever to have attained in the church, is absolutely confirmed by internal evidence. The style and the whole colouring of the letters are utterly unlike those of the genuine epistle; and the writer is evidently one whose whole thoughts and language have been moulded by long and early acquaintance with the New Testament, in the same manner as those of the real Clement are by his acquaintance with the Old. The Gospel of St. John is more than once cited, but not any apocryphal New Testament book. The great object of the second letter, is to insist that men who have taken vows of chastity should not give cause for scandal by conversing privately with women, or accepting hospitable attentions from them, but it scarcely appears that the abuses against which the writer contends proceeded so far as those against which Cyprian remonstrated. Competent judges have assigned these epistles to the middle of the 2nd century, but their arguments hardly suffice to exclude a somewhat later date.

The Epistles to James our Lord's brother.—In the article CLEMENTINE LITERATURE is given an account of the letter to James by Clement, which relates how Peter, in immediate anticipation of death, ordained Clement as his successor, and gave him charge concerning his ministry. After the translation of this letter by Rufinus, some Latin writer added a second, giving instruction concerning the administration of the Eucharist and other matters of church discipline. These two letters had considerable currency in the West. In the forged decretals both these letters were much enlarged, and three new letters purporting to be Clement's were added.

It is worthy of remark how James, who in the original Clementines is the head of the church, is made in the later epistle to receive instruction and commands from Peter's successor Clement. There must have been yet other letters ascribed to Clement in the East if there be no error in the MS. of Leontius (Mai, Script. Vet. Noc. Coll. vii. 84), who cites a passage not elsewhere extant as from the ninth letter of Clement. Discourses concerning Providence and the righteous judgment of God are cited by Anastasius of Antioch; and a writer of the 13th century (Spicilegium Acherianum, viii. 382) reports having seen in a Saracen MS. a book of Revelations of Peter, compiled by Clement. [G. S.]

CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA [TITUS FLAVIUS CLEMENS]. It will be convenient to notice in succession: i. The personal Details of Clement's Life; ii. His Works; and iii. His Position and Influence in the Development of Christian Doctrine and Thought.

i. The Life of Clement.—The full name of Clement, Titus Flavius Clemens, is given by Eusebius (Il. E. vi. 13) and Photius (Cod. 111) in the title of the Stromateis (Τίτου Φλαυίου Κλήμεντος [Photius adds πρεσβυτέρου Ἀλεξανδρείας] τῶν κατὰ τὴν ἀληθῆ φιλοσοφίαν γνωστικῶν ὑπομνημάτων στρωματείς). The remarkable coincidence of the name with that of Titus Flavius Clemens, nephew of Vespasian and consul in 95 [CLEMENS FLAVIUS], cannot have been accidental, but no direct evidence enables us to determine what was Clement's connexion with the imperial Flavian family. Perhaps he was descended from a freedman of the consul; and at any rate his wide and varied learning indicates that he had received a liberal education, and so far suggests that his parents occupied a good social position.

The place of Clement's birth is not certainly known. Epiphanius, the earliest authority on the question, observes casually that two opinions were held in his time, "some saying that he was an Alexandrian, others that he was an Athenian" (ὅν φασὶ τινες Ἀλεξανδρῆα ἕτεροι δὲ Ἀθηναῖον, Haer. xxxii. 6). There are obvious reasons why he should be called an Alexandrine, since Alexandria was without doubt the principal scene of his labours; but there was no apparent reason for connecting him with Athens by mere conjecture. The statement that he was an Athenian must therefore have rested upon some direct tradition that he was born or educated there. That this was the case follows also by a natural deduction from the description which he gives of his Christian training. In recounting his wanderings he makes Greece the starting-point and Alexandria the goal of his search (Strom. i. § 11, p. 322); and in the 2nd century Athens was still the centre of the literary and spiritual life of Greece.

We may then with reasonable probability conclude that Clement was an Athenian by training if not by origin, and the fact that he was at the head of the catechetical school of Alexandria towards the close of the century fixes the date of his birth about A.D. 150-160. Nothing is recorded of his parentage; but his own language seems to imply that he embraced Christianity by a personal act, as in some sense a convert (Paed. i. § 1, p. 97, τὰς παλαιὰς ἀπομυθήμενὸν δόξας; comp. Paed. ii. § 62, p. 206, δάκρῳ ἔσμεν . . . οἱ εἰς αὐτὸν πεπιστευκότες), and this is directly affirmed by Eusebius (Præp. Ec. ii. 2 f.), though it is doubtful whether he speaks from independent knowledge or simply gives an inference from Clement's words. Such a conversion would not be irreconcilable with the belief that Clement, like Augustine, was of Christian parentage at least on one side; but whether Clement's parents were Christians or heathens it is evident that heathenism attracted him for a time; and though he soon overcame its attractions, his inquisitive spirit did not at once find rest in Christianity. He enumerates six illustrious teachers under whom he studied the "true tradition of the blessed doctrine of the holy apostles." His first teacher in Greece was an Ionian (Athenagoras?); others he heard in Magna Graecia; others in the East; and at last he found in Egypt the true master for whom he had before sought in vain (Strom. i. § 11, p. 322). There can be no doubt that this master was Pantaenus, to whom he is said to have expressed his obligations in his Hypotyposes (Euseb. H. E. vi. 13; v. 11). Pantaenus was at the time the chief of the catechetical school, and though the accounts of Eusebius and Jerome (Euseb. H. E. v. 10; Hieron. de Vir. iii. 36, 38) are irreconcilable in their details and chronology, it cannot be questioned that on the death or retirement of Pantaenus, Clement succeeded to his office, and it is not unlikely that he had acted as his colleague before. The period during which Clement presided over the catechetical school (c. A.D. 190-203) seems to have been the season of his greatest literary activity. He was now a presbyter of the church (Paed. i. § 37, p. 120) and he had the glory of reckoning Origen among his scholars. On the outbreak of the persecution under Severus (A.D. 202, 203) in which Leonidas the father of Origen perished, Clement retired from Alexandria (Euseb. H. E. vi. 3) never, as it seems, to return. Nothing is directly stated as to the place of his withdrawal. There are some indications that he made a visit to Syria (Euseb. H. E. vi. 11, ὃν ἴσται); and at a later date we find him in the company of an old pupil, Alexander, afterwards bishop of Jerusalem, and at that time a bishop of Cappadocia, who was in prison for the faith. If therefore Clement had before withdrawn from danger, it was through wisdom and not through fear. Alexander regarded his presence as due to "a special providence" (comp. Euseb. H. E. vi. 14), and charged him, in most honourable terms, with a letter of congratulation to the church of Antioch on the appointment of Asclepiades to the bishopric of that city, A.D. 311 (Euseb. H. E. vi. 11). This is the last mention of Clement which has been preserved. The time and the place of his death are alike unknown. Popular opinion reckoned him among the saints of the church; and he was commemorated in the early Western martyrologies on Dec. 4. His name, however, was omitted in the martyrology issued by Clement VIII. after the corrections of Baronius; and Benedict XIV. elaborately defended the omission, which called forth some protests, in a letter to John V. king of Portugal, dated 1748. In this letter Benedict argued that the teaching of Clement was at least open to suspicion, and that private usage would not entitle him to a place in the calendar. (Benedicti XIV. Opera, vi. pp. 119 ff. ed. 1842, where the evidence is given in detail; comp. Cognat, Clément d'Alexandrie, pp. 451 ff.)

ii. The Works of Clement.—Eusebius, whom Jerome follows closely with some mistakes (De Vir. iii. 38) has given a list of the works of Clement (H. E. vi. 13): (1) Στρωματεῖς, libb. viii.; (2) Ἐπιτομῶσεις, libb. viii.; (3) Πρὸς Ἕλληνας λόγος προτρεπτικός (adversus Gentes, Jerome); (4) Παιδαγωγός, libb. iii.; (5) Τὸ εἰς σωζόμενος πλούσιος; (6) Περὶ τοῦ πάσχα; (7) Διαλέξεις περὶ νηστείας; (8) Περὶ καταλαλίας; (9) Προτρεπτικός εἰς ὑπομονὴν ἢ πρὸς τοὺς γεωστί βεβαπτισμένους (omitted by Jerome); (10) Κατὰ ἐκκλησιαστικὸν ἢ πρὸς τοὺς Ἰουδαίους (De Cimonibus Ecclesiasticis et adversum eos qui Judaeorum sequuntur errorem, Jerome).

Photius (Bibl. Codd. 109-111) mentions that he read the first five works on the list, and knew by report 6, 7, 8 (περὶ κακολογίας); 10, (περὶ κανόνων ἐκκλησιαστικῶν); from the variations in the titles and the omission of 9, it is evident that he derived his knowledge of these simply from the secondary Greek version of Jerome's list.

With the exception of 2, the first five works are still preserved almost entire. Of 2 considerable fragments remain; and of 6, 8, 10, a few fragments have been preserved in express quotations.

Quotations are also found from a treatise περὶ προνοίας, and from another, περὶ ψυχῆς, to which Clement himself refers (Strom. iii. 13, p. 516; v. 88, p. 699). Elsewhere Clement speaks of his intention to write On First Principles (περὶ ἀρχῶν, Strom. iii. 13, p. 516; id. 21, p. 520; comp. iv. 2, p. 564); On Prophecy (Strom. v. 88, p. 699; id. iv. 93, p. 605); Against Heresies (Strom. iv. 92, p. 604); On the Resurrection (Paed. i. 6, p. 125); On Marriage (Paed. iii. 8, p. 278).

But it may be questioned whether the references may not be partly to sections of his greater works, and partly to designs which he never carried out (comp. Strom. iv. 1-3, pp. 563 f.). No doubt has ever been raised as to the genuineness of the Address, the Tutor, and the Miscellanies. Internal evidence shews that they are all the work of one writer (comp. Reinkens, de Clemente, cap. ii. § 4), and they have been quoted as Clement's by a continuous succession of fathers even from the time of Origen (Comun. in Joh. ii. 3, p. 52 B; Strom.; anonymous). These three principal extant works form a connected series. The first is an exhortation to the heathen to embrace Christianity, based on an exposition of the comparative character of heathenism and Christianity: the second offers a system of training for the new convert, with a view to the regulation of his conduct as a Christian: the third is an introduction to Christian philosophy. The series was further continued in the lost Outlines (ὑποτυπώσεις), in which Clement laid the foundation of his philosophic structure in an investigation of the canonical writings. The mutual relations of these writings leave no doubt that Clement proposed to himself to construct a complete system of Christian teaching, corresponding with the "whole economy of the gracious Word, who first addresses, then trains, and then teaches" (Paed. i. 1), bringing to man in due succession conviction, discipline, wisdom. The first three books correspond in a remarkable degree, as has frequently been remarked (Potter, ad Protrept. i.), with the stages of the Neo-Platonic course, the Purification (ἀποκάθαρσις) the Initiation (μύησις), and the Vision (ἐπιπείρα). The fourth book was probably designed to give a solid basis to the truths which were fleeting and unreal in systems of philosophy. If Clement had done no more than conceive such a plan his service to "the Gospel of the Kingdom" would not have been unfruitful. As it is, the execution of his work, if it falls short of the design, is still full of precious lessons. And when it is frankly admitted that his style is generally deficient in terseness and elegance; that his method is desultory; that his learning is undigested: we can still thankfully admire his richness of information, his breadth of reading, his largeness of sympathy, his lofty aspirations, his noble conception of the office and capacities of the Faith.

I. The Address to the Greeks (Λόγος προτρεπτικός πρὸς Ἕλληνας: comp. Strom. vii. § 22, p. 421, ἐν τῷ προτρεπτικῷ ἐπιγραφομένῳ ἡμῖν λόγῳ).—The works of Clement were composed in the order in which they have been mentioned. The Address was written before the Tutor, which contains a reference to it in the first section (ὁ λόγος ὁπρὶνὰ μὲν ἐπὶ σωτηρίαν παρεκάλει, προτρεπτικὸς ὄνομα αὐτῷ ἦν: comp. Strom. vii. § 22; Pott. p. 841); and, if we can trust the assertion of Eusebius (H. E. v. 28), some of Clement's works were composed before the accession of Victor (A.D. 192). Putting these two facts together, we may reasonably suppose that the Address was written c. A.D. 190. It was addressed to Greeks and not to Gentiles, generally, as Jerome understood the word (adversus gentes, De Vir. Ill. 38). This appears from the entire contents of the book, which deals almost exclusively with Greek mythology and Greek speculation. Nor is there anything unnatural in supposing that in his first work Clement, the Athenian student, wrote with a direct reference to men who had once shared his speculations and had not yet gained his resting-place.

The general aim of the Address is to prove the superiority of Christianity to the religions and the philosophies of heathendom, while it satisfies the cravings of humanity to which they bore witness. The gospel is, as Clement shews with consummate eloquence, the New Song more powerful than that of Orpheus or Arion, new and yet older than the creation (c. 1), pure and spiritual as contrasted with the sensuality and idolatry of the pagan rites, clear and substantial as compared with the vague hopes of poets and philosophers (2-9). In such a case, he argues, custom cannot be pleaded against the duty of conversion. Man is born for God, and is bound to obey the call of God who through the Word is waiting to make him like unto Himself. The choice is between judgment and grace, between destruction and life: can the issue then be doubtful (10-12)?

It would not be difficult to point out errors in taste, in fact, in argument throughout Clement's appeal: on the other hand it would be perhaps impossible to shew in any earlier work, passages like those in which he describes the mission of the Word, the Light of men (p. 88) and pictures the true destiny of man (pp. 92 ff.).

Manuscripts.—The Address is preserved in the following MSS.:

1. Cod. Paris. Bibl. Imp. 451. Saec. x. (914 A.D.). Collated by Dindorf, in whose edition it is marked P. This MS. contains Scholia on the work, which are printed in Klotz and Dindorf.

2. Cod. Mutin. Bibl. Palat. iii. d. 7. Saec. xi. Collated by Dindorf, in whose edition it is marked M. This MS. also contains Scholia; generally coincident with those in P, but with some later additions.

3. Cod. Oxon. Coll. Novi 139. Saec. xv. Collated for Potter, and worthy of a second and complete examination. Cited by Dindorf (from Potter) as N.

II. The Tutor (ὁ Παιδαγωγός. Comp. Hos. v. 2, quoted in Paed. i. 7, p. 129).—The Tutor was written after the Address (c. A.D. 190), as we have seen, and before the Miscellanies in which the Tutor is described generally (Strom. vi. § 1, p. 736), that is, it was written c. A.D. 190-195. The writer's design was, as he describes it, "to prepare from early years, that is from the beginning of elementary instruction (ἐκ κατηχήσεως), a rule of life growing with the increase of faith, and fitting the souls of those just on the verge of manhood with virtue so as to enable them to receive the higher knowledge of philosophy" (εἰς ἐπιστήμης γνωστικῆς παραδοχῆν, Strom. i. c.).

The main scope of the Tutor is therefore practical: the aim is action and not knowledge; but still action as preparatory to knowledge, and resting upon conviction. It is divided into three books. The first book give a general description of the Tutor, who is the Word Himself (1-3); of the "children" whom He trains, Christian men and women alike (4-6); and of the general method which He follows, using both chastisements and love (7-12). The second and third books deal with special precepts which were designed to meet the actual difficulties of contemporary life and not to offer a theory of morals. And as it would not be easy to find elsewhere, even in the Roman satirists, an equally vivid and detailed picture of heathen manners, so this picture must be vivified before justice can be done to the rules of conduct which Clement lays down. Nay more, Clement must be compared with Tertullian, and the society of Alexandria with the society of Carthage, if we are to appreciate rightly the temper of Clement's instruction. The second book contains general directions as to eating and drinking (1 f.) furniture (3), entertainments (4-8), sleep (9), the relations of men and women (10), the use of jewellery (11 f.). The third book opens with an inquiry into the nature of true beauty (c. 1). This leads to a condemnation of extravagance in dress both in men and in women (2 ff.), of luxurious establishments (4 f.), of the misuse of wealth (6 f.). Frugality and exercise are recommended (8-10); and many minute directions are added—often curiously suggestive in the present times—as to dress and behaviour (11 f.). General instructions from Holy Scripture as to the various duties and offices of life lead up to the prayer to the Tutor—the Word—with which the work closes.

Immediately after the Tutor are printed in the editions of Clement two short poems, which have been attributed to his authorship. The former of these, written in an anapaestic measure, is A Hymn of the Saviour Christ (ὕμνος τοῦ Σωτήρος Χριστοῦ), and the other, written in trimeter iambs is addressed To the Tutor (εἰς τὸν Παιδαγωγόν). There is no evidence, as far as appears, to shew that the second is Clement's work. The first is said to be "Saint Clement's" (τοῦ ἁγίου Κλήμεντος) in those MSS. which contain it; but it may be a work of primitive date like the Morning Hymn which has been preserved in our Communion Office as the Gloria in Excelsis. If it were Clement's, and designed to occupy its present place, it is scarcely possible that it would have been omitted in any MS.; while, on the other hand, it makes an appropriate and natural addition if taken from some other source. The lines To the Tutor cannot be any thing more than an effusion of some pious scholar of a later date than Clement.

Manuscripts.—The Tutor is contained in the following MSS.:

1. Cod. Paris. P. (imperfect at the beginning. Lib. i. capp 1-10, without the hymn).
2. Cod. Mutin. M.
3. Cod. Flor. Bibl. Laur. 5-24. Saec. xi. Collated by Dindorf, in whose edition it is marked F. These MSS. (P, M, F) contain Scholia. Those in M are fullest. Of this MS. there are three secondary copies of the 16th century; B (Bodl. Saec. xvi.); R (Mus. Brit.); P (Palat.); which were used by Potter.

4. Cod. Oxon. N (Saec. xv.) contains books ii, iii., without the hymn.

5. Cod. Ven. (Marc. 652) Saec. xv.

There are several other MSS. of late date which possess no independent value. Comp. Dindorf. Pref. pp. x. and ff.

III. The Miscellanies (Στραματεῖς).^a—The title of this work, the Miscellanies (στραματεῖς, patchwork, or rather bags for holding the bedclothes, like στραματόδεσμοί) suggests a true idea of its character. It is designedly unmethodical, a kind of meadow as Clement describes it, or rather a wooded mountain (vii. § 111), studded irregularly with various growths, and so fitted to exercise the ingenuity and labour of those who were likely to profit by it (vi. § 2, p. 736, Pott.). But in spite of the irregularity of its composition the book is inspired by one thought. It is an endeavour to claim for the gospel the power of fulfilling all the desires of men and of raising to a supreme unity all the objects of knowledge, in the soul of the true gnostic—the perfect Christian philosopher. The first book, which is mutilated at the beginning, treats in the main of the office and the origin of Greek philosophy in relation to Christianity and Judaism. Clement shews that Greek philosophy was part of the Divine education of men, subordinate to the training of the law and the prophets, but yet really from God (§§ 1-58; 91-100). In his anxiety to establish this cardinal proposition he is not content with shewing that the books of the Old Testament are older than those of the philosophers (59-65; 101-164; 180-182); but he endeavours to prove also that the philosophers borrowed from the Jews (66-90; 165 f.). After this he vindicates the character and explains the general scope of the law—"the philosophy of Moses" (167-179).

The main object of the second book is defined to lie in the more detailed exposition of the originality and superiority of the moral teaching of revelation as compared with that of Greek philosophy which was in part derived from it (§§ 1 ff.; 20-24; 78-96). The argument includes an examination of the nature of faith (4-19; 25-31), resting on a godly fear and perfected by love (32-55); and of repentance (56-71). There is some discussion of the sense in which human affections are ascribed to God (72-75); and it is shewn that the conception of the ideal Christian is that of a man made like to God (97-126), in accordance with the noblest aspirations of philosophy (127-136). The book closes with a preliminary discussion of marriage.

The third book is taken up with an investigation of the true doctrine of marriage (§§ 57-60) as against those who indulged in every license on the ground that bodily actions are indifferent (1-11; 25-44); and those on the other hand who abstained from marriage from hatred of the Creator (12-24; 45-46). Various passages of Scripture which were wrongly interpreted by heretics are examined (61-101); and the two main errors are shewn to be inconsistent with Christianity (102-110).

Clement opens the fourth book with a very interesting outline of the whole plan of the comprehensive apology for Christianity on which he had entered (§§ 1-3). The work evidently grew under his hands, and he implies that he could hardly expect to accomplish the complete design. After this sketch he adds fresh traits to the portrait of the true "gnostic," of whose character he had already given some outlines. Self-sacrifice, martyrdom, lies at the root of his nature (8-56; 72-77), a virtue which is within the reach of all states and of men and women alike (57-71), though even this required to be guarded against fanaticism and misunderstanding (78-96). Other virtues, as love and endurance, are touched upon (97-119); and then Clement gives a picture of a godly woman (120-131), and of the gnostic, who rises above fear and hope to that perfection which rests in the knowledge and love of God (132-174).

In the fifth book Clement, following the outline which he had laid down (iv. 1), discusses faith and hope (§§ 1-18), and then passes on to the principle of enigmatic teaching. This, he argues, was followed by heathen and Jewish masters alike (19-26); by Pythagoras (27-31); by Moses, in the ordinances of the tabernacle (32-41); by the Egyptians (42-44); and by many others (45-56). The principle itself is, he maintains, defensible on intelligible grounds (57-60), and supported by the authority of the apostles (61-67). For in fact the knowledge of God can be gained only through serious effort and by divine help (68-89). This review of the character and sources of the highest knowledge leads Clement back to his characteristic proposition that the Greeks borrowed from the Jews the noblest truths of their own philosophy.

The sixth and seventh books are designed, as Clement states (vi. § 1) to shew the character of the Christian philosopher (the gnostic), and so to make it clear that he alone is the true worshipper of God. By way of prelude Clement repeats and enforces at the beginning of the sixth book what he had said on Greek plagiarisms (§§ 4-38) admitting at the same time that the Greeks had some true knowledge of God (39-43), and also affirming that the gospel was preached in Hades to those of them who had lived according to their light (44-53), though that was feeble when compared with the glory of the gospel (54-70). From this point he goes on to sketch the lineaments of the Christian philosopher, who attains to a perfectly passionless state (71-79) and masters for the service of the faith all forms of knowledge which include various mysteries that are open to him only (80-114). The reward of this true philosopher is proportioned to his attainments (115-148). These are practically unlimited in range, for Greek philosophy, even while it was a gift of God for the training of the nations, is only a recreation for the Christian philosopher, in comparison with the serious objects of his study (149-168).

In the seventh book, Clement regards the Christian philosopher as the one true worshipper of God (§§ 1-5), striving to become like the Son of God (5-21), even as the heathen conversely made their gods like themselves (22-27). The soul is his temple: prayers and thanksgivings, his sacrifice: truth, the law of his life (28-54). Other traits are added to the portraiture of "the gnostic" (55-88); and Clement then meets the general objection which was urged against Christianity from the conflict of rival sects (89-92). Heresy, he replies, can be detected by two tests. It is opposed to the testimony of Scripture (93-105); and it is of recent origin (106-108).

At the close of the seventh book Clement remarks that he "shall proceed with his argument from a fresh beginning" (τῶν ἐξῆς ἀπ' ἄλλης ἀρχῆς ποιησόμεθα τὸν λόγον). The phrase may mean that he proposes to enter upon a new division of the Miscellanies, or that he will now pass to another portion of the great system of writings which he sketched out in Strom. iv. 1-3. In favour of the first opinion it may be urged that Eusebius (H. E. vi. 13) and Photius (Cod. 109) expressly mention eight books of the Miscellanies; while on the other hand the words themselves, taken in connexion with vii. 1, point rather to the commencement of a new book.

The fragment which bears the title of the eighth book in the one remaining MS. is in fact a piece of a treatise on logic. It may naturally have served as an introduction to the examination of the opinions of Greek philosophers, the interpretation of Scripture, and the refutation of heresies which were the general topics of the second principal member of Clement's plan (iv. 2); but it is not easy to see how it could have formed the close of the Miscellanies. It is "a fresh beginning" and nothing more.

There is no evidence to shew what were the contents of the eighth book in the reckoning of Eusebius. In the time of Photius (c. A.D. 850) the present fragment was reckoned as the eighth book in some copies, and in others the tract, On the rich man that is saved (Bibl. 111). Still further confusion is indicated by the fact that passages from the Extracts from the Prophetical Writings are quoted from "the eighth book of the Miscellanies" (Bunsen, Anal. Ante-Nic. i. 288, f.), and also from "the eighth book of the Outlines" (id. 285); while the discussion of prophecy, it may be added, was postponed from the Miscellanies to some later opportunity (Strom. vii. 1, cf. iv. 2).

Perhaps the simplest solution of these difficulties is to suppose that at a very early date the logical introduction to the Outlines was separated from the remainder of the work, and added to MSS. of the Miscellanies. In this way the opinion would arise that there were eight books of the Miscellanies, and scribes supplied the place of the eighth according to their pleasure.

Manuscript.—The Miscellanies have been preserved in one MS. only of the 11th century: Cod. Flor. (Laur. v. 3) (L). This MS. contains The eight books of the Stromateis (the first leaf has been lost), with the Ex. ex Theod. and Ecl. Proph. Bandini has given a facsimile of this MS. (Catal. MSS. Græc. Tab. i. 1). A copy of this MS., transcribed in the 15th century, is preserved at Paris, of which copy a collation was made for Potter; but this has of course no independent value.

In the absence of other MSS., the quotations, especially those of Eusebius (Præp. Ev.), are of great value in correcting the text.

IV. The Outlines (Ἰποσηπώσεις), as has been already indicated, seem to have grown out of the Miscellanies.

Several express quotations from the 4th, 5th, 6th, and 7th books of the Outlines have been preserved; but the fragments are too few and Clement's method too desultory to allow these to furnish a certain plan of the arrangement of the work. They can, however, be brought without any violence into agreement with the summary description of Photius, and it is probable that the books i.-iii. contained the general introduction, with notes on the Old Testament ("Genesis, Exodus, and the Psalms"); books iv.-vi., notes on the Epistles of St. Paul; books vii., viii., notes on the Catholic Epistles.^b

In addition to the detached quotations, there can be no reasonable doubt that the three series of extracts, (a) The summaries from the expositions of Theodotus and the so-called Western school, (b) The selections from the comments on the prophets, and (c) The outlines on the Catholic Epistles, were taken from the Outlines. But partly from the method of compilation, partly from the manner in which they have been preserved in a single MS., these fragments, though of the deepest interest, are at present only imperfectly intelligible.

(a) The Summaries from Theodotus (ἐκ τῶν Θεοδοῦτου καὶ τῆς ἀνατολικῆς καλουμένης διδασκαλίας κατὰ τοὺς Οὐαλεντινίου χρόνους ἐπιτομαί) are at once the most corrupt and the most intrinsically difficult of the extracts. It appears as if the compiler set down hastily the passages which contained the interpretations of the school which he wished to collect, without regard to the context, and often in an imperfect form. Sometimes he adds the criticism of Clement (ἡμεῖς δέ, § 8; Ἔμοι δέ, § 17; ὁ ἡμέτερος [λόγος], § 33); but generally the Valentinian comment is given without remark (οἱ ἀπὸ Οὐαλεντινίου, §§ 2, 6, 16, 23, 25; οἱ Οὐαλεντινιανοί, §§ 21, 24, 37; ὡς φησὶν ὁ Θεόδοτος, §§ 22, 26, 30; φησί, §§ 41, 67; φασί, §§ 33, 35; λέγουσιν, § 43). It follows necessarily from the character of the selection that in some cases it is uncertain whether Clement quotes a Valentinian author by way of exposition, or adopts the opinion which he quotes. The same ambiguity appears to have existed in the original work; and it is easy to see how Photius, in his rapid perusal of the treatise, may have attributed to Clement doctrines which he simply recited without approval and without examination. Thus, in the fragments which remain, occasion might be given to charge Clement with false opinions on the nature of the Son (§ 19), on the creation of Eve (§ 21) on the two Words (§§ 6, 7, 19), on Fate (§§ 75, ff.), on the Incarnation (§ 1).

There is no perceptible order or connexion in the series of extracts. The beginning and the end are equally corrupt. Some sections are quite detached, e. g. (§§ 9, 18, 21, 28, 66, &c.); others give a more or less continuous exposition of some mystery: e. g. §§ 10-16 (the nature of spiritual existences); 39-65 (the relations of wisdom, Jesus, the Christ, the demiurge; the material, the animal, the spiritual); 67-86 (birth, fate, baptism).

(b) The prophetic selections (ἐκ τῶν προφητικῶν ἐκλογαί) are for the most part scarcely less desultory and disconnected than the Summaries;

but they are far simpler in style and substance. They commence with some remarks on the symbolism of the elements, and mainly of water (§§ 1-8). Then follow fragmentary reflections on discipline (9-11), on knowledge, faith, creation, the new creation (12-24), fire (25 f.), on writing and preaching (27), on traits of the true gnostic (28-37). A long miscellaneous series of observations, some of them physiological, succeeds (38-50), and the collection closes with a fairly continuous exposition of Ps. xviii. (xix.).

Manuscript.—The summaries from Theodotus and the prophetic selections are at present found only in C. d. Flor. I (see above).

The text which is given in the editions of Clement is most corrupt. The conjectural emendations and Latin translation of J. Bernays, given by Bunsen in his edition of the fragments of "The Outlines" (Anal. Ante-Nic. I.), are by far the most valuable help yet given for the understanding of the text. Dindorf, in his edition, has overlooked these.

(c) The third important fragment of the Outlines consists of a Latin version of notes on detached verses of 1 Peter, Jude, and 1, 2 John, with several insertions, which are probably due in some cases to transpositions in the MS. (e. g. 1 John ii. 1, hæc namque primitivæ virtutes—audita est, Pott. p. 1009, stands properly in connexion with the line of speculation on Jude 9); and in others to a marginal illustration drawn from some other part of the work (e. g. Jude 24, cum dicit Daniel—confusus est).

Cassiodorus says (Inst. Div. Litt. 8) that Clement wrote some remarks on 1 Peter i., 2 John, and James, which were generally subtle, but at times rash; and that he himself translated them into Latin, with such revision as rendered their teaching more safe. It has generally been supposed, in spite of the difference of range (James for Jude): that these Latin notes are the version of Cassiodorus. It seems, however, more probable that the printed notes are mere glosses taken from a Catena, and not a substantial work.

The Adumbrations were published by De la Bigne in his Bibliotheca Patrum, Par. 1575 (and in later editions); but he gives no account of the MS. or MSS. from which the text was taken, nor does it appear that any later editor has taken the pains to verify his authorities. Ph. Labbe, however, states (De Scriptt. Ecclcs. 1660, i. p. 230) that he saw an ancient parchment MS., "qui fuit olim Coenobii S. Mariæ Montis Dei," which contained these Adumbrations, under that title, together with Didymus' commentary on the Catholic Epistles. It may, therefore, be fairly concluded, in the absence of all other evidence, that De la Bigne found the notes of Clement in the "very ancient but somewhat illegible MS." from which he took his text of Didymus, which follows the Adumbrations (Bibl. vi. p. 676 n.). It is much to be regretted that this MS. has not been sought for and identified by later editors, for nothing more is known of the exact title of the notes than that they bore the heading Adumbrations; though from the silence of De la Bigne, it is reasonable to suppose that he found them distinctly assigned to Clement.^c

^b Bunsen (Anal. Ante-Nic. I. pp. 163 f.) arranges the contents of the books very differently. The evidence is slight; but it does not appear from Photius that the Gospels formed the subject of special annotation, and Bunsen makes the third book Commentarius in Evangelia.

^c It is probable that a careful examination of the

V. The remaining extant work of Clement, Who is the rich man that is saved? (τίς ὁ σαζόμενος πλούσιος;) is apparently a popular address based upon St. Mark x. 17-31. The teaching is simple, eloquent, and just; and the tract closes with the exquisite "story, which is no story," of St. John and the young robber, which Eusebius has made familiar by inserting it in his History (iii. 23).

Manuscript.—The whole tract is preserved at present only in one late and somewhat imperfect Vatican MS.; but the story of "the young robber" is found separately in several MSS., of which Dindorf has collated two.

iii. Clement's position and influence as a Christian teacher.—In order to understand Clement rightly, it is necessary to bear constantly in mind that he laboured in a crisis of transition. It is this very fact which gives his writings their peculiar interest in all times of change. The transition which Clement strove more or less consciously to deal with was threefold, affecting doctrine, thought, and life. Doctrine was passing from the stage of oral tradition to written definition (1). Thought was passing from the immediate circle of the Christian revelation to the whole domain of human experience (2). Life in its fulness was coming to be apprehended as the object of Christian discipline (3). A few suggestions will be offered upon the first two of these heads.

(1.) Clement repeatedly affirms that even when he sets forth the deepest mysteries, he is simply reproducing an original unwritten tradition. This had been committed by the Lord to the apostles Peter and James, and John and Paul, and handed down from father to son, till at length he set forth accurately in writing what had been before delivered in word (Strom. i. § 11, p. 322; Comp. vi. 68, p. 774; and fragm. ap. Euseb. H. E. ii. 1). But this tradition was, as he held it, not an independent source of doctrine, but a guide to the apprehension of doctrine. It was not co-ordinate with Scripture, but interpretative of Scripture (Strom. vi. 124, f.; pp. 802 f. De Div. Sal. § 5, p. 938). It was the help to the training of the Christian philosopher (ὁ γνωστικός), and not part of the heritage of the simple believer.

Tradition in this aspect preserved the clue to the right understanding of the hidden sense, the underlying harmonies, the manifold unity of revelation. More particularly the philosopher was able to obtain through tradition the general principles of interpreting the records of revelation and significant illustrations of their application. In this way the true "gnostic" was saved from the errors of the false "gnostic" or heretic, who interpreted Scripture without regard to "the ecclesiastical rule" (Strom. vi. 125, p. 803, κανὼν ἐκκλησιαστικός; ὁ ἐκκλ. κ. id. vi. 165, p. 826; vii. 41, p. 855; comp. ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἀληθείας, id. vi. 124, p. 802; 131, p. 806; vii. 94, p. 890; ὁ κανὼν τῆς ἐκκλησίας, id. i. 96, p. 375; vii. 105, p. 897).

Latin glosses on the Catholic Epistles would bring to light important fragments of Clement's Commentary. A very hasty inspection of the two MSS. mentioned in the old Catal. M.S. Angl. (Bodl. 640 (2094): Land. Lat. 110), as containing glosses of Clement, did not produce anything of interest; but it is desirable that the MSS. should be examined more thoroughly.

The examples of spiritual interpretation which Clement gives in accordance with this traditional "rule," are frequently visionary and puerile (e.g. Strom. vi. 133 ff. pp. 807 ff.). But none the less the rule itself witnessed to a vital truth, the continuity and permanent value of the books of Holy Scripture. This truth was an essential part of the inheritance of the Catholic church; and Clement, however faulty in detail, did good service in maintaining it (id. vii. 96, p. 891).

As yet, however, the contents of the Christian Bible were imperfectly defined. Clement, like the other fathers who habitually used the Alexandrine Old Testament, quotes the books of the Apocrypha without distinguishing them in any way from the books of the Hebrew canon. This, however, is simply a matter of common practice; and he nowhere expresses a deliberate judgment upon the authority of the two groups of books, though he appears to regard the current Greek Bible as answering to the Hebrew Scriptures restored by Ezra (Strom. i. 124, p. 392; id. 148, p. 409).

There is the same laxity of usage in Clement with regard to the Scriptures of the New Testament. He ascribes great weight to the Epistle of Barnabas (Strom. ii. 31, p. 445; id. 116, p. 489); and makes frequent use of the Preaching of Peter (Strom. i. 182, p. 427, &c.); and quotes also the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Strom. ii. 45, p. 453). Eusebius further adds that he wrote notes on the Revelation of Peter, which is in fact quoted in the Extracts from the Prophets (§§ 41, 48, 49).

The text of his quotations is often inaccurate and evidently given from memory (e.g. Matt. v. 45; vi. 26, &c. Comp. Dict. of Bible, New Testament, § 7). But still as the earliest Greek writer who largely and expressly quotes the books of the New Testament, for the Greek fragments of Irenaeus are of comparatively small compass, his evidence as to the primitive form of the apostolic writings is of the highest value. Not unfrequently he is one of a very small group of witnesses who have preserved an original reading (e.g. 1 Cor. ii. 13; vii. 3, 5, 35, 39, &c.). In other cases his readings, even when they are wrong, are shewn by other evidence to have been widely spread at a very early date (e.g. Matt. vi. 33).

It would be impossible to follow out in detail Clement's opinions on special points of doctrine. The contrast which he draws between the gnostic (the philosophic Christian) and the ordinary believer is of more general interest. This contrast underlies, as we have seen, the whole plan of his Miscellanies, and explains the different aspects in which doctrine, according to his view, might be regarded as an object of faith and as an object of knowledge. Faith is the foundation; knowledge the superstructure (Strom. vi. 26, p. 660). By knowledge faith is perfected (id. vii. 55, p. 864), for to know is more than to believe (id. vi. 109, p. 794). Faith is a summary knowledge of urgent truths: knowledge a sure demonstration of what has been received through faith, being itself reared upon faith through the teaching of the Lord (id. vii. 57, p. 865). Thus the gnostic grasps the complete truth of all revelation from the beginning of the world to the end, piercing to the depths of Scripture, of which the believer tastes the surface only (id. vi. 78, p. 779; 131, p. 806; vii. 95, p. 891). As a consequence of this intelligent sympathy with the Divine Will, the gnostic becomes in perfect unity in himself (μοναδικός), and as far as possible like God (id. iv. 154, p. 633; vii. 13, p. 835). Definite outward observances cease to have any value for one whose whole being is brought into an abiding harmony with that which is eternal: he has no wants, no passions; he rests in the contemplation of God, which is and will be his unfailing blessedness (id. vii. 35, p. 851, 84, p. 883; vi. 71, p. 776; vii. 56, p. 865).

In this outline it is easy to see the noblest traits of later mysticism. And if some of Clement's statements go beyond subjects which lie within the powers of man, still he bears impressive testimony to two essential truths which require continual iteration, that the aim of faith through knowledge perfected by love is the present recovery of the divine likeness; and again, that formulated doctrine is not an end in itself, but a means whereby we rise through fragmentary propositions to knowledge which is immediate and one.

(2.) The character of the gnostic, the ideal Christian, the perfect philosopher, represents the link between man, in his earthly conflict, and God: it represents also the link between man and men. The gnostic fulfils through the gospel the destiny and nature of mankind, and gathers together the fruit of their varied experience. This thought of the Incarnation as the crown and consummation of the whole history of the world is perhaps that which is most characteristic of Clement's office as an interpreter of the faith. It rests upon his view of human nature, of the providential government of God, of the finality of the Christian dispensation.

Man, according to Clement, is born for the service of God. His soul (ψυχή) is a gift sent down to him from heaven by God (Strom. iv. 169, p. 640), and strains to return thither (id. 9, p. 567). For this end there is need of painful training (Strom. i. 33, p. 335; vi. 78, p. 779); and the various partial sciences are helps towards the attainment of the true destiny of existence (Strom. vi. 80 ff. pp. 780 ff.). The "image" of God which man receives at his birth is slowly completed in the "likeness" of God (Strom. ii. 131, p. 499. Comp. Paed. i. 98, p. 156). The inspiration of the divine breath by which he is distinguished from other creatures (Gen. ii. 7) is fulfilled by the gift of the Holy Spirit to the believer, which that original constitution makes possible (Strom. v. 87 f.; p. 698. Comp. Strom. iv. 150, p. 632). The image of God, Clement says elsewhere, is the Word (Logos), and the true image of the Word is man, that is, the reason in man (Cohort. 98, p. 79).

It follows necessarily from this view of humanity, as essentially related to God through the Word, that Clement acknowledged a providential purpose in the development of Gentile life. Looking at the bright side of Gentile speculation he recognized in it many divine elements. These he regarded as partly borrowed from Jewish revelation, and partly derived from reason illuminated by the Word (Λόγος), the final source of reason. Some truths, he says, the Greek philosophers stole and disfigured; some they overlaid with restless and foolish speculations; others they discovered, for they also perhaps had "a spirit of wisdom" (Ex. xxviii. 3) (Strom. i. 87, p. 369).

But whatever might be, in Clement's judgment, the source of Greek philosophy, he distinctly recognised the office which it had fulfilled for the Greeks, and still in his own time continued to fulfil, as a guide to righteousness, and a work of divine providence (Strom. i. 170 ff. pp. 425 ff.; 91 ff. pp. 372 ff.). It was, according to his interpretation, a preparation for justifying faith (Strom. i. 99, p. 377; vi. 44, p. 762; id. 47 ff. pp. 764 ff.), and in a true sense a dispensation, a covenant (Strom. vi. 42, p. 761; id. 67, p. 773; id. 159, p. 823; i. 28, p. 331).

The training of the Jews and the training of the Greeks were thus in different ways designed to fit men for the final manifestation of the Christ. They were partial in their essence, and by the imperfection of men they were made still more partial. The various schools of philosophy, Jewish and heathen, are described by Clement under a memorable image, as rendering in pieces the one truth like the Bacchants who rent the body of Pentheus, and bore about the fragments in triumph. Each one, he says, boasts that the morsel which it has had the good fortune to gain is all the truth. . . . Yet by the rising of the light, he continues, all things are lightened. . . . and he that again combines the divided parts and unites the exposition (Λόγος) in a perfect whole, will, we may be assured, look upon the truth without peril (Strom. i. 57, p. 349).

Towards this great unity of all science and all life Clement himself strove; and by the influence of his writings he has kept alive in others the sense of the magnificent promises included in the teaching of St. Paul and St. John, which by their very grandeur are apt to escape apprehension. He affirmed, once for all, upon the threshold of the new age, that Christianity is the heir of all past time, and the interpreter of the future. Sixteen centuries have confirmed the truth of his principle, and left its application still fruitful.

The Editio princeps of Clement was edited by P. Victorius, Flor. 1550. A Latin version by G. Hervetus and C. Strozza was published shortly afterwards, Flor. 1551, emended Paris. 1590. The edition of F. Sylburg, Heidelb. 1592, gave a Greek text carefully corrected, and two valuable indices. This was followed by the Graeco-Latin edition of D. Heinsius, Lugd. Bat. (1616), which served as the basis of the edition of J. Potter, Oxon. 1715. Other editions and reprints which possess no peculiar value may be passed over. The small edition of the Greek text, by R. Klotz, Lips. 1831-34, is convenient from its size, but singularly inaccurate; and the last edition by G. Dindorf, Oxon. 1869, is in every way most disappointing, hastily put together, incomplete, and in almost every respect below the standard of modern scholarship, so that it simply closes the way against a satisfactory edition of Clement, which is still greatly needed. Comp. Fabric. Bibl. Graeca (ed. Harles) vii. 119-149.

In addition to the chief Church Histories, the following works are of importance for the study of Clement: Le Nourry, Appar. ad Bibliothecam Patrum Lib. III. (reprinted in Dindorf's edition); Moehler, Patrologie, 1840; Daehne, Gesch.-Darstellung d. jüd.-alex. Religions-Philosophie, 1834; Mansel, The Gnostic Heresies, Lect. xvi.; and the histories of the Alexandrine School, by Guericke, Matter, J. Simon, Vacherot. There are several interesting summaries of Clement's teaching, besides those given in the general works of Lumpfer, Maréchal, and Schramm; by Bp. Kaye (Some Account of the Writings and Opinions of Clement of Alexandria, Lond. 1835); Bp. Reinkens (De Clemente Presb. Alex. homine, scriptore, philosopho, theologo liber. Vratisl. 1851); Abbé Cognat (Clément d'Alexandrie, sa Doctrine et sa Polémique, Paris, 1859); Abbé Freppel (Clément d'Alexandrie, Cours à la Sorbonne, Paris, 1866). [B. F. W.]

CLEMENTINE LITERATURE. Among the spurious writings attributed to Clement of Rome, the chief is one which purported to contain a record made by Clement of discourses of the apostle Peter, together with an account of the circumstances under which Clement came to be Peter's travelling companion, and of other details of Clement's family history. This work assumed a considerable variety of forms. Important changes were made with a view to the improvement of its doctrine, the Ebionitism with which the original work had been strongly coloured having been first softened, then removed. Changes were also made with a view to the improvement of the story; and as time went on far more interest was felt in the framework of narrative in which the discourses were set, than in the discourses themselves. In the latest forms of the work, several of the discourses are omitted, and the rest greatly abridged. In early times, even when the work was rejected as heretical, it seems still to have been supposed to rest on a groundwork of fact, and several statements passed into church tradition which appear primarily to rest on the authority of this book. Afterwards, when it came to be presented in an orthodox form, it was accepted as a genuine work of Clement and a trustworthy historical authority. On the revival of learning these claims were disallowed, and the disposition then was to disregard the book as a heretical figment quite worthless to the student of church history. Later it was seen, that even though the work be regarded as no more than a historical novel composed with a controversial object towards the end of the second century, such a document must be most valuable for the light which it throws on the opinions of the school from which it emanated; and accordingly the Clementine writings play an important part in all modern discussions concerning the history of the early ages of the church.

The work has come down to us in three principal forms. 1. The Homilies (in the MSS. τὰ Κλημέντια) first printed by Cotelier in his edition of the Apostolic Fathers 1672, from one of the Colbertine MSS. in the Paris Library. This manuscript is both corrupt and defective, breaking off in the middle of the 19th of the 20 homilies of which the entire work consists. The complete work was first published by Dressel, 1853, from a MS. which he found in the Ottobonian Library in the Vatican. Notes on the homilies by Wieseler, which were intended to have formed part of this publication, only appeared in 1859 as an appendix to Dressel's edition of the Epitomes, which will be presently mentioned. The two MSS. we have mentioned are the only ones now known to exist, though it would seem that a MS. different from either was used by Turrianus (1573), who in quoting the homilies uses a division into books different from that of the existing MSS.

II. The Recognitions (ἀναγνώσεις, ἀναγνωρισμοί). This work in the MSS. bears a great variety of titles, the most common being Itinerarium S. Clementis (corresponding probably to περίοδοι Κλημέντος or περίοδοι Πέτρου). The original is lost, but the work is preserved in a translation by Rufinus, of which many MSS. are extant. Rufinus states in his preface that there were then extant two forms of the work, in many respects differing in the narrative. He adds that he had omitted certain passages common to both forms, one of which he specifies, as being, to say the least, unintelligible to him; and elsewhere he expresses his opinion that those passages had been interpolated by heretics. He claims in the remainder of the work to have aimed at giving rather a literal than an elegant translation; and there seems reason for accepting this statement, and for regarding this translation as more faithful than some other translations by Rufinus. Besides that we can test his work in the case of fragments of the original preserved by quotation, we have now also a Syriac translation of the first three books, which may be described as in the main in fair agreement with the Latin. For one of the most important variations see Lightfoot on the Galatians, 4th edit. p. 316. The translation of Rufinus was first published by Sichardus, Basle, 1526. The most important of later editions are that by Cotelier in his Apostolic Fathers, Paris, 1672, and that by Gersdorf, Leipsic, 1838. A new edition, founded on a better collation of MSS., is much to be wished for. The Syriac translation, an edition of which was published by de Lagarde, 1861, is preserved in two MSS. belonging to the British Museum. The older of these claims to have been written at Edessa, A.D. 411, and exhibits errors of transcription, which shew that it was taken from a still earlier MS. It contains the first three books of the Recognitions and part of the first chapter of the fourth book, at the end of which is marked "the end of the first discourse of Clemens." Then follow the 10th homily with the heading "the third against the Gentiles;" the 11th homily with the heading "the fourth;" the 12th and 13th homilies, the former only as far as chapter twenty-four, with the heading "from Tripoli in Phoenicia;" and the 14th homily with the heading "book fourteen," after which is marked "the end of the discourses of Clemens." The other MS. is some four centuries later, and contains only the first three books of the Recognitions, the note at the end being "the ninth of Clemens who accompanied Simon Cephas is ended."

III. The Epitome, first published by Turnebus 1555. This is an abridgement of the first form (i.e. the Homilies); and contains also a continuation of the story, use being made therein of the martyrdom of Clement by Simeon Metaphrastes, and of a tale by Ephraim, bishop of Chersonesus, of a miracle performed at the tomb of Clement. The Epitome is given in a form more or less full in different MSS. The latest edition by Dressel, Leipzig, 1859, besides giving a fuller version of the Epitome previously published, contains also a second form considerably different. Besides the forms which have come down to us, there must have been at least one other, called by Uhlhorn the orthodox Clementines, which retained the discourses, but completely expurgated the heresy contained in them. This is inferred from the citations of the late Greek writers (Nicephorus Callisti, Cedrenus, and Michael Glycas); and the Clementines so amended were so entirely accepted by the later Greek church, that a Scholiast on Eusebius is quite unable to understand the charge of heresy which his author brings against these writings. In what follows we set aside the consideration of the Epitomes as being manifestly a late form of the work, and we confine our attention to the other two forms, viz. the Homilies and Recognitions, to which, or to their writers, we shall refer under the abbreviations H. and R. Of these the Homilies contain all the characteristics of Ebionitism in much the harsher form; but before discussing the doctrine of the work, it will be convenient first to compare the narratives as told in either form. The following is an abstract of the Recognitions. The form is that of an autobiography addressed by Clement to James, bishop of Jerusalem. The work divides itself into three portions, probably of different dates. I. Clement, having stated that he had been born at Rome, and had been from early years a lover of chastity, gives a lively description of the perplexity caused him by his anxiety to solve the problems, what had been the origin, and what would be the future of the world, and whether he himself might look forward to a future life. He seeks in vain for knowledge in the schools of the philosophers, but finds nothing but disputings, contradiction, and uncertainty. At length a rumour that there had arisen in Judaea a preacher of truth possessed of miraculous power, is confirmed by the arrival of Barnabas in Rome, who declares that the Son of God was even then preaching in Judaea, and promising eternal life to his disciples. Barnabas is rudely received by the Roman rabble, and returns to his own country in haste to be present at a Jewish feast. Clement, though desirous to accompany him for further instruction, is detained by the necessity of collecting money due to him; but having despatched his business as speedily as he can, he sails shortly after for Palestine, and after a fifteen days' voyage arrives at Caesarea. There he finds Barnabas again and is introduced by him to Peter, who had arrived at Caesarea on the same day, and who was on the next to hold a discussion with Simon the Samaritan. Peter forthwith frees Clement from his perplexities, by instructing him in the doctrine of the "true prophet" who has come to enlighten man's darkness and teach him what to believe. For one who has received the true prophet's credentials there is an end of uncertainty; faith in this prophet can never be withdrawn, nor can anything which he teaches admit of doubt or question. We are here told that Clement by Peter's orders committed his teaching on this subject to writing, and sent the book to James, to whom Peter had been commanded annually to transmit an account of his doings. We are next told that Simon postponed the appointed discussion with Peter, who uses the interval thus gained to give Clement a continuous exposition of the faith, in which God's dealings are declared from the commencement of the world to the then present time. This section includes an account of a disputation held on the temple steps between the apostles and the various sects of the Jews, viz. the priests, the Sadducees, the Samaritans, the Scribes and Pharisees, and the disciples of John. When the apostles are on the point of success the disputation is broken off by a tumult raised by an enemy, whose name is not given, but who is unmistakably Saul, who flings James down the temple steps, leaving him for dead, and disperses the assembly. The disciples fly to Jericho, and the enemy hastens to Damascus whither he supposes Peter to have fled, in order there to make havoc of the faithful. At Jericho, James hears from Zacchaens of the mischief that is being done by Simon at Caesarea, and sends Peter thither to refute him, ordering him to report to him his doings annually, but more particularly every seven years. In the section that has been just described there are some things which do not harmonise with what has gone before. The date of the events related is given as seven years after our Lord's passion, although the previous story implies that Clement's voyage had been made in the very year that ended our Lord's ministry. Also in one place (I. 71) Peter is mentioned in the third person, though he is himself the speaker. These facts prove that the story of Clement has been added on to an older document. It has been conjectured that this document was an Ebionite work 'Αναβασιολ Ἰακώβου, the contents of which, as described by Epiphanius (xxx. 16), well correspond with those of this section, and the title of which might be explained as referring to discourses on the temple steps. But this conjecture encounters the difficulty that the author himself indicates a different source for this part of his work.

We are next introduced to two disciples of Peter, Nicetas and Aquila, who had formerly been disciples of Simon. These give an account of the history of Simon and of his magical powers, stating in particular that Simon supposed himself to perform his wonders by the aid of the soul of a murdered boy, whose likeness was preserved in Simon's bed-chamber. Prepared with this information Peter enters into a public discussion with Simon which lasts for three days, the main subject in debate being whether the difficulty of reconciling the existence of evil with the goodness and power of the Creator, does not force us to believe in the existence of a God different from the Creator of the world. The question of the immortality of the soul is also treated of, and this brings the discussion to a dramatic close. For Peter at length offers to settle the question by proceeding to Simon's bed-chamber, and interrogating the soul of the murdered boy, whose likeness was there preserved. On finding his secret to be known to Peter Simon humbles himself, but retracts his repentance on Peter's acknowledging that he had this knowledge, not by prophetic power, but by the information of associates of Simon. The multitude however are filled with indignation, and drive Simon away in disgrace. Simon departs informing his disciples that divine honours await him at Rome. Peter resolves to follow him among the Gentiles and expose his wickedness; and having remained three months at Caesarea for the establishment of the church, he ordains Zacchaeus as its bishop, and sets out for Tripolis, which he learns has now become the centre of Simon's operations. This brings the third book of the Recognitions to a close; and here we are told that Clement sent to James an account in ten books of Peter's discourses. It has been questioned whether these ten books were imagined by the author of the Recognitions or whether they formed a work really in existence previous to his own composition. The latter supposition is greatly to be preferred, for the author not only refers to ten books, but gives in detail the contents of each book. And it is to be noted that these contents can scarcely be described as an abstract of the contents of the three books of the Recognitions; for though the same topics are more or less touched on in the Recognitions, the order and proportion of treatment are different. One of the books is described as treating of the Apostles' disputation at the temple; and therefore it seems needless to look for the original of this part in the "Ascents of James" or elsewhere.

II. On Peter's arrival at Tripolis he finds that Simon on hearing of his coming had taken flight by night and gone to Syria. Peter then proceeds to instruct the people of the place; and his discourses, containing a polemic against heathenism, occupy the next three books of the Recognitions. The sixth terminates with the baptism of Clement and the ordination of a bishop, after which Peter sets out for Antioch, having spent three months at Tripolis. III. With the seventh book the story of Clement's recognition of his family begins. We shall presently discuss the manner in which an occasion is skillfully presented for Clement's relating his family history to Peter. That history is as follows:—Clement's father, named Faustinianus, was a member of the emperor's family, and was married by him to a lady of noble birth, named Mattidia. By her he had twin sons, Faustus and Faustinus, and afterwards Clement. When Clement was five years old, Mattidia told her husband that she had seen a vision warning her that unless she and her twin sons speedily left Rome and remained absent for ten years all must perish miserably. Thereupon the father sent his wife and children with suitable provision of money and attendance to Athens, in order to educate them there. But after her departure no tidings of her reached Rome, and Faustinianus having in vain sent others to inquire for her, at length left Clement under guardianship at Rome, and departed himself in search of wife and children. But he too disappeared, and Clement now aged thirty-two, had never since heard of father, mother, or brothers. The story proceeds to tell how Peter and Clement on their way to

Antioch go over to the island of Aradus to see the wonders of a celebrated temple there. While Clement and his party are admiring works of Phidias preserved in the temple, Peter converses with a beggar woman outside, and the story she tells him of her life is in such agreement with that previously told him by Clement, that Peter is able to unite mother and son. It appears that the vision which she had related had been only feigned by her in order to escape from the incestuous addresses of her husband's brother, without causing family discord by revealing his wickedness. On her voyage to Athens she had been shipwrecked, and had been cast on shore by the waves, without being able to tell what had become of her children. All now return to the main land, and on telling the story to their companions who had been left behind, a further recognition takes place: for Nicetas and Aquila recognise their own story and declare themselves to be the twin sons, who had been saved from the wreck, but had been sold into slavery by their rescuers. Mattidia is baptized. After the baptism Peter and the three brothers, having bathed in the sea, withdraw to a retired place for prayer. An old man in a workman's dress having noticed what they were doing, accosts them and undertakes to prove to them that prayer is useless, and that there is neither God nor Providence, but that all things are governed by astrological fate (genesis). A set disputation takes place, which occupies the 8th and 9th books of the Recognitions; the three brothers, as being well-trained in Grecian philosophy, successively argue on the side of Providence, and discuss the evidence for astrology. The discussion is closed by a dramatic surprise. When all the old man's other difficulties have been solved, he undertakes to produce a conclusive argument from his own experience. His own wife had been born under a horoscope which compelled her to commit adultery, and to end her days by water in foreign travel. And so it turned out. She had been guilty of adultery with a slave, as he had learned on his brother's testimony, and afterwards leaving Rome with her twin sons on account of a pretended vision, had perished miserably by shipwreck. Peter has now the triumph of re-uniting the family and gaining a victory in the discussion, by shewing the complete falsification of the astrological prediction. From the account given by Rufinus, it would seem that one of the forms of the Recognitions known to him closed here; but in the tenth book as we have it, the story is prolonged by discourses intended to bring Faustinianus to a hearty reception of Christianity. After this Simon is again brought on the stage. He has been very successful at Antioch in shewing wonders to the people and stirring up their hatred against Peter. One of Peter's emissaries, in order to drive him to flight, prevails on Cornelius the centurion, who had been then sent on public business to Caesarea, to give out that he had been commissioned to seek out and destroy Simon, in accordance with an edict of the emperor for the destruction of sorcerers at Rome and in the provinces. Tidings of this are brought to Simon by a pretended friend, who is in reality a Christian spy. Simon, in alarm, flees to Laodicea, and there meeting Faustinianus, who had come to visit their common friends, Apion (or, as our author spells the name, Appion) and Anubion, for his further security he transforms by his magic the features of Faustianus into his own, in order that Faustianus may be arrested in his stead. But Peter, not being deceived by the transformation, turns it to the greater discomfiture of Simon. For he sends Faustianus to Antioch, who pretending to be Simon, whose form he bore, makes a public confession of imposture, and testifies to the divine mission of Peter. After this, when Simon attempts again to get a hearing in Antioch, he is driven away in disgrace. Peter is received then with the greatest honour and baptizes Faustianus, who has meanwhile recovered his own form.

We turn now to the story as told in the Homilies. The opening is identical with that of the Recognitions, except for one small variation. Clement, instead of meeting Barnabas in Rome, has been induced by an anonymous Christian teacher to sail for Palestine; but being driven by storms to Alexandria, there encounters Barnabas. It is not easy to say which form of the story is to be regarded as the original. On the one hand, the account that Clement is delayed from following Barnabas by the necessity of collecting money due to him is perfectly in place if the scene is laid at Rome, but not so if Clement is a stranger driven by stress of weather to Alexandria. The author, who elsewhere shews Alexandrian proclivities, may have been zealous to do honour to that city by connecting Barnabas with it; or, it may be, have been unwilling that Peter should be preceded by another apostle at Rome. On the other hand, the rabble which assails Barnabas, is in both versions described as a mob of Greeks, and the fifteen days' voyage to Palestine corresponds better with Alexandria than with Rome. The narrative proceeds as in R. as far as the end of Peter's disputation with Simon at Caesarea; but both Peter's preliminary instructions to Clement and the disputation itself are different. In H. Peter prepares Clement by teaching him his secret doctrine concerning difficulties likely to be raised by Simon, the true solution of which he could not produce before the multitude. Simon would bring forward texts which seemed to speak of a plurality of Gods, or which imputed imperfection to God, or spoke of him as changing his purpose or hardening men's hearts and so forth; or, again, which laid crimes to the charge of the just men of the law, Adam and Noah, Abraham, Jacob, and Moses. In public it would be inexpedient to question the authority of these passages of Scripture, and the difficulty must be met in some other way. But the true solution is that the Scriptures have been corrupted; and all those passages which speak against God are to be rejected as spurious additions. Although this doctrine is represented as strictly esoteric, to our surprise it is reproduced in the public discussion with Simon which immediately follows. This disputation in H. is very short, the main conflict between Peter and Simon being reserved for a later stage of the story. It is here stated, however, that this disputation at Caesarea lasted three days, although only the subjects treated of on the first day are mentioned. We have now a great variation in the narrative between H. and R.

According to H., Simon vanquished in the disputation flies to Tyre, and Nicetas, Aquila, and Clement are sent forward by Peter to prepare the way for him. There they meet Apion, and a public disputation on heathen mythology is held between Clement and Apion, the debate going over many of the same topics as are treated of in the tenth book of R. On Peter's arrival at Tyre, Simon flies on to Tripolis, and thence also to Syria on Peter's continuing the pursuit. We have, as in R., discourses delivered to the heathen at Tripolis, and the story of the discovery of Clement's family is in the main told as in R., with differences in detail to be noticed presently. In H., the main disputation between Peter and Simon takes place after the recognitions, and is held at Laodicea, Clement's father (whose name according to H. is Faustus) acting as judge. The last homily contains explanations given by Peter to his company after the flight of Simon; and concludes with an account similar to that in R., of the transformation of Clement's father.

To this analysis of the contents of the two forms of the story must be added an account of the prefatory matter. Neither the Latin nor Syriac version of the Recognitions translates any preface; but Rufinus mentions having found in his original a letter of Clement to James, which he does not prefix to his translation, because as he says, it is of later date, and because he had translated it elsewhere. The remark about later date need not be understood to imply any doubt of the genuineness of the letter, but merely that this letter, which purports to have been written after the death of Peter, is not rightly prefixed to discourses which claim to have been written some years previously. The letter itself is preserved in the MSS. of the Homilies, and gives an account of Peter's ordination of Clement as his successor at Rome, and closes with instructions to Clement to send to James an abstract of Peter's discourses since Clement had become his companion. The work that follows then purports to contain an abridgement of discourses already more fully sent to James; and is given in the title: "An epitome by Clement of Peter's discourses during his sojournings" (ἐπιδημιῶν κηρυγμάτων). The Homilies contain another preface in the form of a letter from Peter himself to James. In this letter no mention is made of Clement, but Peter himself sends his discourses to James, strictly forbidding their indiscriminate publication, and charging him not to communicate them to any Gentile, nor even to any of the circumcised, except after a long probation, nor to him all at once, but the later only after he had been tried and found faithful in the case of the earlier. Subjoined is an oath of secrecy to be taken by those to whom the writings shall be communicated. Though, as has been said, both these letters are now found prefixed to the Homilies, examination shews that the letter of Clement cannot belong to the Homilies; for the account which it gives of Clement's deprecation of the dignity of the episcopate, and of the charges given to him on his admission to it, are in a great measure identical with what is related in the 5th homily, in the case of the ordination of Zacchaeus at Caesarea. These are omitted from the story as told in the Recognitions. The inference follows that the letter of Clement is the preface to the Recognitions. Then according to the conclusion we form on other grounds as to the relative priority of the two forms, we may suppose, either that R., when prefixing his account of Clement's ordination, transposed matter which the older document had contained in connexion with Zacchaeus, or else that H., when substituting for the letter of Clement a letter in the name of Peter himself, found in Clement's letter matter which seemed to him too valuable to be wasted, and which he therefore worked into the account of the first ordination related in the story, that of Zacchaeus. The letter of Clement having been assigned to R., that of Peter remains as the preface either to the Homilies, or it may be to the earlier form of the work before the name of Clement had been introduced into the story. On the question of relative priority may be noticed the presumption that it is more likely that a later writer would remove a preface written in the name of Clement, in order to give his work the higher authority of Peter, than that the converse change should be made; and also that the strong charges to secrecy, and to the communication of the work in successive instalments would be accounted for, if we suppose that at the time of the publication of the Homilies another version of Peter's discourses had been in circulation, and that the writer was anxious to offer some account why what he produced as the genuine form of the discourses should not have been earlier made known.

Respecting the relative priority of the forms H. and R. there has been great diversity of opinion among critics: Baur, Schliemann, Schwegler, and Uhlhorn give the priority to H., Hilgenfeld and Ritschl to R.; Lehmann holds R. to be the original as far as the first three books are concerned, H. in the later part of the story. Lipsius regards both as independent modifications of a common original. In such diversity of opinion it would be arrogant to speak over-confidently; but the conclusion to which we have come is, that while neither of the existing documents can claim to be the original form of the story, they are not independent; that H. is the later, and in all that relates to Clement's family history has borrowed from R. The conclusion which seems to us most probable is, that the original form of the document contained little but discourses, and that it probably was an esoteric document, in use only among the Ebionites; that the author of R. added to it the whole story of Clement's recovery of his parents, at the same time fitting the work for popular use by omitting or softening down all the harshest parts of its Ebionitism; and finally, that H., a strong Ebionite, restored some of the original discourses, retaining at the same time the little romance which no doubt had been found to add much to the popularity and attractiveness of the volume. The following are some of the arguments which prove that H. is not an original.

(1.) The story of Clement's first recognition of his family is told in exactly the same way in R. book 7, and in H. book 12. Clement, anxious to be permitted to join himself permanently as travelling companion to Peter, reminds him of words he had used at Caesarea; how he had there invited those to travel with him who could do so with piety, that is to say, without deserting wife, parents, or other relations whom they could not properly leave. Clement states that he is himself one thus untrammelled by family ties, and he is thus led to tell the story of his life. These words of Peter, to which both R. and H. refer, are to be found only in R. (iii. 71), not in H. It has been stated that the ordination of Zacchaeus at Caesarea is told fully in H., and only briefly in R. In recompense R. has a long section describing the grief of the disciples at Peter's departure and the consolations which he addressed to them; all this is compressed into a line or two in H. It is matter which any one revising R. would most naturally cut out as unimportant and uninteresting; but we see that it contains words essential in the interests of the story; and we can hardly doubt that these words were introduced with a view to the use subsequently made of them. This instance not only shews, as Lehmann admits, that H. is not original in respect of the Caesarean sections, but it still more decisively refutes Lehmann's own hypothesis that it was H. who ornamented an originally simpler story with the romance of the recognitions. Either the author of that romance, as is most probable, was also the author of Peter's Caesarean speech, which has little use except as a preparation for what follows; or else finding that speech in an earlier document, he used it as a connecting link to join on his own addition. In either case he must have been fully alive to its importance from his point of view, and it is quite impossible that he could have left it out from his version of the story. It may be added, that of the two writers H. and R., H. is the one infinitely less capable of inventing a romance. Looking at the whole work as a controversial novel, it is apparent all through that H. feels most interest in the controversy, R. in the novel.

(2.) The section just referred to affords another proof of the posteriority of H. In the passage common to H. and R. Peter sends on Nicetas and Aquila to prepare the way for his coming. He apologises for parting company with them, and they express their grief at the separation, but console themselves that it is only for two days. On their departure Clement says, "I thank God that it was not I whom you sent away, as I should have died of grief." And then follows the request that Peter would accept him as his inseparable companion. This is all consistent as the story is told by R.; for these regrets are expressed on the first occasion that any of the three brothers is removed from personal attendance on Peter. But as H. tells the story, Peter had already sent on Clement, while still unbaptized, together with Nicetas and Aquila to Tyre, where they hold a disputation with Apion. There is not a word of grief or remonstrance at the separation for more than a week, and it is therefore strange that subsequently there should be so much regret at a two days' parting. It is plain that H. has interpolated the mission to Tyre; but failed to notice that he ought in consistency to have modified some of the next portion of R. which he retained. This disputation with Apion has been alleged as a proof of the priority of H.; for Apion is introduced also into R., but only as a silent character; and it is urged that the original form of the story is more likely to be that in which this well-known adversary of Judaism is brought in to conduct a disputation, than that in which he is but an insignificant companion of Simon. But this argument does not affect the question of relative priority between H. and R., whatever weight it may have in inducing us to believe that R. is himself not original. Eusebius (iii. 38) mentions a long work ascribed to Clement, and then but recently composed (as he infers from not having seen it quoted by any earlier writer), containing dialogues of Peter and Apion. This description may be intended for the Homilies; but it is also possible that it may refer to a still earlier work. There are expressions in R. which seem to imply that the writer believed himself to be making an improvement, in substituting for Peter as a disputant against heathenism, persons whose early training had been such as to give them better knowledge of heathen mythology and philosophy.

(3.) The story of Clement's recognition of his brothers contains plain marks that H. has abridged R. According to R., Nicetas and Aquila, seeing a strange woman return with Peter and Clement, ask for an explanation. Peter then repeats at full length the story of the adventures of Clement's mother. Nicetas and Aquila listen in silence until Peter describes the shipwrecked mother searching for her children and crying, "Where are my Faustus and Faustinus?" then, when they hear their own names mentioned, they start up in amazement and say, "We suspected at the first that what you were saying might relate to us; but yet as many like things happen in different persons' lives, we kept silence; but when you came to the end and it was entirely manifest that your statements referred to us, then we confessed who we were." H. avoids what seems the needless repetition of a story which had been told already, and only states in general terms that Peter recounted Mattidia's history; but the amazed starting up of the brothers, and the words in which they express themselves, are the same as in R.; while, as the incident of the mention of their former names is omitted, it is in this version not apparent why the conclusion of Peter's speech brought conviction to their minds. It is evident that H., in trying to shorten the narrative by clearing it of what seemed to him a tiresome repetition, has missed a point in the story.

(4.) It has been already related how in R. the recognition of Clement's father crowns a disputation on astrological fate. In H. the whole story is spoiled. An old man accosts Peter, as in R., and promises to prove to him from his personal history that all things are ruled by the stars; but nothing turns on this. The recognition takes place in consequence of a chance meeting of Faustinianus with his wife, and has no relation to the subject he undertakes to discuss with Peter. And the obvious explanation is, that H. has copied the introduction from R.; but omits the disputation because he has already anticipated it, having put the argument for heathenism into the mouth of the eminent rhetorician Apion, who seemed a fitter character to conduct the disputation than the unknown Faustinianus. Further H. (xx. 15) and R. (x. 57) agree in the statement that the magical transformation of Clement's father takes place on the same day that he had been recognised by his family. This agrees with the story as told by R.; but H. had made five days' disputation intervene between the recognition and the transformation. Thus in the account of each of the three sets of recognitions there is evidence that H. copied either from R., or from a writer who tells the story exactly as R. does; and the former hypothesis is to be preferred because there is no evidence whatever of R.'s non-originality in this part of his task.

(5.) It has been stated that in H. there are two disputations of Simon with Peter, viz., at Caesarea and at Laodicea. There is decisive proof that in this H. has varied from the original form of the story which, as R. does, laid the scene of the entire disputation at Caesarea. The indications here, however, point to a borrowing not from R. but from a common original. H. does relate a disputation at Caesarea, but evidently reserves his materials for use further on, giving but a meagre sketch of part of one day's dispute, while he conscientiously follows his authority and relates that the dispute lasted three days. Afterwards at Laodicea the same topics are produced which had been brought forward in the earlier discussion, and produced as if they were new. Simon, for instance, expresses the greatest surprise at Peter's manner of disposing of the alleged spurious passages of the Pentateuch, although exactly the same line of argument had been used by Peter on the former occasion. The phenomenon again presents itself (H. xviii. 21) of a reference to former words of Peter which are not to be found in H. itself, but are found in R. ii. 45. Lastly, in the disputation at Laodicea, the office of summoning Peter to the conflict is ascribed to Zacchaeus, in flagrant contradiction with the previous story, according to which Zacchaeus was the leading man of the church at Caesarea before Peter's arrival, and had been left behind as its bishop on Peter's departure. This alone is enough to shew that H. is copying from an original, in which the scene is laid at Caesarea. It may be added that the Apostolic Constitutions make mention only of a Caesarean disputation.

(6.) It has been stated that the last homily contains private expositions by Peter to his disciples, and these can clearly be proved to be an interpolation. In R., after the disputation on Genesis in which Clement's father is convinced, when the party have returned home and just as they are going to sit down to meat, news comes in of the arrival of Apion and Anubion, and Faustinianus goes off to salute them. In H. the party have retired to rest, and Peter wakes them up in the middle of the night to receive his instructions; yet in the middle of this midnight discourse we have an account, almost verbally agreeing with R., of the news of the arrival of Apion coming just as they were about to sit down to meat, and the consequent departure of Clement's father. The discourse, which is thus clearly shewn to be an interpolation, contains H.'s doctrine concerning the devil, and is in such close connexion with the preceding homily which relates how Peter in his Laodicean disputation dealt with the problem of the permission of evil in the universe, that this also must be set down as an addition made by H. to the original story. And we can see the reason why H. altered the original account of a Caesarean disputation; namely, that he wished to reserve as the climax of his story, the solutions which he put into Peter's mouth, of the great controversy of his own day.

(7.) In the section H. ii. 19-32, which contains the information given by Nicetas and Aquila concerning Simon, there are plain marks that H. is not original. Nicetas, in repeating a conversation with Simon, speaks of himself in the third person: "Nicetas answered," instead of "I answered." In the corresponding section of R., Aquila is the speaker, and the use of the third person is correct. Yet this matter, in which H. is clearly not original, is so different from R., that we are led to the conclusion, not that H. copied from R., but that both copied from a common original. One instance in this section, however, deserves to be mentioned as an apparent case of direct copying from R. In H. ii. 22, Simon is represented as teaching that the dead shall not rise, and as rejecting Jerusalem and substituting Mount Gerizim for it; but nowhere else is there a trace of such doctrine being ascribed to Simon; and no controversy on these subjects is reported in the Homilies. And there is strong reason for suspecting that the explanation is that H. has here blundered in copying R. i. 57, where a Samaritan, whom there is no ground for identifying with Simon, is introduced as teaching these doctrines of the non-resurrection of the dead, and of the sanctity of Mount Gerizim.

It is needless to multiply proofs of the non-originality of H., and we turn to state some of the reasons why R. must also be regarded as the retoucher of a previously existing story. The work itself recognises former records of the things which it relates. In the preface it purports to be an account written after the death of Peter of discourses, some of which had by Peter's command been written down and sent to James during his own lifetime. R. iii. 75, contains an abstract of the contents of ten books of these previously sent reports. Again, R. v. 36, we are told of the despatch to James of a further instalment. Everything confirms the conclusion that R. is here using the credit which an existing narrative had gained, in order to obtain acceptance for his own additions to the story. It has been already shewn that there are some instances in the first division of the work where H. is clearly not original, and yet has not copied from R.; whence we infer the existence of an independent authority, at least for the earlier portion, employed by both writers. There are places where H. and R. seem to supplement one another, each supplying details omitted by the other: other places again where it would seem as if an obscure passage in the common original had been differently understood by each; and again in the discourses common to both, there are places where the version presented by H. preserves so much better the sequence of ideas and the cogency of argument that it is scarcely possible to think the form in R. the original (compare in particular H. ix. 9, 10, R. iv. 15, 16). There are places again where both seem to have abridged the common original. Thus R. mentions concerning an early conversation, that none of the women were present. There is no further mention of women in the party until quite late in the story both H. and R. incidentally speak of Peter's wife as being in the company. It may be noted in passing that they do not represent Peter and his wife as living together as married people; but Peter always sleeps in the same room with his disciples. We may conjecture that the original contained a formal account of the women who travelled with Peter, and this is confirmed by St. Jerome who refers to a work called the circuits of Peter (περίοδοι) as mentioning not only Peter's wife, but his daughter, of whom nothing is said either by H. or R. The work cited by Jerome contained a statement that Peter was bald, which is not found either in H. or R. In like manner we may infer that the original contained a formal account of the appointment of 12 precursors (πρόδοι) who were to go before Peter to the different cities which he meant to visit. H. several times speaks of the precursors, assuming the office to be known to the reader, but without ever recording its appointment. R. does give an account of its appointment, but one which implies that Peter had come attended by 12 companions, of whom Clement was already one. We have already mentioned inconsistencies in this first section from which we infer, that though the original form of the story mentioned the name of Clement, the introduction containing the account of Clement's journey from Rome is a later addition.

We conclude that the work cited by Jerome is the common original of H. and R.; and a comparison of the matter common to the two shews that both worked on their materials pretty freely, modifying the original to their own uses. From what has been said concerning H. under No. 7, we infer that the original contained mention both of Clement and of Nicetas and Aquila, and it is likely that Clement was there too represented as the recorder of the discourses. The original must have contained an account of a three days' disputation with Simon held at Caesarea; it also included the polemic against heathenism contained in the Tripolis discourses, as may be inferred both from R. v. 36 and also from a comparison of the two records of these discourses. It is likely that the same work contained the disputation of Peter and Apion referred to by Eusebius, and that H. followed the original in making Apion a speaking character, although he has been involved in confusion in trying to combine this with the additional matter imported by R. We may conjecture too (see R. x. 52) that it also contained a disputation by Anubion on the subject of "Genesis." On the other hand, there is no evidence that the original contained anything concerning the recognitions by Clement of the members of his family. In this part of the story R. makes no acknowledgment of previous accounts sent to James; and he shews every sign of originality and of having carefully gone over the old story, skilfully adapting it so as to join on his own additions. It appears from H. ii. 22, 26, that in quite an early part of the history the original introduced Nicetas and Aquila as addressing their fellow-disciple Clement as "dearest brother," and this probably gave R. the hint (see R. viii. 8) of representing them as natural brothers. R. omits these expressions in the place where they are inappropriate. A question may be raised whether the document referred to

R. iii. 75, and which contained an account of the disputation with Simon, was part of the same work as that referred to v. 36, which contained the disputation against the heathen. We have marked them as probably different. It may be remarked that Peter's daily bath, which is carefully recorded in the later books, is not mentioned in the three earlier. A question may be raised whether the original did not contain an account of a meeting of Simon and Peter at Rome; and it is not impossible that such an account may have been originally designed by the author; as one or two references to Rome as well as the choice of Clement as the narrator give cause to suspect. But that in any case the design was not executed, appears both from the absence of any early reference to a Roman contest between Simon and Peter; and also from the diversity of the accounts given as to the manner of Simon's death, since we may believe that if the document we are considering had related the story, its version would have superseded all others.

Quite a different impression as to relative originality is produced when we compare the doctrine of H. and R., and when we compare their narratives. The doctrine of H. is very peculiar, and at the same time, for the most part, consistently carried through the whole work; in R. the deviations from ordinary church teaching are far less striking, yet there are passages in which the ideas of H. can be traced, and which present the appearance of an imperfect expurgation of offensive doctrine. In H., Judaism and Christianity are represented as identical, and it is taught to be enough if a man recognise the authority either of Christ or of Moses; in R. he is required to acknowledge both. On this point, however, H. is not consistent; for in several places he agrees with R. in teaching the absolute necessity of baptism to salvation. H. rejects the rite of sacrifice altogether; according to R. the rite was divinely permitted for a time until the true prophet should come, who was to replace it by baptism as a means of forgiveness of sins. With respect to the authority of the Old Testament alleged for the rite of sacrifice, and for certain erroneous doctrines, H. rejects the alleged passages as falsified; R. regards them merely as obscure, and liable to be misunderstood by one who reads them without the guidance of tradition. The inspiration of the prophets later than Moses is denied by H. and admitted by R., though quotations from their writings are alike rare in both forms. According to H., the true prophet has presented himself in various incarnations, Adam, who is regarded as being identical with Christ, being the first and Jesus the last; and the history of Adam's sin is rejected as spurious; according to R., Christ has but revealed himself to, and inspired various holy men of old. And, in general, concerning the dignity and work of our Lord, the doctrine of R., though short of orthodox teaching, is far higher than that of H. The history of the fall, as far, at least, as regards the temptation of Eve, is referred to by R. as historical; but concerning Adam there are intimations of an esoteric doctrine not fully explained. H. gives what may be called a physical theory of the injury done by demons. They are represented as having sensual desires, which, being spirits, they have not organs to satisfy, and which they can gratify only by incorporation with human bodies. They use therefore the permission which the divine law grants them, of entering into the bodies of men who partake of forbidden food, or who, by worshipping them subject themselves to their power. And with these the union is so close, that after death when the demons descend to their natural regions of fire, the souls united to them are forced to accompany them, though grievously tormented by the element in which the demon feels pleasure. The opposition between fire and light is much dwelt on; and again, the water of baptism and other ablutions is represented as having a kind of physical efficacy in quenching the demonic fire. All this doctrine concerning demons shews itself comparatively faintly in R.; yet there seem to be indications that the doctrine as expounded in H. was contained in the original on which R. worked.

It is natural to think that the earlier form is that the doctrine of which is most peculiar; the later, that in which the divergences from orthodox teaching are smoothed away. Yet it is not always true that originality implies priority; and the application of this principle has caused some of the parts of H. which can be shewn to be the most recent, to be accepted as belonging to the original. For instance, we have seen that the private conversation between Peter and his disciples in the 20th homily bears on the face of it marks of interpolation; yet the clearness and peculiarity of its doctrine has caused it to be set down as belonging to the most ancient part of the work. The same may be said of the section concerning philanthropy at the end of the 12th homily, which however is wanting in the Syriac, and may be reasonably set down as one of the most modern parts of the whole work. For it is an addition made by H. to the story of the recognitions as told by R.; and we have already shewn that in all that relates to the recognitions H. is more recent than R. We arrive at more certain results, if examining the sections we have named, and for which H. is most responsible, we try to discover his favourite thoughts and forms of expression, and so to recognise the hand of the latest reviser in other parts of the work. Space will not permit such an examination to be entered on here; but we may notice the fondness of H. for discovering a male and female element in things, and for contrasting things under the names of male and female. This shews itself strongly in the sections referred to; and the almost total absence of the idea from R. makes it unlikely that it could have had any great prominence in the original document. The idea, however, became very popular in the sect to which H. belonged; and is noticed by a writer of the 10th century as a characteristic of some Ebionites then still remaining (see Hilgenfeld Nov. Test. extri can. recept. iii. 156). The germ, however, of the distinction between male and female prophecy, on which H. lays so much stress, was apparently to be found in the original document, which disposed of the testimony borne by our Lord to John the Baptist by the distinction that John was indeed the greatest of the prophets born of women, but was not on the level of the Son of Man. The general result of an attempt to discriminate what belongs to H. and R. respectively, from what they found in their common original, leads to the belief that H., far more nearly than R., represents the doctrinal aspect of the original, from which the teaching of H. differs only in the way of what may be called legitimate development.

The Clementines are unmistakably a production of that sect of Ebionites which held the book of Elchasai as sacred. For an account of the sources whence our knowledge of this book is derived, and for the connexion of the sect with Essenism, see the article ELCHASAITES. Almost all the doctrines ascribed to them are to be found in the Clementines. We have the doctrine already referred to of successive incarnations of Christ, and in particular the identification of Christ with Adam, the requirement of the obligations of the Mosaic Law, the rejection however of the rite of sacrifice, the rejection of certain passages both of the Old and New Testament, hostility to the apostle Paul, abstinence from the use of flesh (H. viii. 15, xii. 6, xv. 7), the inculcation of repeated washing, discouragement of virginity, concealment of their sacred books from all but approved persons, form of adjuration by appeal to the seven witnesses, ascription of gigantic stature to the angels (H. viii. 15) permission to dissemble the faith in time of persecution (R. i. 65, x. 55); while again the supposed derivation of the book of Elchasai from the Seres, is explained by R. viii. 48, where the Seres are described as a nation where all the observances on which the Ebionites laid stress were naturally complied with, and who were consequently exempt from the penalties of sickness and premature death, which attended their neglect. Ritschl regards the book of Elchasai as an exposition of these doctrines later than the Homilies; but we are disposed to look on it as earlier than the work which formed the common basis of H. and R. A recognition of this book is not improbably contained in a passage which is important in reference to the use made by H. and R. of their common original. The date which the book of Elchasai claimed for itself was the third year of Trajan. Whether it actually were so old need not here be inquired, but the fact that it was confessedly no older, might seem to put it at a disadvantage in comparison with the Pauline system which it rejected. But its adherents defended their position by their doctrine of pairs; viz., that it has been ever God's method to pair good and evil together, sending forth first the evil, then the countervailing good. Thus Cain was followed by Abel, Ishmael by Isaac, Esau by Jacob, so now, Simon Magus by Peter; and at the end of the world Antichrist will be followed by Christ. The last but one of the pairs enumerated takes, in the translation of Rufinus, a form which is scarcely intelligible: but the Syriac shews that the version given by R. did not essentially differ from that of H.; and that the contrasted pairs predicted by Peter are a false gospel sent abroad by a deceiver, and a true gospel secretly disseminated after the destruction of the holy place, for the rectification of the then existing heresies. It seems most probable that we are here to understand the doctrine of Paul and of Elchasai; and it may be noted that the fact that in this pair gospels, not persons, are contrasted, favours the conclusion that Hippolytus was mistaken in supposing Elchasai to be the name of a person. Two other of the contrasted pairs deserve notice; in H. we have contrasted Aaron and Moses, in R. the magicians and Moses. Again in H. are contrasted John the Baptist and our Saviour, in R. the tempter and our Saviour. In both cases the version of H. seems to be the original, since in that the law of the pairs is strictly observed that an elder is followed by a better younger; and we can understand R.'s motive for alteration if he did not share that absolute horror of the rite of sacrifice which ranked Aaron on the side of evil, or that hostility to John the Baptist which shews itself elsewhere in H., as for example in ranking Simon Magus among his disciples. There are passages in R. which would give rise to the suspicion that he held the same doctrines as H., but concealed the expression of them in a book intended for the uninitiated, for though in H. the principle of an esoteric doctrine is strongly asserted, the book seems to have been written at a later period, when all attempt at concealment had been abandoned. However, the instance last considered is one of several, where R.'s suppression of the doctrinal teaching of his original seems to imply an actual rejection of it.

It remains to speak of that part of the Clementines to which attention has been most strongly directed by modern students of the early history of the church, their assault on St. Paul under the mask of Simon Magus. And in the first place it may be remarked that the school hostile to St. Paul which found expression in these Clementines, cannot be regarded as the representative or continuation of the body of adversaries with whom he had to contend in his own lifetime. Their connexion was with the Essenes, not the Pharisees; and they themselves claimed no earlier origin than a date later than the destruction of Jerusalem, an event which would seem to have induced many of the Essenes in some sort to accept Christianity. We have seen that a theory was devised to account for the lateness of the period when what professed to be the true gospel opposed to Paul's was published. It follows that whatever results can be obtained from the Clementines belong to the history of the second century, not the first. The name of Paul is mentioned neither by H. nor R. Hostility to him appears in R. in a milder form. It has been already stated that in that part of the work which has been supposed to be derived from the "Ascents of James," an enemy, clearly intended for Paul, is introduced as making an assault on James; but as this relates to the period before the apostle's conversion, the narrative is one which the most orthodox writer need not have scrupled to admit into his work. R., however, plainly following his original, ignores Paul's labours among the heathen, and makes St. Peter the apostle of the Gentiles. And in one passage common to H. and R., and therefore probably belonging to the earlier document, a warning is given that the tempter who had contended in vain with our Lord, would afterwards send apostles of deceit, and therefore the converts are cautioned against receiving any teacher who had not first compared his doctrine with that of James, and had come to them with witnesses, lest the devil should send a preacher of error to them, even as he had raised up Simon as an opponent to Peter. It need not be disputed that in this passage as well as in that concerning the pairs, already quoted, Paul is referred to, his preaching being spoken of in the future tense as dramatic propriety required, since the action of the story is laid at a time before his conversion. And in both places Paul, if Paul be meant, is expressly distinguished from Simon. In the letter of Peter prefixed to the Homilies, we cannot doubt that Paul is assailed as the enemy who taught the lawless and silly doctrine that the obligations of the Mosaic law were not perpetual, and who unwarrantably represented Peter himself as concurring in teaching which he entirely repudiated. In another passage which has been alleged we have been unable to find a reference to Paul. There remains a single passage as the foundation of the Simon-Paulus theory. In the Laodicean disputation which H. makes the climax of his story, a new topic is suddenly introduced (xvii. 13-20) whether the evidence of the senses or that of supernatural vision be more trustworthy; and it is made to appear that Simon claims to have obtained by means of a vision of Jesus, knowledge of him superior to that which Peter had gained during his year of personal converse with him. In this section phrases are introduced which occur in the notice of the dispute at Antioch, between Peter and Paul, contained in the Epistle to the Galatians. It need not be doubted then that in this section of the Homilies, the arguments nominally directed against Simon are really intended to depreciate the claims of Paul. Since von Cölln and Baur first took notice of the concealed object of this section, speculation in Germany has run wild on the identification of Paul and Simon. The theory in the form now most approved will be found in the article on Simon Magus, in Schenkel's Bibel-Lexikon. It has been inferred that Simon was in Jewish circles a pseudonym for Paul, and that all that is related of him is but a parody of the life of Paul. Simon as a historical character almost entirely disappears. Even the story as told in the Acts of the Apostles has been held to be but a caricature of the story of Paul's bringing up to Jerusalem the collection he had made, and hoping by this gift of money to bribe the apostles to admit him to equal dignity. In order to account why the author of the Acts should have admitted into his narrative the section concerning Simon, explanations have been given which certainly have not the advantage in simplicity over that suggested by the work itself, viz., that the author having spent seven days in Philip's house had learned from him interesting particulars of his early evangelical work, which he naturally inserted in his history. The Simon-Paulus theory has been particularly misleading in speculations as to the literary history of the tales concerning Simon. Lipsius, for instance, has set himself to consider in what way the history of Simon could be told, so as best to serve the purpose of a libel on Paul; and having thus constructed a more ingenious parody of Paul's life than any which documentary evidence shews to have been ever in circulation, he asks us to accept this as the original form of the story of Simon. It becomes necessary therefore to point out on how narrow a basis of fact these speculations rest. To R., anti-Pauline though he is, the idea of identifying Simon with Paul seems never to have occurred. All through his book Paul is Paul, and Simon Simon. And the same may be said of the whole of the Homilies, except this Laodicean disputation, which as we have already seen is the part in which the latest writer has taken the greatest liberties with his original. Now before any inference can be drawn from this section as to an early identification of Simon and Paul, it must be shewn in the first place that this section belongs to the original document, and is not an addition for which only the last reviser is responsible. The object of the latter may be inferred from what he states in the form of a prediction (xvi. 21) that other heretics would arise who should assert the same blasphemies against God as Simon; which we may translate as implying that the writer has put into the mouth of Simon doctrines similar to those held by later heretics against whom he had himself to contend. In particular, this Laodicean section is strongly anti-Marcionite; and it is just possible that this section may have been elicited by Marcionite exaggeration of the claims of Paul. But we own, it seems to us far more probable that H. has here preserved a fragment of an earlier document, the full force of which it is even possible he did not himself understand. But then in the second place it is altogether unproved that in this earlier document this particular disputation was directed against Simon. The original work may well have included conflicts of Peter with other adversaries, and in another instance we have seen reason to think that H. has made a mistake in transferring to Simon words which in the earlier document referred to another. But thirdly, even if the earlier writer did put Pauline features into his picture of Simon, it no more follows that he identified Simon with Paul than that the later writer identified him with Marcion. The action of the story being laid at a date antecedent to Paul's conversion, it was a literary necessity that if Pauline pretensions were to be refuted, they must be put into the mouth of another. At the present day history is often written with a view to its bearing on the controversies of our own time; but we do not imagine that a writer doubts Julius Caesar to be a historical character, even though in speaking of him he may have Napoleon Bonaparte in his mind. Now, though the author of the Clementines has put his own words into the mouth both of Simon and Peter, it is manifest that he no more doubted of the historical character of one than of the other. For Simon, his authorities were—(1) the account given in Acts viii. which furnished the conception of Simon as possessed of magical powers; (2) in all probability the account given by Justin Martyr of honours paid to Simon at Rome; and (3) since R. refers to the writings of Simon, it can scarcely be doubted that the author used the work ascribed to Simon called the Great Announcement, some of the language quoted from which by Hippolytus, we have in the Clementines put into the mouth of Simon. And hence has resulted some little confusion, for the heresy of the "Great Announcement" appears to have been akin to the Valentinian; but what the Clementine author has added of his own is Marcionite.

A few words may be added as to the quotations from the New Testament in the Clementines. All the four gospels are quoted; for since the publication of the conclusion of the Homilies by Dressel, we may dismiss as altogether desperate the attempt, which had always been unreasonable, to deny that John's gospel was employed. Epiphanius tells us that a Hebrew translation of John's gospel was in use among the Ebionites. The quotations are principally from St. Matthew, but many of the passages are cited with considerable verbal differences from our present text; and there are a few passages quoted which are not found in any of our present gospels. The deviations from the existing text are much smaller in R. than in H., and it may be asserted that R. always conforms to our present gospels in the matter which he has added of his own and not taken from his original. Since it is known that the Ebionites used an Aramaic gospel, which in the main agreed with St. Matthew, but with considerable variations, we may conclude that this was the source principally employed by the author of the original. H. seems to have used the same sources as the original; but yet two things must be borne in mind before we assert that variations in H. from our existing texts prove that he had a different text before him, one is the laxity with which he cites the Old Testament; the other, the fact that the story demands that Peter should be represented as quoting our Lord's discourses from memory and not from any written source; and that the author would naturally feel himself entitled to a certain amount of licence in quotations of such a kind.*

We have, in conclusion, to say something as to the place and time of composition of the Clementine writings. The use made of the name of Clement had caused Rome to be accepted as the place of composition by the majority of critics, but the opposite arguments urged by Uhlhorn appear conclusive, and to, at least, the original document an Eastern origin must be assigned. Hippolytus mentions the arrival in Rome of an Elchasaite teacher about A.D. 220, whose doctrines would seem to have been then quite novel at Rome, and not to have taken root there. The scene of the story is all laid in the East, and the writings shew no familiarity with the Roman church. The ranking Clement among the disciples of Peter may be even said to be opposed to the earliest traditions of the Roman church, which placed Clement third from the apostles; but it is quite intelligible that in foreign churches where the epistle of Clement was habitually publicly read in the same manner as the apostolic epistles, Clement and the apostles might come to be regarded as contemporaries. Clement might naturally be chosen as a typical representative of the Gentile converts by an Ebionite who desired by his example to enforce on the Gentile churches the duty of obedience to the church of the circumcision. For all through it is James of Jerusalem, not Peter, who is represented as the supreme ruler of the churches. The author of the original document habitually used an Aramaic version of the New Testament; and there are a few phenomena which make it seem to us not incredible that the original document itself may have been written in the same language. On the whole, it appears that we must assign an Eastern origin to the original document; we will not venture to particularise further, though Uhlhorn's conjecture of Eastern Syria as the place of composition seems not improbable. It seems not unlikely, however, that the Recognitions with the prefatory letter relating the ordination of Clement as bishop of Rome, was a version of the story designed for Roman circulation. In order to fix the time of composition, the data are but scanty. The Recognitions are quoted by Origen (with however a different division of books from the present form) about A.D. 230. This gives a later limit to the time of publication of R. We may infer that the chronicle of Hippolytus A.D. 235 recognises the epistle of Clement to James, since it counts Peter as first bishop of Rome, and places the episcopate of Clement at a time so early as to make his ordination by Peter possible [see CLEMENS ROMANUS]. It is not unreasonable to date the epistle of Clement to James at least a quarter of a century earlier, in order to allow time for its ideas to gain such complete acceptance at Rome. Irenaeus is ignorant of the episcopate of Peter, but ranks Clement as a contemporary of the apostles. It is likely therefore that he knew the work on which the Recognitions were founded, but not this later version of the story. As a limit in the other direction we have the use of the name Faustus for one represented as a member of the imperial family, which points to a date later than the reign of Antoninus, whose wife, and whose daughter married to Marcus Aurelius, both bore the name of Faustina. A fact which might seem to yield more definite results is that a section (R. ix. 17-29) is identical with a passage quoted by Eusebius Præp. Ev. 6, 10, as from the dialogues of Bardesanes. But there are difficulties in making use of the inference that R. is later than Bardesanes, on account of uncertainty as to the date of Bardesanes himself [see BARDESANES]. Suffice it here to say that the date assigned by Eusebius in his chronicle for his activity, A.D. 173, seems to need to be put later, because an authority likely to be better informed, the chronicle of Edessa, with great particularity assigns for the date of his birth, July 11, A.D. 154. Further the dialogue cited by Eusebius and by R., has been now recovered from the Syriac and has been published in Cureton's Spicilegium Syriacum, 1855. From this it appears that the dialogue does not purport to be written by Bardesanes himself, but by a scholar of his, Philippus, who addresses him as father and is addressed by him as son. This forbids us to put the dialogue at a very early period of the life of Bardesanes. Merx (Bardesanes von Edessa) tries to shew that not only the section referred to but other sections in R. were no part of the original work, but were later interpolations from Bardesanes; but his arguments have quite failed to convince us. On the whole, A.D. 200 seems as near an approximation as we can make to the probable date of R. The form H. must be dated later; possibly, A.D. 218, the time when according to Hippolytus the Elchasaite Alcibiades came from Apamea to Rome. There is little to determine very closely the date of the original document. If we could lay stress on a passage which speaks of there being one Caesar (R. v. 19, H. x. 14), we should date it before A.D. 161, when Marcus Aurelius shared the empire with Verus. And though this argument is very far from decisive, there is nothing that actually forbids so early a date, while at the same time we could not safely name a much earlier one.

* In one place (xix. 3) H. having quoted some sayings of our Lord, makes the slip of referring to these as "Scripture." It thus clearly appears that the author used written gospels to which he ascribed the authority of Scripture.

The prolegomena of the earlier editors of the Clementines are collected in Migne's Patrologia. The most important monographs on the subject are von Cölln's article in Ersch and Gruber, 1828, Schliemann, die Clementinen, Hamburg, 1844; Hilgenfeld, die clementinischen Recognitionen und Homilien, Jena, 1848; Uhlhorn, die Homilien und Recognitionen des Clemens Rominus, Göttingen, 1854; Lehmann, die clementinische Schriften, Gotha, 1867. In these works will be found references to other sources of information. Baur has treated of the Clementines in several works: the section in Die christliche Gnosis, pp. 300-414, may especially be mentioned. We refer also to Ritschl, die Entstehung der altkatholischen Kirche, who enters more largely into the subject of the Clementines in his first edition; and Lipsius, Quellenkritik des Epiphanius und die Quellen der Römischen Petrusage. There is also an interesting review by Lipsius of Lehmann's work in the Protestantische Kirchenzeitung, 1869, pp. 477-482. [G. S.]

CLEOBIUS, CLEOBIANS. In a fragment of Hegesippus, preserved by Eusebius (H. E. iv. 22), we have an enumeration of some of the earliest heretics: "Simon, whence are the Simonians, Cleobius, whence the Cleobians (Κλεοβίμοι), and Dositheus, whence the Dositheans." In most works against heresy the names of Simon and Dositheus reappear; but ecclesiastical writers rarely mention Cleobius, and they appear to have known nothing of him beyond what they deduced from the passage just cited. Thus Theodoret (Haer. Fab.), in the introduction to the second book, mentions Cleobius, and in that to the first, the Cleobians (Κλεοβάνοι); but in both cases the context shews that he is using the passage in Eusebius. In the Apostolic Constitutions (vi. 8) Simon and Cleobius are described as disciples to Dositheus, whom they afterwards deposed from the chief place. This seems an arbitrary extension to Cleobius of the account given in the Clementines of the relations between Simon and Dositheus. Simon, Cleobius and their followers are accused of the forgery of apocryphal books (Ap. Const. vi. 16). Pseudo-Chrysostom, in the 48th homily on St. Matthew (vol. vi. p. cexix.), names Dositheus, Simon, and Cleonius among the false teachers who came in the name of Christ in fulfillment of our Lord's prophecy (Matt. xxiv. 5). Epiphanius (Haer. 51, p. 427) names "Cleobius or Cleobulus" in a list of heretics who counted our Lord to have been mere man. It is possible he is speaking quite at random, and has no more authority for attributing this opinion to Cleobius than to Demas and Hermogenes, who occur in the same list. But the name of a heretic, Cleobulus, only occurs elsewhere in the interpolated form of the epistle of Ignatius to the Trallians, in which he warns his readers against the children of the evil one, Theodotus and Cleobulus. The hypothesis suggests itself that Epiphanius was acquainted with this form of the epistle of Ignatius, which Zahn considers may be as early as A.D. 360; that he identified the Cleobulus whom he found there with the Cleobius of older writers; and that he attributed to him opinions kindred to those of Theodotus. If this be so, this would be the earliest indication of the existence of the longer form of the Ignatian letters. [G. S.]

CLEOBIUS, in the legendary life of Epiphanius (ii. 320), an instructor of E. in Christianity. [G. S.]

CLEOBULUS. [CLAUDIUS (2).]

CLEOMENES, a teacher of Patristian doctrines at Rome in the beginning of the 3rd century, under the episcopate of Zephyrinus, by whom he was tolerated in the church. Hippolytus states that Cleomenes had learned these doctrines from Epigonus, a disciple of Noetus, who had brought them to Rome (Ref. ix. 3, 7, 10; x. 27). Hippolytus has not expressed himself clearly, and Theodoret, who was only acquainted with the tenth book of the Refutation, was misled into supposing that the order of succession was Epigonus, Cleomenes, Noetus (Haer. Fab. iii. 3). [G. S.]

CLETUS or ANACLETUS, "le même que St. Clet, comme les savants en conviennent" (l'Art de vérifier les Dates, i. 218). Eusebius calls him Anacletus, and says that he was succeeded in the see of Rome by Clement in the twelfth year of Domitian, having sat himself there twelve years. According to this, his own consecration would have fallen in the first year of Domitian, or A.D. 81; but it is variously dated by others (comp. Gieseler, E. H. § 32 with note 4, Eng. tr.). Eusebius indeed nowhere says that he succeeded Linus, or was the second bishop of Rome: yet he places him between Linus, whom he calls the first bishop, and Clement, whom he calls third. Other ancient authorities make Clement the first bishop (see Clinton, F. R. ii. 399). Cave (Hist. Lit. 3 v.) was of opinion at one time, that Clement was ordained bishop by St. Peter over the Jewish section of the Roman church; and Linus by St. Paul bishop over the Gentile section, having Cletus for his successor: on whose death both sections united themselves under Clement. Pearson's dissertations on the subject, he says, altered his view. Yet it should be said that Eusebius himself attests there having been a Jewish succession at Jerusalem for some time, and names Marcus as its first Gentile bishop (E. H. iv. 5-6). Rohrbacher, on the strength of a list attributed to pope Liberius, places Clement after Linus, Cletus after Clement, and another pope named Anacletus after Cletus (E. H. iv. 450). This Gieseler calls "the modern Roman view." Clinton follows Eusebius, but omits his dates (F. R. ii. 535). [This question of the succession of the Roman bishops is discussed also in the article CLEMENS ROMANUS, p. 554.] Three spurious epistles have the name of Anacletus affixed to them in the Pseudo-Isidorian collection (Migne, Patrol. cxxx. 59 and seq.). CLIMACUS, JOHN. [JOHN CLIMACUS.]

CLITAU, king of Brecknock, the son of Clitguin, about A.D. 482. This is the only spelling of the name in the Liber Landavensis, and the varieties Clitanc and Clintanc are probably due to a very common typographical error. The story is, that as he had resolved upon remaining unmarried, and as he was nevertheless beloved by a noble maiden who rejected all other suitors for his sake, one of the courtiers who aspired to her hand was instigated to murder him. On the spot where the crime was perpetrated, and where Clitauc was buried, near the river Myngui, a church was afterwards erected to his memory. He was commemorated on Aug. 19 (Liber Landavensis, 183-188; Capg. N. L. A. f. 59; Cressy, Ch. Hist. of Britt. lib. x. c. 15; Acta SS. Aug. iii. 733; Britannia Sancta, 1745, ii. 88; Rees, Welsh Saints, 318; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 58, 59; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, i. 36). [C. H.]

CLODOALDUS (CLOUD, ST.), presbyter, was third son of Clodomir, king of Orleans, and grandson of St. Clotilda. He was born in A.D. 522, and was scarcely three years old when his father was killed in Burgundy, A.D. 524.

Queen Clotilda then brought Clodoald to Paris, with his elder brothers Theodoald and Gunthar, to be educated suitably to their illustrious birth. But in A.D. 526 king Childebert of Paris and king Clotaire of Soissons, sons of Clotilda, and uncles of the young princes of Orleans, jealous of the love of queen Clotilda for their nephews, murdered the two eldest. King Childebert, repenting after the first murder, interceded for the life of Gunthar in vain. Clodoald, however, escaped by the help of some powerful nobles.

Later on, Clodoaldus cut his hair to shew that he renounced the throne of Orleans, and consecrated himself to God. He maintained this resolution unswervingly, although several opportunities offered themselves for claiming his kingdom.

He quitted his first retreat to place himself under the conduct of St. Severinus, who lived a monastic life near Paris. But the neighbourhood of the city and court prevented him from carrying out his wish to live unknown to the world. So he retired to Provence. His works there won him universal veneration; but he had to receive such a vast number of visits, that he found it better to return to Paris. He was received with transports of joy by the people; and they demanded that he should be elevated to the presbyterate. Accordingly in 551 Eusebius, bishop of Paris, ordained him. Clodoaldus then settled at Nogent (Novigentum), a village two leagues from Paris, where he built a church, and soon had a large number of disciples. He not merely instructed these, but preached in the neighbouring villages. He died about A.D. 560 at Nogent. His church he had placed under the cathedral of Paris, but it was soon made collegiate. (Greg. Turon. Patrol. Lat. lxxi. 110, 125, 564, 565; Valesius, Rerum Francic. lib. vii.; Aimoin, Hist. Franc. II. cap. xii.; Patrol. Lat. cxxxix. p. 675; Le Coite, Annales Eccles. Franc. (Paris, 1665), vol. i. pp. 327, 348, 780; Acta SS. Bolland. September, vol. iii. p. 91.) [W. M. S.]

CLODOBERT was son of Chilperic I., king of the Franks, by his second queen, Fredegundis. He was born in the year 565, and died in 580, aged 15. In the month of August of that year a terrible dysentery ravaged almost the whole of France. The kings were at the time preparing civil war, and it was thought a warning or a judgment. The symptoms were a violent fever, vomiting, agony in the loins, and heaviness of the head or neck. The disease first seized children; then king Chilperic himself became seriously ill; then his younger son Dagobert. As he was for a short time better, the elder son, Clodobert, fell ill. Queen Fredegundis, his mother, terrified, and repenting of the exactions with which king Chilperic had been distressing the people, pathetically urged her husband to burn all the property lists which had been furnished for these tyrannical purposes. Encouraged by her example, the king destroyed the papers, and sent officers to forbid further inquiries into his subjects' property. The younger son now died: with the greatest grief they carried prince Clodobert on a bed from the royal villa at Brennacum to the church of St. Médard at Soissons. Here they laid him at the shrine of the saint, and uttered prayers and vows; but at midnight, panting and exhausted, he expired. They buried him in the church of Saints Crispin and Crispinian. There was a public mourning of the whole people, and men and women followed the funeral with the tokens of grief usual at the burial of husband or wife. King Chilperic afterwards made large donations to the ecclesiastical corporations, the church fabrics and the poor.

Venantius Fortunatus, bishop of Poitiers, wrote two elegiac poems to console king Chilperic and his queen; and composed elegiac epitaphs for the two dead princes. He describes Clodobert as untouched by the contagion of this sorrowful world, an innocent boy, of blameless life.

The details of his sickness and death, and of the speech of queen Fredegundis to king Chilperic, are given at length by Gregory of Tours. (Greg. Turon. Hist. Franc. v. 243, &c.; Patrol. Lat. lxxi. p. 349; Venant. Fortun. Miscell. ix. 2, 3, 4, 5; Patrol. Lat. lxxxviii. p. 298.)

CLODOMIR, one of the four sons of Clovis, amongst whom their father's kingdom was divided in 511. Clodomir's capital was Orleans, and his share embraced parts of western Aquitaine, the lands along the south of the Loire including Tours and probably Poitiers. On this division see Watz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, ii. 103-106, and Excursus on the various partitions of the Frankish kingdom under the Merovingians in Bonnell, die Anfänge des Karolingischen Hauses, Berlin, 1866, p. 199. - In the Frankish war against the Burgundians in 523, Clodomir took prisoner the king Sigismund, his wife and children, and cruelly murdered them at Coulmiers, near Orleans (Greg. Tur. iii. 6). In the following year, 524, in a battle with the Burgundians at Vesronce Clodomir was killed. His three children were entrusted to the care, perhaps the regency, of his mother Clotilda. Two of them, however, were shortly afterwards put to death by their uncles Childebert and Clotaire, who divided Clodomir's kingdom between themselves. The third son, Clodoaldus, escaped, entered the church, and was the reputed founder of the monastery of St. Cloud. See the horrible story in Greg. Tur. iii. 18, and Vita Sancti Clodoaldi, ap. Bouquet, iii. 422. [T. R. B.]

CLODOSINDE, or CHLODOSVINDA, queen of the Lombards, daughter of Clotaire I., king of the Franks, by his queen Ingundis. Clodosinde had learnt much from her grandmother, St. Clotilde, the excellent queen of king Clovis I. She married Alboin, king of the Lombards, but preserved the catholic traditions of her family in the midst of an Arian court. She made many efforts to bring over her husband to her own opinions. Nicetius bishop of Treves wrote her a long letter on this subject, in which he describes her as so wonderfully prosperous and popular as to need additional vigilance towards God. Her fame, he says, is great as that of a useful, humane, and munificent woman, anxious for the welfare of the poor, sagacious in ruling, illustrious amongst all her subjects for her excellent life. She died A.D. 570, leaving an only daughter, Albesinda, who, losing her father two years later, through the intrigues of his queen, Rosamund, with Helmichis, was carried off to Ravenna, and afterwards to the emperor Tiberius at Constantinople, by Longinus, prefect of Ravenna. (Greg. Turon. num. 142, 143, 182, Patrol. Lat. xxi.; Nicet. Trevir. Epist. i., Patrol. Lat. lxxviii. p. 375; Paulus Diacon. de Gestis Langobard. iii. 28, 29, 30, Patrol. Lat. xcvi. p. 498.) CLOFFAN, early Welsh saint, patron of Llangothlan in Pembrokeshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 370). [C. H.]

CLOTAIRE I. (CHLOTHARIUS), the youngest of the four sons of Clovis, amongst whom their father's kingdom was divided in 511. Clotaire's capital was Soissons, and his share embraced generally the Frankish territory on the right bank of the Seine, including Picardy, Vermandois, Flanders, and Brabant (Bonnell, Anfänge d. Karol. Hauses, 201-2). On the death of Clodomir and the murder of his sons by Clotaire [v. CHLODOMERIS] (cf. Löbell, Greg. von Tours, 20-21) the kingdom of Clodomir was divided, Clotaire obtaining Touraine and Poitou (Bonnell, ibid.). Clotaire acted generally in concert with Childebert [v. CHILDEBERTUS I.]. In 555, on the death of Theodebald, grandson of Theodorice I., Clovis's eldest son, Clotaire, obtained his kingdom (Greg. iv. 9; Bonnell, 204). During the next two years Clotaire was engaged against the Saxons with varying fortune (Greg. iv. 14). During his absence, his son Chramnus rose against him, and was assisted by Childebert. Chramnus was put down on Clotaire's return, and Childebert shortly afterwards dying, Clotaire became sole king of the Franks, 558. In 560 Chramnus rose again, and Clotaire marched against him. He fled to Brittany, but was taken and burnt alive with his wife and children (Greg. iv. 20). In 561 Clotaire died at Compiègne, and was buried at Soissons (ib. 21). The kingdom was divided amongst his four sons, Guntram, Charibert, Sigebert, and Chilperic. [T. R. B.]

CLOTAIRE II., son of Chilperic I. and Fredegund, succeeded his father in 584, but only in Chilperic's original kingdom of Soissons [v. CHILPERICUS I.]. Being a minor, Clotaire was under the regency of his uncle Guntram, king of Burgundy. After Guntram's death in 593 various attempts were made to despoil Clotaire of his possessions. The first, by Childebert II., was repulsed with great loss (Fredegund, 14). On the death of Childebert in 596, Fredegund seized Paris for her son (ib. 17); but dying the next year, her son's kingdom became a prey to Theodorice and Theodebert; kings of Burgundy and Austrasia, doubtless prompted to the attack by Brunehilde. Clotaire lost everything but a few possessions near the mouth of the Seine (ib. 20); nor was his mayor, Landeric, any more successful in attempting to recover these losses four years afterwards (ib. 25). In 611, however, Clotaire is found united with Theodorice against Theodebert (ib. 37-8). Theodebert being deprived of his kingdom, Theodorice turned against Clotaire, but before the two armies met Theodorice died suddenly at Metz (ib. 39). Brunehilde endeavoured to set up Sigebert, Theodorice's son, in his father's place, but the Burgundian and Austrasian nobles joined Clotaire; Brunehilde was taken and barbarously put to death, together with Sigebert and one of his brothers (ib. 40-2). Clotaire thus became sole king of the Franks (613), and the period of internecine family wars between the Merovingian princes was at an end. The remaining fifteen years of Clotaire's reign were comparatively undisturbed (pacem habens cum omnibus gentibus vicinis, Fred. 42). Each subsidiary kingdom, Neustria, Austrasia, and Burgundy was put under a separate mayor of the palace, at first Landeric in Neustria, Rado in Austrasia, and Warnachar in Burgundy. On Warnachar's death in 626, the Burgundian nobles specially requested that no successor might be appointed in his place. In 622 Clotaire committed the government of Austrasia to his son Dagobert, whose chief advisers were Arnulf, bishop of Metz, and Pippin as mayor of the palace. The rule of Dagobert in Austrasia was practically independent, and on the death of Clotaire in 628, Dagobert succeeded to the throne of the united realm. The lex Alamannorum appears to have been promulgated during this reign (Pertz, Leg. iii. 1 sq.). Also a very important edict for the government of the kingdom was issued by Clotaire at an assembly in Paris in 614 (Pertz, Leg. i. 14 sq.). Amongst other provisions it decreed that election of bishops was to be by clergy and people (a clero et populo) with right of confirmation in the king, and reserving also a right of direct nomination to the king (c. 1). No bishop was to elect his own successor (c. 2). The clergy were only in special cases to be subject to the civil courts (c. 4). In disputes between the clergy and civilians, the cause was to be adjudged by a mixed tribunal (c. 5). Liberty of appeal was granted against oppressive taxation (c. 9); also liberty to relations of intestates to inherit (c. 6). In local administration natives of the locality alone were to be employed (c. 12). Finally, there was a clause that neither freeman nor slave, unless a thief caught in the act, should be condemned to death without a hearing. Compare Waitz, Deutsche Verfassungsgeschichte, ii. 684 sq.; Fehr, Staat und Kirche im fränkischen Reiche bis auf Carl den Grossen, 51 sq. Also see generally Richter, Anna'en d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, i. sub annis. [T. R. B.]

CLOTAIRE III., son of Clovis II., was chosen king of the Franks on his father's death in 656.

Ercinoald, mayor of the palace, died shortly after Clotaire's accession, and was replaced by Ebroin. Clotaire's mother Balthildis retained some authority as regent till the year 664, when, her son coming of age, she retired into the monastery of Chelles, founded by herself. With her retirement began the unrestrained tyranny of Ebroin [v. EBROIN]. In the year 660, Clotaire's brother, Childeric II., had been raised with the consent of Balthildis (Vita S. Balthildis, 5) to the Austrasian throne, and from that year till 670, when he died, Clovis was king only of Neustria and Burgundia. For the chronology of the Gesta Reg. Fr. 45, see Richter, Annalen d. Deutschen Geschichte im Mittelalter, vol. i. sub an. 670, note. During the reign of Clotaire, the famous monastery of Corbie was founded by Balthildis. See Bréquigny, ed. Pardessus, ii. 114 n.

[T. R. B.]

CLOTAIRE IV. was set up as king of the Austrasian Franks by Charles Martel during his struggle with the Neustrians in 717. It is uncertain whether Clotaire was of Merovingian race or not. He died in 719. (Gesta Reg. Fr. 53.) [CHARLES MARTEL.] [T. R. B.]

CLOTILDA, or CHROTECHILDIS or CHROTILDIS, daughter of Chilperic, was early left an orphan by the murder of her parents by her uncle Gundobald, the Burgundian king. Though the daughter of an Arian, she, as well as the sons of Gundobald (v. Binding, das Burgundisch-Romanische Königreich, 1868, p. 184), was brought up a Catholic. Of her marriage with Clovis, the Frankish king, about the year 492 or 493, around which so much legendary matter has grown, the only trustworthy authority is Gregory of Tours. This is his account: "Chlodoveus happened to be sending frequent embassies to Burgundy. On one of these occasions his envoys discovered the girl Chrotildis. As they saw that she was comely and modest, and knew that she was of royal stock, they announced the fact to Chlodoveus. Without delay he despatched an embassy to Gundobald, to demand her hand in marriage. Gundobald, afraid to refuse, delivered her over to the Franks. They received her, and quickly brought her to the king's presence. And when Chlodoveus saw her, he rejoiced greatly, and wedded her" (Greg. Tur. ii. 28). Then follows a dramatic scene. Clotilda baptized her first-born son, and took occasion to represent to Clovis the futility of the worship of the heathen gods. The child died shortly afterwards; Clovis believed the Frankish gods to be offended. Nevertheless he allowed the second child also to be baptized. It too sickened; but notwithstanding the taunts of her husband, Clotilda prayed for it, and it recovered. Nor did she cease her endeavours to convert her husband until eventually successful (on the conversion, see CLOVIS). The dramatic character and the dialogue are no doubt Gregory's own. The facts, however, seem authentic enough. Though not a contemporary himself, Gregory makes use of contemporary authority (ii. 31; see generally on his authority, Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter, 3rd ed. 1873, i. pp. 76-83; Löbell, Gregor von Tours, pp. 320 ff.). These facts nevertheless speedily became encrusted with legend. This legendary growth is summed up and already stereotyped in the Gesta Francorum, chap. 11-13, and the Historia Epitomata of Fredegarius, ch. 18. (Both chronicles are to be found in the collections of Bouquet, vol. ii., and Duchesne, vol. i.) The latter looks on Clotilda as the avenger on Burgundy of the bloody deeds of Gundobald. The former takes more strictly the ecclesiastical point of view of Clotilda as the converter of Clovis and the Franks, and the life of Clotilda, in the Acta Sanctorum, follows the Gesta. A discussion of the growth and character of the legendary accounts of the marriage is to be found in an appendix to Faurl, Histoire de la Gaule Méridionale, vol. ii.; also in Junghans, Geschichte der Frankischen Könige Childerich und Chlodovech, Göttingen, 1857; cp. Binding, p. 112 and note.

After Clovis's death Clotilda lived principally at Tours, paying rare visits to Paris. She had borne to her husband four sons and one daughter; the latter was married to Amalaric, the Visigothic king of Spain. After the death of her son Chlodimir she gave shelter to his children until they were craftily abstracted from her care, and two of them murdered by their uncles. She was the real or reputed foundress of several religious houses, notably of St. Mary of Andelys, near Rouen, to which girls were sent for education from England during Bede's time (H. E. iii. 8). The original foundation was destroyed by the Normans. Clotilda, however, remained the patron-saint of the place, and miracles were worked there in her name down to the Revolution, and have recommenced since. She died at Tours in 545, and was buried at Paris beside her husband, in the church of the Apostles, afterwards St. Geneviève's. Of "Sainte Clotilde, reine de France," many lives have been written, and panegyrics pronounced, by French divines and devotees. The only one of any value is Sainte Clotilde et son Siècle, by the Abbé Rouquette, Paris, 1867. [T. R. B.]

CLOUD, ST. [CLODOALDUS.]

CLOVIS (in the chroniclers CLUODOECUS, CLODOVEUS, CHLODOVECHUS, &c., modern German LUDWIG, modern French LOUIS. On the spelling v. Thiel, Ep. Rom. Pon. p. 624 note, and Memoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, vol. 20, p. 67), son of Childeric, one of the kings of the Salian Franks, was born in the year 466, and succeeded his father in 481 (Greg. Tur. ii. 43). As soon as he reached manhood (486) he attacked Syagrius, "rex Romanorum" (Greg. ii. 23), son of Aegidius, the isolated and independent representative of the Roman power in Gaul (v. Junghans, pp. 22, 23). Syagrius was defeated, and Clovis advanced his territory from the Somme to the Seine, and afterwards to the Loire (Gesta Francorum, 14), was recognised king by the former subjects of Syagrius (Greg. ii. 27), and transferred his capital from Tournai to Soissons. (Vita S. Remigii, ap. Bouquet, iii. 377 E.) Waitz (ii. 60 note) doubts this (see Junghans, p. 34, note 3). Many wars and conquests followed (Greg. ii. 27).

About the year 492 Clovis married the Burgundian princess Clotilda or Chrotechildis. [As regards the marriage, see CLOTILDA.] Clotilda was a Christian and a Catholic, and she is said to have made many attempts to convert her husband from idolatry to Christianity (Greg. ii. 29; Rückert, Culturgeschichte, i. pp. 316, 317; Binding, pp. 111-4, doubts the value of Clotilda's work; Bornhak, pp. 207, 208, magnifies it). What the entreaties of Clotilda could not effect the crisis of war brought about. During a battle against the Alamanni (whether at Tolbiae or elsewhere, see Bornhak, p. 209, note 2; Waitz, ii. 65, note 2) the Franks were hard pressed, and beginning to yield. Clovis raised his eyes to heaven and invoked the aid of Christ. Forthwith the tide of battle turned, and the Alamanni fled. Remigius, at the instance of Clotilda, called on Clovis to fulfil his vow. "Gladly," replied the king, "but I must first obtain the consent of my own people." His warriors signified their assent in the well-known words, "Gods that die we cast away from us; the god that dies not, whom Remigius preaches, we are prepared to follow." On Christmas day, therefore, of the same year (496), Clovis, with his sisters Albofleda, a heathen, and Lantechild, an Arian, was baptized by Remigius at Rheims. "Gently, Saccabrian, bow down thy head, worship what thou hast hitherto destroyed, destroy what thou hast hitherto worshipped," were the apt words of Remigius (Greg. ii. 30, 31; Vita Rem. ap. Bouquet). How important this conversion was in the eyes of the Catholic world of the day may be gathered from the letters of congratulation addressed to Clovis by Avitus, bishop of Vienne (Bouquet, iv. 49), and by pope Anastasius, who wrote not only to the king but to the bishops of Gaul as well (Thiel, Ep. Rom. Pont. pp. 624 and 634). Theodoric, the Ostrogothic king of Italy, was an Arian, though a tolerant one, but Euric, the Visigoth, had proclaimed himself militant and proselytising (Fauriel, ii. 28); the Burgundian and Vandal princes were also Arian. The majority of the population of Gaul was Catholic, and Clovis was the only Catholic prince. (On the relation of these Arian princes to their Catholic subjects, see Binding, pp. 125 ff.) Whatever may have been his motives, and every variety has been attributed to him, from direct inspiration of the Holy Ghost (Rettberg, Kirchengeschichte, i. p. 274, 5) to the coldest political calculation (Binding, pp. 111-114), Clovis must have been aware that by his conversion to the Catholic faith he would make the majority of his own subjects firm in their allegiance, and the Roman subjects of the Arian princes in the south ill-affected towards their rulers. (An instance of such disaffection may be found in Greg. ii. 36.) Nor can he have been ignorant of the political importance of the aid which he would get from the Catholic priesthood throughout Gaul. From this point, therefore, dates an increase of influence among the Roman population, the foundations were laid of a Roman nobility of office and intellect capable of superseding the old Teutonic nobility of race (Bornhak, pp. 219-221). Thus, whilst from one point of view this was the "first step towards the world-historical union of Teutonic civilisation with the Roman church" (Richter, p. 36 note 6), on the other hand, a reaction of Roman civilisation against its Teutonic conquerors now set in and modern Latin France became possible. As regards the immediate consequences of the conversion, a body of Frankish warriors not yet converted joined Rachnacher (Vita Rem. ap. Bouquet, iii. p. 377 C.D.). Whether this was also a desertion of Clovis is doubtful (v. Junghans, p. 59). The conversion of the nation was not completed till long afterwards (see Waitz, ii. 85, note 1; and Rettberg, pp. 285-287). All questions connected with the conversion of Clovis are fully treated by Rückert, Culturgeschichte des Deutschen Volkes in der Zeit des Uebergangs aus dem Heidenthum in das Christenthum, Leipzig, 1853-54.

The next war of Clovis was with Burgundy, A.D. 500. Gundobald, the uncle of Clotilda and murderer of her parents, was defeated at Dijon. Clovis annexed part of the Burgundian dominion, and gave the rest to Godegisel, another brother. Shortly afterwards Gundobald returned, expelled Godegisel, and apparently became reconciled to Clovis, for in 507 the Burgundians helped Clovis in his expedition against the Visigoths. (This alliance is not mentioned by Gregory, but see Binding, p. 194 note 659; and Richter, p. 41 note e.) Between 505 and 507 Clovis is said to have been afflicted with tedious illness (Vita Severini, Bouquet, iii. 392 B.), immediately on recovery from which he issued his famous declaration of war against the Visigoths: "Verily it grieves my soul that these Arians should hold a part of Gaul; with God's help let us go and conquer them, and reduce their territory into our hands" (Greg. ii. 37). From Paris Clovis marched through Orleans to Tours, gave strict orders for the protection of the Catholic church and all belonging to it (Epist. ap. Bouquet, iv. 54), met and defeated the Visigoths at Voullon or Vouglé near Poitiers, slaying Alaric the king with his own hand (Richter, p. 40 notes and ref.). The winter of 507-8 Clovis spent at Bordeaux, carried off the Visigothic treasure from Toulouse, and reduced Angoulême and the surrounding territory before his return to Paris, which city henceforward he made the capital of his kingdom (Greg. ii. 38). That the religious element was very powerful in this war (Rückert, i. 324) is evident from the letter of Clovis to the bishops (Bouquet, l. c.), from the vain attempts which Alaric had made to confirm the allegiance of his Catholic and Roman subjects (Richter, p. 39 note 2), and from what Cassiodorus (Var. iii. Ep. 1-4) tells us of the negotiations before the war. It seems that Theodoric the Ostrogoth had proposed an alliance amongst all the Arian German kings for the maintenance of peace; and when the Franks began to pursue their victories in a fresh campaign and laid siege to Arles, Theodoric interfered, sent an army under Ibbas, which defeated the Franks and relieved Arles, and eventually agreed to a peace, by which Provence was annexed by the Ostrogothic power, Septimania adhered to the Visigothic kingdom of Spain, and Clovis's conquest of Aquitaine was acknowledged (v. Binding, p. 212 and note 731). We do not know whether Clovis joined personally in this Rhone campaign. No mention of it is made by Gregory. It was at Tours, on his return from Bordeaux in 508, that Clovis received a letter from the emperor Anastasius, "conferring upon him the consular dignity, from which time he was habitually called consul and Augustus" ("ab Anastasio Imperatore codicillis de consulatu accepit, et in basilicâ beati Martini tunicâ blateâ indutus est et chlamyde, imponens vertice diadema, . . . et ab eâ die tanquam consul et (al. 'aut') Augustus est vocitatus," Greg. ii. 38). Much discussion has taken place as to the exact meaning of this passage. The name of Clovis does not appear in the consular Fasti, but in the prologue to the Lex Salaria he is entitled "proconsul" (Sybel, Jahrb. d. Alt. in Rheinl. iv. p. 86). Again the chlamys and the diadem are the insignia of the patriciate. Hence it has been assumed by many that what was conferred on Clovis was the proconsulate and the patriciate (Valesius, i. 299; Richter, pp. 40, 41; Junghans, pp. 126-128). On the contrary, Waitz (ii. 59-61) and others (e.g. Petigny, ii. 533; and Bornhak, pp. 234-35), adhering to the exact words of Gregory, maintain that it was the title of consul that was actually conferred on Clovis. The significance of the event itself is plain. Anastasius saw the value to the empire of the Frankish power as a counterpoise to the Ostrogothic. Clovis willingly accepted any title of honour by which he obtained a quasi-legal title in the eyes of his Roman subjects (cp. Hallam, Middle Ages, vol. i. note 3 on chap. i.).

The well-known story of the vase of Soissons (Greg. ii. 27) not only shews how ill Clovis brooked the liberty and equality of the other Frankish chiefs, but reveals the most unfavourable side of his character, his deceitfulness. "Dolus," however, if on the right side, is seldom an attribute of blame with the mediæval chroniclers. The most discreditable deeds of this character attributed to Clovis are the machinations by which he subjected the other Frankish chiefs originally his equals, and brought about the unification of the Frankish empire. Thus he suggested the murder of his father to Sigebert, king of the Ripuarian Franks, and when the deed was done, himself took possession of the kingdom (Greg. ii. 40). So king Chararich is first imprisoned, and then put to death (ib. 41; cp. c. 27 dem ferri, of Syagrius). King Rachnachar of Cambrai and his two brothers shared a similar fate (ib. 42).

In the early part of 511 Clovis summoned a council of 32 bishops to Orleans (see Decrees ap. Sirmondi, Conc. Gall. i. 177). Before the close of the year he died at the age of 45, and was buried at Paris in the church of the Apostles (afterwards St. Geneviève's) which he and Clotilda had built. He left four sons, Theodoric, the eldest (illegitimate); Chlodimir, Childebert, and Lothar, by Clotilda.

The best and only first-class original authority for the reign of Clovis is Gregory of Tours, Historia Francorum, ii. 27-43, contained in the collections of Duchesne, vol. i.; and Bouquet, Recueil des Historiens, &c., vol. ii. (in the 3rd volume of Bouquet are extracts from the lives of the saints relating to the reign of Clovis). On the authority of Gregory see Löbell, Gregor von Tours und seine Zeit, pp. 320 ff.; Monod, in the Bibliothèque de l'École des hautes Etudes, part 8, 1872; and Wattenbach, Deutschlands Geschichtsquellen im Mittelalter, 3rd ed. 1873, vol. i. pp. 76-83. The best monograph on the subject of Clovis is Junghans, Geschichte der Frankischen Könige Childerich und Chlodovech, Göttingen, 1857. CLOVIS II. (for orthography, see CLOVIS I.) was chosen successor, whilst still a minor, to his father Dagobert I. by the chief men of Neustria and Burgundy, A.D. 638 (omnes leudes sublimant in regnum. Fredegar, 79). The government, though nominally under the regency of Nantechilde his mother, was really in the hands the mayors of the palace, Aega and Erchinoald. Pippin, mayor of Sigebert, half-brother of Clovis and king of the Austrasian Franks, demanded a partition of the treasures of Dagobert. A placitum, or common assembly of the chief men of each division, was held at Compiègne and the partition made (Fredegar, 85). Of Clovis it is said that he was the first of his race that allowed himself to be driven in an ox-waggon; at any rate he was weak-minded and profligate (Gesta Fr. 44), and towards the end of his reign insane (Fredegar, Cont. 91). There are stories of his having broken off the arm of St. Denis, of his having carried off certain silver ornaments from the church of that monastery, and of his having as an atonement released the monastery from the jurisdiction of the archbishop of Paris. For this and for his benefactions to other monasteries, such as St. Maur-les-Fossés, Luxeuil, Rebas, &c., see the documents in Bréquigny's collection (ed. Pardessus). Sigebert died at the beginning of the year 656. Grimold, the Austrasian mayor, attempted to place his own son upon the throne. The Austrasian chiefs rose against him, brought him bound before Clovis at Paris, to whom they offered the crown (Gesta Reg. Fr. 43). Clovis thus reunited the whole Frankish realm, but only for a few months, as he died in August of the same year 656. Clovis married Baldechildis or Balthildis, originally a captive from England (afterwards canonised, see her life in Acta Sanctorum, ii. 26th Jan.), and by her he had three sons, Clotaire III., Childeric II., and Theodoric III. Clovis was buried at St. Denis. [T. R. B.]

CLOVIS III., son of Theodoric III., youngest son of Clovis II., was chosen king of the Franks on his father's death in 691. He died four years afterwards, in 695, whilst still a minor, and was succeeded by his brother Childebert III. (Fredegar, Cont. 101; Gesta Reg. Fr. 49.) [T. R. B.]

CLYDAI, Welsh saint of the 5th century, reputed foundress of a church named Clydai in Emlyn (Rees, Welsh Saints, 151). [C. H.]

CLYDOG (CLEDOG), Welsh saint of the 5th century, buried at Clodock church in Herefordshire, of which he was the reputed founder; patron of the chapels of Llanfeuno (St. Beuno), Longtown (St. Peter), and Cresswell (St. Mary); commemorated on Aug. 19 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 145). [C. H.]

CNEBURG (Hen. Hunt. Hist. M. H. B. 724), CNEUBURGA, perhaps (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 342), sister of Ina king of the West Saxons and Cuthburga. [CUENBURH.] [C. H.]

COBHRAN is said by St. Aengus (De Matr. Hib. SS.) to be the son of Nenain or Enain and of Mincloth, sister of St. Columba: his brothers were Moab, Moabbus, or Moabbanus, Colman, and Moeldubius. But as there are in the calendars a Cobhran of Cluain or Cluain-Enach at July 19, and another of Cluain-Cuallacta at Aug. 2, Colgan cannot decide which dedication belongs to the nephew and disciple of St. Columba, or whether they are not both his. (Tr. Thaum. 469, c. 86, 482 n.⁴²; Reeves, Adamnan, 247.) [J. G.]

COBTHACH is mentioned among the companions of St. Columba in crossing from Ireland to Iona, and Camerarius places him in the calendar on Aug. 7, but without any authority. He was son of Brendan, and brother of St. Baithen, St. Columba's successor at Iona: he was thus cousin-german of St. Columba. (Reeves, Adamnan, Add. Note A, p. 245; Colgan, Acti SS. 7-8, and Tr. Thaum. 418 n.¹⁸.) Camerarius and other Scotch hagiographers call him Cibthachus, brother of Ethernan or Ernan, and nephew of St. Columba; but they are evidently at fault in both kindred and facts, as Ernan was St. Columba's maternal uncle. [J. G.]

COCCA, (COGA, CHOCA, CUACH,) of Cill-Choca, Jan. 8, June 6. St. Cocca is by some identified with Cocha nurse of St. Ciaran [COCHA], but they appear to have been entirely different. Others, with more probability, think she was the same as the person elsewhere called Erenat, or Ergnat, the cook and embroideress or robe-maker of St. Columba, Cocca being a form of Coqua, a cook [ERENAT]. She is commemorated on Jan. 8 and June 6, on the former as "Cuach, Virgin, of Cill-Cuaiche in Cairbre-Ua-Cardha" (Mart. Doneg.), now Kilcock, in the baronies of Ikeathy and Oughterany, co. Kildare. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 379; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. iii. 122; Colgan, Acta SS. 465, n.²⁹; O'Hanlon, Irish Saints, i. 130; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 553.) [J. G.]

COCHA, of Ros-bennachair (now Rosbanagher, or Rosmanagher, co. Clare)—June 29. In the Life of St. Ciaran, of Saighir, there is an account of the many services St. Ciaran did to St. Cocha, and of their lasting friendship. She was St. Ciaran's nurse, and through him her monastery at Rosbanagher was founded in the 6th century. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 183, 379; Colgan, Acta SS. 461, 465, n.²⁹; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 405.) [J. G.]

CODDIANI, according to Epiphanius (Haer. xxvi. p. 85) a nickname given to an impure sect of Gnostic heretics. He explains the word as "plattermen," deriving it from a Syriac word, codda (Aram. כִּדָּא), a platter or dish; and says that they got the name because, on account of their pollution, no one could eat with them, and it was necessary that their food should be given them separately. [G. S.]

COELESTIANI. [COLESTIUS, PELAGIUS.]

COELCHUS, Irish saint. [COLGA (5).]

COELESTINUS I., commonly called CELESTINE, 42nd bishop of Rome, succeeded Boniface I. on Sunday, September 10, 422, without any delay or contest. He was of Roman birth—the son of Priscus. In early life he had visited Milan during the episcopate of St. Ambrose. He had been deacon to Innocent, and at that time had written a cordial letter to

St. Augustine, which he sent to Hippo by a cleric named Projectus. Augustine returned a suitable reply (Aug. Ep. 192). Soon after his accession to the see of Rome, Celestine received a letter from Augustine (Ep. 209) on the case of one Antony, who had been somewhat precipitately appointed bishop of Fussala, a small town forty miles from Hippo, had gravely misconducted himself in his office, had been compelled by a synod of bishops to leave Fussala, and had afterwards applied to Boniface with a view to his restoration. Boniface had written in his favour, with the saving clause, "if the information which he had given was correct." Augustine entreated Celestine to consider the statement of facts which he now transmitted, and not to impose on the people of Fussala, by aid of the secular power, a prelate so unworthy of the dignity to which he had been inconsiderately raised. "There is no doubt," says Fleury (b. xxiv. s. 34), "that matters were ordered to St. Augustine's satisfaction." After this, the African bishops resolved that they would no longer allow of appeals to Rome from their own country; and when Celestine, apparently in 426, wrote to them in behalf of the priest Apiarius, deposed from his office by his bishop Urbanus some eight years before, and favourably received, on his appeal to Rome, by pope Zosimus, a general council of Africa met and sent a reply to this effect: We have found Apiarius guilty of so many crimes that Faustinus (the deputy of the Roman see, sent by Zosimus to deal with the case) was unable to defend him; therefore we beg you to observe the Nicene rule (can. 5), and not to receive to communion those who have been excommunicated by us. Our African church retains its right to decide the causes of its own members. The Nicene council has ordered that all causes should be decided where they arise; nor can any one "believe that our God will inspire a single individual with justice, and deny it to a large number of bishops sitting in council." That persons should be sent by you to decide causes in Africa has been "ordained by no synod;" and as to the claim made for your see in this matter on the authority of the Nicene council, we proved to your predecessor, by authentic copies of Nicene canons, that it was wholly baseless. Do not, then, send (whoever may ask it) clerics of your own to carry out your orders in Africa, "lest we should seem to be introducing into Christ's church the smoky pride of this world" (Cod. Can. Ecol. Afric. ad fin.; Galland, Bibl. Patr. ix. 289).

Celestine was zealous against Pelagianism, and constrained Coelestius, the companion of Pelagius, to leave Italy. He retired to Constantinople, where Marius M-reator attacked him in a published "memorial."

The affairs of eastern Illyricum occupied the attention of Celestine, as of his predecessors. This "diocese" was attached, politically, to the eastern empire; but the see of Rome had kept a hold over its churches by committing a sort of vicarial authority to the see of Thessalonica, which was its head. Thus Damasus is said to have made the bishops of Thessalonica his representatives. See Fleury, b. xviii. c. 22. Le Quien, Or. Christ. ii. 9, thinks this an over-statement; but at any rate, he observes, Siricius (who succeeded Damasus), and afterwards Innocent, gave a delegated authority to Anysius of Thessalonica. In A.D. 421 a collision took place between the Roman bishop Boniface and Theodosius II., who "claimed the power of transferring to the bishop of Constantinople that superintendence over the bishops of Illyricum" which Rome had entrusted to Thessalonica (Fleury, xxiv. 31). But Theodosius appears to have yielded the point to the remonstrances of his brother and of Boniface; and Celestine having already "interposed" in behalf of an Illyrian bishop named Felix, who was "in peril of being crushed by factious accusers," afterwards wrote (Cel. Ep. 3) to Perigenes of Corinth and eight other prelates of eastern Illyricum, asserting his right, as successor of St. Peter, to a general oversight ("necessitatem de omnibus tractandi"), and directing his "beloved brethren" to refer all causes to his deputy, Rufus of Thessalonica, and not to consecrate bishops, nor hold councils, without the sanction of that bishop. "Dominentur nobis regulæ," writes Celestine, "non regulis dominemur; simus subiecti canonibus," &c. But, says Tillemont, in the significant tone which he sometimes adopts about such cases, "it is difficult to see how he practised this excellent maxim;" for by the sixth Nicene canon the Illyrian bishops would be subject to their several metropolitans and provincial synods (xiv. 150).

Another letter of Celestine's (Ep. 4) was addressed, July 25, 428, "to the bishops of the provinces of Vienne and Narbonne, for the purpose of correcting several abuses" (Fleury, xxiv. 56). Some bishops, he had learned, "surreptitiously" wore the philosophic "pallium," with a girdle, by way of carrying out Luke xii. 35. "Why not," asks Celestine, "also hold lighted lamps and staves?" The text is to be understood spiritually. This sort of dress, he adds, may be retained by those who dwell apart (monks), but there is no precedent for it in the case of bishops. "We ought to be distinguished from the people, not by dress, but by teaching; not by attire, but by conduct. . . . We ought not to accustom the simple minds of the faithful to such things. . . . Our duty is not to make an impression on their eyes, but to instil precepts into their minds." On other matters he comments to this effect. Some refuse to give absolute penitents even at the hour of death: this is a barbarous "killing of the soul;" real conversion of those who are at the point of death is to be estimated mente, not tempore. Some consecrate laymen to the episcopate. Let no one be consecrated until he has gone through all degrees of the ministry: he who would be a teacher must first be a disciple—this principle is attested by common sense. One Daniel has been consecrated when he was notoriously suspected of grave crimes: let him be suspended from communion, and with him the bishop of Marseilles, accused of "rejoicing at his own brother's murder." Let the metropolitans be "content with their respective bounds," and not meddle with other provinces; and in the appointment of bishops let native clerics have a preference over strangers, and let the wishes of the flock be respected: "Nullus invitis detur episcopus." These words of Celestine's became the recognised expression of a great principle of church law.

With this letter may be compared a short one (Ep. 5), written in the following year, to urge the Apulian and Calabrian bishops to observe the canons, and not to gratify any popular wish for the consecration of a person who had not served in the ministry. "The people are to be taught, not followed. If they do not know what is lawful, and what is not, our business is to instruct them, not to yield to them." (On this subject of per saltum consecrations, see Bingham, ii. 10, 4 sq.)

It was in this year 429 that Germanus, bishop of Auxerre, commonly called St. German, and Lupus of Troyes, were sent over into Britain in order to repress Pelagianism. Prosper, in his Chronicle, says that Celestine, by the negotiation or management (ad actionem) of the deacon, sent German as his delegate (vice suâ) to guide the Britons to Catholic faith. Constantius of Lyons, the biographer of German, whom Bede follows (H. E. i. 17), says that German and Lupus were sent by a large synod of Gallic bishops. Each narrator had his own advantage: Prosper was then in Gaul, and ere long became Celestine's secretary: Constantius wrote some sixty years later, but with full access to local information. The accounts may be reasonably harmonized. In German's case there was probably a special commission from Celestine, in addition to that which emanated from the Gallican synod. In this way, apparently, Celestine, as Prosper afterwards wrote in another work (C. Collatorem, 21, al. 24), "took pains to keep the Roman island Catholic." And here it will be natural to consider Celestine's further proceedings in regard to "the barbaric island," Ireland, which, says Prosper, in the same sentence, he "made Christian." What did he do in this respect? Two years later than the expedition of German he consecrated Palladius, and sent him to "the Scots, who believed in Christ," i. e. to the Irish, "as their first bishop." Such is Prosper's statement in his Chronicle. Christianity had been planted here and there in "the barbaric island" some time before, but there had not been an organised Irish church. Palladius had but little success, and stayed in Ireland but a short time; and there is no sufficient evidence for associating the mission of his great successor, Patrick, with Celestine or with the see of Rome. (See Todd's Life of St. Patrick, p. 309, sq. 352, 387, &c.)

We must now turn to the part which Celestine took in the great doctrinal controversy which was raised by the sermons of Nestorius at the end of 428. Celestine had, as he himself says (Ep. 13), entertained, from report, a favourable opinion of the new bishop of Constantinople; and he would be the more disturbed when, early in 429, he received copies of controversial discourses said to be by Nestorius, and wrote on his own behalf, and on that of other Italian bishops, to Cyril of Alexandria, asking for information on the case [CYRIL]. Cyril was in no haste to reply; he purposely kept silence for a year; and before he wrote, Celestine had received from Nestorius himself, by the hands of a man of high rank, named Antiochus, copies of his discourses, with a letter, which may, perhaps, be identified with one still extant in Latin, in which Nestorius takes occasion to write from the circumstance that certain exiled Pelagians, then resident in Constantinople, were importuning the emperor and himself to have their cause re-examined. For his own part, so Nestorius professed, he was insufficiently informed; he must apply to Celestine for full information; and then he passes on to the controversy about the Incarnation, and describes his opponents as Apollinarians, &c. He wrote more than once again (Mansi, iv. 102-3), and another extant letter resumes the same topic. "I am really anxious," he says in effect, "to hear from you whether these memorialists are, or are not, heretics condemned by the Western church. Day after day I put them off without an answer, because I am hoping for a letter from you." He then recurred to the question about the Person of Christ. This letter was brought to Rome by Valerius, an officer of Theodosius' household.

Celestine caused the Nestorian discourses to be rendered into Latin. This work took up some time; and while it was in process he received a letter from Cyril, accompanied by other translations of these documents, made at Alexandria. Thus aided, Celestine formed his own opinion on their theological character, and summoned a synod of bishops at the beginning of August in 430. We possess an interesting fragment of his speech on this occasion. "I remember that Ambrose of blessed memory, on the day of the Nativity of our Lord Jesus Christ, made the whole people sing to God with one voice—

"Veni, Redemptor gentium, Ostende partum Virginis;
Miretur omne saeculum;
Talis decet partus Deum."

(Ambros. Hymn 12; in Brev. Ambros. first verses of Nativ.). "Did he say, 'Talis decet partus hominem?' So, the meaning of our brother Cyril, in that he calls Mary 'Theotocos,' entirely agrees with 'Talis decet partus Deum.' It was God whom the Virgin, by her child-bearing, brought forth, through His power who is full of omnipotence." He proceeded to quote a passage from Hilary, and two shorter ones from Damasus (Mansi, iv. 550; Galland, ix. 304). The council's resolutions were expressed by Celestine in letters to Cyril and to Nestorius. In the former (Ep. 11), Celestine commends Cyril's zeal in a cause which is, in truth, that of "Christ our God;" declares that a last effort must be made to rescue from the precipice one who has forgotten the name and the duties of a pastor; adds, that if Nestorius persists in his obstinacy, he must be driven away, as a wolf from the fold; and concludes by desiring Cyril to "join the authority of the Roman see to his own," and, as representing Celestine while acting for himself, to carry out with rigorous strictness the decision, that unless Nestorius should, within ten days, condemn his own wicked doctrines by a written profession of the same faith, as to "the birth of Christ our God," which is held by the Roman, by the Alexandrian, by the entire church, provision must be made for the see of Constantinople as if vacant, and Nestorius must be treated as one "separate from our body." This letter was dated Aug. 11, 430. Celestine wrote also to John bishop of Antioch, to Juvenal of Jerusalem, to Flavian of Phlippi, to Rufus of Thessalonica (Ep. 12). His meaning is evident: he is not professing to act as the sole supreme judge and oracle of Christendom, or as the mouthpiece of the Catholic church; he announces his resolution, in concert with the Alexandrian church, to break off all communion with the bishop of Constantinople, unless he retracted his heretical sentiments. Another letter was addressed to Nestorius himself (Ep. 13): it is verbose beyond what is usual with Celestine, and its point is contained in the observation, "You have been warned once, twice—I now give you the third warning, according to the rule of St. Paul. The orthodox clerics whom you have persecuted," he proceeds (alluding to some who had withstood Nestorius and experienced his anger), "are confessors: as for those heretics about whom you consulted me as if you did not know the facts about them (although you might have known, for they were condemned by your predecessor, Atticus), the sentences against them were just, and you, whose writings contain orthodox language about original sin, ought to have given them no encouragement. But as to your own matters, 'physician, heal thyself!' if you wish to retain communion with myself and with the bishop of Alexandria, affirm what he affirms—confess our faith." Celestine also wrote (Ep. 14) to the clergy and laity of Constantinople: as the "teacher of the Gentiles" bore "the care of all the churches," so, Celestine declares, "do I feel with you, am one with you in the unity of the church. Nestorius teaches error against Christ's Divinity: how unlike your great bishop John (Chrysostom), whose discourses—building up Catholic faith—are read all the world over; how unlike Atticus or Sisinnius, your late bishops, so zealous for orthodoxy!" He exhorts the orthodox clergy to endure manfully, and to take example from St. Athanasius. "Who cannot find comfort in his endurance, and instruction in his constancy, and encouragement in his return home? He was exiled—he was welcomed at Rome, and was refreshed by communion with our see" (alluding to pope Julius); "in all his troubles he never felt weariness, and no Christian can be exiled in respect to the presence of God."

The events which followed the council of Rome may be studied in the biography of Cyril; but it must here be observed that in the November of 430, when Theodosius, at the instance of Nestorius, had summoned an oecumenical council to meet at Ephesus at the coming Whitsuntide, and before the Roman and Alexandrian resolutions had been communicated to Nestorius, the latter wrote to Celestine, complacently remarking that Cyril, frightened at the accusations which would be brought against him before the council, was disposed to make terms. The best terms, said Nestorius, would be found in the adoption of the word "Christotocos," although he did not object to "Theotocos," if it were used so as not to imply "a confusion of natures." This, he added, he had signified to Cyril in a letter, a copy of which he sent to Celestine. "There will," he concluded, "be no difficulty, as far as I see, in treating of the Divinity of our Lord Christ: but, with him, such a phrase only meant that Christ possessed a titular divinity through His intimate "association" with the Divine Word—an association which, on the Nestorian theory, differed in degree, rather than in kind, from the relation of prophets and saints to God. The question, of course, was complicated by the publication of Cyril's anathemas at Constantinople, and by the discussion raised by the theologians of the Anti-oche patriarchate as to their alleged affinity to Apollinarianism. In the spring of 431, Cyril wrote again to Celestine, asking what should be done if Nestorius—having refused to retract at the summons of Rome and Alexandria—were to retract at the coming synod. Celestine answered, May 7 (Ep. 16), in a tone which exhibits him in a more favourable light than his great Alexandrian colleague. "As water to a thirsty soul, so is news of a friend, according to the saying of the most wise Solomon, from a far country—news 'received through your letter.' As to your question," he proceeds, "let us, in common, consult our common Lord. Does not He answer us by prophet and apostle, that He willeth not the death of a sinner, that He willeth every man to be saved? Let your Holiness, with our brethren, strive to close the controversy." After an assurance that he would be present in spirit at the council, Celestine adds, "I am anxious for the salvation of him who is perishing, provided that he is willing to own himself sick: if not, let our previous decisions stand . . . let him reap what . . . he has sown—being about to perish, not by our design, but by his own act. Let him find that our feet are not swift to shed blood, whenever he understands that healing is offered to him." Next day, May 8, Celestine wrote a paper of instructions for the three persons—Arcadius and Projectus, bishops, and Philip, a presbyter—whom he was sending to represent him at the council (Ep. 17). The substance of this "memorandum" is, "When you reach Ephesus, consult Cyril in everything, and do what he thinks best. Uphold the authority of the apostolic see: if a discussion takes place you are not to enter into it, but to judge of the opinions expressed. But if the council should be over when you arrive, inquire how the matter was settled: if you learn that the decision was in accordance with the ancient Catholic faith, and that Cyril has gone to Constantinople (i. e. to consecrate a new bishop), you must go thither also, and present to the emperor the letter which you will be charged with for him. If you find matters still unsettled, you will be guided by circumstances as to the course which, in conjunction with Cyril, you should take." On the same day Celestine wrote the most remarkable of his letters, that addressed to the council of Ephesus (Ep. 18), which was afterwards read, first in Latin, then in a Greek translation, at the second sitting of the council (see Mansi, iv. 1283; Tillemont, xiv. 376). "A gathering of priests (sacerdotum, used for bishops) bears witness to the presence of the Holy Spirit." So Celestine begins his letter, and goes on to cite Matt. xviii. 20, and to argue à fortiori from "two or three," "Christ," he adds, "was present in the company of apostles when they taught what He had taught them. This duty of preaching has been entrusted to all the Lord's priests in common, for by right of inheritance are we bound to undertake this solicitude." . . . "Go, teach all nations: observe, brethren, that we have received a general commission. His pleasure is that we should all do that which He thus entrusted in common to all the apostles. . . . Let us all undertake the labours of those to whom we have succeeded in dignity . . . let us act now with a common exertion, that we may preserve what was entrusted to us and has been retained through succession from the apostles (per apostolicam successionem) to this very day." (See, on this remarkable passage, the note in the Oxford ed. of Fleury, vol. iii. p. 23, citing the words of St. Cyprian: "The episcopate is one, and each individual bishop has an equal share in it as joint tenant." Fleury himself remarks that Celestine traces episcopal authority to Christ himself.) Celestine then insists on those recollections of the pastoral epistles which the place of the council's meeting should inspire. "Idem locus, eadem causa. . . ." "Let us be unanimous, let us do nothing by strife or vainglory; since the faith, which is one, is attacked, let the whole body (collegium) grieve, yea, mourn, in common with us. He who is to judge the world is called into judgment: discutitur qui discussurus est omnes: and He who redeemed us is being calumniated." He reminds them of the words of St. Paul to the "episcopi" of Ephesus, Acts xx. 28; and exhorts them to think of "that love in which, according to the words of John the apostle, whose remains you are venerating on the spot (cujus reliquias præsentes veneramini) we ought to abide;" to pray, as the apostles prayed, for grace to "speak the word of God with boldness," to "ask for, and to preserve, what will promote the peace of Jerusalem." He concludes by commending to them his three representatives who are to be present at their proceedings, and to "carry out what has been formerly determined by us" (i. e. at the Roman council), "to which we doubt not that your Holinesses will give your assent, when that which is read" (i. e. in the account or record of the Roman council; legitur is probably the right reading, although agitur stands now in the Latin text—the ἄρεσιν ἂν γυνάτε of the present Greek version being a mistake for ἄρεσιν ἀνεγυράτε) "shall appear to have been determined in favour of the peace of the universal church." In this latter sentence Celestine evidently means, "I trust that you will affirm the same conclusion which I expressed last year in my own synod." His deputies did not leave Rome until after the middle of May; for on May 15 he wrote to Theodosius (Ep. 19) a short letter, in which, speaking as one of the whole body of catholic bishops, he entreats the emperor to uphold the faith, in the true interests of his own sovereignty. "Whatever you do for the tranquillity of the church, or for the honour of our holy religion, is done pro vestro imperio." It was on July 10 that the three deputies appeared in the council, Nestorius having been deposed on June 22; the council, as Firmus of Caesarea told the deputies, had "followed in the track" of Celestine's previous decision; but, it must be observed, after a full and independent examination of the evidence. The deputies, on the next day, heard the "acts" of the first session read, and then affirmed the sentence passed on Nestorius in that session, taking care to dwell on the dignity of the see of St. Peter, while Cyril was not less careful to refer to them as representing "the apostolic chair and the council of Western bishops." After the formal breach between the council and the "Easterns," i. e. John of Antioch and his supporters, the council wrote to Celestine as their "fellow-minister" (Ep. 20), giving a narrative of events, and not forgetting to say that they had read and affirmed the sentences formerly pronounced by him against the Pelagian heretics. They evidently regarded him as the first in dignity among all bishops, but not as the master or ruler of all: they "admire him for his far-reaching solicitude as to the interests of religion." "It is your habit, great as you are, to approve yourself in regard to all things, and to take a personal interest in the defence of the churches."

The news of Maximian's consecration, on the 25th of October, to the see of Constantinople, did not reach Celestine before Christmas. He read the letters of Theodosius and Maximian, announcing the event, to the people assembled in St. Peter's on "the day on which we celebrated the birth of Christ our God according to the flesh" (Ep. 23): but, for some reason unexplained, he did not reply until March 15, 432. In his letter to the members of the council (Ep. 22) he dwelt on the care with which, although at a distance from them, he had watched their proceedings. "To the care of the blessed Peter all are present." He refers especially to a point as to which the bishops had not informed him. Nestorius, though sent away from Ephesus, had been allowed to live at his old home near Antioch. Celestine objected strongly to this, and thought that Nestorius ought to be placed where he could have no opportunity of spreading his opinions. The birthplace of the Christian name is beset by a pestilent "disease," &c. "As for Nestorius's adherents, although I have read your sentence against them, yet I also determine what seems fitting. There are, in such cases, many points for consideration, which the apostolic see has always kept in view. The case of the Coelestians attests what I say." He means, as his next words shew, that in any sentence against a party of heretics, a distinction should be drawn between heresiarchs and their followers. The latter "should have opportunity of recovering their position on repentance." The consecrators of Maximian appear to have passed a too indiscriminating sentence against all Nestorianising bishops, and Celestine wished to moderate their zeal. He also wrote (Ep. 23) to Theodosius, extravagantly lauding his acts in behalf of orthodoxy, speaking highly of Maximian, and hinting that Nestorius ought to be sent into distant exile. In this letter, as in others of Celestine's, the phrase, "Christ our God," indicates his keen sense of the issue really involved in the controversy. To Maximian he sent a cordial letter (Ep. 24), exhorting him, in the difficult position in which he was placed, to strengthen those whose faith had been shaken, to heal those who were wounded, to put away those who refused all treatment, to "shew towards those whom the disturber had scattered that gentle spirit which he was known to possess." "You have a wide field in which to exhibit the glory of a watchful pastor and of a benignant bishop"—words which illustrate Celestine's dislike for measures of extreme rigour. His last letter on the subject, dated at the same time, was addressed to the clergy and laity of Constantinople (Ep. 25). He reminds us of the previous letter, in which he had inculcated patience: patience, he says, has reaped its reward. After dilating on the "impiety and treason" of Nestorius, and lauding Cyril's third letter to him, which, he says, "you have read, and retain in your memories," he refers again to "the blessed Peter" as not having deserted them in their trouble. "We offered him, with the knife, lenitive treatment also: but, while we longed for his life, he chose death," &c. "We did nothing rashly or prematurely." After much more on this subject—so much that "perhaps my somewhat prolix discourse will have wearied you—let us leave the dead to bury their dead," Celestine exhorts his readers to listen to the words of their simple teacher, who would, as they well knew, teach nothing but the old faith; and so this lengthy epistle comes to a close.

"One of Celestine's last actions," says Tillemont, xiv. 156, "was his defence of the memory of St. Augustine as a teacher, against the Semi-Pelagians of Gaul. He wrote to Venerius, bishop of Marseilles, and five other Gallic prelates, urging them not to be silent. When presbyters spoke rashly and contentiously, it was not seemly that bishops should allow their subordinates 'to claim the first place in teaching,' especially when they raised their voices against 'Augustine of holy memory, who, on account of his holy life, has ever been in our communion, nor has a breath of sinister suspicion lighted upon him. His knowledge, we remember, was so great that even my predecessor ranks him among the best of teachers: he was beloved and honoured by all men everywhere. Let those persons, therefore, whom, unfortunately, we see to become more numerous, be resisted, and let us be assured, by your imposing silence upon them, that their language is as displeasing to you as it is to us'" (Ep. 21). The nine articles on the doctrine of grace which are appended to this letter are not by Celestine (see note to Oxf. ed. of Fleury, iii. p. 143).

Celestine is described by Socrates (vii. 11) as having treated the Novatians of Rome with harshness, taken away their churches, and obliged their bishop, Rusticola, to hold his services in private houses. "Previously, the Novatians were in a very flourishing state at Rome, and possessed many churches and large congregations. But," adds the historian, who sympathised largely with this sect, "jealousy attacked them also; since the Roman episcopate, like the Alexandrian, had already, for a considerable time, advanced beyond the limits of priestly action to a position of sovereign power."

Celestine died on or about the 26th of July, 432 (Tillemont, xiv. 738), and was succeeded by Sixtus III.

COELESTIUS occupies a unique position among the Hibernian Scots, as he taught not the faith, but heresy. The general belief is that he was a native of Ireland, of noble birth, and, in early years, of singular piety. About A.D. 405 he is found attached to Pelagius at Rome, and the names of these two figure largely in the history of the church, till they are finally condemned in the Ephesine Council, A.D. 431. Coelestus had for some time studied law, and then become a monk, when his speculations upon the conditions of grace and nature attracted attention, as he affirmed the leading points of what were afterwards known as the Pelagian heresy upon the fall of man and the need of supernatural assistance, in effect denying both. These errors he had partly learned, as he said, from a holy presbyter, Rufinus, of whom nothing else is known. From Rome, on the approach of the Goths, he passed to Sicily, and thence to Carthage: by a council at Carthage under Aurelius, the bishop, his teaching was condemned, A.D. 412, though St. Augustine of Hippo had not yet taken up the controversy against him. He soon after retired to Ephesus, where he obtained the priesthood which he had sought for in vain at Carthage. On an appeal to pope Zosimus, A.D. 417, he presented his teaching in such a light as to procure acquittal before the pope, at first a half-informed judge, who however in the following year saw good reason to condemn him: at Carthage he always met with a determined opposition, and at Constantinople and Rome both the imperial and the ecclesiastical powers were finally arrayed against him. After the condemnation of the doctrines of Pelagius by the oecumenical council at Ephesus, Coelestinus passed from sight. His chief opponents were St. Augustine and St. Jerome. (Fleury, Ecol. Hist. B. xxiii.—xxv.; Mosheim, Ecol. Hist. i. cent. v. ch. 23 sq.; Wall, Inf. Bapt. i. c. 19; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 9 (wks. v. 250 sq.); Gennadius, de Script. Ecol. c. 44; Bright, *Hist. COELICOLAE. The death of Julian (A.D. 363) was followed by a reaction in favour of the Christians and against the Jews. The fierce bitterness of the edicts of Constantine and Constantius was never perhaps renewed, but the decrees of Theodosius the Great (379-395) and his son Honorius (395-423), were sufficiently strong and cruel, to make it evident how the Roman emperors were influenced, both theologically and politically.

The Christians convinced themselves that a stand must be made more earnestly than ever against any heresy which would seduce their members in the direction of either Judaism or Paganism. The possible confusion of Christianity with either was by all means to be avoided. Most especially should this be the case as regarded Judaism. The scandal at Antioch which roused the holy indignation of St. Chrysostom—Christian ladies frequenting the synagogues and observing the Jewish festivals, Christian men bringing their lawsuits by preference before the judges of Israel (Grätz, Gesch. d. Juden, iv. 315)—found its reflection in many of the chief centres of the Eastern and Western empires. Hence the effort became more and more strenuous to suppress not only such open approximation of the two religious bodies, but also such sects as indicated, by their forms and doctrines, the intention of presenting a compromise with the truth.

Gentle means were tried. St. Augustine (Op. ii. Ep. xliv. cap. vi. § 13, ed. Migne) wrote to the "Elder" of one of these sects—the Coelicolae, inviting him to a conference. It does not appear that any response was made. Recourse was had to imperial threatenings, and the edicts of Theodosius and Honorius denounced the "new doctrine" of the sect. It was said to be marked by "new and unwonted audacity," and to be nothing else than a "new crime of superstition:" hence, the Coelicolae must suffer the punishment of heretics if they refused to be converted to Christianity (Cod. Theod. xvi. t. v. viii. x. Cod. Justin. i. tit. ix.). Happily there is reason to believe that kinder counsels moderated the severity of such intolerance (Grätz, p. 386, sq.; Leyssohn, Diss. inauguralis de Jud. sub Caesar. conditione, p. 4 sq.).

It is difficult to ascertain precisely the views of the Coelicolae. In one edict they are classed with the Jews and the Samaritans, in a second with the Jews only. But it would be a mistake to consider them simply Jews. Their name is rather an indication of a vulgar error than of an erroneous worship. The Romans, it is well known, called the Jews worshippers of idols through a mistaken notion that the Jewish use of the word "Heaven" for "God" (Buxtorf, Lex. Rab. s. v. שָׁמַיִם, p. 2440. Jost, Gesch. d. Judenthums, i. 303)—a use derived from Babylonian sources (see note to Daniel iv. 26, E. V. Speaker's Commentary)—indicated the worship of some created embodiment of heaven (Vitringa, de Synag. i. 229). The Coelicolae proper would therefore be easily included by the Romans under the one general title "Jews." From St. Augustine's letter it would seem that the Coelicolae used a baptism which he counted sacrilege: that is, they probably combined a Christian form of baptism with the Jewish rite of circumcision. If so, the compromise would be most objectionable to St. Augustine, and he would denounce it as dangerous. If, moreover, as would seem to be the case from the name they bore, the Coelicolae openly professed their adhesion to the Jewish worship of the One God to the rejection of the Christian doctrine of the Trinity, then this would be an error which would not find compensation in their abhorrence of the Pagan forms of idolatry.

More than this it seems impossible to ascertain. But the very existence of a sect which strove to combine Christian and Jewish ceremonies and doctrines, was pregnant with mischief and danger. Therefore the Coelicolae of Africa, like their congeners the Θεοεβείς of Phoenicia and Palestine, and the Hypsistarii of Cappadocia, were stamped or died out in the course of a few years. COEMACA, COEMOCA. [See CAEMHOQ.]

COEMAN. [See CAEMHAN.]

COEMGEN (CAOIMHGHEN, KEVIN), abbat of Glendalough, June 3, A.D. 618. He was descended from Laeghaire Lorc, monarch of Ireland, through his father Coemell, of the Dal Messincorb: his mother was Coemell, daughter of Cenandan or Ceannfhiannon, son of Ceisi, also descended from Laeghaire Lore through Cormac Caech, brother of Messincorb. He had at least two brothers and two sisters, St. Caemhan of Ard-chaemhain (June 12), St. Mochaemh or Natchaemh of Tirdaglas (May 1), St. Caemhog (July 23), called also Coeltigerna and mother of St. Dagan, and Melda mother of St. Abban. Supposing his age at death to have been 120, he was born A.D. 498, and baptized by St. Cronan; but Lanigan gives strong reasons for objecting to so early a date. In Scotch his name signifies "fair begotten," and he belongs to the second order of Irish saints. At the age of seven years he was committed to the charge of St. Petroc, a learned and holy Briton, and after a stay of five years with him (A.D. 510, Ussher) was put under his uncle, St. Eugenius or Eoghan of Derry, St. Lochan, and St. Enna, with whom he remained for three years, "et apud illos sanctos beatus Coemgenus sedulo legebat." In dread of being elected abbat he fled to Gleann-da-loch (now Glendalough, or the Valley of the Two Lakes, in the barony of North Ballinacor, co. Wicklow), was ordained priest by Lugidus or Lugaidh, and founded the monastery there in A.D. 549. (For an account of the Seven Churches of Glendalough and other remains, see Petrie, Round Towers, 168 sq. 445; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Ass. Ir. 4 ser. i. 194.) There he had a school as well as a church, and among his pupils was St. Berach of Cluaincainpthe. He was also intimately acquainted with SS. Columba, Comgall, and Caigneach. In the ancient Life given by the Bollandists he is said to have led an eremitic life for four years in the upper valley of the glen, then to have been induced to descend to a "clara cella," called Disert-Cavghin, or Disert-Caoimhghen, now Reefert church, and at last to have removed his monastery and awaited the resurrection at the confluence of the rivers where the town of Glendalough now stands. He received his viaticum from St. Mochorog, a Briton, and died A.D. 618. Some writings are attributed to him, but perhaps the most famous was his Monastic Rule. He was very highly esteemed around Glendalough, and his memory is yet gratefully revered throughout Ireland with an honour that is scarcely less than that which is paid to St. Brigida. (Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 43 sq.; Bp. Forbes, Kel. Scott. Saints, 302; Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. 123-4; Butler, Lives of the SS. vi. 69, 70; Bollandists, Acta SS. Jun. tom. i. 310-322; Mart. Ir. 121 sq.; Hardy, Desc. Cat. i. 217.) In the time of the O'Cleries his life in Irish was in the possession of Domhnall Carrach, son of Ferghal Mac Eochadha, at Fanach-mor in Ui Ceinnsellaigh (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 145). There is a Life of St. Coemgen in the Book of Kilkenny (Marsh, Lib. Dubl. f. 64 b sq.). He has a few dedications in Argyleshire. There is another Coemgen, who, however, is generally known by the more endearing and reverential form of the name [MOCHAEMOG]. [J. G.]

COENA (Flor. Wig. Nom. Archiep. in M. H. B. 625; Le Neve, Fasti, iii. 94; Stubbs, Regist. 180), bishop of York. [ETHELBERT.] [C. H.]

COENBURGA (QUOENBURGA) (1), according to Bede a daughter of Cearl, king of Mercia, and wife of Aelwin, afterwards king of Northumbria (Bede, H. E. ii. 14). She seems to have died before her husband came to the throne. [J. R.]

(2) Daughter of Heriburg, abbess of Watton (Vetadun), E. R. York, and a nun in that house, who was cured of an infirmity by John, bishop of

York, circa A.D. 686 (Beda, H. E. v. 3; Vita S. Joh. apud Corpus Hist. Ebor. i. 247-8). [J. R.]

COENBURGA (3), abbess, associated with the abbess Cneuburga and others in a proposal for mutual intercessory prayer (Haddan and Stubbs, iii. 342). [COENBURH.] [C. H.]

COENFERTH, one of two presbyters from the diocese of Worcester attesting an act of the Council of Clovesho, October 12, 803 (Kemble, C. D. No. 1024; Haddan and Stubbs, Councils, iii. 546). [C. H.]

COENRED (1), son of Ceolwald and the father of Ina king of Wessex. [CENRED.]

(2) King of the Mercians, 704-709. He was a son of Wulfhere and Eormengild, and succeeded his uncle Ethelred on his resignation in 704, having been for two years before the under-king of Southumbria. In 709 he followed the example of his uncle, resigned his crown, and went to Rome in company with Offa king of the East Saxons; there he remained for the rest of his life. Bede mentions him as undertaking, at Ethelred's request, the protection of Wilfrid (H. E. v. 19). He confirmed a charter of Ethelheard and Ethelward of the Huiccas to Worcester (Cod. Dipl. No. 53) and another to Evesham in 706 (ibid. No. 56), and appears as the grantor of several spurious Evesham charters (ibid.). His cousin Ceolred succeeded him. [S.]

In A.D. 702, during his uncle's reign, Coenred succeeded to the "kingdom of the Southumbrians," and when his uncle abdicated, A.D. 704, he succeeded to the "kingdom of the Mercians" (A. S. C. ad an. 702, 704). Here is a clear distinction between Southumbria and Mercia, the former evidently being a subordinate province; but where situated? Southumbria is a word of rare occurrence (A. S. C. ad ann. 449, 697, 702; Gaimar, v. 1594; M. H. B. 299, 325, 783). We might conceive it as applying to that portion of Mercia which lay immediately contiguous to Northumbria, and called elsewhere North Mercia, for the Trent formed a recognised division of Mercia into north and south (Bede, H. E. iii. 24). But another solution of the difficulty seems preferable. The country of the Lindisfari, otherwise Lindsey or Lindissa (now Lincolnshire), was subject to the kings of Mercia, but was always spoken of as distinct from Mercia (cf. Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an. 655), and it always had its own bishop. In A.D. 678 Egfrid king of Northumbria conquered it from Wulfhere king of Mercia; but in 681 Ethelred of Mercia recovered it. Might not this have been Southumbria? Northumbria in its primitive sense was that maritime region north of the Humber estuary which was first colonised, and by analogy Southumbria would be south of the estuary, not merely south of inland Northumbria. The passage of Gaimar seems to bear out this view. On coming to the reign of Coenred, he describes his dominions from the starting-point of Southumbria, and proceeds to a detailed survey of the country which we recognise as Lincolnshire. This is the passage, which afterwards goes on to mention more briefly other places in Mercia:—

“Kenret regna sur Suthumbreis :
Co est Lindeseye e Holmedene, Kestevene e Hoiland e Hestdene:
Del Humbre tresk'en Roteland
Durout cel regne, e plus avante.
Par pelus faitz fu la devise :
Tels llus i out dreit a Tamise,” etc.

(L'Estorie des Engles, vv. 1594 sq. M. H. B. 783). Lindsey, Kesteven, and Holland are names of districts in Lincolnshire to this day. Bede defines the Lindissa regio to be that “quae est prima ad meridianam Humbrae fluminis ripam” (Hist. Ecl. ii. 16). Historical connexion as well as geographical position would sufficiently account for the occasional designation of Southumbria in the place of the more usual one. It was contiguous to Northumbria, it was coveted by it, it had been annexed to it, and it had not been recovered. It might therefore not unnaturally be called for distinction Southumbria. Moreover the remoteness of this district from the Mercian capital, which was Lichfield, its border situation, its provincial distinctness, would conspire to mark it out as suitable for a prince who was to succeed to the throne. It should be noticed that a passage in Bede's epitome, compared with a passage in the Saxon Chronicle, would appear to identify Southumbria with Mercia. But the inference is not necessary. The principes Merciorum of one writer might be Southumbrians in another. The epitome says that Osthryd queen of the Mercians was slain “a suis, id est, Merciorum primatibus” (ad an. 697), and the chronicler writes that “the Southumbrians” slew her.

Coenred could only just have succeeded his uncle when the veteran Wilfrid returned, and for the last time, from Rome, with letters from pope John, one of which was addressed to the late king of Mercia, urging compliance with the exile's claims. It was in consequence of this that Ethelred, who had ever been a staunch supporter of Wilfrid, advised his nephew to maintain a friendly footing with him. That Coenred was a man of strong religious convictions we learn from a story which Bede relates in much detail. There was an officer to whom, for his faithful services, he was much attached, but whose utter indifference to religion deeply grieved him, and he longed for his conversion to a better mind. At last the man fell sick, and the king, by personal visits, assiduously sought to bring him to repentance. All, however, was to no purpose, and Coenred heard from his dying lips an awful vision he had had of his coming condemnation (H. E. v. 19). Bede dwells on the circumstance only for the spiritual benefit of his readers; but William of Malmesbury attributes Coenred's abdication and journey to Rome to the deep impression made upon his mind on this occasion (Malm. G. R. ed. Hardy, i. 111). The step is assigned to various years, A.D. 708, 709, 710; but 709 is the one fixed by Bede (H. E. v. 24, Recapit. Chron. ad an. 709), who also states that it was the year bishop Wilfrid died (v. 19), and similarly the Sax. Chron. (ad an.). See also Pagi (Baron. Annal. ad an. 709, § 5, ed. Theiner, 1865). He was accompanied by Offa king of the East Saxons, and at their joint request (Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an.) Egwin bishop of the Wicci (Worcester) went with them. In Rome (Constantine being then pope) Coenred was shorn and made a monk “ad limina apostolorum,” continuing to his last hours in prayers, fastings, and alms-deeds (Bed. H. E. v. 19; Flor. Wig. l. c.; Wend. F. H. ed. Coxe, i. 200). A reputed grant to Egwin in favour of Evesham is dated at Rome (Monast. Angl. ii. 15; Acta SS. Jan. i. 712; Kemble, C. D. No. 61, A.D. 709). Neither wife nor child are attributed to him, but he had a sister Wereburga, and a brother Baerhtwald (Flor. Wig. Genual. Merc. Regg.; Malm. G. P. ed. Hamilton, 308, 323, 351; Lapp. Hist. Eng. tr. Thorpe, i. 291). Coenred was the fifth of the Anglo-Saxon kings who abdicated on religious grounds, following Ethelred; and he was the second of those who went to Rome and died there, Caedwalla being the first; but Coenred and his companion Offa were the only ones who became monks at Rome. Little is to be said of Mercian church affairs during the reign of Coenred. His bishops were Hedda for the Mercians at Lichfield, Edgar for Lindsey, Egwin for Worcester. Brihtwald was archbishop of Canterbury (Stubbs, Regist.). In A.D. 705 there was a Mercian witenagemot, at a place unknown, attended by Coenred, and his bishops, and his “duces religiosi,” “de reconciliatone Aelfridae” (Hadd. and Stubbs, Councils, i. 273). But the most noted event was the foundation of the abbey of Evesham in or shortly before A.D. 706, for which see Hadd. and Stubbs, iii. 278 sq.

The variations of this king's name are COINRED, CENRED, CYNRED, CHENRET, KENRED, KENRET. [C. H.]

COENRED (3). COENRAED, CENRED, KENRED, king of Northumbria from A.D. 716 to 718. He was the son of Cutha, and is said by Malmesbury to have been implicated in the violent end of Osred, his predecessor on the throne (de Gestis Regum). There is little or nothing known about Coenred's reign. (See Bede, v. 22; Saxon Chron. sub anno 716.) [J. R.]

COENUALD (COENWALD, KENWALD), a monk sent by archbishop Theodore to Rome bearing written charges against Wilfrid before pope Agatho. Malmesbury represents him as supporting the charges in harsh and bitter terms (Eddius, Vit. Wilf. c. 29; Malm. G. P. i. 222, 223, ed. Hamilton). [C. H.]

COENUALH (Kemble, C. D. No. 167), bishop. [COENWALCH.]

COENUEALHA (Kemble, C. D. No. 7); COENWALCH (Flor. Wig. Genual. Reg. W. Sax., M. H. B. 633), king of the West Saxons. [COENWALCH.] [C. H.]

COENULF, -FUS (Kemble, C. D. No. 116), king of Mercia. [KENULF.] [C. H.]

COENWALCH, the eleventh bishop of London. His episcopate falls between 789, when Eadgar was bishop, and 796 when Eadbald his successor died. His name is attached to a questionable or spurious charter of Offa, dated 793; Kemble, C. D. No. 162. (Mon. Hist. Brit. p. 617.) [S.]

COFEN, early Welsh saint, patron of Llan-gofen, in Monmouthshire, and of St. Goven chapel in Pembrokeshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 307).

COGITOSUS, monk of Kildare. April 18 is his festival in Mart. Tallaght, where he is called the "Wise," and on that day Marian O'Gorman has the suilage, "Virtus Cogitosi iusti et veracis nos defendat." In the closing chapter of his Life of St. Brigida he calls himself her "nepos culpabilis," tells (c. 32) of the wonders done at her tomb in his day "quas non virtutes non solum audivimus sed etiam oculis nostris vidimus," and speaks, in the Prologue, of the archiepiscopal see being placed at Kildare. Colgan would not interpret "nepos" strictly according to the letter, but is of opinion that Cogitosus must have written before A.D. 594, and probably about A.D. 550. This date, however, is too early, but Basnage, the editor of Canisius, and Dr. Ledwich (Antiq. Irel. 2 ed. pp. 352, 353), who accepts Basnage's opinion and words, are wrong in saying that Cogitosus's account of the decorations upon the tombs of St. Brigida and St. Conlaeth "smell of a later age" than that spoken of by Cogitosus, and must be referred to the 12th century. Lanigan and Petrie prove incontestably that Cogitosus must have written previously to A.D. 831, when Kildare was first plundered, and must have flourished at latest in the beginning of the 9th century [BRIGIDA (5)]. In a paper read before the Royal Irish Academy in 1863 Dr. Graves concludes that Muirchu Maccumachteni, the author of the Life of St. Patrick with which the Book of Armagh commences, was the son of Cogitosus, and that Cogitosus died about the year 670. (For a defence of Cogitosus and his description of the church and tombs at Kildare, see Petrie, Round Towers, 197-207.) His Life of St. Brigida contains thirty-six chapters, and follows closely St. Brogan's metrical Life of the same saint in his general order of miracles, and is not so diffuse as those by St. Ultan and the others. This Life is given by Canisius (Lectt. Antiq. tom. v. 416-24); by Messingham (Floril. Ins. Sanct. 189-200); by Colgan (Tr. Thuan. 518-526); by the Bollandists (Acta SS. vol. iv. Feb. tom. i.). It is also given by Surius. As to Cogitosus himself, we know little beyond what we gather from his Life of St. Brigida. Among the Praetermissi on April 18, the Bollandists (Acta SS. April, tom. iii. 518) mention "Cogitosi Episcopi depositio Turonis" as read in a "MS. Tornacensi et pridie in Lactiensis," but they merely refer to Colgan and Mart. Tallaght as above, and sum up with "reliqua ignoramus." (Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. i. 379 sq.; O'Conor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 137 sq.; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 269 sq.; Vossius, de Scrip. Lat. iii. 624.)

[J. G.]

COIFI, the chief of the heathen priests of Aedwin, king of Northumbria, in A.D. 627. He advised his master to accept Christianity at the preaching of Paulinus, and himself, lance in hand, and riding on a horse, desecrated the temple at Goodmanham in the East Riding of Yorkshire (Godmundingaham), in which he had so often officiated (Bede, H. E. ii. 13).

[J. K.]

COIMGHEALL, daughter of Mae Iaar.

[CAEL.]

COINCHENN, CONCHENN. There were two virgin saints of this name in the 7th and 8th centuries.

COINCHENN (1), of Cael-achadh. August 20. She was daughter of Ceallach Cualann, who was son of Gerrtide king of Leinster, and, dying A.D. 713, was the ancestor of the Ui-Ceallaigh Cualann, in the north of Wicklow. Her monastery was probably at Killeigh, bar. Geshill, King's County, and she died about A.D. 743, according to the Irish Annals (Colgan, Acta SS. 607; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 313, 341).

(2) On March 13 was the festival of St. Coinchenn the Devout, sister to St. Fintan Munna (Oct. 21). According to Colgan (Acta SS. 606), who has collected all that is known regarding her, she flourished in Ulster in the beginning of the 7th century. Her father was Tulchan, and her mother Fethlimidia, both descended from Neill king of Munster; and her brothers are said to have been St. Fintan abbat of Cluain Edneach (Feb. 17, but this relationship is very doubtful), Lugaidh of Cluain Fiacul (now possibly Clonfeakle, March 2), and St. Fintan Munna (Oct. 21). But the chronology casts doubts upon her receiving the virgin's veil from St. Monenna in the monastery of Kill-Sleibhe. In the Life of St. Munna [FINTAN (3)] there is a legend of his restoring St. Coinchenn to life, a common miracle in such Lives. She became abbess of Cill-Sleibhe, (now Killeavy, at the foot of Slieve Gullion, in the barony of Upper Orior, co. Armagh,) and died A.D. 654 (Four Mast.) or 657 (Ann. Tigh.) (Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Ir. iii. 38 sq.; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 168 n., 267; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 3 ser. i. 100, 101.)

[J. G.]

COININGEN—April 29. In the Irish Martyrologies she is called the pupil of St. Mac Tail, bishop of Cill-Cuilinn (now Old Killecullen, co. Kildare), who died about A.D. 548, and is said to have been denounced by the clergy of Leinster on her account. She is also identified with "St. Cuach, of Cill Fionnmaighe, in Ui Feneclais in Fortuatha Laigen," in the present barony of Arklow, co. Wicklow (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 113; Mart. Tall. in Kelly's Cal. Ir. SS. p. xxii.)

[J. G.]

COINRED, -DUS (Bede, H. E. v. 19, edd. Smith, M. H. B., Giles, Stevenson, Moberly), king of Mercia. [COENRED.] [C. H.]

COINWALCH (Bede, H. E. iii. 7, edd. Smith, M. H. B., Stevenson, Moberly); COINWALCH (Bede, Vit. Abbat. ed. Smith), king of Wessex. [COINWALCH.] [C. H.]

COINWALCH (CENWALH), king of Wessex. He succeeded his father Cyneigils in 643, being still a heathen. In 645, having repudiated his wife, a sister of Penda, king of Mercia, he drew down upon himself the vengeance of that great ruler, and was driven from his country. He took refuge with Anna, king of the East Angles, at whose court he was converted to Christianity and baptized by Felix the bishop of the East Angles. After three years of exile he returned with the assistance of Cuthred, son of Cuicelm, introduced Christianity into his dominions, and accepted Agilbert as bishop in succession to Birinus. Unable to understand the language of Agilbert he some time after introduced Wini as bishop, upon whose arrival Agilbert left Wessex. But Coinwalch did not agree with Wini any better than with Agilbert, and on his departure, after proposing that Agilbert should return, he accepted Leutherius or Lothere as his bishop. His reign was the period of the great development of the West Saxon kingdom; he defeated the Britons in three great battles, and extended his dominions as far as the Parret, but in his later years he had to retire southwards before the advancing power of Mercia. Bede ascribes to him the plan of dividing Wessex into two dioceses for his two rival bishops, and he is the traditional founder of the see and cathedral of Winchester (A. S. Chr. 643; H. Hunt., in M. H. B. 716; Bed. H. E. iii. 7, iv. 12). One of his last acts was to entertain Benedict Biscop on his way from Rome. He died in 672, leaving Wessex in the hands of his wife, Sexburga. A spurious charter of Glastonbury is ascribed to him (Keimble, C. D. No. 7).

It was in A.D. 646 (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an.) that Coinwalch was persuaded by the pious king of the East Angles to accept the faith which he had refused (Bed. H. E. iii. 7) eleven years before to share with his father. On gaining his crown in A.D. 648, Birinus was still bishop, and had the satisfaction of seeing a Christian succession maintained in the kingdom. It was in that same year that Coinwalch caused the minster at Winchester to be built and "halloved in the name of St. Peter" (A. S. C. ad an.); the mention of it under the year 643 appears to be intended rather summarily than chronologically, as well as to have been entered at a later date, after the new minster had been built. We are not to understand that erection to imply any alteration in the ecclesiastical government. Birinus still remained seated at Dorchester, and there he was buried in A.D. 650. The Gallie Agilbert, who just then appeared in Wessex conveniently to succeed him, continued likewise in the same episcopal city. The Winchester St. Peter's was meant probably to dignify the royal capital, and perhaps to stand as a pledge and memorial of the king's conversion. Ten years afterwards, A.D. 658 (A. S. C. and Flor. Wig. Chron. ad an.), occurred the military event of this reign which is chiefly interesting to the church historian. Coinwalch fought against the "Welsh" (i. e. Britons) at Peonua, and drove them as far as Pedrida (A. S. C. ad an.). This was a great and decisive victory; Henry of Huntingdon dwells on it with much emphasis, and speaks of the 'plaga insanabilis' which fell upon "the progeny of Brutus" on that occasion (M. H. B. 717). Peonua cannot be clearly identified among the various Pens of Somersetshire (cf. E. A. Freeman, Old Eng. Hist. 65), but Pedrida was Petherton on the Parrett, so that here we have the limit of Wessex at this stage of its western progress, and it included all the eastern and bulkiest half of Somersetshire. The ecclesiastical interest of the event is perceived as soon as we begin to examine the dates of the great religious foundations in the western counties. The first of them that we think of is of course Glastonbury, that leads off the Monasticum Anglicanum. Now at all events, if not earlier ("not much before A.D. 652-658," Haddan and Stubbs, i. 121 n.), that venerable settlement, with all its traditions of British Christianity, of Arthur, of Patrick, of Roman days too, came within the limits of Saxon dominion, and was severed for ever from the Britons. It must long have been the outpost of British Christianity against the advancing tide of Teutonic paganism, and many a wistful gaze must have been directed eastward from its walls. It was a grand thing for Glastonbury that the conquest of those parts did not occur when the Wessex kings were pagan. It was not now injured or destroyed, as it might once have been, but fostered and Saxonised. The old British line of abbats was not abruptly broken, as Berthwald, the first of the Saxon, appears to have begun his rule in 668 (Monast. Angl. i. 2), and in his day, A.D. 670, Coinwalch himself heads the royal benefactors. Of the other famous houses in the west, Sherborne seems to have been in existence as early as the days of Coinwalch; Malmesbury sprang up in 675, Wimburn somewhat later. [CUTHBURGA.]

Passing from the monasteries (which were the method of those early days for solving the problems we now solve by the parochial system) to the episcopate, we see in the conduct of Agilbert the prevalent ideas of the heptarchal prelacy, that there must be one king and one bishop in a kingdom, however large the kingdom might grow. Augustine was more modest when he allowed Kent to have a second bishop at Rochester. That Wina should have been "subintroductus" (Bede, H. E. iii. 7), without Agilbert being consulted, was intolerable. The West Saxon king did in 664 what the Northumbrian Oswy did a very little later, and the case of Wilfrid and Cealda might be studied in that of Agilbert and Wina. The king was limiting the power of his spiritual rival. The new see of Winchester was not intended to supersede that of Dorchester, but to divide a great bishopric, and the foreign tongue may have been partly a pretence. It is worthy of remark that it was while Agilbert in France, with his wound still fresh, was ordaining Wilfrid for the great bishopric of the north, Cealda was, after the manner of Wina, subintroductus to York, and Wilfrid not consulted. We should have been sure the two aggrieved men conferred, even if we had not the descriptions of Eddius. Wilfrid acted much as Agilbert had done, refusing to take half a post, retiring to his own home, his monastery at Ripon, while the intruder was in the way. It must, however, be observed that Coinwalch and Oswy may both have given just cause of offence by stretching the royal prerogative and appointing bishops without a synodic election. The 'subintroductus' would seem to imply that.

The Annales Winton. (Wharton, Angl. Sac. i. 288) assert that Coinwalch constructed the church at Winchester which his father had begun, endowing it with three manors, Duntun, Alresford, and Wordia; and that there he was buried.

The various other spellings of this name are: COINUALCH, COINVALCH, CENWALCH, CENUUALCH, CENUUALCHUS, CENWALCH, CENWAL, COENWALCH, COENWALCHIUS, CENWAILLE, CHENEWOLD, CYNWALCH, KENWALCH, CONUALCH, CONWALH, COYNWALH, CEONWALH, CYNUEWALH.

COLACHUS. [See CELLACH (3), of whose name this is probably a Latin form.] [J. G.]

COLARBASUS (Hippol., Ps. Tert.; Colorbasus, Iren., Epiph., Theodoret, Philast. cod., Aug.; C. Bassus Philast. codd.), a supposed Valentinian Gnostic of the 2d century. The name occurs first, and that only incidentally, in a solitary passage of Irenaeus (p. 65) which has been the subject of much discussion. Volkmar (Die Colarbasus-Gnosis in Niederer's Zeitschrift f. d. Hist. Theologie, 1855, 603-616) has vindicated the substantial integrity of the Latin version, and restored the original by its help from the corrupt form which it assumes in Epiphanius (Haer. 236 D), as follows:—Οὗτος οὖν ὁ Μάρκος μῆτραν καὶ ἐκδοχείον τῆς Κολαρβάσου Σιγῆς ἰαυτὸν μονώτατον γεγονέναι λέγων, ἅτε μονογενῆς ὑπάρχων, τὸ τοῦ σπέρματος κατατεθὲν εἰς αὐτὸν ὡδὲ πᾶς ἀπεκύσσει. Αὐτὴν τὴν ἀπὸ τῶν ὑπερτάτων καὶ ἀπὸ τῶν ἀοράτων καὶ ἀκατονομάστων τόπων Τετράδα κατεληλυθὲν σχήματι γυναικείῳ πρὸς αὐτόν, ἐπειδὴ, φησί, τὸ ἄρρὲν αὐτῆς ὁ κόσμος φέρειν οὐκ ἠδύνατο, καὶ μνηῦσαι αὐτὴν ἤτις ἦν, καὶ τὴν τῶν πάντων γένεσιν, ἦν οὐδενὶ ποῦτε οὔτε θεῶν οὔτε ἀνθρώπων ἀεκάλοψε, τίποτε μονώτατῳ διηγήσασθαι, οὕτως εἰπούσαν, κ. τ. λ. Marcus, Irenaeus seems to say, boasted that he alone was allowed to become the womb and receptacle of the Sigé (Silence) of Colarbasus; the offspring to which he gave birth being the statement and revelation recorded afterwards. There is no previous mention of Colarbasus. Irenaeus has for six pages (of Massuet) been speaking of Marcus alone. Eleven pages back he refers briefly to "a certain other Illustrious teacher of theirs" [the Valentinians]; but there is no coincidence of doctrine, and nothing to suggest that the nameless, or obscurely named [ΕΠΙΦΑΝΗΣ], heretic was himself Colarbasus, as some have supposed.

According to Philaster (Haer. 43) Colarbasus taught after Marcus and "in like manner;" his two lines of description are merely a vague echo of Marcossian doctrine. Pseudo-Tertullian (15) combines the two names indistinguishably in one article. Their common source, the lost Compendium of Hippolytus, can have contained no special information about Colarbasus. When Hippolytus wrote the great later treatise Against all Heresies, he was evidently not better instructed. At the beginning of the sixth book he promises to describe "the doctrines held by Marcus and Colarbasus;" he devotes in due course twenty-three pages to a repetition of Irenaeus's account of Marcus; and at the end he considers he has sufficiently shewn who [viz., Pythagoreans and astrologers] were the masters of Marcus and Colarbasus, "the successors in the school of Valentinus;" yet not a word is given to Colarbasus separately. Once elsewhere (iv. 13) Colarbasus is said to have "endeavoured to expound theology by measures and numbers;" but this is simply the Marcossian method. The proceeding of Epiphanius is more audacious. He has a separate article (Haer. xxxv. 258-262) on Colarbasus, the composition of which has been fully laid bare by Volkmar (l. c. 614 f.) and R. A. Lipsius (Zur Quellengesch. d. Epiph. 167 f.). The long account of Marcus in Irenaeus is preceded by a series of short notices (mostly without names) of the chief doctrines maintained by different branches of the great Valentinian sect. The passage relating to one group distinguished as "those who are reputed to be the wiser among them," is transferred bodily by Epiphanius to Colarbasus, and with it, stranger still, the next paragraph down to the end of the chapter, though it sets forth in single sentences the doctrines of no less than five sets of Valentinians about the Saviour. The passage about the "wise" group immediately follows one on Ptolemaeus; and accordingly Epiphanius makes Colarbasus to spring from "the root of Ptolemaeus," as well as to borrow from Marcus, and attributes to him a purpose of devising a greater and more ingenious scheme than his predecessors. Theodoret (Haer. Fab. i. 12) merely abbreviates Epiphanius, changing at the same time "Colarbasus" into "the Colarbasians." A doubtful conjecture has brought Colarbasus into a single sentence of Tertullian (adv. Val. 4), where at most no more is said than that a road was marked out for him by Valentinus; Ptolemaeus is named next, then Heracleon, Secundus, and Marcus. All these various writers against heresies are known to have learned, directly or indirectly, from Irenaeus; and every statement of theirs about Colarbasus can be at once traced, through transcription or immediate inference, to something in the text of Irenaeus not far distant from the place where the name of Colarbasus occurs. On the other hand, the reports of doctrine have little or nothing in common. Hippolytus and his followers make Colarbasus to have taught only what Marcus taught: Epiphanius and his copyist fathers upon him the discordant views of a miscellaneous cluster of Valentinians.

The credit of detecting the cause of the confusion belongs to C. A. Heumann (Hamburgische Vermischte Bibliothek, 1743, i. 145'). He got rid of the mysterious double of Marcus by pointing out that Chol-arba (כלארבע) means "All-Four," i. e. the divine Tetrad, which in the scheme of Marcus stood at the head of the Pleroma. He was less successful in dealing with the details of the text: and Baur (K.G. d. 3 erst. Jahrh. i. 204) has rightly substituted Col (קל) for Chol (The Voice of Four for All-Four). Volkmar (l. c. 612) explains the appearance of s by the Aramaic commutation of ʿ with ס; and the o of several authorities by Theodoret's Κοσσιανός for Κασσιανός: Colassae and Colossae afford a still better illustration.

Both the Tetrad and Sigé appear in the context as if they made revelations to Marcus, but (what has not been sufficiently observed) in different ways. When Irenaeus is simply recording what he found in his Marcossian authority, he speaks of the Tetrad or Tetractys. Thus:—"That the Tetrad herself came down to him from the highest and from the invisible [and innominable] places in female form, because, it is said, the world could not bear her male [element], and that she made known who she was," etc. (66); "And that the Tetractys, when she had explained this to him, said 'And I will also shew thee——'" etc. (68); "And as Marcus waited expecting her [Aetheia or Truth, another aeon] to say something more, the Tetractys again came forward and spoke" (69). Sigé, on the other hand, is mentioned only when Irenaeus speaks in his own person, and always with a touch of sarcasm. Thus: ". . . the letters of which Marcus's Sigé (ἡ Μάρκον Σιγῆ) pronounced (ἔδογματίσθη) the 'Forefather' to consist" (68); "and he [apparently 'Perfect Reason"] uses as his minister the greatness of the seven numbers, as says Marcus's Sigé" (72); "and the seventh [heaven] shouts out the letter O, as Marcus's Sigé positively affirms, she who babbles at great length but says nothing true" (72); "Thus then the all-wise Sigé announces to him the origin of the 24 letters" (74); "Who will endure that Sigé of thine that babbles so much, her who names the Innominate, and declares the Unutterable, and expounds the Unsearchable," etc.? (78 f.) It may therefore be questioned whether Marcus ever represented Sigé as herself visiting him. Two passages indeed suggest pretty clearly that he held her to be faithful to her name. Speaking of "Truth," virtually the alphabet, also called Man, he says (69) that she "is the fountain of every speech, and the beginning of every voice, and the utterance of everything unutterable, and the mouth of the unspoken Sigé" (τῆς σιωπημένης Σιγῆς). Again we hear (64) that Marcossians were taught to offer a prayer for deliverance from "the Judge" to a female divinity addressed as "thou that sittest beside God and the mystic Sigé before the aeons" (or ages: ὁ πάρεδρε θεοῦ κ. τ. λ.). This address supplies the required clue, for the divinity is presently called "the Mother," in a passage almost immediately preceding the occurrence of the name Colarbasus; and elsewhere (75: cf. 84) "the Mother of the Universe" is identified with "the first Tetrad." Sigé herself then doubtless remains hidden above; but her mysteries are made known to Marcus by the Tetrad, of the Colarbas or Voice of Four, who must be the (nameless) "most mighty power from the invisible and innominate places," to whom he boasted that he owed his "knowledge," as we read in Irenaeus's first paragraph about him (60).

The difficulty of the primary phrase τῆς Κολαρβάσου Σιγῆς remains. In the absence of a second article, it can only mean "the Sigé of Colarbas" (or Colarbasus) instead of "the Colarbas (or Colarba) of Sigé," as the sense above elicited requires. The difficulty would be lightened, and the perplexing termination of Κολαρβάσου at the same time removed, by reading τῆς Κολαρβάς ἐκ Σιγῆς, "the Colarba (Voice of Four) proceeding out of Sigé (Silence)." In round continuous uncials the change would be easy, EK and OY having much resemblance when written. The two names would thus stand in the right relation to each other. The phrase however would still be briefer than we should expect. The sudden appearance of the Hebrew term remains likewise unaccounted for. The obscurity evidently lies in the original text of Irenaeus, if not of the authority whom he followed; and it was found as embarrassing in the third and fourth centuries as now. It was only disguised, not removed, by supposing a heretic named Colarbasus. [MARCUS, VALENTINUS.]

COLCU (Alc. Ep. 3, Patrol. c. 142), Irish saint. [COLGA (1).]

[C. H.]

COLFRIDUS (MS. described in Hardy, Descr. Cat. i. 412), abbat of Wearmouth. [CEOLFRID.]

[C. H.]

COLGA, COLCHU. Colgan (in a note in Acta SS. p. 379) gives an account of this name and its various forms. It is in Irish Coelchu, and now more usually Colga: it is derived from coel, "rarus vel tenuis," or from colg, "gladius vel acies," and cu, "molossus vel lupus." It admits of many modifications, as Coelchu, Colehu, Colga, Colgeu, Colcus, Colcius, Colcanus, Colganus, &c.

COLGA (1) the Wise, Lector of Clonmacnoise, Feb. 20. He was a man of eminent piety and learning, and acquired the name of Chief Scribe or Master of all the Scots. He belonged to the family of the Ua Duineachda, and was appointed to preside over the great school of Clonmacnoise. He was a special friend and correspondent of Alcuin at the court of Charlemagne, and an extremely interesting letter from Alcuin, addressed to St. Colga, is published by Usher (Sylloge, Ep. xviii.), and reprinted by Colgan (Acta SS. 379). It is important in itself, and also in shewing the great esteem in which S. Colga was held by Alcuin. His death was about A.D. 796, some placing it earlier. He is said to have composed the Scauip-chrabhaidh, "Scopa Devotionis," or "Besom of Devotion," which Colgan describes as a collection of most ardent prayers, somewhat in the form of litanies, a work full of the warmest and most soul-stirring devotion to God; it was extant in his day, and may be the manuscript called Leabhar-na-hUidhré. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 228 sq.; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 55; Book of Deer, p. cxxxvi.; Colgan, Acta SS. 378.)

(2) Colgus or Colganus, son of Aedh Draignech, was of the powerful family of the Hy-Fiachrach, in Connaught, in the modern counties of Galway and Mayo. His sister was S. Failenna or Foilenna (March 3) [FAILA], and his mother Cuilenn or Cuillenda, who was guilty of impurity, and whom St. Colgus was sent to reprove: he had also two brothers, Aedh and Sorar. He had a church and possibly a monastery, called Cill-Colgan, in the diocese of Kilmacduach, and barony of Doolkillen in the county of Galway, but he is chiefly known in connexion with St. Columba. He flourished about A.D. 580, and probably died in his native land, according to St. Columba's promise. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 328; Reeves, Adamnan, 45 sq., 225; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 342, 368, 429; and Acta SS. 380-1; Kelly, Cal. Ir. SS. 77.)

(3) Colgius or Colcius, son of Cellach, was another disciple and associate of St. Columba. He appears as an attendant on St. Columba, asked blessed salt to cure his sister of ophthalmia, and was waiting upon St. Columba, when that saint saw in spirit the workman falling from the Round Tower of Derry and sent the angel on the instant to save him. Colgan conjectures that he may have been the same as Colga or Colgus, son of Aedh Draignech, and also a bishop, but is probably in error regarding both. The obit of Colga son of Ceallach stands in the Irish Annals at about A.D. 622 (Ann. Tigh.). (Reeves, Adamnan, 65, 114, 216; Petrie, Round Towers, 388; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 328; Colgan, Acta SS. 381-2.)

(4) Colga, abbat of Lusk in Leinster. He flourished about A.D. 694, and was one of the chief prelates who attended the synod at Armagh, convened by Flann Febhla and St. Adamnan about A.D. 697. He was son of Moenach, and must be distinguished from Colga, son of Crunnmhael, abbat of Lusk, who died about the year 787, but no more seems to be known of him. (Colgan, Acta SS. 382; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 140.)

COLGA (5) Caolehu, of Lui-airthir, Sept. 24. This is Coelchus, Caolchus, or Cailcon, son of Caol or Coelius, of the race of Ciar, of the descendants of Rudhraige: he was at St. Barry's school at Loch Erce, and was one of those who gave up their church "to God and to St. Baire." (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 257; Kelly, Cat. Ir. SS. p. xxv.; Caulfield, Life of St. Fin Barre, p. v.) [J. G.]

COLLA (Wend. F. H. ed. Coxe, i. 205), bishop of Selsey. [EOLLA.] [C. H.]

COLLECTA. (Cyp. Ep. 21.) [CORNELIA.]

COLLEN, Welsh saint of the 7th century, patron of Llängollen in Denbighshire; commemorated on May 20 (Rees, Welsh Saints, 302). [C. H.]

COLLUTHUS (1) Martyr under Maximian in the Thebais. (Menology, May 19.) [E. B. B.]

(2) Presbyter and founder of a sect at Alexandria early in the 4th century. He assumed (on what grounds it is unknown) to exercise episcopal functions; but the council of Alexandria under Hosius (A.D. 324) decided that he was only a presbyter, from which it was held to follow by necessary consequence that ISCHYRAS and others ordained by him were to be accounted only laymen (Athanas. Apol. cont. Arian. 12, 75-77, 80, pp. 106, 152). The passages cited mention not only Colluthus, but a sect of Colluthians. Bishop Alexander, in a letter preserved in the Ecc. Hist. of Theodoret (i. 4), uses language which seems to imply that Colluthus commenced his schismatical proceedings before Arius had separated from the church. A phrase used by Alexander (Χριστεμπορεία) has been understood by Valesius to charge Colluthus with taking money for conferring orders. Valesius also is led by Alexander's letter to conjecture that the cause of Colluthus's separation was impatience that Alexander had not taken stronger measures against Arianism. The name Colluthus is the first among those of the presbyters who subscribed to Alexander's condemnation of Arius (Gelas. Cyzic. ii. 3). The authorities thus far cited accuse Colluthus of schism, not heresy; as is also indicated by the mildness of the course taken by the council of Alexandria, which would probably have excommunicated him had he been deeply tainted with erroneous doctrine. Epiphanius mentions in general terms (Haer. 69, 728) that Colluthus taught some perverse things, and founded a sect, which was soon dispersed. The giving Colluthus a separate heading in heretical lists begins with Philastrius (79), followed by Augustine and later heresiologists. The heresy charged on him by Philastrius is that he contradicted Isaiah xlv. 7, by teaching that God did not make evil. (Tillemont, vi. 231; Walch, Hist. der Ketz. iv. 502.) [G. S.]

(3) A monophysite, extracts from whose writings were read at the Lateran Council, A.D. 649. (Binus, Concilia, ii. 2, 468, quoted by Fabricius, Bibl. Gr. ix. 246, ed. Harles.) [G. S.]

COLLYRIDIAN. Under this name Epiphanius (Haer. 79) assails certain women who had brought from Thrace into Arabia the practice of performing on certain days rites in honour of the Blessed Virgin, the chief being the offering of a cake (κολλυρίς), and the partaking of it by the worshippers. Epiphanius condemns their conduct on the double ground that women ought not to take it on them to offer sacrifice, and that while Mary is to be honoured, God only is to be worshipped. The name Collyris (or kindred forms) is to be found in the Septuagint translation of Levit. vii. 12, viii. 26; 2 Sam. vi. 19, xiii. 68; and the word thence passed also into the Latin versions. [G. S.]

COLMA, virgin, of Leitir; commemorated Jan. 22. St. Colma, or Columba, and her sisters, Bogha and Lassar or Lassara, belonged to the family of the Dalm Buain in the barony of Upper Massareene, co. Antrim, and were pupils or foster-children of St. Comgall of Bangor [BOGHA]. (Desc. Cat. i. 210, 224; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 401-2; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 25.) [J. G.]

COLMAN. This is a name of extreme frequency in Irish hagiology. In the Table of the Mart. Doneg. are given 97 Colmans, and in the Index 113; Colgan (Tr. Thom. 480 n. 8) gives them as more than 130; and Ussher (Ecc. Ant. c. 17, Wks. vi. p. 540) says there are upwards of 230 described "in Hibernicorum nostrorum sanctorum matriculis." The root of the word Colman is Colum or Colm, which Colgan (Acta SS. 155 n. 3) translates "Columba, a dove." To this may be added the diminutives an and og, and the prefix of veneration or affection mo; hence arise the names Colman, Colm, and Mocholmog. Therefore the names Colm, Columba, Columbanus, Columbus, Colman, Colmanus, Colmo, Mocholmog, Mocholmog are all varieties of the same, and may be used interchangeably. Yet as one or other of the forms has usually come to be attached more or less constantly to particular individuals, we are able to divide them into Colmans, Colums, &c., but the favourite name was Colman. (On the derivation and use of the names, see Colgan ut sup.; Reeves, Adannan, 29 n. 98 n., and Ecc. Ant. 17 n.; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. iii. 146; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, pp. xliii. n. 148, n. 2.)

COLMAN (1) Son of Comgellain, was a man deeply versed in legal and ecclesiastical learning and a great friend of St. Columba, though much younger. Once, when visiting at Comgellain's house, St. Columba is said to have taken the infant in his arms and prophesied over him his coming greatness. He died in the year of the eclipses, A.D. 625. (Colgan, Tr. Thom. 410, c. 10, 432, c. 10 et al.; Reeves, Adannan, 92, 459; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. ii. 238; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. iv. 42 n.)

(2) Son of Daire, bishop of Doire-mor (now Derrymore or Kilcolman in King's County). May 20, July 31. He is called son of Daire or Dairene, but in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, p. 207) Dairene is called his foster-mother, sister of his own mother Sant. He is often termed son of Aengus, son of Nafraech, king of Cashel, but chronology requires his being merely a descendant. He was a friend and neighbour of St. Pulcherius or Mochaemog (Mar. 13) of Liathmora, there being little more than a mile between their monasteries. Colman must have flourished in the beginning of the 7th century. He is probably the same as Colman, son of Dairene B. commemorated on July 31. (See Colgan, Acta SS. 169, c. 2, 172 n. 10, 593, c. 22; Ussher, Ecc. Ant. c. 17 [wks. vi. 529-30]; Lanigan, Ecc. Hist. Ir. i. 401-2.)

ii. 210 sq.; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 252 n. 1, 253.)

COLMAN (3) Son of Duach, of Cill-mac-Duach, B. Feb. 3. This appears to have been Colman of the third class of Irish saints, and a man of great virtue and miracles. He was son of Duach, of the race of the southern Hy-Fiactrach, or Ui-Fiachrach Aidhne, of Connaught, and was closely related to Guaire Aidhne, king of that province, who died according to the Four Masters, in A.D. 662. He followed Christ from his youth, and at length retired to a hermit-cell, near the place where afterwards, in the first years of Guaire Aidhne, the church of Kilmacduagh (now in the barony of Kiltartan, and county of Galway) was built. The foundation of Kilmacduagh was probably laid before A.D. 620, on the supposition, which Colgan adopts, that Guaire Aidhne flourished A.D. 630, and died before A.D. 662, the date given above. His festival in the calendars is Feb. 3, but the day observed at Kilmacduagh seems to have been Oct. 27. (Colgan, Acta SS. 245 sq., for the memoir of Colman, commonly called Macduach; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 341 sq.; Ware, Ir. Ant. 110, 148; Bollandists, Acta SS., Oct. tom. xii. 880-892; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 108 n. 4; Dubl. Penny Journal, i. 200.) On the remains of Colman Mac Duach's churches at Kilmacduagh, and on Inishmore in Galway Bay, see Petrie (Round Towers, 176-7, 404 sq.).

(4) Son of Eochaidh, Jan. 1. There are several Colmans in the calendars called "Son of Eochaidh," as the present, another on Sept. 6, another called Colum or Colman of Rosglanda, also on Sept. 6, and a fourth called Ua Fiachrach, Oct. 27. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 384, n. 24) gives reasons for thinking that the Columbanus in St. Adamnan's Columba (ii. c. 43) is the same as he who is counted founder of Snamluthair, and venerated on Jan. 1; and Dr. Reeves identifies Colman or Colum of Rosglanda as the same person, so that the four referred to above are reduced to two, whose dedications are Jan. 1 chiefly, and Oct. 27. The former (Jan. 1) was son of Eochaidh, descended from Laeghaire, son of Niall of the nine hostages. He is first met with driving St. Columba for a whole day through very rough roads, with a car which had no lynch-pins: there he is called the founder of the monastery which in Scotch is called Snamluthair. Again, in the Life of St. Fechin, he is represented as blind for a long time, and restored to sight by St. Fechin. As St. Fechin died A.D. 665, St. Colman must have been a young man in the days of St. Columba. He was venerated at Snamluthair, in Carbre Gabhra, which was the monastery of his sister Comaigh, and is now Slanore, in the present parish of Kilmore, in the barony of Upper Loughitee, co. Cavan. (Colgan, Acta SS. 136, c. 30, 338 n. 11; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 26; Reeves, Adamnan, 172, 173; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 5, 239, 287.)

(5) Son of Finntan, Dec. 14. This is the entry in Mart. Doneg., but Mar. O'Gorman calls him son of Finnbar, and about A.D. 703, the Irish Annals give the obit of Colman, son of Finnbar, abbat of Lismore (Colgan, Acta SS. 793). [COLMAN (25) of Lismore.]

(6) Son of Lenin, of Cluain-uamha (Cloyne), Nov. 24. He is counted by Lanigan among the saints of the second order in Ireland, and believed to have flourished in the 6th century.

He was son of Lenin, son of Mogh Nuadhat, king of Munster, and is sometimes surmamed Mitine from Museraighe Mitine, (now Muskerry in Cork,) where he was probably born. He was brother of St. Brigida, daughter of Lenin or Leinin [BRIGIDA (3)], and was one of the saints belonging to the family of St. Foilan. He seems at first to have been a poet attached to the court of Aedh Caemh, king of Cashel, about the middle of the 6th century, and after his conversion to have attended St. Jarlath's school at Clonfois, where he was next in order of sanctity to St. Brendan of Clonfert (May 6). He died in or about A.D. 604 (Ann. Tigh.). His character as a poet appears in the very elegant metrical Life of St. Senan, which he composed, and of which we have now but a fragment mentioned; the substance of it is incorporated into Colgan's second Life of St. Senan. (Acta SS. 104, c. 2, 533, c. 22, 539; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 41 sq. 212 sq.; Caulfield, St. Fin Barre, 18 n. 22 n.; Todd, St. Patrick, 208; O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 76; Ware, Ir. Ant. 144; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 317; Four Mast. by O'Donovan, i. 225, n. 4; Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. ii. pt. ii. 253 sq.)

COLMAN (7) Son of Lugaidh, priest of Cluain Bruchais, July 12. He was a grandson of Laeghaire, king of Ireland, and is given among those of that race who embraced the faith (Colgan, Acta SS. 111, c. 3). O'Clery thinks he was the son of Lugaidh, son of Aenghus, king of Munster (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 193). In either case he must have lived not later than the middle of the 6th century.

(8) Son of Murchu, has had attributed to him and his two brothers (Colman, the eldest, being a bishop, and the others priests) the authorship of a hymn in praise of Michael the archangel; it is given in the Book of Hymns, and edited by Dr. Todd. He seems to have belonged to Connaught, and for a time at least engaged in missionary labours on the continent before becoming abbat of Moville, where he died A.D. 735 (Ant. Ult.). Dr. Todd remains undecided as to the identity of Murchu or Murchon his father, but Dr. Graves is of opinion that Murchu is the Murchu Mac Ua Maichtene of June 8 in the calendars, and the father of Cogitosus. [COGITOSUS.] (Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. ii. 165 sq.; Proc. Roy. Ir. Acad. viii. 269 sq.)

(9) Son of Roi, of Reachrainn, June 16. His father was Roi, and his mother Eithne, daughter of Coneraidh, who was the mother also of many other saints; or at least Eithne was the name of the mothers of several Irish saints, like St. Columba (June 9), St. Maedoc of Ferns (Jan. 31), and St. Comgan of Glen-Uissen (Feb. 27), and this may be all that is meant in the martyrology. He is also called Colman the Deacon, and received from St. Columba the church which that saint had built at Reachrainn, Rachraind, or Rachra, now Lambay island, off the coast of Dublin. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 171; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 400, c. 65, 450 n. 68, 489 n. 25; Reeves, Adamnan, pp. lxx. 164, and Ecol. Ant. 292.)

(10) Son of Ronan, Mar. 30. In Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 91) he is said to have been of the race of Conall Gulban, son of Niall. In Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 480, col. 1) he appears among the saints derived from the same paternal stem as St. Columba, as "Columbanus or Colmanus, son of Ronan, son of Loarn, son of Fergus, son of Conall Gulban," and again (ib. 489, col. 1) Colgan places him among the disciples of St. Columba.

COLMAN (11) Son of Tighernach, Jan. 3. This saint is of the same race as Colman the son of Ronan, being son of Tighernach, son of Fergus, son of Conall Gulban, and thus like the last is classed among the disciples and relatives of St. Columba. He was brother of St. Begbile (Oct. 12), St. Conandil (Mar. 8), and St. Cuan Caein (Mar. 2). (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 480 n.⁹, 489 n.²⁷; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 15; O'Haulon, Ir. Saints, i. 195.)

(12) Son of Ua Laoighse, or Moc-u-Loigse, May 15. He is represented as son of Luagnius, and descended from Laeighseach Cearn-mohr, the son of Conall Cearnach, chief of the heroes of the Craebh Ruadh, or Red Branch, of the Clanna Rudhraidhe. He was a bishop at Tulach-mic-Comghail in Druimni Togha, that is, Nuacongbail in Laoghis in Leinster, now Onghaval, a townland in the parish of Stradbally, in the south of the Queen's County, and containing the old graveyard where Colman's church once stood (Ord. Survey, s. 19; Reeves, Adamnam, 212-13 n.). He was a contemporary of St. Columba, and is twice presented to our notice in that saint's life. We have no account of the exact date of St. Colman's death, but it was evidently some time between those of St. Fintan and St. Columba, all the three probably dying at about the same time. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 321, c. 8, 324 n.¹⁰, 417, and Acta SS. 353, c. 22, 354 n.²⁵; Reeves, Adamnam, 164, 165, 212; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 177, 229 sq.; Book of Rights, by O'Donovan, 166 n. 214 n.)

(13) Mac-Ui-Tealduibh, Feb. 8, Dec. 12. This is Columbanus, one of the bishops to whom pope John IV. A.D. 640 (while yet but pope-elect) addressed the well-known letter urging the Scots to observe the true Easter, and avoid the Pelagian heresy (Bede, Ecol. Hist. ii. c. 19). He was bishop of Clonard, and the Irish Annals give the death of Colman, bishop, son of Cudelduib, Aitelduibh, O'Fellduiborium, or Vihely, abbat of Cluain-Iraird (Clonard) at about A.D. 654 (Ann. Tigh.). (Colgan, Acta SS. 17 n.¹¹, 406, c. 5, and Ind. Chron.; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 412; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 149 n.; Ussher, Ant. Ecol. c. 17, wks. vi. 536.)

(14) Of Ardbo, Feb. 21. Among the saints belonging to the same family as St. Maidoc (Jan. 31), bishop of Ferns, Colgan (Acta SS. 22, c. 4) gives St. Colman surnamed Macaidhe, of Ardbo; he is son of Aedh, son of Amalgaidh, and descended from Colla Uais, monarch of Ireland in the beginning of the 4th century. His church was on the margin of Loch Eachach, now Lough Neagh, in the north-east of Ireland. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 55.)

(15) Abbat of Cam-Achadh (March 31), and of Camnus (Oct. 30). [COLMAN (24) of Linn-uachaille.]

(16) Of Cill-mic-Eoghain, Oct. 1. This saint was of the race of Colla-dá-chrioch, and surnamed Cille. He was son of Eugenius, son of Murdoch, and descended from the family of the Oirghialli (Oriell) in Ulster. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 265; Colgan, Acta SS. 713, c. 4.)

(17) Of Cill-rnaidh, B., Oct. 16. The gloss on the Felire of Aengus calls him "Son of Cathbadh." It is related in the Life of St. Ailbhe (of Emly) that when St. Ailbhe returned to his native country of Ireland and landed in the north part of the island, his servant (familia ipsius), named Colman, built, at his command, a church, which received the name of Ceall-ruaidh, and there St. Ailbhe wrought several miracles. That church has given its name to the parish of Cill-Ruaidh (Red Church), new Kilroot, in the barony of Lower Belfast, co. Antrim, beside Belfast Lough. In the townland of Kilroot, on the edge of the Lough, is the churchyard, with some remains of the ancient church. The Irish Annals place the death of St. Ailbhe after the beginning of the 6th century, and as we have no account of St. Colman's date except in connexion with this saint, we must suppose that he flourished about that time. St. Colman seems also to have received a place among the saints of Scotland, but, with so many of the same name, some doubt must remain regarding the dedications. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 277; Ussher, Ant. Ecol. c. 16 (wks. vi. 346); Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 245 sq.; Lanigan, Ecol. Ant. Ir. i. 23 sq.; Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 302.)

COLMAN (18) Of Cluain-eraird (Clonard in Meath), Feb. 9. The second hand in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 43) has "Riognach, sister of Finnen of Cluain-Eraird, was his mother, but St. Finnian flourished in the first half of the 6th century." Among the saints, prelates, and illustrious men in the school and church of Clonard, Colgan (Acta SS. 406, c. 5) cites from the Four Masters, A.D. 700, the death in that year of Colman-ua-hEirc, abbat of Clonard. He must not be confounded with St. Colman Mac-ni-tealduibh, who was also abbat and bishop of Clonard, and died on Feb. 8, A.D. 652 [COLMAN (13) Mac-Ui-Tealduibh].

(19) Of Comhraire, at Uisneach (now Kilcomreragh, near the hill of Uisneach, in the co. of Westmeath), Sept. 25. Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 259) says Bronach, daughter of Miliuc, son of Buan, with whom Patrick was in bondage, was his mother.

(20) Of Druim-mor (Dromore), B. and C., June 6 and 7. This saint is known as Colman, Colmoc, and Mocholmog, probably, too, as Calmaig. In the Irish martyrologies he is usually called Mocholmog, bishop of Dromore, in Iveagh of Ulidia (on the river Lagan and county of Down). He belonged to the noble family of Conall Cearnach of the Dalaradians, and was son of Ua Arta. The dates of his birth and death are unknown, but he evidently flourished in the very beginning of the 6th century, and is not to be confounded with St. Colman Ela who flourished half a century later. Baptized and confirmed by St. Colman his uncle, probably the bishop of Cill-ruaidh or Kilroot (Oct. 12), he became a pupil of St. Caelan or Mochoai, bishop of Nendrum, and afterwards was sent to study the Scriptures under St. Ailbhe of Emly (Sept. 12). By the advice of Macnissime, bishop of Connor, he founded the noble monastery of Dromore, on the banks of the Lagan. As St. Macnissime died A.D. 513 (Four Masters), this foundation must have taken place before that date, probably about A.D. 500. His Life is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Junii tom. ii. c. 24-9) and in Brev. Aberd. (p. hyem. foll. ci. cii.). Like many others of his time he compiled a Rule for his monks, and showed himself a pattern of obedience. He was buried in the city of Dromore. In his honour the monastery of Inchmahol-moch or Inchmahone, on an island in the Loch of Menteith, Perthshire, was solemnly dedicated. As Colmac, Colmoc, and Calmaig, he appears to have several dedications in Scotland. In the Scotch calendars his feast is June 6, and in the Irish, June 7. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 149; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 98, 104, 303 sq.; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 424, 431 sq.; Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 100 sq., and St. Patrick, 131, sq.; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 304-5; Ware, Ir. Ant. 133; Hardy, Des. Cat. i. 224.)

COLMAN (21) Of Glendalough, B., Dec. 12. He was son of Uithechar, and of the race of Cealtechar. His festival is Dec. 12. He died A.D. 660 (Ann. Tigh.), and was contemporary with several other Colmans in the third class of Irish saints. (Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 4; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 536, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 660; Colgan, Acta SS. 247 n. 2; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 304.)

(22) Of Glem-delmaic, in Magh Raighne. in Osraige, Nov. 5. The history of Colman himself is obscure, and the name of his church is changed, yet his memory is preserved in the dedication and holy will at Clara or Claragh, in the barony of Gowrau, co. Kilkenny. (See paper on 'Topographical and Historical Illustrations, co. Kilkenny,' by John Hogan, in Journ. Kilk. Arch. Soc. v. p. 212, new series.)

(23) Of Lindisfarne and Inis-bo-fin, B., Feb. 18, Aug. 8. In Kal. Drumnont. he is given "apud Hiberniam" at both these days; Camerarius is alone in placing him on March 7. This saint is connected with both Scotland and Ireland, and thus has a double commemoration, in Scotland on Feb. 18, and in Ireland on Aug. 8. He is confounded by Wion with St. Colomannus, the Irish martyr in Austria, and credited with the conversion of king Penda. He first appears in accredited history as successor to bishop Finan in the see of Lindisfarne, to which he was consecrated A.D. 661. From his afterwards having taken up his abode in Mayo and the adjoining coast, Lanigan believes him to have been a native of that part of Ireland; this may be true, but from a comparison of dates it is scarcely possible for him to have been that "Columbanus nepos Briuni" whom St. Adamnan (Vit. St. Col. ii. c. 16) mentions as a disciple of St. Columba, and Colgan would wish to identify with this St. Colman. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 382 n. 14; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 61; Reeves, Adamnan, 125 n.) He attended the council of Whithy in 664 on the Easter controversy, where he represented the Scottish party and was defeated, [WILFRID.] Accompanied by all his Scottish or Irish monks, and about thirty of the English, St. Colman returned to his parent monastery of Hy. After remaining some time there, he sailed to the west of Ireland, A.D. 668, and took up his abode in the island called Inis-bo-finne, in Latin Insula Vaccae Albae, or the island of the White Cow, now Inishbofin, an island and parish in the barony of Murrisk, off the west coast of Mayo. After he settled at Inishbofin a dispute arose between his Scotch and Irish disciples, and to preserve peace he built another monastery at Mayo, where he placed his English monks, while he and the others remained at Inishbofin, where he died on Aug. 8, A.D. 676, and where the ruins of his church are still to be seen in the town-land of Knock. (See Bede, Ecol. Hist. iii. c. 25, iv. c. 4; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 59 sq.; Bollandists' Acta SS. Feb. tom. iii. 82 sq.; Boethius, Scot. Hist. B. ix. cc. xxi.-ii.; Grub, Ecol. Hist. Scotl. i. 87 sq.; Neander, Gen. Ch. Hist. Edinb. 1849, v. 28 sq.; O'Connor, Rer. Hib. Scrip. ii. 209, iv. 60; Prim. Ch. Hist. Ir. 180 sq., 240 sq.; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. (wks. vi.) cc. xv. xvii and Ind. Chron.; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. 171 sq.; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 278 n. 279 n.; Fordun, Scotichronicon, i. 60 sq.; Ware, Ir. Ant. iii. 125; Bishop Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 303-4; O'Flaherty, Jar-Connaught, 116 sq. Ir. Arch. Soc.; Des. Cat. i. 296.)

COLMAN (24) Of Linn-Uachaille or Lann, Mar. 30. Colgan (Acta SS. 792-3) has collected all the scattered notices regarding this saint, and reduced them to what he considers six ascertained facts from ancient writers. 1. That his mother's name was Lassara. 2. That he and another Colman were uterine brothers and living at the same time, but the father of this Colman was of the Hi Gualla or Gaill-fine, an Ulster tribe, so that Colman was a native of Ulster; while the name of the other Colman's father was Luachan, the son of Aidh, of the royal family of Meath. 3. That he had two or three churches, viz. Cambos or Camus, which had been founded by St. Comgall of Bangor, on the west bank of the Bann, in the diocese of Derry, Lann Mocholmoc in the diocese of Down or Dromore, and perhaps Lann Abhaic in Down, or Lann Ronain in Dromore. (On these churches see Reeves, Ecol. Antiq. 110 n., 313 n., 378 n., 380 n.) 4. That Linn Uachaille, at Cassan-linne in the east of Ulster, called also Linn-Duachail, (now Magheralin, on the river Lagan, in the county of Down and diocese of Dromore,) received its name from a demon who infested that place before St. Colman's time. 5. That in his churches he is commemorated on March 30 and October 30. 6. And that he died on March 30, A.D. 699, according to the Four Masters. The saint is often called Mocholmoc, and his church Lann-Da-Cholmoc or Lann Mocholmoc, or more briefly Lann. (For allusions to the saint and his churches see Reeves, ut sup. 110 n.; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 146; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 91, 289; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 300 n. *) From the confusion in the references it is impossible to define clearly the identity of the various persons who seem to have a certain amount of connexion, but Colgan is probably correct in making the festivals of March 30 and October 30 belong to one person, who is of Linn-Uachaille, and that of June 17 to another, who is uterine brother of the former, and is designated Colman Mór of Lann-mic-Luachan.

(25) Colman or Mocholmog of Lismore, Jan. 22. He was a native of Ibh-Liathain, the country of the O'Lehans, between Cork and Youghal. His father was Finbarr, of the illustrious house of Hua Beogna, and descended from the dynasty of that region. He flourished in the reign of Cennfaeladh, king of Ireland, who died A.D. 769, and must have been a considerable time at the monastery of Lismore, where he received the monastic habit. After the death of St. Iarnla or Hierlog, on Jan. 16, A.D. 699 (Ann. Ul.), St. Colman succeeded him as bishop and abbat of Lismore, and during his incumbency scholars were attracted to his school from all quarters on account of his learning and piety. St. Colman died on Jan. 22, in A.D. 703 (Ann. Tigh.). (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 304 n., 305; Colgan, Acta SS. 154-5; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. iii. 145-7; Kelby, Cal. Ir. SS. 60; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 397 sq.)

COLMAN (26) Alainn, Dec. 14. In his memoir of St. Colman of Linn-Uachaille (March 30), Colgan notices a Colmanus Lannensis, whose feast is on Dec. 14; but he cannot decide whether he is the saint of Linn-Uachaille or a brother also called Colman, and the son of Luachan; it is possible that he is distinct from both. Marian O'Gorman and his followers have the petition, "Tres S. Colmani nobis suffragentur, S. Colmanus de Rathmaolsidhe, S. Colmanus filius Finbarri, et S. Colmanus de Lann" (Colgan, Acta SS. 792, 793 n. 3), but Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 337) commemorates them as Colman of Rath Maolsidhe, Colman, son of Finntan, and Colman Alainn. [COLMAN (24) of Linn-Uachaille.]

(27) Dubheuilenn, of Dun in the Renna, and of Bealach Chonglais in Leinster, and of many other places (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 315), Nov. 24. He flourished A.D. 570, and was contemporary with SS. Kevin, Mohi Clairenech, Colman of Doiremor, Colman Ela, &c. He is carefully to be distinguished from St. Colman of Cloyne, whose feast is the same day. (Ussher, Ecol. Ant. (wks. vi.), pp. 529-30, and Ind. Chron. A.D. 570; Colgan, Acta SS. 193, col. 1.)

(28) Eala, Ela, or Colmanellus of Lann-elo, (now Lynally, in the barony of Ballycowan, King's County, and diocese of Meath,) Sept. 26. He was son of Beognai, and descended from Eachach son of Muiredhach. From a nearer progenitor St. Colman Ela is called Mocusailni. By his mother Mór he was nephew of St. Columba, and belonged to the race of Conall Gulban son of Niall of the Nine Hostages (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 261). He was born in Glennaichle, now Glenelly, A.D. 555, and was a pupil of Caemhan of Enochtruim. Three churches are associated with his memory, viz. Connor, Muckamore, and Lynally. But his special and best-known foundation was at Lann-Eala, in Ferrecall (now Lynally). Ussher (Ecol. Ant. p. 960) gives a curious account of the way he received the site for this monastery from Aeth Flan, or rather Slaine, prince of Meath. He is said to have owed it to the suggestion of St. Columba, his kinsman, probably about A.D. 580. It is doubtful whether he was bishop or priest, and, if a bishop, whether he became such before or after St. Columba's death. He probably died A.D. 611 (Ann. Tigh.), (Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 97 n., 240 sq., and Adannam, 29, 42; Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 32 n., 52 sq.; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 17 (wks. vi. 529 sq.) and Ind. Chron. A.D. 560, 580, 610; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 235; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 87, c. 56, and Acta SS. 69, c. 21; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 304 sq.; Hardy, Des. Cut. i. 210). Besides the churches already named, and Ahogill, co. Antrim, many places in Ayrshire and Argyleshire were dedicated to his memory (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 305). A life of St. Colman Ela is given by the Bollandists (Acta SS. Sept. tom. i. 664 sq.). Two are contained in Codex D, Prim. Marsh, Lib. Dubl. fol. 129, and Codex E, 3, 11, Trin. Coll. Dubl. fol. 106.

COLMAN (29) Finn, April 4. In the days when it was customary to join companions under one leader for Christian teaching and practice, we find St. Colman Finn, who is invoked "with his twelve companions in Morthreabh Cornea," in the litany of St. Aengus (Colgan, Acta SS. 436 n. 2; Reeves, Adannam, 300). He died A.D. 771, according to the Four Masters, who call him "Colum Finn the anchorite."

(30) Imramha, of Fathan Beg, in Inis Eoghain (now Fahan, in the barony of Inishowen, co. Donegal), July 8. He was of the race of Cairpre Riada, son of Conaire, of the race of Hereimon (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, p. 191, and note). Among the abbats and saints of the church of Fahan, where Colgan says there was at one time a noble monastery, and now there is only a parish church in the diocese of Derry, there is cited, but without date, "S. Colmanus cogn. Imramha," &c., and his feast is marked as July 8. He is placed in the list before St. Murus or Mura, who is usually considered the founder of Fahan, which is from him called Fathan Mura. St. Mura must have died some time before A.D. 658, as that is the date given for the death of Cellach, the successor of St. Mura (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 510, c. 9; Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. 37-8; Ulster Journ. Arch. i. 273).

(31) Itadach, or The Thirsty, March 5. He is a characteristic type of the monkhood in ecclesiastical legend, and dies a martyr to monastic obedience. His name does not appear in the calendars, yet his faithfulness is duly chronicled in the Lives of St. Patrick, by Evinus and Jocelyne, from which Colgan has taken his memoir. In his strict observance of the patrician rule of fasting, he would not quench his thirst in the harvest field, and died in consequence, at a place called Trian Conchobuir. His death took place in the year in which Armagh was founded, probably A.D. 445 (Ussher), but others place it later (Colgan, Acta SS. 476, and Tr. Thaum. 101, c. 165, 163, c. 77; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. c. 17 (wks. vi. 414 sq.); Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. i. 319).

(32) Mór, son of Luachan, June 17. [COLMAN (24) of Linn-Uachaille.]

(33) Muilinn, "of the Mill," Jan. 1. He is said to have been of Doire Chaochain (now Derrykeighan, a parish in the barony of Lower Dunluce, co. Antrim, where the foundations of the old church are still in the old churchyard in the village of Dervock). In St. Aengus's tract on the 'Mothers of the Irish Saints' (Book of Lecan, fol. 43), his mother is given as Bronach the daughter of Milchu, son of Buan, with whom St. Patrick was in captivity. This Bronach is also given as mother of St. Mochaio, or Caelan, (June 23,) of Neudrum, who died A.D. 497, and others, which is the only clue we have to the period when he lived. To account for his name, O'Clery says: "It was in a mill he used to make obeisance to his brethren." (Colgan, Acta SS. 95, col. 2, 756 n. 43; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 3; Reeves, Ecol. Ant. 78-9, 189; O'Hanlon, Ir. Saints, i. 18.)

COLMAN (34) Priscus, A.D. 800. He is not to be found in the calendars, but Hector Boethius gives a Colmanus Priscus, who, with St. Medan, St. Modan, and St. Enchinus, was preacher among the Picts and Scots (Scotor. Hist. lib. viii. fol. 151 A, ed. 1575). Ussher says that he calls him Priscus to distinguish him from St. Colman of Landisfarne (Eccl. Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. p. 220), though Dempster confounds them (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 304).

[J. G.]

He was patron saint of the church of Llangolman (subject to Maenlochog) and of Capel Colman (subject to Llanfihangel Penbedw) in Pembrokeshire (Rees, Welsh Saints, 190). [C. H.]

(35) Stellain, of Tir-di-glas, (now Terryglass, in the barony of Lower Ormond, co. Tipperary,) May 26. The Mart. Doneg. gives Stellain of Tirdaglas, and Colman, as different persons; but Mart. Tallaght has "Colman Stellain Tiridaglass," and they are really "unus et idem sanctus" (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 138). Little appears to be known regarding him; he died A.D. 624 (Colgan, Acta SS. 247 n. 2; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17 (wks. vi. 540); Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 2, 4).

(36) Ua Cluasaigh. This Colman is of unknown parentage and obscure descent. He was Fer-Leghinn, or lecturer in the theological school at Cork, and is best known as the tutor or master of St. Cnmin Foda of Clonfert. On his pupil he wrote a panegyric, which is quoted by the Four Masters at A.D. 661. He wrote also a hymn, which was intended as a protection against the plague; this hymn has been given, with translation and notes, in the Book of Hymns, edited by the late Dr. Todd. He died in time of the pestilence, but in what year it is not ascertained, as the mortality rested on Ireland for a considerable time. Ann. Tigh. gives his obit at A.D. 662, and the Four Mast. the preceding year. (Todd, Book of Hymns, Fasc. i. 86, 93; ii. 121 sq.; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 271-2; Colgan, Acta SS. 149 n. 7.)

(37) Ua Fiachrach, of Senbotha, (now Templeshambo, a parish in the barony of Scarawalsh, co. Wexford,) Oct. 27. He was son of Eochaidh Brec, of the race of Fiachra, son of Eochaidh Muighmhedhoin, and thus was related to Niall, of the Nine Hostages. St. Colman Ua Fiachrach was a contemporary of St. Colman Macduach (Feb. 3), and of St. Maidoc of Ferns (Jan. 31), who flourished in the beginning of the 7th century. The year of his death is unknown, but his festival is Oct. 27. His monastery was situated at the foot of Mount Leinster, where there are the remains of a monastic establishment in the churchyard of Templeshambo. (Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. iii. 2, 5; Bolland, Acta SS. Oct. tom. xii. 904-5; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 287; Colgan, Acta SS. 141 n. 19, 246, c. 15; Journ. Roy. Hist. and Arch. Assoc. Ir. 4 ser. iii. 41 n.)

(38) Uah Eirc, Dec. 5. He was abbat of Clonard, and died A.D. 700. His chief feast was Dec. 5, but he appears to have been also commemorated on Feb. 9. (Colgan, Acta SS. 406, c. 5; Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 327.)

(39) Ua Liathain, doctor, A.D. 725, July 25. This is the entry in Mart. Doneg.; but Mart. Tallaght (Kelly, Cul. Ir. SS. p. xxx.) has "Colman idem ac Mocholmoc h. Fiachrach." Colgan Acta SS. 149 n. 10) calls him bishop of Lisamore and a famous doctor, and says he died about

A.D. 725, which is the year in the Four Mast. when "S. Colman O'Liadain, a select doctor, died."

COLMAN (40) Of Uambach (Huamaccensis), scribe of Armagh: died in the year 725 (Ann. Ult.), Nov. 24. He is sometimes identified with Colman, son of Lenin, of Cluain-Uamba (Cloyne), but erroneously. In the Annals and by the Irish authors he is simply called "Scribe of Armagh," and as such has some Acta S. Patricii, ascribed to him. (Mart. Doneg. by Todd and Reeves, 317; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17 (wks. vi. 375); Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 128, c. 69, 172, n. 50, 218, 294.)

(41) Oct. 1. It is said in Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 265) that this may be Colman, of Cill-mic-Eoghain, who is of the race of Colla-da-Chrioch. And among the saints of the family of the Oirghialli (Oriel), and race of Colla-da-Chrioch, Colgan (Acta SS. 713, c. 4) numbers St. Colman surnamed Kille, son of Eoghain, son of Murdach, &c., and gives his feast as Oct. 1. [J. G.]

COLMUS is said by Camerarius and Dempster to have been a bishop among the Orkney Islands, and is commemorated on March 9, and June 6. But the name probably belongs to two or more individuals, and may be the same as the Colmach, Colman, and Colme, of the Scotch calendars, and of the Litany of Dunkeld (Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 305-6, et al.) [J. G.]

COLONATUS. [COLMAN.] At July 8, there are two entries in the Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 191), first, of "Cele-Clerech, bp., Aedh, and Tadhg," who suffered martyrdom in Uairseburg in Almania; and then of "Kilianus, Colmanus et Colonatus, Totnanus Diaconus;" but Dr. Todd in his learned note shews that the two entries belong to the same persons, namely, to St. Cilian and his companions, who evangelised Würzburg, and suffered there. [CILIAN.] Colonatus is said to have been honoured in the Enzie, Banffshire, "in Ainziã provincia Scotiae." (Camerarius, de Scot. Fort. 147; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 306.) [J. G.]

COLONICA. [See MACARIUS.] [E. W. B.]

COLORBIANUS. [COLARBASUS.]

COLOSSIANUS. [FIRMUS.]

COLUM (COLAM) is the primary form of the name, which becomes also Columbus, Columba, and, as a diminutive, Colman, Colmoc, Columban, and again, with the prefixes Da and Mo, "honoris et singularis deservantiae causa," Dacholmoc and Mocholmoc, or Mocholmog. [COLMAN.] It appears as the proper name of several saints, yet seems always more or less interchangeable with the other forms.

(1) Son of Aedh, of Cuil-Damhain, or Cuil-Briuin, Nov. 8, Dec. 11. On one occasion St. Conall, bp. of Culerathin (now Coleraine), had prepared a hospitable entertainment for St. Columba, and the people had brought countless gifts of food to enrich the feast, but St. Columba refused to taste the gift of Columbus, the son of Aedh, a wise and avaricious man, till he should have repented of his avarice: and, conscience-stricken, Columbus repented (Adamnan, S. Columba, i. c. 35). Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 381 n. 107) has himself no doubt, though he will not assert, that this is St. Columbus of Cuil-Damhain, i.e. Cuil Briuin, whose father is called Aedh Clain by Mar. O'Gorman, and who has a double dedication, viz. at Nov. 8 and Dec. 11. In Mart. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 299, 333) there is given at Nov. 8, "Colum, son of Aedh, of Cuil-Damhain," and at Dec. 11, "Colum, son of Aedh Claen, of Cuil Briuiu."

COLUM (2) of Tirdaglas, Dec. 13. He is often called son of Crimthainn, or of Ui Crimthainn, so that the abbats of Tirdaglas (now Terryglass, in the barony of Lower Ormonde, co. Tipperary) were styled the coarbs of Colum Mac Crimthainn. His father was Ninnidh, son of Nasar, of the race of Cathaoir Mor. He was a pupil of St. Finian at Clonard. He had charge of St. Caemhan of Enachtruim or Annatrim (Nov. 3), Fintan of Clonenagh (Oct. 21), and Mocumin, his own successor at Tirdaglas. After being at Clonenagh for some time with his pupils, apparently before the monastery was founded there by St. Fintan, he went and founded the celebrated monastery of Tirdaglas, about A.D. 548. He is said in his life to have visited Tours, and brought back with him relics from St. Martin's shrine. He died, with so many other saints, in the plague called the Cron chonail, about A.D. 552. (Reeves, Admannan, 186, 332; Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 186 n. 4, 187; Colgan, Acta SS. 113, c. 7, 350, 395, and Tr. Thaum. 457; Usher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 533, 109, 962, Ind. Chron. A.D. 550; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 71; Butler, Lives of the Saints, xii. 259.)

(3) June 4. Cruimthir (priest) Colum, of Domhnach-mor Maighe Imchlaire. This is the entry in Mart. Doneg., but Mart. Tallaght has "Colum Mac Cuana Ernain," if it belongs to the same person. On this day Colgan places the Columbanus or Columba, presbyter of Kill-Ernain (in Meath, or Limerick), who is said to have been one of those who met St. Patrick, as they returned from Rome, and received from him the skin to form the book-satchel: this, Colgan says, remained in the church of Kill-Ernain. (Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 86, c. 93, 130, c. 9, 174 n. 29.)

(4) Priest, of Enach, Sept. 22. It is narrated by St. Adannan (Vit. St. Col. i. c. 2) that when St. Fintan Munna (Oct. 21) was debating with himself as to whether he should go to Iona and join St. Columba, he went before deciding to consult an aged friend, "in sua gente prudentissimum venerandumque clericum," who was called in the Scotch tongue Colum Crag. But as they were deliberating, two of St. Columba's monks, who had come that morning from Derry, arrived and announced St. Columba's death. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 373 n. 22) is of opinion that this Colum Crag was the "Priest of Enach," but can give no account of the designation "crag." Dr. Reeves (Admannan, 19) quotes this opinion of Colgan as probably true in the absence of the specific name from the calendar, and says Enagh, situated beside the lake of the same name, lies about two miles north-east of Derry, in the parish of Clondermot, barony of Tirkeeran, co. Londonderry. Colgan (ibid. 489 n. 29) places him among the disciples of St. Columba, but Lanigan (Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 141, 407) refuses both Colgan's conjecture and Archdall's amplification of it.

(5) Of Inis-Cealtra. This person is often mentioned in Irish history. Yet the details of his life are lost. He had his monastery on one of the islands in Lough Derg, now included in the parish of Inishcaltra, and called the island of seven churches. He died in the Cron Chonail or Yellow Jaundice, A.D. 548 (Four Masters), and is to be distinguished from St. Caimin (March 24) of the same place (Four Mast. by O'Donov. i. 187).

COLUM (6) Of Ros-glanda, Sept. 6. [COLMAN (4) Son of Eochaidh.]

(7) Gobha (the Smith), June 7. St. Columba in Hy is said to have seen the soul of Columba Coilriginus, "taber ferrarius in Mediterranea parte Hiberniae," carried by the angels to the heavenly joys for his abundant alms to the poor. Colgan (Tr. Thaum. 328, 334, 365, 388 n. 13) identifies him with St. Colum or Columba the Smith, who is venerated on June 7, and Dr. Reeves (Admannan, 208 n.) derives Coilriginus from the tribe Calraighe Teathbha, which "gave name to Sliabh gCalraidhe, now Slieve Golry, near Ardagh, in the middle of Longford, not far north of the exact centre of Ireland." [J. G.]

COLUMBA (1), COLUMCILLE, June 9. The life, character, and work of this saint have been exhaustively treated of late years by an Irish and a French author, Reeves and Montalembert, whose treatises leave little to be further done or desired.

St. Columba was the son of Fedhlimidh, son of Fergus Cennfada, and thus descended through Connall Gulban from Niall of the Nine Hostages, monarch of Ireland, his great-great-grandfather: he was also connected with the Dalriads in Scotland through Erca, daughter of Loarne Mor. His mother was Eithne, daughter of Dima, son of Nae, and descended from Cathaer Mor, king of Leinster and afterwards king of Ireland. He was born at Gartan, a wild district in the county of Donegal, on 7th Dec., most probably in the year A.D. 521. He had a brother Iogen, Eogan, or Eugenius, and three sisters, Cuimne, Mincloth, and Sinech. He was baptized by the priest Cruithnechan at Tulach-Dubhglaise, (now Temple-Douglas, about halfway between Gartan and Letterkenny), under the name, first, of Crimthann (wolf), and then of Colum (dove), to which was afterwards added the suffix cille, as some say, from his close attendance at the church of his youthful sojourn, and as others, from the many communities founded and governed by him. His chief instructors were bishop Finnian (Sept. 10) of Moville (by whom he was ordained deacon), the bard Gemman in Leinster, St. Finnian (Dec. 12) of Clonard, and Mòbi Clairenech, [BERCHAN (4)] of Glasnevin, near Dublin. While he was at Clonard with St. Finnian he was ordained to the priesthood by bishop Etchen of Clonfad (Feb. 11), to whom he was sent by St. Finnian for that purpose. Why he was never raised to the episcopate is now a matter of speculation: in the Scholia on the Felire of St. Aengus the Culdee there is a legend relating how the order of the priesthood was conferred by mistake in place of that of the episcopate. (Todd, St. Patrick, 70-1; Book of Obits of C. C. Dublin, Dubl. 1844, p. liv.; Colgan, Acta SS. 306 n. 12.) Bishop Lloyd supposes a political reason, and Lanigan thinks he applied only for the office of chorepiscopus. But Dr. Reeves is of opinion that he really shrank from the responsibilities and many obligations of the highest ecclesiastical rank. His companions at Glasnevin were Comgall, the two Ciarans, the two Brendans, Cainnech, and others who are all included with him in the second order of the Irish saints. When that school was broken up by the plague (A.D. 544) he returned to the north, and at this period we have probably to place the many ecclesiastical and monastic foundations attributed to him in Ireland, his chief favourites being Durrrow and Derry. The reasons usually given for his afterwards leaving Ireland are various. The first is the decision pronounced against him at Tara, by king Diarmaid [referred to at the end of this article]. Another reason assigned is, that king Diarmaid disregarded the sanctuary of St. Columba's protection, and dragging Curran, son of the king of Connaught, from the arms of St. Columba, to whom he had fled for refuge, slew him before his eyes. But whatever the special reasons may have been, he is said to have used his influence to excite a quarrel between the families of the north and south Hy Neill, and the consequence was the battle of Cul-Dreinhne or Cooldrevny, fought in the barony of Carrberry, between Drumcliff and Sligo, on the borders of Ulster and Connaught, A.D. 561, and gained by the Neills of the north, the party of St. Columba. In consequence of St. Columba's participation in this quarrel, a synod was assembled at Teltown in Meath to excommunicate him for his share in shedding Christian blood, and if the sentence of excommunication was not actually pronounced, it was owing to the exertions of St. Brendan of Birr and bishop Finnian of Moville on his behalf. Be it, however, by the advice of St. Molaisi of Devenish (Sept. 12), or by the charge of the synod of Teltown, that he must win as many souls to Christ by his preaching as lives were lost at Cul-Dreinhne, through his own feelings of remorse, or his great desire for the conversion of the heathen—for all these reasons together, or only for the last as imagined by Lanigan, he left Ireland in the year 563, and in the forty-second of his age, and, traversing the sea in a curragh of wickerwork covered with hides, landed with his twelve companions on the small island of I, Hy, I-colum-kille, Iona, or Iona, which is situated about two miles off the south-west extremity of Mull in Argyleshire. There on the border land between the Picts and Scots, and favoured by both, St. Columba founded his monastery, and made it the centre from which he and his followers evangelised the Picts and taught more carefully the Scots, who were already Christians at least in name. Hy was henceforth his chief abode, but he frequently left it for Scotland, where he founded many churches, penetrating northward even to Inverness, and probably farther, and eastward into Buchan, Aberdeenshire, sending his disciples where he himself had not leisure to go. His connexion with Ireland also was not broken off, nor did he visit it as an exiled man; his name is still connected with battles that occurred there, and in A.D. 575 he attended the synod of Drumceatt, with his cousin king Aidan of Dalriada, whom he had crowned in Iona the preceding year. But wherever he went his home was Iona, and from that, as a centre, the enthusiasm and thorough earnestness of his character found the means of establishing Christianity on a firm basis to the north of the Tay and the Clyde. It is unfortunate that, valuable as St. Adamnan's

Life of St. Columba is, it is written rather to extol its subject than to present a picture of the time, so that we can give little chronological sequence to the events of the thirty years and upwards of his sojourn in Iona. From it however we gather that in his monastery he was indefatigable in the work of prayer, teaching, study, and transcription of the Scriptures; people came to him from all quarters, some for bodily aid, but most for their spiritual need; and soon smaller societies had to be formed, as at Hinba (one of the Garveloch Islands), Tyree, and other places, for the requirements of the monastery. He visited king Bruide at Craig-Phadrack, beside Inverness, and established the monastery of Deer in the north-east corner of Aberdeenshire, where he left St. Drostan, so that his churches are traced all over the north of Scotland (Book of Deer, pref.) He also frequently visited Ireland on matters connected with his monasteries, the superintendence of which he retained to the last. He manifested always the greatest favour for the bards and the national poetry of his country; he himself is accounted one of the poets of Ireland, and poems, attributed to him, are preserved and quoted by Dr. Reeves and Montalembert (see also Misc. Arch. Soc. 1 sq.). It is said that one great purpose of his attending the synod of Drumceatt was to defend the bardic order, and its leader, the old and blind Dallan Forgaill (Jan. 29), his friend, from the attempt of king Aidh, son of Ainnire, to banish them from the country (O'Curry, Lect. Anc. Ir. ii. 77, iii. 245). In A.D. 593 he seems to have been visited by sickness, and the angels sent for his soul were stayed but for a time. As the time approached, and the infirmities of age were weighing upon him, he made all preparations for his departure, blessing his monastery, visiting the old scenes, and taking his farewell of even the brute beasts about the monastery. On the Saturday afternoon he was transcribing the thirty-fourth Psalm (Ps. xxxiii. E.V.), and coming to the verse, "They who seek the Lord shall want no manner of thing that is good," he said, "Here I must stop—at the end of this page; what follows let Baithen write." He then left his cell to attend vespers, and, returning at the close, lay down on his couch of stone, and gave his last injunctions to Baithen, till the bell at midnight called them to the nocturnal office. St. Columba was the first to enter the oratory, and when the brethren followed with lights they found the saint prostrate before the altar, and he soon passed away, with a sweet smile upon his face, as though he had merely fallen into a gentle sleep. This, according to Dr. Reeves' computation, was early in the morning of Sunday, June 9, A.D. 597. Dallan Forgaill's elegy, the 'Amra Choluimcille,' could then be sung without fear of exciting pride in St. Columba, and Ireland might justly mourn for one of the best of her sons, and Scotland for one of her greatest benefactors. Dr. Reeves (Adamnan, 276 sq.) gives the lists of 37 dedications in Ireland, 32 among the Albanic Scots, and 21 among the Picts of Scotland, yet these lists are confessedly incomplete. [J. G.]

To the migratory tastes so usual among Hibernian saints Columba added a passionate love of fine manuscripts, and he would incur any amount of risk and trouble in copying them. Having once transcribed a Latin Psalter belonging to abbat Finnian, he was brought to answer for the offence before king Diarmaid at Tara, who in the following words sentenced him to the surrender of his treasure,—“To every book belongs its copy as to every cow its calf.” Columba revenged himself by inciting to arms the powerful clans of his friends and relations, and in the “Battle of the Psalter” Diarmaid was defeated. The precious object of this civil war was afterwards enclosed in a sort of portable shrine, and under the name of Cathach or Cuah was venerated as a palladium in the clan O'Donnell, who for more than a thousand years carried it into their battles as a sure pledge of victory. The history of this relic down to present times, when it was placed in the museum of the Royal Irish Academy, is narrated by Reeves (Adamnan, Introd. p. lxxvii). Sir William Betham's exact account, illustrated by drawings, describes the case as a brass box 9½ inches by 8, and 2 inches deep, the top being a silver plate riveted to one of brass (Betham, Ir. Antiq. Research. 1827, i. 169); but whether the MS. can be so old as the time of Columba is doubted. That sanguinary feud, as well as others into which an excitable temperament betrayed him, appears to have been the principal among the alleged causes of Columba's entering upon a new career of life. It is related that he was charged in the synod of Teltown to win to Christ as many pagan souls as the number of Christians whose death he had occasioned; that he embraced the idea with characteristic ardour, and, establishing himself in Iona, laboured as a missionary both among his Christian countrymen, the Irish Scots, occupying the islands and part of the western coasts of Scotland contiguous to his abode, and also among the heathen Picts of the north and east beyond the great mountain barriers.

Columba occupies in missionary history the entire generation preceding the arrival of Augustine (A.D. 597). The Celtic apostle of Caledonia died the very year in which the Roman mission set foot in the south of Britain. The first abbat of Iona laboured much longer, in a far wider sphere, and personally with more success as well as prodigiously more romance than the first archbishop of Canterbury. His mission, however, although it has become the most famous, was by no means the only attempt made at that period to Christianise the northern parts of this island. Other efforts, either accompanying or following it up in a subsequent generation, are illustrated by the names of Comgal, Mochonna, Cormac, Ernan, Lugneus Mocumin, Baithen, Findchan, Cailtan, Diuni, Drostan, Moluag, Congan, Donnan, Maelrubha (Haddan and Stubbs, i. 116, 121; ii. 107). Adamnan (3, 5, 22) describes him as angelic in appearance, graceful in speech, with a holy joy ever beaming in his face; and from this we may safely picture a noble specimen of the Celtic type without adopting the imaginative portrait drawn by the historian of Western monachism. But while Adamnan implies that he was dove-like in character, according to his name, Montalembert, taking facts into consideration, must be nearer the truth in saying that in temper he was no “Columba,” gentleness being the one virtue that he most lacked; that he was vindictive, passionate, bold, a man of strife, born to be a soldier rather than a monk; full of contradictions and contrasts; tender and irritable, rude and courteous, ironical and compassionate, caressing and imperious, grateful and revengeful. Dr. Reeves, the learned editor of Adamnan, remarks, that if we may judge from the biographical records that have descended to us, primitive Irish ecclesiastics, and especially the superior class commonly known as saints, were very impatient of contradiction and very resentful of injury. Excommunication, fasting against, and cursing, were in frequent employment, and inanimate as well as animate objects are represented as the subjects of their maledictions. St. Columba, who seems to have inherited the high bearing of his race, was not disposed to receive injuries or even affronts in silence (Introd. xxix.). In the language of the French author already quoted, Iona was for two centuries the nursery of bishops, the centre of education, the asylum of religious knowledge, the point of union among the British Isles, the capital and necropolis of the Celtic race. Numerous kings and princes were buried there at the feet of Columba. During these two centuries it retained an uncontested supremacy over all the monasteries and churches of Caledonia and over those of half Ireland. It disputed with the Roman missionaries for authority over the Anglo-Saxons of the north (Mounts of the West, iii. 269, 279). The settlement of Iona was in 801, 805, 877, burnt by the Danes, who were attracted by the offerings lavished upon the tomb of the saint. In the 9th century his remains were removed to Down, and are said to have been laid with those of St. Patrick and St. Bridget. Ussher (De Antiq. Brit. c. xvii.) says that four monastic rules are extant in the old Irish tongue, and amongst them that of St. Columba, which was followed, as may reasonably be assumed, in Scotland and in the churches founded by the Scottish monks among the northern Anglo-Saxons. Montalembert maintains (iii. 282) that there is not sufficient proof of Columba himself having left his disciples a monastic rule distinct from that of the other Celtic monasteries. Until 716 the monks of Iona differed from Rome in the observance of Easter (Bede,

H. E. v. 22). On this point see also ADAMNAN.

COLUMBA (2) A Columba, said to have flourished about A.D. 640, is often given as the first bishop of Dunkeld, and the educator of St. Cuthbert and St. Brigida (Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 15, wks. vi. 248 sq., and Ind. Chron. A.D. 610; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 165; Colgan, Acta SS. 679, c. 4, 690 n. 8). So at first thought Dr. Reeves, on the strength of what seemed good authority, but maturer consideration has convinced him (Adamnan, 6 n., 296-8) that the only Columba connected with Dunkeld is St. Columba of Iona, whose relics were deposited there, and who was honoured as the patron saint (Grub, Eccl. Hist. Scot. i. 129 sq.).

[J. G.]

(3) Another Columba was the son of the Regulus or Lord of Appleby, Congere, Troclyngham and Malenath, all situated in England, who is said to have been raised from the dead, and baptized by St. Blane. He was "in vitâ mirabilis, et miraculis coruscans," and is buried at Dunblane, Perthshire. Whether this was the true reason or not, the see of Dunblane had some rights of property in these places (Fordun, Scotichron. lib. xi. c. 21; Bp. Forbes, Kal. Scott. Saints, 307; and see BLANE).

COLUMBANUS (1) Abbat of Luxeuil and Bobbio, Nov. 21. On this day, in the Murt. Doneg. (by Todd and Reeves, 315), is the entry "Columban, abbat, who was in Italy." Thus simply does the Irish calendar refer to an Irishman whose name is celebrated in France, Switzerland, and Italy, the great champion of public morals at a court notorious for its cruelty and profligacy, the zealous preacher of the Gospel in lands where the Holy Name had been all but forgotten, and the pious founder of monasteries. His life has been written with great care and minuteness by Jonas, of Susa in Piedmont, a monk of his monastery at Bobbio, in the time of Attala and Eustace, his immediate successors, and is now published by Mabillon (in the Acta SS. Ord. St. Bened. tom. ii. sec. ii. 2-26), and by Messingham (Flor. Ins. Sanct., 219-239), who also appends the account of miracles omitted by Jonas, and some additions to his Life (ib. 239-54). Messingham further gives the Rule of St. Columbanus in ten chapters, a short Homily by the saint on the fallaciousness of human life, and some carmina (ib. 403-14). The fullest account of St. Columbanus, his works and writings, is given in Fleming's Collectanea Sacra (fol. Lovan. 1667), which contains Jonas' Life, St. Columbanus' writings, and all that will illustrate the history and character of the abbat of Bobbio. His writings are also contained in Bibl. Mag. Vet. Pat. vol. viii. Paris, 1644, and Bibl. Max. Vet. Pat. vol. xii. Lyons, 1677. His poems were first printed by Goldastus (Paraen. Vet. pars i. 1604). Wright (Bioj. Brit. Lit. 157 sq.) gives a useful notice of the time, place, and form, in which his prose and poetical pieces have been published.

St. Columbanus was born in Leinster in or about A.D. 543, the same year in which Benedict, his great monastic predecessor, died at Monte Cassino. He is said to have been first under St. Sinell, the abbat of Cluain-Inis, in Lough Erne, but his chief training was in the monastery of Bangor, on the coast of Down, under the eye of St. Comgall. There he was educated in all sacred and monastic learning, and there he accepted the monastic vows and habit. At the age, most probably of a little over forty, he was seized with a desire to preach the Gospel beyond the limits of Ireland. Urged by that "ignitum igne Domini desiderium," he wrung an unwilling consent from St. Comgall his master, and with twelve companions crossed over to France, about A.D. 585, making a short visit to Britain as he went. For several years he traversed the country, teaching the faith, but without, to all appearance, building any monastery, till coming to Burgundy and yielding to the solicitations of Gontran, the king, he took up his abode in a deserted part of the Vosges mountains. Wealth from the king he refused, and all his desire was a quiet retreat, where he could bear the cross and follow Christ. He first chose the ruined Roman fort of Anagrates, now Annegray, a hamlet of the commune of Faucongy (Haute-Saône); then, finding the need of a larger foundation, he removed, in A.D. 590 or 591, to the more extensive ruins of the ancient Luxovium, about eight miles distant from Annegray, and clearing the tangled thickets which overspread the once famous Roman watering-place, established his celebrated monastery of Luxeuil, on the confines of Burgundy and Austrasia. But soon he had to erect another monastic establishment at Fontaines, or Fontenay, and divide his monks among these houses. Over each house he placed a superior, who yet was subordinate to himself, and for their management he drew up his well-known Rule, derived no doubt in great measure from his master St. Comgall, and perhaps to some extent too from St. Benedict of Monte Cassino. The great principle of this Rule was obedience, absolute and unreserved; and the next was constant and severe labour, to subdue the flesh, exercise the will in daily self-denial, and at the same time set an example to the people of industry in the cultivation of the soil; the least deviation from the Rule entailed a definite corporal punishment, or a severer form of fast as laid down in the Penitential. (See the Rule given in Messingham, Fleming, and Max. Bibl. Vet. Patr. tom. xii. Lyons, 1677, as noted above; and on it see Montalembert, Monks of the West, ii. 447 sq.; Lanigan, Eccl. Hist. Ir. ii. 267-9; Neander, Gen. Ch. Hist. v. 36-7; Ussher, Eccl. Ant. c. 17, wks. vi. 484 sq.; Fleury, Eccl. Hist. lib. xxxv. sect. 10; Mabillon, Ann. Bened. lib. viii. sect. 17; Butler Lives of the Saints, xi. 438-40; Prim. Ch. Hist. Ir. b. ii. c. 9.) For twenty years in the wooded and all but inaccessible defiles of the Vosges ranges of mountains St. Columbanus laboured with his monks, and all classes of men gathered round him, notwithstanding the severity of his discipline. His own inclination was always to retire into the wood and caves, and hold unrestrained communion with God; but in addition to the claims of his monasteries, Christian zeal and charity asserted their claims and drew him forth into the world. He excited against himself a strong feeling on the part of both the Gallican clergy and the Burgundian court. The cause of the clerical antipathy was twofold. A worldly priesthood could not but feel the reproach of his exceeding earnestness and self-denial, so that his pure severity was a constant accusation of loss of love and truth in them. And going from Ireland, he carried with him the peculiar rites and usages of his mother-church. He would not give up the Irish mode of computing Easter, the Irish tonsure, or the "Cursus Scotorum" he had received from St. Comgall. This gave great offence to the Gallo-Frank clergy, and in A.D. 602 he was arraigned before a synod, where, however, he defended himself with the utmost freedom and force, pleading that if error there was it was not his, but had been received from his fathers, and he asked of them but the licence "to live in silence, in peace and in charity, as I have lived for twelve years, beside the bones of my seventeen departed brethren." At the same time he wrote to pope Gregory the Great several letters on the subject, as afterwards he addressed himself to pope Boniface IV., but with what immediate result we do not hear, though the haughty bearing and generally independent tone, in words and letters, of "Columbanus the sinner" were little calculated to propitiate the favour of either bishops or popes; while at the same time Gregory's very friendly connexion with queen Brunehault would make that pope give little heed to the appeals of the stranger whom she disliked. Indirectly, however, his earnestness had a rousing effect upon the Gallican church. But the opposition he received from the Burgundian court was of a more dangerous character from the influence of the famous Brunehild, or Brunehault. Thierry II., called also Theodoric, was under age, and his grandmother Brunehault not only ruled with violent and arbitrary bearing, but encouraged the young king in every form of vice, and the grossest system of concubinage, so as to retain in her own hand the entire control of the kingdom. Such open profligacy St. Columbanus did not hesitate to reprove by word and writing, and thus he incurred the bitterest enmity of the king, and specially of the queen-mother. When gifts and flattery proved to be in vain, he was first carried prisoner to Besançon, and having escaped from that, he was finally banished from the kingdom, in A.D. 610. He departed from Luxeuil and the other monasteries after twenty years' labour there, never to return. With his Irish monks he was hurried across the country to the Loire, visited St. Martin's tomb at Tours, and at Nantes was to be put on board a vessel to carry him to Ireland. But before leaving he addressed a letter full of the most passionate grief and affectionate tenderness, yet the sternest resolve, to the monks of Luxeuil. Whether he afterwards embarked and was cast upon the shores of Neustria, or found his way inland to that kingdom, is not known, but he next is found at the court of Clotaire II., king of Neustria; thence he proceeded to the court of Theodebert at Metz, king of Austrasia, and brother of Thierry. There he was visited by some of his monks from Luxeuil, but he did not venture again into Burgundy. From Metz he crossed to the Rhine, and, embarking below Mayence, proceeded upwards along the Rhine and its tributary the Aar and Limmat, till he reached the Lake of Zurich. At Tuggen, where the Limmat leaves the Lake of Zurich, he took up his residence, preaching to the Alemanni and Suevoi; but, having given great offence to the idolatrous population there, by destroying their temples and gods, he and his associates had to flee eastward to the Lake of Constance. First he came to Arbon on the west coast of the lake; then, hearing of the ruins of Bregentium, now Bregenz, at the south-east corner of the Constance Lake, he went thither with St. Gall and his other monks, and there spent three years, preaching to the people, and contending with privation and difficulty. When the arms of Thierry prevailed, and Bregenz was brought under the power of Burgundy, having before been under Austrasia, St. Columbanus had again to flee, and leaving St. Gall at Bregenz he himself, with only one disciple, passed southward across the Alps into Lombardy, where he was honourably received by king Agilulf. When he came to Milan, he was soon engaged in a controversy with the Arians who abounded in Lombardy, and about this time he wrote also to the pope Boniface IV. at the suggestion of king Agilulf and his queen Theodelind. In so doing he espoused the cause of the Nestorians, as represented by the "Three Chapters," which had been condemned in the 5th General Council at Constantinople, in A.D. 553, though his zeal seems to have outrun his knowledge, with regard to the true state of parties and the real points at issue. In writing to the pope he used his accustomed freedom of address, entreating him to bring the matter fairly before a synod, defend the Roman church against the charge of heresy, and put an end to the present divisions. Agilulf, in the year 613, presented him with a district in the wild gorges of the Apennines, between Genoa and Milan, not far from the Trebbia, and there he built his celebrated monastery of Bobbio. Thither the messengers of Clotaire II. followed him, and invited him to return to France, now that his enemies were dead, and Neustria, Austrasia, and Burgundy were all under one rule, but the aged saint would not be tempted from Bobbio, and there, on Nov. 21 A.D. 615, he calmly resigned his spirit. (For an account of St. Columbanus's Life and Times, see Lanigan, Ecol. Hist. Ir. ii. c. 13; Ussher, Ecol. Ant. cc. xv. xvii. and Ind. Chron. A.D. 589. 614; Montalembert, Monks of the West, ii. book vii.; Butler, Lives of the SS. xi. 435 sq.; Neander, Gen. Ch. Hist. v. 35 sq.; Milman, Hist. Lit. Ir. B. ii. cc. 8-9; Wright, Biog. Brit. Lit. 142 sq.) In his writings he everywhere gives evidence of sound judgment and solid ecclesiastical learning, of an elegant taste, and deep spiritual discernment, which says much for the man and for the school in which he was educated. This is well pointed out by Moore in his Hist. of Ireland (i. p. 267). "The writings of this eminent man display a varied and extensive acquaintance, not merely with ecclesiastical, but with classical literature. From a passage in his letter to Boniface, it appears that he was acquainted both with the Greek and Hebrew languages; and when it is recollected that he did not leave Ireland till he was nearly fifty years of age, and that his life afterwards was one of constant activity and adventure, the conclusion is obvious, that all his knowledge of elegant literature must have been acquired in the schools of his own country. Such a result from a purely Irish education in the middle of the sixth century, it must be owned, not a little remarkable." [J. G.]

It is the great distinction of Columbanus, as Neander has observed, that he first gave the example at the end of the 6th century of that missionary enterprise in remote countries of the continent of Europe, which was afterwards so largely followed up from England and Ireland. The names of Cilian, Wilfrid, Willebrord, Boniface, Willibald, Willehad, will illustrate this remark. Possibly it was that the monasteries of Ireland were overfilled, Bangor for instance under Comgall, and that thus a foreign direction was given to the restless energy of the native character. Colonies of those pious monks, not finding scope enough at home, would journey forth under the leadership of able abbats, carrying the light of Christianity through the dangerous wilds of continental heathendom. It was about 12 years before the arrival of the Roman mission in England (A.D. 597), and the same before the death of Columba the apostle of Caledonia, that Columbanus, fired perhaps by the example of this energetic missionary, passed over into Gaul.

Columbanus's mission, moreover, made its mark on the times in respect of (1) his monastic Rule and (2) the development of his first great foundation, Luxeuil. As to the former, so eagerly was it adopted that it became at one time doubtful if the Columbanian Order would not become prevalent rather than the Benedictine. The rule of Benedict achieved the ascendancy over its rival, as Montalembert has observed, half a century after the death of Columbanus; and it is interesting to notice that this event just synchronises with the great defeat sustained by the Celtic party in England at the council of Whitby (A.D. 664). The victory of the Benedictine Rule is considered to have been owing partly to the principles upon which it was framed, and to its meeting human nature halfway; but chiefly to its having received the sanction and patronage of the see of Rome, which was naturally not accorded to its rival, an offspring of the Celtic church that was ever so jealously regarded at Rome. The Columbanian Rule is shorter and less distinct, as well as more severe than the Benedictine, with which however it agrees in all essential points. Columbanus's foundation of Luxeuil achieved as great a celebrity as his Rule, and a more enduring one. It became the parent of numerous streams of monastic colonies, which spread through both Burgundies, Rauracia (the ancient bishopric of Basel), Neustria, Champagne, Ponthieu, and the Morini. Luxeuil was in short, as Montalembert expresses it, the monastic capital of Gaul, as well as the first school in Christendom, a nursery of bishops and saints. Nor did it altogether eclipse the splendour of the later foundation in Italy. Bobbio, although it remained for so brief a period under the government of its founder, became a stronghold of orthodoxy against the Arians, and long remained a school of learning for North Italy.

The works of Columbanus, which are contained in Patrick Fleming's Collectanea Sacra (Lovanii, A.D. 1667) are as follows. Prose:—I. Regula Monastica, in 10 short chapters.—II. Regula Coenobialis Fratrum, sive Liber de Quotidianis Poenitentibus Monachorum, in 15 chapters.—III. Sermones sive Instructiones Variæ. These are 17 discourses, of no great length, bearing various titles, the first being "De Deo Uno et Trino;" and the last, "Quod per Viam Humilitatis et Obedientiae Deus quaerendus et sequendus sit."—IV. Liber seu Tractatus de Modo seu Mensura Poenitentiarum, the second title being De Poenitentiarum Mensura Taxanda. It prescribes penances for various sins.—V. Instructio de Octo Vitiis Principalibus; a very short piece, occupying less than a column. The vicia are gula, fornicatio, cupiditas, ira, tristitia, acedia, vana gloria, superbia.—VI. Epistolæ Aliquot ad Diversos. These are five in number: 1. "Ad Bonifacium IV.;" 2. "Ad Patres Synodi cujusdam Gallicanæ super Quaestione Paschæ Congregatæ;" 3. "Ad Discipulos et Monachos suos;" 4. "Ad Bonifacium Papam;" 5. "Ad S. Gregorium Papam."

The letters are especially interesting on account of the information they afford on the dispute between the Roman and Irish churches. In reference to the first of them, see BONIFACIUS IV.

The Poetical Works, Pœmata Quaedam, occupy about 8 pages folio. They range in length from 4 lines to 164, and the metres are both classical and mediæval. The titles of the pieces are as follows:—"Ad Hunaldum;" "Epistola ad Sethum;" "Epistola ad Fedolium;" "Epigramma de Muliere;" "Monosticha;" "Rythmus de Vanitate et Miseriâ Vitæ Mortalis." Each separate piece, both prose and verse, is copiously annotated. [C. H.]

COLUMBANUS (2) ST., or COLOMBAN, was a French poet, and abbat of St. Trudo (St. Trond). He died about the middle of the 9th century. Amongst the works of Rabanus Maurus is a poem or dirge on the death of Charlemagne, written by a certain Coloman, who is supposed to have been the abbat of St. Trond. It is addressed to a bishop named André, not otherwise known, and it is certain that it was written immediately after the death of the prince. To him is also attributed the poem entitled 'De Origine atque primordiis gentis Francorum (stirpis Carolinæ).' It was written about the year 840, and dedicated to Charles the Bold, and published, with the notes of Thomas Aquinas, Paris, 1644, in 4to. Histoire littéraire de la France, iv. 422 and ix.; Patrol. Lat. cvi. p. 1257. [D. R. J.]

COMAIGH (COMAGIA), of Snamhluthair, virgin, May 27. The Book of Lecan gives her genealogy; she was daughter of Eochaidh, and in the 6th generation, through Laeghaire, from Niall of the Nine Hostages. Her mother was Aiglenn, daughter of Linin, of Killiney near Dublin. She is commemorated at Snamhluthair (now Slanore, a townland in the parish of Kilmore and barony of Upper Loughtee, co. Cavan), where she had a monastery, and where her brother Colman is also commemorated [COLMAN (4)], (Reeves, Admann, 172 sq.; Colgan, Tr. Thom. 384 n. 3^a). [J. G.]

COMAIL, British king, slain in battle by the

West Saxons, A.D. 577, at Deorham (A. S. C. ad an.) [C. H.]

COMAN (COMMAN), son of Ernán, March 18. Mart. D. neg. (by Todd and Reeves, 81) calls him bishop, but Colgan in his memoir (Acta SS. 651) calls him only confessor, and seeks to identify him with the "honorabilis presbyter," nephew of Virgoun, with whom St. Adamnan (St. Columb. iii. 20) says he conversed. He was son of Ernán, son of Fiachna, of the famous race of Conal Gulban in Tyrconnel, and Cumin Finn abbat of Hy (Feb. 24) was his brother. Following the example of his brother, and uncle St. Virgoun or Fergna, abbat of Hy (March 2), he too came there as a monk, and was alive in the time of St. Adamnan. But the date of St. Coman's death is unknown, though Colgan says he is the "Coman bishop," who, according to the Four Masters, died A.D. 676; and Ussher, by identifying him with St. Coman of Ferns, puts his obit at A.D. 678, while it is probable that he was identical with neither. (Lanigan, Ecl. Hist. Tr. iii. 12, 128; Ussher, Ecl. Antiq. c. 17, wks. vi. 540; Reeves, Adamnan, 225 n.; Colgan, Tr. Thaum. 386 nn. 21, 22, 480 n. 13, 489 n. 30.) His church is Kilchoman in the Rinns of Islay, and the name appears on the cross at Campbelltown (Bp. Forbes, Kil. Scott. Saints, 307).

[J. G.]

COMASIVS, a rhetor in the 5th century, who turned monk, and still continued in the monastery collecting "the rubbish" of classical Greek literature, for which he is severely rebuked by Nilus (Ep. ii. 73, p. 153; cf. ii. 257, p. 251).

COMDHAN (1) Of Cluain-connaidh, Oct. 13. [COMGAN and CONGAN.]

(2) Of Glenn-Uissen, Feb. 27. [COMGAN.]

COMEGERN, eighth bishop of Llandaff, contemporary with Ywyr, king of Gwynedd (Stubbs, Regist. 156). [C. H.]

COMGALL (CONGALL) (1), abbat of Bangor, May 10. This is one of the most prominent leaders of monasticism in Ireland, and he is said to have had as many as 3000 monks under him at one time in Bangor and affiliated houses. Like so many other of the Irish saints, he had both a Scotch and Irish connexion, but in the Scotch tradition (Brev. Aberd. p. aestiv. f. cxvii.), there is nothing of special importance.
